This sacrifice, let men nowadays say what they will, was made in reference to human guilt. His death was not merely an example, nor simply a display of divine love. "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." His death dealt with our uncleanness: it cleanseth us from all sin. "Once in the end of the world hath He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." And this had reference to God. Jesus did not die to make God merciful, as some falsely say that we teach; but because God was merciful Jesus died, that there might be a clear passage for divine mercy, without the violation of divine justice. Jesus did not die to make God love sinners, for He always did love them; but that His love might be exercised in consistency with holiness it was needful that the law should be vindicated, and the threatening should not become a dead letter.

II. Let us now notice

The Manner of His Entrance.

We are told in the text, "He entered in once into the holy place." Much emphasis is to be laid upon that word "once." It has been done, then, once. Once has He offered up Himself without spot unto God; once has He lifted the veil, and passed into the holy place of fullest fellowship with God on our behalf. It has been done! Jesus has entered in. Our Head and Representative is with God. It is not a thing to be wrought in the future, but it has been accomplished. His sacrifice had an immediate efficacy. On the spot it availed to open the kingdom of heaven. From the cross the Forsaken One entered into His kingdom as the Beloved of God. To prove how complete was the effect of His sacrifice, He went into the heaven of God at once. "It is finished." The proof is that Jesus entered in within the veil.

It means, however, that it was only once. Once only has Jesus made entrance officially into the heavenly places; for, by that one entrance, He has made the way open and manifest. The entrance of our Lord once for all into the holy place has secured the entrance of His people. It was once, and it cannot be twice, because it was so effectual; and this is set forth by the evangelists, for

The Veil was Rent.

The holy of holies was laid open; its enclosure was thrown down. What if I say that the inner shrine has expanded itself and taken in the holy place, and now all places are holy where true hearts seek their God? Had our High Priest merely lifted the veil and passed in, we might have supposed that the veil fell back again; but since the veil of the temple was rent in twain, from the top to the bottom, there can be no need for a new entrance; for that which hinders is taken away. No veil now hangs between God and His chosen people: we may come boldly to the throne of grace. Blessed be the name of our Lord who has entered in "once!"

And now, beloved, He has entered into the holy place once in the sense that He has entered in the fullest and most complete manner. When the High Priest went up to the mercy-seat, he drew near to the symbol of God, but not necessarily near to God Himself. But our Lord Jesus Christ, as Mediator, came so near to God that no nearness could be greater. He always was in His Godhead one with the Father; but as

God and man in one person He is now for ever with God. He saith, "I and My Father are one." The nearness of the God-man Christ Jesus to His Father is something to think upon with reverent pleasure; for, remember, Christ has gone into the glory of the Father, and He has made a way for us to enter into like nearness. The road is open, the access is free; God meets us, and invites us to meet Him. He waits to speak to us, as a man with his friend.

III. But now, thirdly, let us consider

The Objects of His Entrance.

What did our Lord Jesus Christ do by His entrance within the veil? What comes of it? It means, first, that He made atonement within the veil. He cleansed the heavenly places. Albeit that the guilty are taken up to dwell with God, and our poor prayers are accepted of God, neither we nor our prayers carry any defilement into the holy place, because the atoning blood is there beforehand. After heaven hath sucked up into itself so much of the sinnerhood of earth, it remains as pure as it was when only God and His holy angels dwelt therein. While men that were once steeped in sin are permitted to come and sit at the right hand of God, God remains as rigorously righteous as if no guilty one had been forgiven: the great sacrifice has secured this.

Then, next, He enters there to appear for us. He hath gone there to put in an appearance on our behalf. As in a court of law, when a man appears by his attorney or legal representative he is in the court, even though he may be miles away; so are we, to-day, in possession of our eternal inheritance through Him who has put in an appearance for us. God sees His saints in heaven in the person of their glorious representative. In Him we are raised up together, and made to sit together in the heavenly places. Is not this a subject for quiet enjoyment? The Forerunner has for us entered upon the purchased possession.

He is there, next, to perfect us. Look at the tenth chapter and fourteenth verse: "For by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." His one sacrifice hath made the comers thereunto perfect; and to show their perfectness, they enter into the holy place. His work is done, else he would not be within the veil; His being there is proof that everything is complete, and that His people are complete in Him. The set-apart ones are accepted, for He in whom they stand is accepted.

He has entered in once, also, that He may abide there. Look at the twelfth and thirteenth verses of the tenth chapter: "But this man, after He had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till His enemies be made His footstool." Jesus is with God in glory, and always must be there till the purposes of grace are accomplished. He holds a permanent session at the right hand of the Father in everlasting triumph. Till our representative is expelled from heaven, we cannot lose it. As that can never be, look up, O believer, and see where you are, and where you always must be; accepted in the Beloved, made nigh by the blood of Christ!

IV. But now, lastly, let us review

The Glories of His Entrance.

We have seen the sacrifice of our Lord's entrance, the manner of His entrance, and the objects of His entrance; and now let us muse upon the glory of His entrance, which is this: "having obtained eternal redemption." The words, "for us," are supplied by the translators, and therefore we leave them out. Our Lord entered the most holy place "having obtained eternal redemption." When Aaron went in with the blood of bulls and goats, he had not obtained "eternal redemption;" he had only obtained a symbolic and temporary purification for the people, and that was all.

Our Lord enters in because, first, His work is all done. We do not read, "He entered in that He might obtain it," but "having obtained." There is no getting redemption out of the Bible. I bless God for this. Many cannot endure the word, but it is there; and it is redemption by price too—"a mercantile transaction," as they profanely speak. "Ye are bought with a price." Redemption is deliverance through payment: in this case, ransom through one standing in another's stead, and discharging that other's obligations. Brethren, when the Lord Jesus Christ died, He paid our redemption price; and when He entered within the veil, He entered as one who not only desired to give us redemption, but as one who had "obtained eternal redemption." He has won for us redemption both by price and by power.

This is, indeed, a great redemption. We are redeemed from all the bondage that ensued from sin. We are no longer the serfs of Satan, nor the slaves of the world, neither are we subject to bondage through fear of death. That last enemy shall be destroyed, and we know it. The Son hath set us free, and we are free indeed. He entered into the heavenly places with this for His everlasting renown, that He has obtained redemption for His people.

When our Lord entered in, He had by His sacrifice also dealt with eternal things, and not with matters of merely passing importance. He offered Himself by the Eternal Spirit, and by that offering He took off the mortgage from the eternal inheritance, and upon the predestinated possession. Sin, death, hell—these are not temporary things: the atonement deals with these, and hence it is an eternal redemption. Let me cheer the heart of anyone here who is burdened with sin with this reflection, that the redemption of Christ deals with the whole of past sin. From every soul that has by faith part and parcel in this redemption, all the olden curse of the race is gone. You have no cause to fear the ancient past; nothing lies buried there which can ever rise to accuse you. Who shall lay anything to the charge of him for whom Christ has obtained eternal redemption?

Now, look forward into eternity. Behold the vista which has no end! Eternal redemption covers all the peril of this mortal life, and every danger beyond, if such there be. You know not how much you are to be tempted and tried before the end cometh. Peradventure, you will live to extreme old age, and you dread the decay of intellect, and the increase of infirmity; and well you may. Nevertheless, be glad that He has obtained eternal redemption for you. You cannot possibly outlive the redemption of Christ, neither can any temptation for which He has not provided by any possibility assail you.

Leap to the end. Think of the future of prophecy. Anticipate the seven trumpets,

The Pouring Out of the Dread Vials!

You need not fear any of these, seeing your Lord has obtained eternal redemption. Our Lord has obtained eternal redemption for His people, and we shall rest contented even though the star Wormwood should fall, and the waters should be turned into blood, and all these things should be dissolved. When prophecy is all fulfilled, and we pass into the dread future, we fear not death, since our Lord has obtained eternal redemption. "Eternal punishment" is a word of unspeakable terror; but it is met and fully covered by "eternal redemption." Be not afraid, O ye that put your trust in the Lord Jesus as your Sacrifice and Priest! There is nothing in the mystery of eternity that need appal you.

I have done, but let me ask my beloved hearers, one by one, Have you this eternal redemption? Do you believe in the Lord Jesus? He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life, and that is the outcome of eternal redemption. Dost thou believe in the Son of God? Into the holiest of all you may enter; nay, you have entered there already in Jesus, and you are there permanently, because He abides there for ever. Your Substitute, your Covenant Head, your Representative is in the glory, and there thou shalt be ere long. Wherefore, if thou believest in Jesus Christ the Son of God with all thine heart, comfort thyself with these words. Since the veil is rent, hide not thyself from God who unveils Himself to thee. By and by thou shalt be with Him where He is. Rejoice that even now He is with thee where thou art. The Lord bless this congregation, and may we all meet within the veil around the great Forerunner whom we love and adore! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS. TWO THANKSGIVING DINNERS.*

A NEW ENGLAND divine not long since related a personal experience, which, as nearly as the writer can remember, was as follows: While making a round of calls one Thanksgiving Day, he dropped into an "Old Ladies' Home" just at dinner-time. A sumptuous repast was spread before them, and thinking how well they were provided for, the minister stepped up to one old lady and remarked upon the bountiful dinner. "Well, yes; good enough, I suppose, but there ain't no onions." This surprising answer turned the clergyman's thought in the direction of another home, less comfortable than this, where another poor old body lived by herself, and where Thanksgiving turkey was an unknown quantity. He next sought this humble abode, and found the solitary woman dining upon dry corn bread. "Well," said he, "my good sister, you have not much to be thankful for to-day." "Oh, yes I have, sir," she responded, cheerfully; "you don't know how thankful I am that the two teeth the Lord has left me are opposite each other!"

A Clergyman's Conversion.

Who would not say at first sight that Miss Wigton's scope of labor and usefulness was very limited? She was sick, weak, in pain, confined to her room, subsisting upon the benefactions of others; withal she had no superior intellectual gifts, and had very little advantage of education. And yet her influence was felt in the far west of America and in Europe. By the assistance of her friends, she maintained a correspondence with Christians at great distances, who had been profited by her example and conversation. I acted as her amanuensis in writing to a clergyman in the West, who had entered the ministry as a man would enter upon the practice of the law. After a few years of almost utter uselessness, he became acquainted with Miss Wigton. She soon found that he had not the root of the matter in him, that he was destitute of a proper knowledge of salvation, and had no personal interest in the atonement. She commenced to make his deficiencies manifest to himself. He became convinced that he was a sinner. His agony for some time was very great; but with a holy wisdom she led the stricken sinner to the Lamb of God, and there at her feet he was converted, and returned to his people a new man in Christ Jesus, ready to do a great work.

The Students' Charge.

While I was a student at Hampden Sidney College there was a young man in the County of Prince Edward who was afflicted with one of the most painful of all the diseases to which the human frame is liable. It was a spinal affection of the most aggravated character. Being entirely dependent on others for support, it became necessary to make some permanent arrangement which would secure for him the constant attention he required. Through the intervention of some benevolent persons connected with the institution, he was transferred to one of the rooms of Union Theological Seminary, and an arrangement was made by which the students of the Seminary, in turn, waited upon him day and night. After he was transferred to their care I often visited him, and had abundant opportunity of knowing what he suffered, and how he bore the painful visitation to which he was subjected. So contorted was he by his malady that he could not lie in a horizontal position, but was propped up by pillows placed under his head and shoulders; and he was so bent that usually his chin rested on his breast. At times it gave him acute pain to partake of his necessary food. In some way the optic nerve was implicated, and so keenly sensitive did he become to the light that it was necessary to exclude it from his room.

And yet amidst all these complicated and bodily distresses, such was his patience and serenity of spirit, so hopeful, and even cheerful was he in the tone of his conversation, so quick was his sympathy in all that concerned others, that his room, so far from being a place of gloom, or in any way repellent, was an attractive resort to the students of the seminary, and to his friends in the neighboring college. He never murmured, but he often gave thanks. . . . Thus racked and consumed with bodily pains, and thus replenished and comforted by divine grace, he lingered on, until a late hour one night, while absorbed in study, I was startled by hearing the tolling of the bell, which announced that his weary, worn, and emaciated body was at rest, and that his patient un murmuring spirit was among the just made perfect.

HADJI HUSSEIN GOULY KHAN.

(See Portrait.)

FOR the first time in the history of the United States the diplomatic circle at Washington includes a Minister from the ancient empire of Persia. This is Hadji Hussein Gouly Khan, whose portrait appears on this page. He is a very pleasant gentleman, a little below the medium height, and has an olive complexion. He dresses in the Eastern costume, and is always seen, in or out doors, wearing the fez cap, even at his meals, as is the custom in the East. He is much pleased with America, and desires to enlarge commercial and social intercourse between the two countries. The Minister is accompanied by Dr. Torrence, a citizen of Chicago, but for some years a resident of Teheran, as Counselor of Legation; Mizra Mahmoud Khan, private secretary; and a Persian valet, about eighteen years old. His Excellency speaks Persian, Arabic, and French with great volubility. He is a person of much distinction in his own country, having been President of the Court of Justice at Ispahan, and second Secretary of State. He has also been Consul-General of Persia in India.

A VISIT TO THE OLD FARM.

(See Illustration.)

"THAT is the last sight of the dear old flag we will have for a year, I suppose," said Ephraim Sewell, as he leaned over the rail of an Atlantic steamer and watched the Stars and Stripes fading from view astern. "I presume you cannot feel exactly as a Yankee feels in quitting 'the land of the free and the home of the brave,' though you are a citizen, and the most thorough-going patriot I ever met with who was not born on the soil. I guess you have a sneaking idea that you are going home, though you have abjured Queen Victoria and all the works and ways of monarchical institutions. Own up, now, George, I won't give you away in the caucus; ain't your home over yonder?"

"Nonsense!" said George Craycroft; "my home is behind us; I'm going on a visit to England, like yourself. I'm more an American than you are. Your nationality is a mere accident. Your mother happened to be in the U. S. when you were born, that is all. I am an American by my own enlightened volition. If Uncle Sam wants to know who are his best, his most intelligent and faithful friends, he must look for them among those who have come to him of their own accord. Where a man is born don't affect his principles. For pure patriotism give me the naturalized citizen every time."

"You must have been quite a youngster when you came, George. I've known you ten years, and you are not thirty yet, are you? What made you come?"

"Ah! that's a sad story. I've never told it to any one except the dominie, but we've been friends so long I don't mind telling you. I was only fifteen when I left England, but there were not many grown men who knew more about wicked ways than I did. Both my parents died when I was an infant, and I was brought up by my uncle. Somehow I got the idea that as he was not my father he had no right to have a father's control over me. He was strict, there is no doubt about that. I guess he saw I was inclined to be wild, and he drew the reins rather tighter, perhaps, on that account. He had a bad time with me. I have seen the old man almost shed tears when the neighbors told him how I was going on. He would beat me pretty severely, on Solomon's principle that the rod was good for a child. I suppose he did it for the best, but it did not suit me. I only grew more stubborn. I grew to regard him as my natural enemy, and delighted in any ingenious device to torment him. I tormented the neighbors too, but it was chiefly because of the annoyance it gave him when they went to complain that I had killed their cats, or opened their gates and let their cattle loose."

"A regular little pickle, eh?"

"Yes, but nothing exasperated him so much as the way I behaved at family prayers and at church. I am ashamed now, when I think of that. That hurt him worst of all, for the old farmer was very pious, and was a member of the Methodist church, and had been from a lad. Well, I played truant from school so often that he took me away when I was fourteen and apprenticed me, for I would not work on his farm. I chose the worst sort of companions in the little market town, and led a bad life. Boy as I was, I used to drink with them, and once when I had no money I sold my Sunday clothes and drank with the money. I was quite tipsy, and my master went over to the farm and told my uncle about it. I knew what that meant for me, so I ran away to avoid punishment."

"And that was the last you saw of him?"

"No; I had another experience. He had a little daughter, my cousin, you know. She was about three years younger than I, and I loved her. She saved me many a beating, and used to beg me to behave. I had made up my mind to come to America, but I wanted to kiss her good-by first, so I sneaked down to the farm to try to see her, but her mother and father, I suppose, were on the alert and kept her indoors. I was so vexed and mad about it that I tried to set fire to uncle's barn. He caught me just as I was putting the lighted match in, and I had a pretty hard job to get out of his hands. Then I made tracks for Liverpool as quickly as I could, and got a passage across by serving as cabin-boy."

"Well, that was rather an unpromising beginning for such a respectable fellow as you are. Does your firm know that you were drunk before you were fifteen and distinguished yourself as a fire-bug?"

"No, that was not the record I was likely to give them. I told the dominie, though, and you know the kind of man he is. I owe him, under God, all I am. I came to America to carry on the same wild life, but after he got hold of me, I soon learned what that meant. He taught me that sin was a wrong to myself, and led me into the better life. I am going back now, for one thing, to see my uncle and beg his pardon."

"And is the little cousin the other thing?"

The young man blushed, and admitted that he was anxious to see his faithful little friend.

Not many days afterward George Craycroft entered the kitchen of the old farmhouse just as the farmer and his wife and daughter rose from their mid-day meal. The twelve years which had elapsed since they met had made more difference in his appearance than in theirs, and none of them recognized him at the moment.

"Uncle," he said, "I have come to ask you to forgive me; I am your wicked, ungrateful nephew George. I—"

"Gladly, my boy, gladly!" said the old farmer, cutting short George's speech, and holding out his hand. "Say no more about that. Dear!

dear! I'm glad to see you. Mother," turning to his wife, "I believe our prayers are answered. Thank God!"

There was a wedding in that village about three months later, and when George Craycroft once more beheld the Stars and Stripes he had a lady with him whose name was entered on the ship's books as Mrs. Craycroft, and who carried with her to her new home the blessings of father and mother, from which her repentant husband was not excluded.

JOHN BRIGHT'S HOME.

THE death of the distinguished English statesman, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on December 27, 1888, has called forth a remarkable tribute of respectful homage from English newspapers of all shades of politics. Some thirty years ago it was the fashion among Conservatives to speak of him in terms of unmitigated detestation. One prominent Conservative when asked what was his political creed said, "I hate John Bright and all his principles." But after Disraeli had lowered the franchise, and his party had held office without attempting to reverse John Bright's free trade policy, there was less antagonism to the great statesman. His matchless powers of eloquence were recognized, and, above all, his sterling nobility of character was seen and admired. In the House of Commons and in the press his death was deplored by Conservatives and Liberals alike, and his political foes joined his political friends in declaring that "There is a prince and a great man fallen this day."

The accompanying illustration shows One Ash, the modest residence in which John Bright spent his time when not in attendance in Parliament. During the later months of his life, when illness had so reduced his strength that he was unable to walk about the grounds around his house, it was his delight to be pushed around the familiar scene in a wheeled chair, accompanied by his favorite skye-terrier, who, with almost human affection, made himself his constant companion day and night, and lay on the foot of his bed almost to the last hour of his life, manifesting a dejection indicative of her intelligence of his approaching end.

Mr. Bright was buried in the grounds attached to the Friends' meeting-house at Rochdale, which he attended regularly when Parliament was not in session, and he could be at One Ash. The meeting-house is about a mile from One Ash, but the aged statesman never allowed bad weather to prevent his being regularly in his seat every Sunday, taking part in the simple worship. His body lies near those of his first and second wife, his father and stepmother, which are all buried there, though in accordance with Quaker principles, no stone marks their last resting-place. American visitors for many years to come will doubtless pay a respectful visit to that plain burial-ground, for the United States had no more faithful friend in England than John Bright; and it will never be forgotten that in the darkest hour of our country's history his voice, almost alone among men of eminence, was raised in defence of our Government, and his confidence in the eventual triumph of our principles of government never wavered. John Bright's memory belongs not to England alone; he was, above all, a Christian statesman, faithful to his God, and the determined opponent of oppression, war, and injustice, wherever they existed, and the warm advocate and friend of the rights of the poor.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

The Fatal Migration.

THE Hand-Cart Company left New York for Utah—a long and formidable journey at best—but in that instance, through mismanagement and neglect, one of the most fatal expeditions that imprudent man has ever undertaken; and it was not until months had passed away, and another season had come round, that we heard anything of their fate.

And time went on, but my troubles did not lighten. My husband still continued to work at the Mormon office, and after a while his salary was slightly increased from time to time; but still his earnings were altogether inadequate for the support of a family, and I found it absolutely necessary to obtain some employment for myself. It cost me many a long and weary day of search and inquiry, and many a battle with my pride, before I could get anything to do; but at last I was successful; and although my little ones required constant attention, I contrived to add a very decent quota to the scanty family purse. And thus matters continued until the following year, our life of uncertainty and care unchanged.

Little in my life at that time is worth recording; to me it was one long, painful struggle, and any change which could come I felt must be for the better. My experience of Mormonism was of course enlarged as new facts presented themselves to my observation, and by nothing was my faith so much shaken as by the discrepancies between the written and spoken Mormonism, which was presented with fair face to the European Saints and the world at large, and the actual conduct of the Elders.

Toward the end of the year 1857 the difficulties in Utah, and a financial panic in New York, resulted in the discontinuance of the Mormon. My husband was thus thrown out of employment, and, to add to our difficulties, the people for whom I worked suspended business operations. This new trial of our faith, however, was not long; out of apparent evil good came. Released from his obligations to the Apostle and the Mormon paper, my husband now set earnestly to work to obtain a living without the crippling influences of "counsel" or the dictates of those whom his religion taught him unhesitatingly to respect.

I had always believed that if suffered to act for himself his energy was such that he would certainly carve his way to a respectable position in the world. In this I was not deceived, either at the time of which I speak or at a later period, when, in Salt Lake City, he engaged in active business on his own account. In New York, where he had been, by this time, appointed President of the Eastern Mission, and was actively engaged in advocating the claims of the Mormon Church, he sought and found employment on the staff of the Herald, and in connection with other daily papers; and such was his success, that from a condition of dependent misery and poverty we were very soon raised to a position of comparative comfort, and surrounded by every luxury suitable to our station in life; and this position we enjoyed until called upon to leave all and journey across the Plains to Salt Lake.

Our own journey to the City was postponed for awhile; but not long before we set forth I received the long-expected letter which Mary Burton had promised me; and as it contains a vivid picture of a mode of transit—the only mode which could then be used—across the Plains, and shows what people were forced to endure so recently as a few short years ago, I shall reproduce it; for I feel sure that if the reader did not peruse the story in the exact words of my unfortunate friend, he never would believe that in this country, and in our own times, such a terrible tragedy could have been enacted.

There is much in the sufferings of the emigrants of the Hand-cart Company that had its counterpart in the exodus from Nauvoo to Salt Lake, to which we have previously referred, but as the particulars of that journey are not generally known, I will here make a digression, and give some details which the reader can compare with Mary Burton's narrative of the Hand-cart journey. Owing to the persecutions which the Mormons had to undergo in their own territory, the High Council issued a circular to the "Church" throughout the world, dated 20th January, 1846, announcing that the Mormons of Nauvoo had resolved to seek a home beyond the Rocky Mountains, and that the pioneers were to depart in March, for the purpose of putting in early spring crops on the way, building houses, and preparing temporary resting-places for those who were to follow.

On the 2d February a council of the apostles and leading elders was held in Nauvoo, to deliberate upon a speedy departure. It was then thought that upon the breaking up of the ice on the Mississippi, the pioneers would be able to commence their pilgrimage, and before their enemies had any knowledge of their departure they would be some distance on their journey. Captains of hundreds and captains of fifties had been chosen, and these were now instructed to hold themselves in readiness to move at an hour's notice. They, however, did not wait for the breaking up of the ice, but three days later the first company crossed the river on the ice, and on the following day the main body began to move, and during February about 1,200 wagons were transported to the Iowa shore.

The following particulars of the journey are from Colonel Thomas L. Kane's narrative, who, from a feeling of compassion accompanied the pilgrims on their journey, and on more than one occasion rendered them very valuable assistance. He remarks: "They began their march in mid-winter, and by the beginning of February 1846, all of them were on the road, many of the wagons having crossed the Mississippi on the ice. Under the most favorable circumstances, an expedition of this sort, undertaken at such a season of the year, could scarcely fail to be disastrous. But the pioneer company had set out in haste, and were very imperfectly supplied with necessaries. The cold was intense. They moved in the teeth of keen-edged northwest winds, such as sweep down the Iowa peninsula from the ice-bound regions of the timber-shaded Slave Lake, and Lake of the Woods; on the Bald Prairie there, nothing above the dead grass breaks their free course over the hard-rolled hills. Even along the scattered water courses where they broke the thick ice to give their cattle drink, the annual autumn fires had left little wood of value. The party, therefore, often wanted for good camp-fires, the first luxury of all travellers; but to men insufficiently furnished with tents and other appliances of shelter, almost an essential to life. After days of fatigue, their nights were often passed in restless efforts to save themselves from freezing.

"Their stock of food, also, proved inadequate; and as their systems became impoverished, their sufferings from cold increased. Sickened with catarrhal affections, manacled by the fetters of dreadfully acute rheumatism, some contrived for a while to get over the shortening day's march, and drag along some others. But the sign of an impaired circulation soon began to show itself in the liability of all to be dreadfully frost-bitten. About the same time, the strength of their beasts of draught began to fail. The small supply of provender they could carry with them had given out. The winter-bleached prairie straw proved devoid of nourishment; and they could only be kept from starving by the men seeking barks, buds, and other stunted growths of the hollows.

"The spring came at last, but it brought its own share of troubles with it. The months with which it opened proved nearly as trying as the worst of winter. The snow and sleet and rain, which fell, as it appeared to them, without intermission, made the road over the rich prairie soil as impassable as one vast bog of heavy black mud. Sometimes they would fasten the horses and oxen of four or five wagons to one, and attempt to get ahead in this way, taking turns, but at the close of a hard day's toil for themselves and their cattle, they would find themselves only a quarter or half a mile from the place they left in the morning. The heavy rains raised all the water-courses; the most trifling streams were impassable. Wood fit for bridging was often not to be had, and in such cases the only resource was to halt for the freshets to subside, a matter in the case of the head waters of the Clariton, for instance, of over three weeks' delay. The women complained that the health of their children suffered more; and it was the fact that the open winds of March and April brought with them more mortal sickness than the sharpest freezing weather. Graves mark all the line of the first year of the Mormon travel—dispiriting milestones to falling stragglers in the rear.

"It is an error to estimate largely the number of Mormons who died of starvation, strictly speaking. Want developed disease, and made them sink under fatigue and maladies that otherwise would have proved trifling. But only those died of it outright who fell in out-of-the-way places, that the hand of brotherhood could not reach. Among the rest, no such thing as plenty was known, while many went an-hungered. If but a part of a group were supplied with provision, the only result was that the whole went on the half or quarter ration, and this so ungrudgingly and contentedly that, till some crisis of trial to their strength, they were themselves unaware that their health was sinking and their vital force impaired. In a kindred spirit of paternal forecast, others laid out great farms in the wilds, and planted in them the grain saved from their own bread, that there might be harvests for those who should follow them.

"In the summer we arrived at the ferry over the Missouri, a trading-post of the American Fur Company, where they gained a favorable crossing by making a deep cut for the road through the steep right bank, and here, without intermission, the flat-bottomed scows of the villagers plied, crowded with the wagons and cows and sheep and children and furniture of the emigrants, who, in waiting their turn, made the woods around smoke with their crowding camp-fires. The heavy cattle, however—and there were 30,000 at this time on their way westward—had to swim across, which was rendered an exceedingly difficult task through a heavy freshet having swollen the river to a width of about a mile and a half, which dashed past its fierce current as if thrown from a mill-race. In the camp nearest us on the west, I found, as early as the 31st of July, that 37 per cent. of the inhabitants were down with the fever, and a sort of strange scorbutic disease, frequently fatal, which they called the Black Kanker. The camps to the west of us, which were all on the eastern side of the Missouri, were yet worse fated.

"The climate of the entire upper 'Misery Bottom,' as they term it, is, during a considerable part of the summer and autumn, singularly pestiferous. Its rich soil, which is, to a depth far beyond the plough, as flat as the earth of a kitchen garden or compost heap, is annually the force-bed of a vegetation as rank as that of the tropics. To render its fatal fertility the greater, it is everywhere freely watered by springs and creeks and larger streams, that flow into it from both sides. In the season of drought, when the sun enters Virgo, these dry down till they run impure as open sewers, exposing to the day foul broad flats, steaming up thick vapors redolent of death.

"Then the plague raged. I have no means of ascertaining the mortality of the Indians who inhabit the Bottom. In 1845, the year previous, which was not more unhealthy, they lost one-ninth of their number in about two months.

The Mormons were scourged severely. The exceeding mortality among some of them was no doubt in the main attributable to the low state to which their systems had been brought by long-continued endurance of want and hardship. It is to be remembered also that they were the first turners up of the prairie sod, and that this of itself made them liable to the sickness of new countries. It was where their agricultural operations had been most considerable, and in situations on the left bank of the river, where the prevalent southwest winds wafted to them the miasmata of its shores, that disease was most rife.

"In some of these the fever prevailed to such an extent that hardly any escaped it. They let their cows go unmilked; they wanted for voices to raise the Psalm on Sunday; the few who were able to keep their feet, went about among the tents and wagons with food and water, like nurses through the wards of an infirmary. Here, at one time, the digging got behind hand; burials were slow; and you might see women sit in the open tents keeping the flies off their dead children after decomposition had set in.

"At this season I was myself incapacitated for nice observations by an attack of fever—mine was what they call the congestive—that it required the utmost use of all my faculties to recover from. I recall but one fact going far to prove a considerable mortality. Earlier in the season, while going westward with the intention of passing the Rocky Mountains that summer, I had opened, with the assistance of Mermon spades and shovels, a mound on a commanding elevation, the tomb of a warrior of the ancient race, and continuing on my way, had left a deep trench excavated entirely through it. Returning fever-struck to the Papillon Camp, I found it planted close by this spot. It was just forming as I arrived; the first wagon, if I mistake not, having but a day or two halted into place. My first airing upon my convalescence took me to the mound, which, probably to save digging, had been re-adapted to its original purpose. In this brief interval they had filled the trench with bodies, and furrowed the ground with graves around it, like the ploughing of a field. The lengthened sojourn of the Mormons in this insalubrious region was imposed upon them by circumstances over which they had no control.

"The heavy winter of 1846-1847 was the severest of their trials; and if I aimed at rhetorical effect, I would be bound to offer you a minute narrative of its progress, as a sort of climax to my history. But I have, I think, given you enough of Mormon sorrows. We are all of us content to sympathize with a certain extent of suffering; but very few can bear the recurring yet scarcely varied narrative of another's distress without something of impatience. The world is full of grief, and we cannot afford to extend too large a share of our charity, or even of our commiseration, in a single quarter. This winter was the turning-point of the Mormon fortunes; those who lived through it were spared to witness the gradual return of better times, and they now liken it to the passing of a dreary night, since which they have watched the coming of a steadily brightening day."

Such is the summary of Colonel Kane's narrative, and it will be seen from the narrative of Mary Burton, which follows, how similar was the experience with the emigrants of the Hand-cart expedition in 1856.

Holy Ghost Days. By Mrs. M. Baxter.—A volume containing 144 pages. Price, neatly bound in cloth, 35 cents, including postage. Address Manager CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

NOTICE TO READERS OF THY HEALER. On January 1 the size of Thy Healer was reduced to 20 pp., and the price changed from 75 cents to 50 cents. Those whose subscriptions run into 1889 will have their time extended, to credit for the difference in size and price. It is hoped that by reducing the price the circulation will be extended, otherwise it will be a considerable loss. Will not those who have found blessing through its pages recommend it to others?

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE TEMPLE FORETOLD.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. Lesson for April 28; Mark 13: 1-13. Golden Text, Matt. 12: 6.

Christ's Warning against Pride and Covetousness—His Notice of the Widow's Offering—Outweighing in Value all the Others—The Beauties of the Temple Pointed Out to Him—The Glory of the Jews—His Perception of its Degradation—When the Temple Could Rightly be Gloried in—Standing as a Witness for God—Superseded by the Living Temple—The Question of the Disciples—What they Had to Fear More than Wars—Other Signs—Closed Doors Opened to the Gospel—Direction for Times of Persecution.

JESUS had been teaching in the temple, and the common people had heard Him gladly. All His teaching tended to the abasement of man and the exaltation of God. He had warned the people to "beware of the scribes, which love to go in long clothing, and love salutations in the market-places, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and the uppermost rooms at feasts;" everything, in fact, which should attract attention to themselves, and bear indication of their own importance! The same spirit obtains in the present day. How many there are who will spend any amount on clothing, in the hope that it will ensure them more respect! And yet their grammar, their abuse of the letter h, and, far more still, their vulgar selfishness, betray them. How many there are who love salutations, especially from rich or titled people, and speak of their acquaintance with Lord so and so, or some other distinguished personage, as though it reflected some credit on themselves! How many love the chief seats in the synagogues, and like to be churchwardens in the church, or deacons in the chapel, even when their names are not written in heaven; and the chief seats at feasts when they do not yet know if they shall be shut out from the marriage supper of the Lamb! These, whose affections are all set upon themselves, have no heart for others; "they devour widows' houses," are hard upon their workmen, and all with whom they have to do. They "for a pretence make long prayers; these shall receive the greater damnation." In immediate contrast with these comes amidst the throng of those who cast money into the treasury. Rich merchants put in gold, the elders of the people did what was expected of them. But this one was specially known to the Searcher of all hearts, the God of the widow; she cast in only two mites, which make a farthing. It was in itself a gift hardly worth reckoning, but it was, in the sight of God, a gift which outweighed in value all the gold and silver which was cast in. The widow went home to an empty cupboard, but conscious that God had her All.

There were no salutations in the market-place for her, neither uppermost nor lowermost rooms at feasts, but there was the joy that God had her all, and accepted it and herself with it; she had sought first the kingdom of God, and she trusted that all other things should be added to her. And Jesus said to His disciples, "Verily, I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury; for all they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living."

"And as He went out of the temple, one of His disciples saith unto Him, Master, see what manner of stones and what buildings are here!" Poor human nature will always find something to glory in. If it is not the long or the rich clothing, the chief seats in the synagogues, or at the feasts, if it is not the salutations, and the notice they attract, then it will fall back upon the church architecture as a means of self-glory. The temple was the glory of the Jews, it was spoken of by the heathen as one of the wonders of the world, and the Jews of our Lord's time took credit to themselves for the restoration of the temple under Herod the Great. But Jesus saw not as man saw. Under the symbolism of the temple and its worship He saw great realities which His disciples were too earthly minded to discover. He saw a house of prayer for all nations degraded to become an object which ministered to human pride. When it was first built, the greatest and most glorious of Israel's kings dedicated it as a house of prayer, by there leading the prayers of his people in person, bowing in heart and spirit before God. Then the glory was not in the stones of the temple, but in God's presence there. At

"it came even to pass, as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord; and when they lifted up their voices with the trumpets and cymbals and instruments of music, and praised the Lord, saying, For He is good: for His mercy endureth for ever; that then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord; so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God." A God who dwelt with His people! This was something to glory in. Oh, how different from buildings and stones! There is something heart-breaking when we hear one and another boasting of his beautiful church, and splendid choir, or beautiful chapel with cushioned seats, and eloquent preacher—but with no record of an indwelling God who answers prayer, no record of immortal souls snatched as brands from the burning! The disciples looked with proud satisfaction on what was about to be destroyed. The outer temple was, after all, but a scaffolding, a temporary thing, whereas there is "a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (II Cor. 5: 1), built up of living stones, once lost souls, but now "an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." (I Peter 2: 5.)

"Jesus, answering, said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." Such is the end of all that is earthly. If we live in the light of eternity, it is wonderful how small and unimportant all these external things become. As the permanent building rises, the scaffold comes down, it has served its purpose, and is needed no more. The temple was a witness for God until Christ came to lay the foundation of

His Living Temple.

Oh how we need to be delivered from externalism, from laying stress on mere outside things! Many a church has been full of blessing and rich in soul-winning when the place of meeting was like the stable in Bethlehem, poor and despised, but as soon as some grand church was built to replace it, the prayer-meetings fell off, the conversions became few; it was too fashionable for the humble Carpenter of Nazareth. In the lowly place, the widow who gives her mite is honored; in the gorgeous church there is no room for her, but only for those who love salutations, and for a pretence make long prayers; but the glory is not there, man takes too prominent a place.

The disciples were silenced for the time, but the more inquiring among them, "Peter and James and John and Andrew, asked Him privately, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled? And Jesus, answering them, began to say, Take heed lest any man deceive you. For many shall come in My name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many. And when ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars, be ye not troubled, for such things must needs be; but the end shall not be yet." This would seem a strange answer if we did not find in St. Matthew's gospel that they had asked also, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the age?" "Take heed, lest any man deceive you." God does not call us to follow man's theories about His coming, but He does expect us to know intelligently all which He says about His coming. Men may deceive us, and the deceivers we are to beware of are such as come in His name, saying, "I am Christ," like the poor deluded man who is the head of the Agapemone, or Mr. G. Monod, or the Mahdi. These far more than wars and rumors of wars. In the time of war, there may be loss of property, but a true Christian has nothing which he counts as really his own; there may be changes of government, but he looks above, and recognizes a King of kings and a Lord of lords; such things are not to trouble him; the end which he longs for, when Christ shall reign, will have more distinct signs than this: "Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be earthquakes in divers places; these are the beginnings of sorrows." All these things have been more or less common to the whole dispensation. But no doubt the greater frequency and violence of these things points to the approaching end of the age.

Next He speaks of persecution as a mark of discipleship throughout the dispensation, "Ye shall be brought before rulers and kings for My sake, for a testimony against them." Perhaps the only chance Felix and Agrippa ever had to hear the gospel faithfully preached was when Paul was brought before each of them; and wherever the gospel is faithfully preached Christ's witnesses have to appear before the civil and ecclesiastical tribunals at some time or other. Christ and the world never could agree, and never will. "And the gospel must first be published among all nations." We almost hold our breath to listen,

His Coming Must be so Near.

The doors of all the nations, closed for the most part thirty years ago against the gospel, are now thrown wide open, China itself is open from end to end to Christian teachers, and those who formerly went out one or two in a year, are now going out by hundreds. Surely the end is near.

Jesus makes a promise so precious, and, where it has been put to the proof, so infallible, that it is a wonder any Christians have substituted the miserable policy of civil law and human wisdom to supersede it, "When they shall lead you, and deliver you up, take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate, but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye; for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost;" or, "I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist." (Luke 21: 15.) But who dares thus to trust the living God? Who is there that is courageous enough to trust God for His defence? Alas, alas! we might write "Ichabod" over the Christianity of the day, and say, "The glory is departed." But, thank God, He is not departed, God is still with us; let us return to the old simplicity of the gospel, the old simplicity of faith, and though we may be misunderstood, and hated of all men for Christ's sake, yet "he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved." We can never expect the world to understand us, "the world knoweth us not because it knew Him not," and the world hates all that is not of its own. Let it keep the glory of its buildings and its stones, but let our glory be an indwelling God and a coming King.

“FOR MY SAKE.”

Three little words, but full of tenderest meaning;
Three little words the heart can scarcely hold;
Three little words, but on their import dwelling
What wealth of love do they unfold!

“For my sake” cheer the suffering, help the needy;
On earth this was my work, I give it thee;
If thou wouldst follow in thy Master’s footsteps,
Take my cross, and learn of me.

“For my sake” let the harsh word die unuttered
That trembles on the swift impetuous tongue;
“For my sake” check the quick rebellious feeling
Which rises when thy brother does thee wrong.

“For my sake” press thou with patience onward,
Although the race be hard, the battle long;
Within my Father’s house are many mansions,
There thou shalt rest, and join the victor’s song.

And if in coming days the world revile thee,
If “for my sake” thou suffer pain and loss,
Bear on, faint heart, thy Master went before thee,
They only wear His crown who share His cross.

MR. F. S. ARNOT,

Missionary Explorer in Central Africa.

At various times incidents connected with Mr. F. S. Arnot's work in Africa have appeared in these pages, and we are now able to give the portrait of the intrepid missionary explorer, and a fuller account of his latest journey. Probably few men now living have furnished a more complete proof of God's care of His servants. Mr. Arnot penetrated into the interior of Africa unprotected, with no show of arms, and accompanied only by natives, trusting in God for support and guidance. In both his journeys he was kept in safety, and he is now starting on his third journey, relying on the same omniscient and all-sufficient Power.

Frederick Stanley Arnot is about thirty years of age. He was born in Glasgow, and is the son of pious parents. In his youth he had the privilege of listening to a lecture by Dr. Livingstone, and from that time his earnest desire was to give his life to the cause of Christ in Africa. When school life was ended, young Arnot was put to business, in which he displayed such industry and sagacity that when he was only a youth he was sent as an agent of the Glasgow firm by which he was employed, to represent them.

In South and West Africa.

But he soon gave up all thoughts of prosecuting what was undoubtedly a most promising commercial career, that he might carry the good news of the Gospel to the unevangelized millions of the interior. Throwing himself, therefore, entirely on the Lord for guidance and support, he went forward on his beneficent and Christ-like errand. This was in 1881, when Mr. Arnot was only twenty-two years old; and after having qualified himself as well as he could for helping the people of the interior of the Continent, Mr. Arnot set out to reach the tribes north of the great river Zambesi. His object was to reach the high water-shed of Africa, thinking it would be possible to find some healthy country, habitable by Europeans, where missionaries could carry on preliminary work in training natives for evangelizing the people who reside in the lower and less healthy parts.

He Started From Natal

by the ordinary bullock wagon, and succeeded in reaching the first native station at Shoshong. The missionaries of the London Missionary and Wesleyan Methodist Societies at Shoshong have for some time been greatly blessed. The young native Christians go out in all directions to the villages, and carry the gospel message to their fellow-countrymen. Mr. Arnot saw there that the only way to evangelize Africa is by means of Africans themselves.

He had no proper means of crossing the desert, but he secured three donkeys, and was planning a start on foot, when the great Christian chief Khama came to his help. He became interested in the mission, and placed at Mr. Arnot's disposal his own wagon, with twenty oxen and some of his men, to accompany him as far as they could towards Zambesi. This chief Khama not only desires to see the gospel prosper in his own country, but to carry it forward to those in the regions beyond. "We succeeded in crossing the first part of the desert," says Mr. Arnot, "and, after many delays, we started on the most trying part of the desert journey." They soon travelled past the springs of water, and got into

The Great Untrodden Region.

They pushed on day and night, not knowing when or how they would reach water, but hoping to strike it somewhere. "At this time, says the missionary, "we were dependent on a few Bushmen, who provided us with water. These inhabitants of the desert, about four feet in height, are supposed to be amongst the lowest types of humanity in existence, yet we found them capable of wonderful kindness. They came and dug pits alongside of our wagon. At the bottom of these they sank long, hollow reeds, which acted as a kind of artesian well. By and by we reached a spot where good, sweet water was fairly plentiful."

Presently it was found that the party could not proceed with the oxen, owing to which is fatal to them. The oxen and wagon, therefore, had to return, and the young explorer had to look about for means of transport on foot. He was able to muster twenty men in all, gathered from the villages. Each man carried a supply of water, and off they started. The first point of destination aimed at was the river Chobe, a tributary of the Zambesi. The country, however, proved very difficult to travel through. The water supply became less and less, and it had to be served out in cupfuls. At one point they hoped to reach a pool where they expected to find water. Just before they got there they came on the track of elephants; the animals had been to the pool and had drained it of its last drop. The men were completely discouraged; they threw down their loads, and from the look of things, Mr. Arnot saw no chance of starting again unless water could be obtained. They went out in all directions

In Search of Water.

At last they came back more cast down than ever; no signs of water had been seen, and there seemed no hope of life to the men unless they ran away and left their loads behind them. One lad, however, who had gone out in a different direction, fell in with some Bushmen, who were on the trail of elephants. Meeting the boy, they left the trail and took him to one of their own deposits of water in the desert. They fill ostrich shells with water and bury them in the sand, so that they can be found when needed. These men took some of the water to the white man and his famished party, and they were so refreshed and invigorated by it that they were enabled to start and traverse the remaining sixty miles that lay between them and the river Chobe. "You can imagine," writes Mr. Arnot, "the effect it had upon us when we saw the great rolling stream. We sat down on the bank, and, like children, gazed at the river; and though we could only swallow a few cupfuls, we felt as though we would like to drink bucketfuls, after our long journey of two months."

The party rested at this river about ten days, and, starting again, at length reached the Zambesi. While turning over in his mind what God would have him next do, and whither he ought to go, Mr. Arnot was told that some distance up the river there lived a powerful chief, Liwanika, who was paramount ruler over all the country to the north of the Zambesi; and that no one could cross the river without his permission. The white traveller sent a courteous message to him, and immediately he sent down three boats for the party. Meantime, Mr. Arnot had returned to Panda-ma-tenka, to procure some things necessary for the journey up the river. On his way back to the Zambesi he was struck down with his first touch of African Fever.

He thus describes it: "It comes so suddenly that before one knows its effect, he is unconscious. We were nearly half-way on our journey when I was seized. I was behind my party, and had with me only a little boy. I felt myself growing more and more unfit to travel, and I was obliged to lie down, sending the boy after the carriers, to call them back. He missed them, however, as, not knowing I was so ill, and thinking that I would follow on, they had pushed on for the river, without any instructions from me. The lad started a second time to find them. He went on all that night and till about 11 o'clock next day, through a country which was literally infested with wild animals. He had really run the whole of the way—fully thirty miles. When he reached the station he told a trader that I was out in the desert, dying. There I lay until the third day, when a messenger that the trader had sent reached me. This kind man found me in a desperate condition from thirst and fever. My tongue was swollen so that I could not speak a word, and I was so feeble that they had to lift me up and nurse me for five weeks. It was entirely owing to the kindness of that little boy that my life was saved at that time. On recovering strength, I started back to the Zambesi, and the king's boats reached that point on the river two days after my arrival. These five weeks of sickness had not been lost time after all, as I was in plenty of time to meet the messengers from the king."

Liwanika Cordially Welcomed Arnot, and was willing that he should remain in his capital. He did not at all approve of the white visitor going to the north, though he acknowledged it was a very healthy country. It was inhabited by a class of people whom he called his "dogs;" they were reserved by him to be raided upon at his pleasure, and to replenish his own villages as he desired. So the traveller thought it was better to remain there for a few months, to see how things would be ordered by God, meanwhile learning the language, and gathering strength, as far as it was possible to do so in such a country.

This particular region, it seems, is called the Barosse country, and here Mr. Arnot found Mr. and Mrs. Coillard, of the French Mission, enduring for Christ's sake hardships and privations scarcely credible.

Mr. Arnot returned a second time to Panda-ma-tenka, hoping to hear of the arrival of a friend who had promised to join him in his missionary work. He was disappointed in this, and resolved to go towards the West Coast. On the way thither he passed through

A Most Interesting Country.

He says: "My idea of Africa had been that of a land very much desert, or else marshy and almost uninhabitable. But here was a region, rich, fertile, and beautiful, well watered, and, better still, with many people living all along the banks of the rivers. At one place, among the Bakuti, it was remarkable how the people seemed to open their ears and hearts, and gave their time. I spent ten days among them. The first five I went among their villages, having large meetings, at which I told them of Jesus and His love. As I could speak a dialect which many of them understood I could explain myself quite freely to them. They became very much interested in what they heard me say, and they said among themselves, 'We are only tiring the white man out by coming day after day to our villages; we will go to him.' So, for the last five days, we had

All-Day Meetings

--a most extraordinary time, I might say, for Africa. They kept up the discussions among themselves, and before I left, at least two of the men stood up in the midst of their tribe, and declared for Jesus before all their friends, in their own simple language. They acknowledged that the things that we said to them were true, and they renounced their superstitions and fetish worship. Since then I have heard that they are still longing for a return visit from me, or that some other white teacher should go to their country."

While on his journey there was a chief who had heard about the God and Saviour of whom the white man had been telling the people, and was so intensely interested that he came forward to meet Mr. Arnot. He said, almost as soon as the meeting took place: "All the huntsmen have been called in; the women are in from the fields; we are all here, and we want you at once to begin your conversation with us about the Great Spirit, and those things you have been talking of along the road." And talking with them for some hours, the chief

He went up to the village and coned with these poor old broken-down people, the scene was most touching. oceeding, Mr. Arnot came upon a very in- rious people. he remainder of the journey to the Lualaba er, which is one of the main sources of the go, was accomplished by forced marches, and pite of many impediments. From the Lual- the missionary sent on two messengers to is ruler of that great and populous district. s answer was propitious, but before Mr. Ar- could reach Moshide's court, some Arabs come there who tried to prejudice the king inst the white man. The Arabs, being the at slave traders, have a dread of the coming white traveler, having learned by experience t where he comes, their trade is menaced. y succeeded in exciting the suspicions of the ple, so that Mr. Arnot on his arrival had to nto a kind of quarantine for six days, so t they might test whether his heart was as te as his skin. The doctors and medicine- went through their ceremonies, making ocutions with a certain kind of bark in it. If y found, each morning, that the wood was nd, that proved that the heart of the visitor ound. If the wood proved to be rotten, t would show that the heart of the visitor rotten. Happily it turned out in his favor, t the order was given that the people should ber and give him a grand reception. Three s were occupied in gathering the people to- her. Then he had to march down through m and receive a military salute. In the cen- of the court was the chief, surrounded by his wives, and the reception was imposing and ressive. "I cannot say the king is a Chris- t," writes Mr. Arnot, after staying with him some time, "but he has opened his ear to d's word, and is willing to listen."

Mr. Arnot was reinforced in 1887 by Mr. an, from Sunderland, and Mr. Faulkner, from ada, and for some months they enjoyed mu- l fellowship and labor in the Gareganze ntry, where they now are at work for the ster. Gareganze borders on Katanga, not from Lake Tanganyika. "The object I had view in going to Africa, namely, to establish tion in a healthy part of the interior, was mplished after seven years," says Mr. Arnot. lthough I travelled without a white or even ack companion, and with no body-guard or show of arms, I never received any ill-treatment. Repeatedly the natives expressed their joy and satisfaction at the way I had treated them by coming amongst them with open hands. As the result of seven years' experience, I would say that you could go anywhere in Africa, if you only go in peace and love. I pray that God may thrust forth more laborers into Africa."

It appears that the African tribes who possess cattle are devoted to them, and in their defence become brave and warlike. Sharing the vicissitudes of life together, in times of war and peace, a strong attachment springs up between herdsmen and cattle. 3.—A Remarkable Adventure with a Lion. Mr. Arnot thus describes the incident: "While resting near the Lukuruwe River, near Mirambo, we had quite a remarkable adventure with a lion, which but for the protecting care of God would have ended more seriously. All night we were kept awake more or less by three lions serenading us, and the lads had enough to do to keep their bivouac fires burning. I, however, got a good night's rest. Next morning, when passing through a clump of long reedy grass, I heard distinctly in front the low,

Angry Growl of a Lion.

The man who was before me stopped, saying it was a buffalo, and asked for my gun that he might shoot it. I urged him to push on, and tried to prevent the three boys from stopping, but it was too late to avoid the brute's charge. He made straight at the hindmost lad, who was carrying my mat and blanket. I ran back, and succeeded in intercepting him, so that in his spring he fell short a few feet from his intended victim, and before my very face—too near, indeed, to allow me time to use my rifle. The man and the three lads dropped their loads, and were off like deer, leaving me and my royal friend alone in the reed thicket face to face. For a moment it was a question what the next scene would be. He was raging fiercely, and would fain have sprung on me, but seemed to lack the nerve. Holding him hard with my eyes, and slowly cocking my rifle, I lifted it to my shoulder for a steady aim, when he suddenly gave in, his huge tail dropped, and drawing his teeth under his lips he made off. Daniel's God is still the same to us. All God has been to His people in ages past, and all He has promised to be throughout eternity, He now is to us—"This God is our God."—4. Mode of crossing an African river on the back of an Ox: not a desirable means of locomotion, as the accounts of those who have tried it show; and 5.—The American Missionaries' Tent at Bailundu, between Benguela and Bihe, in the western part of Central Africa, through which Mr. Arnot passed on his way to Gareganze.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Visit to the Blue Grotto of Capri.—Mr. W. A. Campbell said: "Some years ago I, with some friends, was visiting Naples. While there we heard much of the famous Blue Grotto of Capri, and one day we hired a boat, and set out to see it. We knew very little about boats, especially of the kind in which we were then sailing, but we could plainly see that they had very little grip on the water, and would not be safe on a rough sea. We saw the Grotto, and were on our return voyage when a storm came on. As the wind increased and the sea rose, our worst fears were fulfilled. The boat made scarcely any progress. To add to our alarm the sailors seemed disorganized, and making very faint efforts to manage her, and we were debarred even from giving advice, as none of us could talk Italian. We were momentarily expecting nothing less than to be capsized, and I, with a feeble effort at cheerfulness, was saying something about our taking off our boots and coats and trying to swim to shore, which, as we looked at the bare and rugged rocks seemed far from pleasant, when suddenly our boat rounded a point, and we found ourselves in a safe harbor. We did not know of the harbor, but the captain of our boat did, and when to us all hope seemed gone, and there was nothing before us but a desperate and almost helpless struggle for life, he guided us into safety. Similarly, some Christians, out in the sea of adversity, look round and see only, as it were, the bare, jagged rocks. They almost despair. But the Lord Jesus, with a touch of His guiding hand, will steer their boat into the safe harbor of His gracious protection, which is always close by, though the imperilled voyager knows not of it."

Grapes Coming Back.—St. Macarius, the hermit, lived in the desert in a little community of solitaires. One day there was brought to him that which in the hot desert is the most tempting and exquisite of all luxuries, a bunch of fresh purple grapes, with the bloom and mist of their delicious ripeness upon them. Macarius hated the thought of taking them himself; he handed them to one of the brothers, but the same motive was strong in him, and he gave them to another. But again, this other preferred the enjoyment of a companion to his own; and so, in the absolute unselfishness of that community, the untouched, tempting grapes were handed from one to another, none wishing to keep what would be pleasant to his fellow, till at last they were handed back to Macarius again. Unselfishness had become as completely the law of that little brotherhood as selfishness is the law of the common world.

A French Laborer, Painfully Anxious About the fate of his little family should death take him away, one day found in a bush two birds' nests near each other. Constantly he watched them, till he saw a hawk pounce upon, and destroy the parent birds belonging to one of them. Sadly distressed, thinking that the fate of the little birds betokened the fate of his own little children, in the event of their losing him, he avoided the place for some time, but at last was drawn to look at the nest, expecting to find the fledgelings starved to death, but, to his surprise, they were alive and healthy. Standing by in astonishment he saw the parents of the other brood equally distribute the food they brought between their own young ones and the orphan birds, and took comfort in believing that the great Father would provide in a similar way for His children. So in truth should all the victims of want and woe find rescue and remedy for their sadness and their sorrow.

Story of the Heroic George Audley.—Mr. McKay said: "One stormy night the fisher-folk of Peterhead, on the East of Aberdeenshire, saw a large ship unable to battle with the wind and waves, being driven on to the rocks. No life-boat was at hand, nor would it have been of any use if there had been. The ship was plainly doomed, but thanks to the rocket apparatus the crew might still be saved. From a high cliff they discharged rocket after rocket, but all seemed to fall short. As the fated ship drifted nearer and nearer the shore, they distinctly saw three or four rocket lines fall on board, but the crew made no effort to use them. Either they did not know their use, or were too benumbed to avail themselves of them. George Audley had been on the cliff with the others, but suddenly he appeared on the shore, stripped. Then before anyone could interfere, he plunged into the raging sea. At last he gained the ship and was drawn on board. At once he set to work drawing in the lines of the rockets, and presently a good stout cable stretched between the ship and the shore. Upon this a cradle was swung and drawn to the ship, and one by one, the poor weary, half-drowned sailors were pulled to the shore, and, last of all, George Audley himself, almost dead with fatigue and exposure, but still living. What a cheer burst from the people as he was helped out of the cradle. How many poor sinners are being dashed on the rocks of distraction. But see through the sea of death and sin there comes a Saviour. The strong cable of faith is soon established between the ship of Mansoul and the golden shore."

THE SLAUGHTER.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached at St. Louis, Mo., Last Sunday, April 7, 1889.

"As an ox to the slaughter."—Prov. 7:22.

The Ox an Unwitting Victim—Young Men Unconscious of their Peril—I. Society Slaughtering—The Ethics of Debt—Vagabond Debtors—A Leaf from Experience—The Misery of the Hunted Debtor—II. Irreligion Slaughtering—The Victim's Bible Captured—The Worst of all Larcenies—Where the Slaughtered Are—How to Stop the Slaughter—A Young Man's Bulwarks—The God-Given Outfit—A Young Englishman at the Tabernacle—Ole Bull's Watch.

THERE is nothing in the voice or manner of the butcher to indicate to the ox that there is death ahead. The ox thinks he is going on to a rich pasture-field of clover, where all day long he will revel in the herbaceous luxuriance; but after a while the men and the boys close in upon him with sticks and stones and shouting, and drive him through bars and into a doorway, where he is fastened, and with a well-aimed stroke the axe falls him; and so the anticipation of the redolent pasture-field is completely disappointed. So many a young man has been driven on by temptation to what he thought would be paradisiacal enjoyment; but after a while, influences with darker hue and swarthier arm close in upon him, and he finds that instead of making an excursion into a garden, he has gone "as an ox to the slaughter."

Slaughtered by Society.

I. We are apt to blame young men for being destroyed, when we ought to blame the influences that destroy them. Society slaughters a great many young men by the behest, "You must keep up appearances; whatever be your salary, you must dress as well as others; you must wine and brandy as many friends, you must smoke as costly cigars, you must give as expensive entertainments, and you must live in as fashionable a boarding-house. If you haven't the money, borrow. If you can't borrow, make a false entry, or subtract here and there a bill from a bundle of bank bills; you will only have to make the deception a little while; in a few months, or in a year or two, you can make all right. Nobody will be hurt by it; nobody will be the wiser. You yourself will not be damaged." By that awful process a hundred thousand men have been slaughtered for time and slaughtered for eternity.

Suppose you borrow. There is nothing wrong about borrowing money. There is hardly a man in the house but has sometimes borrowed money. Vast estates have been built on a borrowed dollar. But there are two kinds of Borrowed Money.

Money borrowed for the purpose of starting or keeping up legitimate enterprise and expense, and money borrowed to get that which you can do without. The first is right, the other is wrong. If you have money enough of your own to buy a coat, however plain, and then you borrow money for a dandy's outfit, you have taken the first revolution of the wheel down grade. Borrow for the necessities; that may be well. Borrow for the luxuries; that tips your prospects over in the wrong direction.

The Bible distinctly says the borrower is servant of the lender. It is a bad state of things when you have to go down some other street to escape meeting some one whom you owe. If young men knew what is the despotism of being in debt more of them would keep out of it. What did debt do for Lord Bacon, with a mind towering above the centuries? It induced him to take bribes, and convict himself as a criminal before all ages. What did debt do for Walter Scott? Broken-hearted at Abbotsford. Kept him writing until his hand gave out in paralysis to keep the sheriff away from his pictures and statuary. Better for him if he had minded the maxim which he had chiseled over the fireplace at Abbotsford, "Waste not, want not."

The trouble is, my friends, the people do not understand the ethics of going in debt, and that if you purchase goods with no expectation of paying for them, or go into debts which you cannot meet, you steal just so much money. If I go into a grocer's store, and I buy sugars and coffees and meats, with no capacity to pay for them, and no intention of paying for them, I am more dishonest than if I go into the store, and when the grocer's face is turned the other way I fill my pockets with the articles of merchandise and carry off a ham. In the one case I take the merchant's time, and I take the time of his messenger to transfer the goods to my house, while in the other case I take none of the time of the merchant, and I wait upon myself, and I transfer the goods without any trouble to him. In other words, a sneak thief is not so bad as a man who contracts for debts he never expects to pay.

Peripatetic Debtors.

Yet in all our cities there are families that move every May-day to get into proximity to other grocers, and meat shops, and apothecaries. They owe everybody within half a mile of where they now live, and next May they will move into a distant part of the city, finding a new lot of victims. Meanwhile you, the honest family in the new house, are bothered day by day by the knocking at the door of disappointed bakers, and butchers, and dry-goods dealers, and newspaper carriers, and you are asked where your predecessor is. You do not know. It was arranged you should not know. Meanwhile your predecessor has gone to some distant part of the city, and the people who have anything to sell have sent their wagons and stopped there to solicit the "valuable" custom of the new neighbor, and he, the new neighbor, with great complacency and with an air of affluence, orders the finest steaks, and the highest priced sugars, and the best of the canned fruits, and, perhaps, all the newspapers. And the debts will keep on accumulating until he gets his goods on the 30th of next April in the furniture cart.

Now, let me say, if there are any such persons in the house, if you have any regard for your own convenience, you had better remove to some greatly distant part of the city. It is too bad that, having had all the trouble of consuming the goods, you should also have the trouble of being dunned! And let me say that if you find that this pictures your own photograph, instead of being in church

You Ought to be in the Penitentiary!

No wonder that so many of our merchants fail in business. They are swindled into bankruptcy by these wandering Arabs, these nomads of city life. They cheat the grocer out of the green apples which make them sick, the physician who attends their distress, and the undertaker who fits them out for departure from the neighborhood where they owe everybody, when they pay the debt of nature, the only debt they ever do pay!

Now our young men are coming up in this depraved state of commercial ethics, and I am solicitous about them. I want to warn them against being slaughtered on the sharp edges of debt. You want many things you have not, my young friends. You shall have them if you have patience and honesty and industry. Certain lines of conduct always lead out to certain results. There is a law which controls even those Things That Seem Haphazard.

I have been told by those who have observed that it is possible to calculate just how many letters will be sent to the Dead Letter Office every year through misdirection; that it is possible to calculate just how many letters will be detained for lack of postage stamps through the forgetfulness of the senders; and that it is possible to tell just how many people will fall in the streets by slipping on an orange peel. In other words, there are no accidents. The most insignificant event you ever heard of is the link between two eternities—the eternity of the past and the eternity of the future. Head the right way, and you will come out at the right goal.

Bring me a young man and tell me what his physical health is, and what his mental calibre, and what his habits, and I will tell you what will be his destiny for this world, and his destiny for the world to come, and I will not make five inaccurate prophecies out of the five hundred. All this makes me solicitous in regard to young men, and I want to make them nervous in regard to the contraction of unpayable debts. I give you a paragraph from My Own Experience.

My first settlement as pastor was in a village. My salary was $800 and a parsonage. The amount seemed enormous to me. I said to myself, "What! all this for one year?" I was afraid of getting worldly under so much prosperity! I resolved to invite all the congregations to my house in groups of twenty-five each, began, and as they were the best congregations in all the world, and we felt nothing was good for them, we piled all the luxuries on the table. I never completed the undertaking, the end of six months I was in financial despair. I found, what every young man learns time to save himself, or too late, that you must measure the size of a man's body before you begin to cut the cloth for his coat.

When a young man wilfully and of choice having the comforts of life, goes into the contraction of unpayable debts, he knows not what he goes. The creditors get after the debtor, the pack of and alas! for the reindeer. They jingle the door-bell before he gets up in the morning, they jingle his door-bell after he has gone to bed at night. They meet him as he comes off his front steps. They send him a postal-card, a letter, in curtest style, telling him to pay. They attach his goods. They want cash, note at thirty days, or a note on demand. They call him a knave. They say he lies. They discipline him at the church. They want turned out of the bank. They come at him from this side, and from that side, and from before, and from behind, and from above, from beneath, and he is insulted and gibbered and sued, and dunned, and sworn at, until he gets the nervous dyspepsia, gets neuralgia, liver complaint, gets heart disease, gets consumptive disorder, gets consumption.

Now he is dead, and you say: "Of course they will let him alone!" Oh, no! Now they are watchful to see whether there are any necessary expenses at the obsequies, to see whether there is any useless handle on the ket, to see whether there is any surplus on the shroud, to see whether the heart is costly or cheap, to see whether the flowers to the casket have been bought by the father or donated, to see in whose name the deed the grave is made out. Then they ransack the bereft household, the books, the pictures, carpets, the chairs, the sofa, the piano, mattresses, the pillow on which he died. Can he debt! For the sake of your own happiness for the sake of your good morals, for the sake of your immortal soul, for God's sake, you man, as far as possible, keep out of it!

II. But I think more young men are Slaughtered Through Irreligion.

Take away a young man's religion, and make him the prey of evil. We all know the Bible is the only perfect system of morals. Now, if you want to destroy the young man's morals, take his Bible away. How will you do that? Well, you will caricature his reverence for the Scriptures; you will take all those incidents of the Bible which can be made mirthful—Jonah's whale, Samson's foxes, Adam's rib, then you will caricature eccentric Christians, inconsistent Christians; then you will pass as your own all those hackneyed arguments against Christianity, which are as old as Time, Paine, as old as Voltaire, as old as sin. Then you have captured his Bible, and you have taken his strongest fortress; the way is comparatively clear, and all the gates of his soul are set open in invitation to the sins of earth and the sorrows of death, that they may come in and drive him to stake for their encampment.

A steamer fifteen hundred miles from shore with broken rudder and lost compass, the hull leaking fifty gallons the hour, is bean a young man when you have robbed of his Bible. Have you ever noticed how meanly it is to take away the world's without proposing a substitute? It is easier than to come to a sick man and steal medicine; meaner than to come to a cripple steal his crutch; meaner than to come to a pauper and steal his crust; meaner than to come to a poor man and burn his house. It is steal the Bible, which has been the crutch, medicine and food and eternal home to so many! What a generous and magnanimous man is infidelity! This splitting of life-boats and taking away of fire-escapes, extinguishing of light-houses! I come out and say to such people, "What are you doing for?" "Oh," they say, "just for fun." It is such fun to see Christians try to hold on to their Bibles! Many of them have lost loved ones, and have been told that there is a resurrection, and it is such fun to tell them there is no resurrection! Many of them have loved that Christ came to carry the burdens to heal the wounds of the world, and it is such fun to tell them they will have to be their saviour! Think of the meanest thing you have heard of; then go down a thousand feet beneath it, and you will find yourself at the bottom of a stairs a hundred miles long; go to the top of the stairs, and you will find a ladder a thousand miles long; then go to the foot of the ladder and look off a precipice half as far as from here to China, and you will find the headwaters of the meanness that would rob this world of its only comfort in life, its only peace, death, and its only hope for immortality. Slaughter a young man's faith in God, and you are is

Now, what has become of the slaughtered? Well, some of them are in their father's or mother's house broken down in health, waiting to die; others are in the hospital; others are in the penitentiary, or, rather, their bodies are, for their souls have gone on to retribution. Not much respect for a young man who started life with good health, and good education, and a Christian example set him, and opportunity of usefulness, who gathered all his treasures and put them in one box, and dropped it into the sea. Now, how is this wholesale slaughter to be stopped? There is not a person in the house who is interested in that question. Young man, save yourself! The object of my sermon is to put a weapon in each of your hands for your own defense. Wait not for Young Men's Christian Associations to protect you, or churches to protect you. Appealing to God for help,

Take Care of Yourself.

First, have a room somewhere that you can call your own. Whether it be the back parlor, a fashionable boarding-house, or a room in the fourth story of a cheap lodging, I care not. Only have that one room your fortress. Do not the dissipator or unclean step over the threshold. If they come up the long flight of stairs and knock at the door, meet them face to face, and kindly yet firmly refuse them admittance. Have a few family portraits on the wall, you brought them with you from your country home. Have a Bible on the stand. If you can afford it, and you can play on one, have an instrument of music—harp or flute, or cornet, or clodeon, or violin, or piano. Every morning before you leave that room, pray. Every night after you come home in that room, pray. Make at room your Gibraltar, your Sebastopol, your Mount Zion. Let no bad book or newspaper come into that room, any more than you would allow a cobra to coil on your table.

Take care of yourself. Nobody else will take care of you. Your help will not come up two or three or four flights of stairs; your help will come, through the roof, down from heaven, from God who in the six thousand years of the world's history never betrayed a young man who tried to be good and a Christian. Let me say, regard to your adverse worldly circumstances, in passing, that you are on a level, now with those who are Finally to Succeed.

Mark my words, young man, and think of it thirty years from now. You will find that those who thirty years from now are the millionaires of this country, who are the orators of the country, who are the poets of the country, who are the strong merchants of the country, who are the great philanthropists of the country—mightiest in church and state—are this morning on a level with you, not an inch above you, and in straitened circumstances now. Herschel earned his living by playing a violin at parties, and in the interstices of the play he would go out and look up at the midnight heavens, the fields of his immortal conquests. George Stephenson rose from being the foreman in a colliery to be the most renowned of the world's engineers. No outfit, no capital, to start with! Young man, go down to the Mercantile Library and get some books, and read of what wonderful mechanism God gave you in your hand, in your foot, in your eye, in your ear, and then ask some doctor to take you into the dissecting room and illustrate to you what you have read about, and never again commit the blasphemy of saying you have no

Capital to Start With.

Equipped! Why, the poorest young man in this house is equipped as only the God of the whole universe could afford to equip him. Then his body—a very poor affair compared with his wonderful soul—oh, that is what makes me solicitous. I am not so much anxious about you, young man, because you have so little to do with, as I am anxious about you because you have much to risk, and lose or gain.

There is no class of persons that so stir my sympathies as young men in great cities. Not quite enough salary to live on, and all the temptations that come from that deficit. Invited on all hands to drink, and their exhausted nervous system seeming to demand stimulus. Their religion caricatured by the most of the clerks in the store and most of the operatives in the factory.

The Rapids of Temptation

and death rushing against that young man forty miles the hour, and he in a frail boat headed upstream, with nothing but a broken oar to work with. Unless Almighty God help them they will go under. Ah! when I told you to take care of yourself you misunderstood me if you thought I meant you are to depend upon human resolution, which may be dissolved in the foam of the wine cup, or may be blown out with the first gust of temptation. Here is the helmet, the sword of the Lord God Almighty. Clothe yourself in that panoply, and you shall not be put to confusion. Sin pays well neither in this world nor the next, but right thinking, and right believing, and acting will take you in safety through this life, and in transport through the next.

I never shall forget a prayer I heard a young man make some fifteen years ago. It was a very short prayer, but it was a tremendous prayer: "Oh Lord, help us. We find it so very easy to do wrong, and so hard to do right. Lord, help us." That prayer, I warrant you, reached the ear of God, and reached His heart. And there are in this house a hundred men who have found out—a thousand young men, perhaps, who have found out—that very thing. It is so easy to do wrong, and so hard to do right.

I got a letter, only one paragraph of which I shall read: "Having moved around somewhat I have run across many young men of intelligence, ardent strivers after that will-o'-the-wisp, fortune, and of one of these I would speak. He was of twenty three or four years, who came to New York, where he had acquaintances, with barely sufficient to keep him a couple of weeks. He had been tenderly reared; perhaps I should say too tenderly, and was not used to earning his living, and found it extremely difficult to get any position that he was capable of filling.

After many vain efforts in this direction he found himself on Sunday evening in Brooklyn, near your church, with about three dollars left of his small capital. Providence seemed to lead him to your door, and he determined to go in and hear you.

"He told me his going to hear you that night was undoubtedly the turning-point in his life, for when he went into your church he felt desperate, but while listening to your discourse his better nature got the mastery. I truly believe, from what this young man told me, that your sounding the depths of his heart that night alone brought him back to his God whom he was so near leaving."

The echo, that is, of multitudes in the house. I am not preaching an abstraction, but

A Great Reality.

Oh! friendless young man, Oh! prodigal young man, Oh! broken-hearted young man, discouraged young man, wounded young man, I commend you to Christ this day, the best friend a man ever had. He meets you this morning. You have come here for this blessing. Despair not that emotion rising in your soul; it is divinely lifted. Look into the face of Christ. Lift one prayer to your father's God, to your mother's God, and get the pardoning blessing. Now, while I speak, you are at the forks of the road.

One Sabbath morning, at the close of my service, I saw a gold watch of the world-renowned and deeply lamented violinist Ole Bull. You remember he died in his island home off the coast of Norway. That gold watch he had wound up day after day through his illness, and then he said to his companion, "Now I want to wind this watch as long as I can, and then when I am gone I want you to keep it wound up until it gets to my friend Dr. Doremus, in New York, and then he will keep it wound up until his life is done, and then I want the watch to go to his young son, my especial favorite."

The great musician who more than any other artist had made the violin speak and sing and weep and laugh and triumph—for it seemed, when he drew the bow across the strings, as if all the earth and heaven trembled in delighted sympathy—the great musician, in a room looking off upon the sea, and surrounded by his favorite instruments of music, closed his eyes in death. While at his departure, sixteen crowded steamers fell into line of funeral procession to carry his body to the mainland. There were fifty thousand of his countrymen gathered in an amphitheatre of the hills waiting to hear the eulogium, and it was said when the great orator of the day with stentorian voice began to speak, the fifty thousand people burst into tears.

Oh! that was the close of a life that had done so much to make the world happy. But I have to tell you, young man, if you live right, and die right, that was a tame scene compared with that which will greet you when from the galleries of heaven the one hundred and forty and four thousand shall accord with Christ in crying, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." And the influences that on earth you put in motion will go down from generation to generation, the influences you wound up handed to your children, and their influences wound up and handed to their children, until watch and clock are no more needed to mark the progress, because time itself shall be no longer.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 328 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

IS THE WORLD GROWING BETTER?

By Rev. L. W. Munhall, M. D.*

The Bible Distinction—Are Atrocities on the Increase?—The Massacre of the Innocents Eclipsed—A Worse Persecution than Nero's Coming—Intemperance Increasing—Betrayal of Trusts—Desecration of the Lord's Day—Sunday Trains and Newspapers—The Church Corrupted.

THE above question is often asked. I answer, Yes! and, No! If by "the world" is meant the mass of the earth's population, I answer, Yes! I believe there are more churches in the world to-day; more Gospel agencies employed; more Christians (save possibly in the early part of the third century); more pure Gospel preaching (the while there is more error promulgated); more educational, benevolent, and elevating agencies at work (the direct and indirect result of the Gospel of the Son of God), than ever before. In this sense, this is the best day the world has seen. If it is meant by "the world"

What the Bible Means.

I answer, No! The Holy Scriptures recognize but three classes of persons, viz.: The Jews, the Church, and the "world that lieth in wickedness." These are never confounded in the Word of God. According to the Holy Scriptures, the world will wax worse and worse unto the end. The following are a few of many passages on the subject:

"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron." (1 Tim. 4:1, 2.) "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived." (II Tim. 3, 13.)

"But, beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken before of the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts. These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the spirit." (Jude, 17-19.)

But it is alleged that far greater atrocities were committed in the early part of the present era than in these times. This I do not believe. Of course this is a question that can never be settled to the satisfaction of everybody. However, it may be profitable to draw a few contrasts. But before doing so, let me insist upon it that the standard of judgment indicated in the Scriptures, "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required," (Luke 12:48) shall be observed. The greater light, intelligence, and refinement of our boasted civilization makes the same offence, committed by a lot of pagans and barbarians centuries ago, the more heinous and inexcusable.

The Massacre of the Innocents

by Herod's order is cited as a case that cannot be repeated in these days. But Herod is out-Heroded by the dicta of the world's so-called first society, in so-called Christian lands. Said society has decreed that maternity is unfashionable; and, as a result, one thousand innocents are murdered every year in these lands, to one murdered in obedience to Herod's decree.

The cruel persecutions and slaughter under the early Roman Emperors, more especially under the Neronian despotism, has not been repeated in these times, nor can they be, say some. Even now I hear of similar atrocities being perpetrated in the interior of Africa, at the command of a despot no more or less barbaric than was Nero. But the Word of God tells us plainly that by far, than the Neronian, will befall God's people in the last days. Here is the testimony; "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel, the prophet, stand in the holy place (whoso readeth, let him understand). Then let them that be in Judea flee to the mountains: let him which is on the house-top not come down to take anything out of his house: neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes. And woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day: for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." (Matt. 24:15, 22.)

Thus the Word of God settles this part of the question. Also the tortures of the Inquisition, though they are not to be placed upon a plane with the Neronian persecutions, as they were committed by the Church of Jesus Christ, so-called (Roman Catholic), which is no more tolerant and Christlike now, but reckoned to be Christian, to the last member, by all well-regulated optimists. Don't we all know that Intemperance is Upon the Increase?

The ever rapidly-increasing manufacture and consumption of intoxicating liquor makes it very certain that this is so. Don't we all know that "John Barleycorn" comes more nearly dominating the civil and social affairs in the United States than Christian principles? Does he not dictate nearly all the laws that would affect him, directly or indirectly? Does he not override whatever laws he pleases? The Congress of the United States can't put him out of the Capitol building. Haven't they tried it more than once? and isn't the cursed bar still there? Why don't the United States Government collect the millions of dollars due it on the whisky tax? It don't; it never will. The whisky pool, at Washington, is too big; they have too much money. John Barleycorn controls nearly all the elections and pretty much all the politics in the United States. He has laid his ruthless and un pitying hand upon nearly all commerce and trade; and his dark shadow is flung across the threshold of nearly every home in the land. When were these things ever so certainly and extensively true as now? And all this in a so-called Christian land, in the face of the heroic and persistent efforts of the Christian and other temperance people.

Were public and commercial trusts in the United States so extensively betrayed fifty years ago, in proportion to population and the monetary transactions of the land, as now? When ever in the history of civilized nations was crime so prevalent and lawlessness so alarmingly general? Let the records answer. How about the Desecration of the Lord's Day?

Twenty-five years ago a Sunday railway train was scarcely heard of. But now nine-tenths of the railroads in the United States use Sunday as a "clearing-up day"—doing more work on that day than any other of the week. There are thousands of professing Christians who have no conscience about riding on the cars on Sunday, and thus keep thousands of the employes of these corporations from the house of worship, and deprive them of the rest God designed every living creature should have, who wouldn't have thought of doing such a thing a dozen years ago.

Twenty-five years ago a Sunday issue of a secular newspaper was a rare thing. Now, there is not a score, of the hundreds of leading morning newspapers in the land, that do not issue a Sunday edition, which is quite twenty-five per cent. larger than that of any other day of the week. Thousands upon thousands of professing Christians, who a few years ago would spend the early hours of the Lord's day reading God's Holy Word, and in meditating upon eternal verities, and be by these means prepared to enter upon the worship of the assembly of the saints, now spend these hours in reading in the

the reports of the commercial transactions and society and political events of the day before; and the appalling record of crime and shame that these enterprising papers have been able, by their great "Muck Rates," to gather from the gutters and slums of the earth; and, with their minds filled with such things, they go some of them—to church, and if the minister gives the congregation the "heavenly manna" they have no appetite for it, and insist that a sermon was very stupid, dull and long, and must have a new minister, one who is abreast the times, who has a new theology, and will preach upon the practical subjects of the day. A result of this is, the faithful minister preaches to empty pews, oftentimes. Another result many ministers have yielded to the pressure and are preaching "another gospel that is in another." (Gal. 1:6, 7.)

The Church Corrupted.

Do we not all know that the world has brazenly intruded itself into the visible Church and is even now dictating to Christians how they shall live—what shall be their pleasure pastimes, and occupations. Twenty-five years ago, dancing, card-playing, wine-drinking, theatre-going, etc., were not allowed in nine-tenths of our so-called Protestant churches. We have known not a few persons expelled from the Church for indulging in such things. It is so no longer. Let the Church authorities attempt to enforce the rules relating to such things, if they dare, and they will find, very quickly, that the camel is in the mill and proposes to stay.

Are not these things but the fulfilment of the prophecies? "Must not judgment begin at the house of God?" (1 Peter 4:17.) Ought not "the axe" to be "laid unto the root of the trees"? (Luke 3:9.)

PROGRESS IN COREA.

IN view of the recent reports widely circulated, that Christian work in Corea has been stopped by the royal interdict, a letter just published in the Independent from the Rev. H. G. Underwood, who writes from Seoul, in Corea, contains welcome news. He says: "For the amount of labor expended, and seed sown, no work has yielded a better increase, no field a better harvest than that in Corea during the past year. Still further, I think I may be safe in stating that leaving entirely out of the question the labor expended and the seed sown, in no land on the face of this globe has the Church shown as great a proportionate increase during 1888 as the native Church of Christ in Corea. A year ago we were small in numbers, and, being an infant church, weak in faith. Now we have increased to almost six times what we were then, and a decided growth 'in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ' is seen."

The applicants for baptism have been more numerous, more decided in their belief, more zealous in their desires to profess a faith in Christ, than ever before. The very talk about the "Royal decree" opened the door for the preaching of the gospel to many an official who came to call. Officials in high rank are inquiring the way. Christian books are more read and more sought after than ever before. Our services, which are now public, are more largely attended. The old fear of outsiders has been put aside, and the sacraments are administered before men who know not Christ. Mr. Appenzeller, in a trip north last fall, was entertained at the magistracy of a certain town. There inquirers after truth came to learn about the Gospel. In the presence of petty officials they were taught the way of life, and before he left, right in the magistracy itself, a number were baptized. The work that we are doing is known to the officials, and yet we are treated as friends. They call on us, and in every way show at least their kindly feelings toward us.

A winter theological class has just closed, and eight earnest devoted men have gone back to their homes and work to teach the truth. They spent the whole time they were here in earnestly studying the Bible and inquiring as to the latest means of spreading a knowledge of the truth.

Among the women of this land it is hard to work. None but women can reach them, and there are but few here that are able to do anything for them. Mrs. M. F. Scranton, of the Methodist Church, and Mrs. Dr. J. W. Heron, of the Presbyterian Church, have each of them been doing a good work in this line, and their influence is reaching farther and farther. As a result of their labors several have been baptized, and there is the prospect of having, at no very late date, a number of Christian mothers training their sons and daughters for the Lord.

A CHILD LOBBYIST.

WHEN the question of submitting a Prohibition Amendment to the people of Nebraska was before the Legislature of that State, it was evident that the vote would be very close. Indeed, submission was only carried by the change of two votes from nay to aye. Mr. McNickle, one of the members who so changed his vote, made a speech in explanation, which is thus reported in the National Temperance Advocate:

"Mr. Speaker, I wish to change my vote. I am placed in a very trying position. I represent two counties, and one of these counties favors the submission of a prohibitory amendment, while the other is opposed to it. I was nominated under the firm conviction that I should be defeated in the county which is opposed to submission, but some of my supporters induced me to make that county a promise that I would vote against a submission bill, and upon that ground they claim that I secured my election. But you can understand my predicament when I tell you that people from both these counties have been urging me to vote in accordance with their wishes. I realize that it will be an impossibility for me to please both sides. I have been very greatly troubled over this matter. I have lost a great many nights' sleep thinking what is best to do. Yes, I have even been looking for guidance from some higher power in this very difficult question to decide, but I have about come to the conclusion that the Lord has little to do with the affairs of a Nebraska legislature. I have consulted with my family upon the question, and the other evening my little five-year-old boy climbed upon my knee, and putting his arms around my neck, he said: 'You will vote right on submission, won't you, papa?' I shall now say to both the counties I represent that I cannot please you both, I will disregard the wishes of the county on my right and the county on my left, but with the grace of God helping me, I will vote for the salvation and welfare of my boy; I therefore vote aye, Mr. Speaker."

A DRUNKEN MERCHANT SAVED.

AMONG the reminiscences of Mr. J. C. Lanphier, the founder of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, is a remarkable instance of the rescue of a despairing merchant. He says: A merchant in a neighboring city stood very high in social life. He was an earnest, devoted Christian, and took an active part in Sunday-school and mission work. Financial reverses overtook him. He yielded to the intoxicating cup, and fell from his high position. Full of shame and mortification at his disgrace, he signed the pledge and resolved once more to be a man. Though he stood pledged to abstain, the love of intoxicating drink was very strong, so strong that it overpowered him the second time. The ruin of the man seemed complete. His family became alienated, and left him. He seemed to have no friends. Poverty came upon him like an armed man, and he was literally an outcast. He came to New York in the hope of picking up some work, but was disappointed. He resolved to put an end to his life, and purchased laudanum with that intent.

Something held him back, and he started for Fulton Street, where in sunnier days he had enjoyed the presence of the Lord. He took a back seat. Among the requests read at the meeting was for a poor, unfortunate drunkard, who was struggling with his appetite. He was moved to send a request for himself. Perhaps here might be found the help for which he had sought in vain elsewhere. He went home and wrote a request asking the meeting to pray for "one who was an outcast from his house, from his Church, and from his friends, by reason of strong drink." This was sent to the room by a little boy. He was present when the request was read. In the meeting was one who related his experience. This speaker said he had fallen six times, and had been taken up each time by a Christian brother, and it was not until he had committed himself wholly to the Saviour that he found his appetite for drink conquered. The desperate man took courage. He went to his room, locked the door, fell on his knees and told the Saviour all. Before he arose he felt that he was fully pardoned. He arose with the love of strong drink taken wholly from him, as he believes, in answer to earnest prayer. Months have passed, and the desire for strong drink has never returned. He has been readmitted to the Church of God, and a happy home and good business await him.

A BOHEMIAN REPROBATE CONVERTED.

IN a recent report to the American Bible Society Mr. Clark, the Secretary, mentioned an incident reported to him by a colporteur in Bohemia. The colporteur said: "Some months ago I came in contact with a very bad man. He was not only intemperate, but guilty of gross immorality. At first I was afraid of him, but God's Word, which he finally bought, softened his heart. Soon he began visiting our Bible meetings instead of spending the evening in some drinking-saloon. For weeks he was a very attentive listener. One day in his work in repairing a pump, he fell twenty feet or more into the well. As soon as I had time, I visited him in the hospital, where he lay seemingly unconscious. My first duty was to comfort his weeping wife. Soon he opened his eyes. To my question, 'Do you know me?' he replied, 'Yes,' and began repeating the hymn, 'Come to Jesus.' His wife remarked, 'We sang that hymn the morning he met with this severe accident.' After a little rest he said, 'I would like to hear that hymn to-morrow in the meeting.' 'Do you believe that Jesus has received you, and that His blood has cleansed you?' 'Yes, I believe that He has pardoned all my sins.' He soon fell asleep, to wake no more in this life."

A MISSIONARY'S ARGUMENT.

AN illustration of the discussions which arise in missionary work is given in Dr. Cullis's Times of Refreshing in the course of a letter from Rev. W. A. Moore, who is laboring at Basim, India. Mr. Moore says: One night was especially interesting. While I was talking, a man asked, "Sahib, are we not to worship idols?" I asked, "What is the good of worshipping idols?" Another then asked, "Is God only in one place, or is He everywhere?" I replied, "He is everywhere." "Then, Sahib, if God is everywhere, He is in the trees, and stones, etc., and if I believe that God is in this tree, won't I find Him there?" A good number thought that was a very conclusive argument. Said I, "You believe that God is in everything—trees, stones, etc.?" "Yes." "Granted, for a moment, that that is true. If I put up a stone here, none of you will worship it. No; first a Brahman must come and repeat a munvaa over it, and bring the divinity into it, and then you will worship it. Now I want to know where the Brahman brings his divinity from into the stone, if the divinity was in that stone before?" It was good to see the astonishment of the people. They looked at each other and wagged their heads, saying, "Whha!" (an exclamation of approbation). I then said: "Some have asked us whether God has not given us all these gods because He was invisible. Which man of you here would say to his wife when coming to the jatra, 'Bai, I am going to the jatra, and you won't see me for some days. Now, to remind you of me, I bring these four men for you to keep as your husbands till I return; which of you would do it?' Many of them, with a look of disgust, said, 'Chee! chee what man would do that?' Said I: "Do you think that God would give human beings idols to worship because He is invisible? Never. He says that whoever worships idols commits adultery. He is a spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth."

The services continued increasing in interest, and the congregations increased also.

SCHOOL WORK IN SYRIA.

IN a letter from the Rev. F. E. Hoskins, a Presbyterian missionary at Zahleh, to the Church, he thus describes the difficulties of conducting Christian schools in Syria: "We have had trouble in Zahleh from several quarters, but are unmolested now, and the schools are doing nicely. The Governor seems friendly. He showed his feeling a few weeks ago in a curious way. The teacher of the girls in the small school complained of having been stoned by the boys near the school. We tried in vain to prevent it, but at last appealed to the Governor. He struck a stunning blow at the root of the trouble by arresting the mothers of all the troublesome boys. He kept them in ward until sundown. Since then we have had nothing to complain of."

"We are just about closing two small schools near Baalbec. One of them was new, in the Metawali village of Yaat; the other at Ain Burdhai, where a school was begun nine years ago, but discontinued four years ago. The kaimakam at Baalbec was implacable. He sent for the parents of the scholars, and threatened to imprison them. When Mr. Ford and I called on him he said he meant to turn over all the schools, and close those that had not special orders from Constantinople. He said that for the present we might keep our schools open, but he would see that the children did not come. We have sent the teacher of Yaat back to Schleja, whence he came, so that we have only one school less in that region. The school in Ain Burdhai was closed by the opposition of the bishop, who very recently visited the village."

MR. HENRY M. STANLEY AS A DENTIST.

IN a magazine devoted to the profession of dentistry Mr. Edward Ayton says that before Stanley started on his expedition for the relief of Emin Pasha his teeth needed professional attention, and the great explorer consulted Mr. Ayton. "Among other things, he told me," says Mr. Ayton, "that he also was a dentist, but that his practice extended only to the extraction of teeth. A set of forceps always formed part of his baggage. The extraction of a tooth was a great event in a native village, the inhabitants turning out, and assembling in large numbers in front of the tent of the wonderful white medicine man, to witness what to them was almost a miracle. Stanley, who knew the value of 'effect' on the natives, and the advantage to be gained by impressing them with the greatness of the white man, encouraged this curiosity, and with laudable intention gave himself a certain amount of airs, which increased the solemn gravity of the situation. The critical moment arrived, the chattering of the negroes would cease, and the rolling white eyes would be concentrated on the movements of the operator and on the victim. The operation over, the offending member would be eagerly examined, amid much gesticulation and delighted exclamations of astonishment."

"I suppose," said I, "your patient was usually grateful, and his gratitude took some tangible form."

"No," replied Stanley, slowly; "not often. They have nothing to bring. A young fowl, some bananas, or a few edible roots they sometimes brought me; but they are very poor."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Adjourned Finally, After Electing Mr. Ingalls President pro tem., on April 2. During its session it received from the President 284 messages, containing 350 nominations. Of these only two were rejected. They were Murat Halstead, to be Minister to Germany, and I. S. Loventhal, to be Postmaster at Modesto, Cal. Eight others, six of which were postmasters, were not acted upon, and are therefore void. Twenty-two States shared in the distribution of the greater offices, New York getting the largest share. She had one Cabinet-officer—General Tracy—and three important foreign missions, those of France, Russia, and Austria, besides the Commissioner of Pensions and two Assistant Secretaries, those of the Treasury and Interior. The most important of the foreign offices in which no change has been made are the missions to the Argentine Republic, Bolivia, China, Germany, Greece, the Hawaiian Islands, Liberia, Paraguay, Persia, Roumania, Serbia, Siam, and Turkey.

The Representatives of the United States at the Congress of American Nations to be held in Washington in November next have been selected by the President, and on April 2 were approved by the Senate. They are ten in number, and three of them are said to be Democrats. They are: John B. Henderson, of Missouri; Cornelius N. Bliss, of New York; William Pinckney Whyte, of Maryland; Clement Studebaker, of Indiana; T. Jefferson Coolidge, of Massachusetts; William H. Trescott, of South Carolina; Andrew Carnegie, of Pennsylvania; John R. G. Pitkin, of Louisiana; Morris M. Estee, of California; and J. F. Hansom, of Georgia. The nations to participate in the Congress are the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil. They will send delegates on the invitation of our Government for the purpose of discussing some plan of arbitration for the settlement of disagreements and disputes that may hereafter arise between them, and for considering questions relating to the improvement of business intercourse.

Confirmation of the News of the Marine Disaster at Samoa reached the Department of the Navy on March 30. It appears that a terrific hurricane struck the ships in the harbor at Apia on March 15. The British steamer Calliope had her steam up, and put out to sea, and was saved. The German man-of-war Eber was the first to drag her anchor, and she drifted helplessly on the reef that runs around the harbor. She sank a few minutes after striking, and as the majority of the crew were below-deck at the time, it is thought that none escaped. Her sister ship, the Adler, followed her, and was lifted by a huge wave and dropped with a terrific crash on the reef. Her captain and a few officers and seamen saved themselves by swimming. The United States war-ship Nipsic was the next to yield to the storm, but her captain steered her for a sandbank, where she ran aground. All her crew were saved in the boats, but seven were lost in the capsizing of one of the boats. The Vandalia's disaster was much more fatal. She struck the reef, and her captain, several officers, and most of the crew were washed off and drowned. Soon afterward the Trenton, which had so far held fast, though much battered, began to drift.

She struck on the wreck of the Vandalia, and a large hole was stove in her keel. Happily, all on board of her were saved. The loss of life is very mournful. The American ships lost four officers and forty-six men, and the Germans ninety-six. It is deeply significant that these mighty vessels, representing two great powers, were powerless before that great Power which rules the winds and the waves, and the people of the islands could see that He was mightier than the mightiest.

Extensive Preparations are Being Made for the celebration of the Presidential Centenary in April next. On April 30, 1789, George Washington formally took the oath of office in New York, and efforts will be made to commemorate the day in a fitting manner. The Committee in charge of the affair suggest that at 9 o'clock in the morning religious services should be held in every church in New York in commemoration of the services that took place in 1789. It is hoped that similar services will be held throughout the nation. A special service will be held in New York, in St. Paul's Church, and will be attended by the President and Vice-President of the United States, just as Washington and John Adams worshipped there 100 years previously. It will be conducted by Bishop Potter, and the Rev. Morgan Dix of Trinity Church. After the service at St. Paul's the scene will be changed to the steps of the Sub-Treasury Building, which is on the site of Federal Hall, in front of which Washington took the oath of office. A prayer will there be offered by the Rev. Dr. Richard S. Storrs, and an oration by Chauncey M. Depew. The President of the United States is expected there also, and it is hoped that John Greenleaf Whittier will be able to read an original poem. Then a great military and industrial procession will pass in review before the President of the United States. There is also to be a naval display in the harbor, and France has been invited to send ships to take part, in recognition of the aid she gave to the young nation a hundred years ago. A proclamation issued by the President on April 5, makes the day a day of National Thanksgiving.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker's Address on prohibition, in the Bethany Church, Philadelphia, on Sunday March 31, has surprised many Republicans, who cannot understand a member of the Republican Cabinet taking so decisive a stand as he did in favor of the prohibition amendment. It is clear that Mr. Wanamaker did not sell his conscience when he accepted office. He said: "Just as the saloon keeper must answer for every glass he sells, so we must answer for voting for liquor. It is simply a question of whether or not we are in favor of the saloon. It isn't a question of high license. The quibble that prohibition does not prohibit has nothing to do with it. The law against stealing does not prevent stealing. The same power that puts the amendment in our Constitution will attend to the enforcement of the law. It is our duty to make it as difficult to get liquor as it is to get poison. License means that the city, the State, and the saloon keeper, shall go into partnership to ruin men, to build up jails, almshouses, hospitals, and houses of correction, and to keep up the taxes. God's going to count the votes. Vote for prohibition and you will be voting for Him, for order, for religion, and for the highest civilization. He will see every ballot. When you go home to-night go down on your knees, every one of you, and pray God to help you to carry the amendment."

The Flight of General Boulanger to Brussels last week was a fruitful subject of European discussion. He heard that the Government had decided to prosecute him for disloyalty, and he promptly fled, under an assumed name, and did not rest until he was safe beyond the frontier. In an interview with a reporter he professed to believe that he feared he would not get justice at his trial if he remained behind in Paris. The general impression, however, is that there was a strong probability of his getting justice, and that it was precisely the realization of that fact that prompted the General to run away. The French law allows a man to be prosecuted in his absence if he does not choose to be present, and the Government therefore has decided to go on with the trial, and the Legislature has endorsed the prosecution. In asking its permission to proceed, Premier Tirard said: "We desire to prosecute a man who is seeking to overthrow the Republic. It is our duty to defend the institutions of our country against the intrigues of factions, and to take every means to safeguard France from the horrors of civil war." After speeches by other members, a vote was taken sanctioning the prosecution of General Boulanger. The Chamber decided, by a vote of 355 to 203, in favor of prosecution.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley's Thrilling Story of his long journey was given to the press on April 2. It is a record of misfortune, danger, toil, and disaster. Setting out from Yambuga on June 28, 1887, with 389 officers and men, he did not meet Emin until April 29, 1888, having made a land journey of 1,705 miles through a country full of natural obstacles and infested with enemies. During 160 days the expedition wandered in a vast forest, from which it emerged with only 173 men, having lost some by death, some by desertion, and having left some sick in a camp. Stanley's worst difficulty arose from the conduct of the Arabs, who devastated the country and burned the villages on his route, so that no food could be obtained. On the second day of the march the expedition was molested by the natives, but did not suffer loss. On August 13, however, a more serious engagement took place, and Stanley lost five men by poisoned arrows, and Lieutenant Stairs was dangerously wounded. On October 18, the men were so weak through living solely on nuts and roots, that it was decided to leave the boat at Killinga Longa, with seventy loads of goods, under the care of Surgeon Parke and Captain Nelson. On November 12 food became plentiful, and the expedition halted for thirteen days to recuperate. Marching on, it came to the country of the chief Mazamboni, and here the expedition was again attacked by the natives, and severe fighting occurred. The natives were eventually driven off, after a hard struggle, and the march continued. On December 17 the weary men were gladdened by the sight of the Albert Nyanza. There Stanley expected to have met Emin Pasha, but evidently Emin had not received news of Stanley's coming, for he did not come down the lake. Their own boat had been left behind, and they could get no canoes. There was no other resource but for Stanley to turn back and fetch his boat. In this emergency Stanley himself was stricken down with sickness, and it took a month to nurse him back to health. The boat recovered, and carried back to the Nyanza, its crew sighted the southernmost point of Emin's territory on April 26. Three days later Emin came to the camp, and he and Stanley remained together until May 25. Stanley then set out to meet the column under Major Barttelot, which should have followed him. He came upon it on August 17, fearfully thinned and discouraged. Eleven days later he completed his letter and dispatched it. He was then about to return to Emin, and ascertain if he was willing to leave. Emin was partly persuaded to do so, when Stanley left him, but was hesitating, because he had 10,000 people with him, many of whom were women and children, whom it would be difficult to transport to the coast. What was finally done we do not know. It is rumored that Stanley and Emin are now on their way with their large cavalcade to Zanzibar, but there is no reliable intelligence since the date of Stanley's letter, August 28, 1888.

Encouraging Reports of the Progress of Bishop Riley's work in Mexico are given by Mr. L. B. Heller, who has recently returned from a business tour in that country. Mr. Heller's object in visiting the country was to introduce several valuable inventions and useful patents, in which he is financially interested, but being an earnest Christian he always endeavors, wherever he goes, to do some work for his Master. In the city of Mexico he made inquiries for an evangelical place of worship, and as to the various missionary efforts being made there. He found that the Mexican people are extremely jealous of their nationality, and suspicious of any movement, religious or otherwise, having foreign origin. He found that they regard Bishop Riley's services and institutions as a national Church, and are therefore more favorable to it than to missionary efforts, which excite fear and prejudice. Mr. Heller attended the service in Bishop Riley's cathedral, and was much impressed with the earnestness and power of the preacher, and the large and attentive audience. He also visited the schools in connection with the work, and speaks highly of their efficiency. It is his deliberate judgment, from personal observation, that the work under Bishop Riley's leadership is the most important of all the efforts now being made to evangelize Mexico.

Two Girl Stowaways Arrived in Philadelphia on board the S. S. Ohio on April 3. They were involuntary voyagers, and had no fraudulent motive. It appears that some friends of theirs were coming to America, and the two girls boarded the vessel at Queenstown, Ireland, to wish them farewell. They were in the "between decks" when the notice, "All ashore that's going," was given before the tender cast away to take back to Queenstown, three miles away from the vessel, those who had come to the Ohio to say good-by. The two girls did not hear the warning, and the steamer was under way and the tender a spot in the distance before the girls knew they were on the way to America without their passage paid, and without even a change of clothing. Their friends cared for them, and they weren't thrown overboard, as they had feared they would be when the captain sternly questioned them as to why they were on the vessel without paying their passage. As they are strong and intelligent, and able to earn their livelihood here, they are to be allowed to remain, and are glad to do so. It will be very different with those worldly Christians who fail to hear and obey the warning cry now being raised to come out from the world and be separate, lest they be partakers in its plagues. (Rev. 18:4.)

An Extensive System of Forgery and Fraud has been brought to light in New Orleans by the death of a prominent official. He had lived in high social circles, and was much respected by a large number of personal friends, and the public generally. He lived expensively, but as he had a very extensive connection in his business as a notary public, no suspicion of his integrity was entertained. On March 29 his executors were astonished to receive, among the claims for which they had called, a large number of promissory notes, for which the deceased was liable as collateral security. On examination, all these notes proved to be forgeries. When a person came to him in transactions of real estate, the notary had made two sets of mortgage notes, one set of which was genuine, and properly signed, while to the other he forged all the names required, copying the signatures from the genuine notes, and this second set he had disposed of for his own benefit to persons seeking good investments for their money. No inquiries were made, as he paid the interest regularly; and he had carried on the business in this way for twenty years, no one apparently having the slightest suspicion. It was only when his death was announced, and the holders of the forged mortgaged notes presented their claims, that his crime was discovered. It is so with other forms of sin. Even if the perpetrator conceals his wickedness for many years, and dies without suffering human retribution, the claims are presented then, for all the evil he has done, and if not expunged by the blood of Christ, an account must be rendered of all the deeds done in the body. (Rom. 2:5, 6.)

A Marriage on the Bank of a Brook is Com-memorated in the quaint name still borne by a stream which runs between Massachusetts and Connecticut. A contemporary replying to a question as to the origin of the name Bride Brook says that it was given by John Winthrop, who in 1646 was Governor of Massachusetts. A couple living in Connecticut applied to him to unite them in marriage, as there was no person in their neighborhood authorized to perform the ceremony. Mr. Winthrop's commission extended only to Massachusetts, he therefore suggested to them that they should come to the brook which formed the western boundary, and he would meet them there. They agreed, and on the bank of the brook, in the midst of a dreary waste of snow, far away from human habitation the two were united, and Mr. Winthrop gave the name of Bride Brook to the stream in memory of the event. Probably few persons knew before this why the brook was so named, but to the young people united there, the name would be full of meaning so long as they lived, reminding them that it was there they began their new life. It is so with those who have passed from death into life. The place where Christ met them and gave them new life in Him, may be to others a common place soon forgotten, but to them it is henceforth a sacred spot, hallowed by holy memories. (Ps. 137:5-7.)

A Surgical Remedy for Lying and Stealing was tried recently in New York. A distinguished physician told the reporter of a daily journal that he was called to attend a boy of twelve years of age, who had received a blow on the head from a board which fell upon him while he was playing in a half-built house. The wound soon healed, but the boy showed a remarkable change of character. The physician knew him before the injury, and said that he possessed many excellent qualities, being amiable, truthful, and affectionate. After his recovery from the wound, he manifested a complete change of character. He would steal, tell lies, and act brutally. His parents were heart-broken, and mentioned the sad change to the physician. He studied the case, and at length advised that the boy be trephined. The operation was skillfully performed, and, after the piece of skull was removed, a small splinter of bone was found pressing on the brain. It was taken away, the section of skull replaced, and the boy rapidly recovered. To the delight of his parents, the evil traits which had caused them so much sorrow entirely disappeared, and their son was once more the truthful, honest, and obedient boy that he was before his injury. The surgical remedy was successful in this case because the cause of the trouble was physical, but in the majority of cases of lying and stealing the source of the evil is moral and spiritual, and then nothing but the touch of the Great Physician can cure. (Deut. 30:6.)

A Term of Imprisonment as a Cure for the opium habit was recommended a few days ago by a man who returned from Sing Sing to New York after a prolonged residence in the Penitentiary. Several years ago the released prisoner, then a man of thirty-five years of age, was an habitual opium eater. His business was ruined, his memory impaired, and he was a physical wreck, but he could not abandon the habit. The quantity of the drug necessary to satisfy his craving cost two dollars a day, and, after practicing all kinds of meannesses to obtain money for the purpose, he tried to rob a grocer's till. He was detected and arrested. He sent word to a friend, who was also a victim of the habit, that he was in prison, begging him for pity's sake to bring him a little opium to relieve his sufferings. His friend kept him supplied while he was in the Tombs, but after he was sent to Sing Sing he could do no more for him. The enforced abstinence from the drug in the Penitentiary produced its usual results. The man suffered absolute torture with cramps in the stomach, aching of every limb and joint, and excruciating, lacerating pains in the back. The prison physician was summoned, and grew interested in his case. He kept life in the prisoner while he went through the ordeal of deprivation of the drug, and as, being a prisoner, there were no means of evading vigilance and getting a fresh supply, he gradually struggled through. By the time his term expired he was completely emancipated from the awful slavery of his habit. Meeting his friend on Broadway after his release from prison, he gravely and sincerely urged him to get arrested and go through the same experience, assuring him that the joy he would feel in deliverance would amply compensate him for the agony he would endure in the process. That is the experience of the sinner after he has been delivered by Christ from the chains of sin. What he cannot do himself is done for him, and he has no desire to return to the sins which once he loved. (Rom. 6:21, 22.)

BRIEF NOTES.

More than $6,000 worth of temperance literature has already been shipped to Paris for the W. C. T. U. exhibit at the World's Fair.

Major Cole has been laboring at Brookfield, Mo., with great success. The services have been largely attended, and the interest most marked.

Dr. Duane B. Simmons, who went to Japan as medical missionary in 1859, and has labored there ever since, died at Tokio in February last. He was fifty-seven years old.

Gen. Neal Dow has been appointed to represent the State of Maine as commissioner at the Paris exhibition. It is hoped that the trip may be beneficial to him, and that he may stay a long time.

The many friends of Dr. Charles F. Deems will be glad to learn that he is again able to resume his pastoral duties. His rest of a few weeks at Dansville, N. Y.—the first he has taken for many years—appears to have fully restored him to health.

The Revs. Ostrom and Karlson are holding evangelistic services at Marinette, Wis. The addresses are in Swedish and English, and are attracting large gatherings. The Eagle of that town says that at each service the Opera House is crowded.

Miss Frances E. Willard and Miss Anna Gordon have started for a six weeks' trip in the South, during which time they will attend the annual W. C. T. U. Conventions and visit the leading cities in Georgia, South Carolina, and other Southern and Southwestern States.

The branch of the White Cross Army connected with the Y. M. C. A. at Twenty-third Street, New York, now numbers 2,201 members. Any church or association desiring to organize a branch may obtain information by writing to Mr. E. L. Bentley, 52 East Twenty-third Street, New York.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy held its monthly meeting at its rooms, 4 Winthrop Place, New York, on April 4. The subject for discussion was the Attitude of the Secular Press of America toward religion. Mr. A. H. Sigfried, of the Chicago Daily News, read a paper on the subject.

A missionary in the West reports, as the result of God's blessing on his twenty-one years' labor, the organizing of 400 Sunday-schools and about 8,000 conversions. All his expenses have been defrayed by Mr. Hiram Camp, of New Haven, Conn., who has also supported another missionary for several years.

The missionaries at Victoria Nyanza and Usagara, Africa, for whose safety fears were entertained, owing to the disturbances in Eastern Africa, are not in danger. The Church Missionary Society, under whose auspices they are working, has received word that the amicable relations existing between them and the far inland tribes are still maintained.

Dr. Edward Beecher, the venerable brother of the late Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, was severely injured on April 3. In stepping from a car at the Culver Railroad Depot, Brooklyn, he slipped and fell. The wheels of the car passed over his left ankle, and it has been found necessary to amputate his foot. He is eighty-five years old, and has been a minister fifty-four years.

Miss Alice C. Fletcher, the well-known friend of the Indians, gave an address on April 9 at the Central Presbyterian Church, New York, at the anniversary of the Ladies' Missionary Society. She is acting as special Government agent in the allotment of lands in severalty to the Winnebago Indians. Since she took up the cause of the Omahas some years ago, all her time has been given to the work of securing better treatment of the Indian tribes.

TWO ESSENTIAL THINGS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.
 "Testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." Acts 20: 21.

A Puritan Preacher's Sobriquet—The Door and Door-post—I. A Repentance not Toward God—Produced by Shame—By Painful Consequences—By Dread of Hell—By a Sense of the Unworthiness of an Ill Life—Partial Repentance—A Cobbler's Debts Paid—II. Repentance Toward God—Consciousness of Neglecting God—Of Offending Him—Of Sin as Sin—III. Repentant Sinners Permitted to Believe—IV. Repentance Linked to Faith—The Result of an Unperceived Faith—The Gemini of the Heavens—Grow Together—Increase Each Other—A Forgetful Minister.

THIS was the practical drift of Paul's teaching at Ephesus, and everywhere else. He kept back nothing which was profitable to them; and the main profit he expected them to derive from his teaching the whole counsel of God was this, that they should have "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." This was the great aim of the apostle. I pray that it may be so with all of us who are teachers of the Word; may we never be satisfied if we interest, please, or dazzle; but may we long for the immediate production, by the Spirit of God, of true

Repentance and Faith.

Old Mr. Dodd, one of the quaintest of the Puritans, was called by some people "Old Mr. Faith and Repentance," because he was always insisting upon these two things. Philip Henry, remarking upon his name, writes somewhat to this effect: "As for Mr. Dodd's abundant preaching repentance and faith, I admire him for it; for if I die in the pulpit, I desire to die preaching repentance and faith, and if I die out of the pulpit, I desire to die practicing repentance and faith."

Beloved friends, we cannot at this time do without either of these any more than could the Greeks and Jews. They are essential to salvation. Some things may be, but these must be. Certain things are needful to the well-being of a Christian, but these things are essential to the very being of a Christian. If you have not repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, you have no part nor lot in this matter. Repentance and faith must go together to complete each other. I compare them to a door and its post. Repentance is the door which shuts out sin, but faith is the post upon which its hinges are fixed. A door without a door-post to hang upon is not a door at all; while a door-post without the door hanging to it is of no value whatever. What God hath joined together let no man put asunder; and these two He has made inseparable—repentance and faith.

I. Let me observe, in the first place, that there is a repentance which is not toward God. Discriminate this morning. Paul did not merely preach repentance, but repentance toward God; and there is a because it is not toward God. In some there is a repentance of sin which is produced by a sense of shame. The evil-doers are found out, and indignant words are spoken about them; they are ashamed, and so far they are repentant, because they have dishonored themselves. If they had not been found out, in all probability they would have continued comfortably in the sin, and even have gone further on in it. It is said that among Orientals it is not considered wrong to lie, but it is considered a very great fault to lie so blunderingly as to be caught at it. Many who profess regret for having done wrong are not sorry for the sin itself, but they are affected by the opinion of their fellow-men, and by the remarks that are made concerning their offence, and so they hang their heads. Do not mistake a little natural fluttering of the heart and blushing of the face, on account of being found out in sin, for true repentance.

Some, again, have a repentance which consists in grief because of the painful consequences of sin. The man has been a spendthrift, a gambler, a profligate, and his money is gone; and now he repents that he has played the fool. Another has been indulging the passions of his corrupt nature, and he finds himself suffering for it, and therefore he repents of his wickedness. There are many cases that I need not instance here, in which sin comes home very quickly to men. Certain sins bear fruit speedily: their harvest is reaped soon after the seed is sown. Then a man says he is sorry, and he gives up the sin for a time; not because he dislikes it, but because he sees that it is ruining him: as sailors in a storm cast overboard the cargo of the ship, not because they are weary of it, but because the vessel will go to the bottom if they retain it. This is regret for consequences, not sorrow for sin. It is repentance that can never be acceptable in the sight of God.

Some, again, exhibit a repentance which consists entirely of horror at the future punishment of sin. This fear is healthful in many ways, and we can by no means dispense with it. But if this fear goes no further than a selfish no reliance can be placed upon its moral effect. If they could be assured that no punishment would follow, such persons would continue in sin, and not only be content to live in it, but be delighted to have it so. Beloved, true repentance is sorrow for the sin itself: it has not only a dread of the death which is the wages of sin, but of the sin which earns the wages. If you have no repentance for the sin itself, it is in vain that you should stand and tremble because of judgment to come.

Another kind of repentance may be rather better than any we have spoken of, but still it is not repentance toward God. It is a very good counterfeit; but it is Not the Genuine Article.

I refer to a sense of the unworthiness of an ill life. I have known persons, upon a review of their past, rise above the grovelling level of absolute carelessness, and they have begun to enjoy some apprehension of the beauty of virtue, the nobleness of usefulness, and the meanness of a life of selfish pleasure. They regret that their story will never be quoted among the examples of good men, who have left "footprints on the sands of time." Musing upon their position in reference to society and history, they wish that they could blot out the past, and write more worthy lines upon the page of life. Now, this is hopeful; but it is not sufficient. Repentance toward God is the only thing which can effectually cut the cable which holds a man to the fatal shores of evil.

Once more, there is a repentance which is partial. Men sometimes wake up to the notice of certain great blots in their lives. They cannot forget that black night: they dare not tell what was then done. They cannot forget the villainous act which ruined another, nor that base lie which blasted a reputation. The man who only repents of this and that glaring offence, has not repented of sin at all. I remember the story of Thomas Olivers, who was a loose-living man till he was renewed by grace through the preaching of Mr. Wesley, and became a mighty preacher, and the author of that glorious hymn, "The God of Abraham praise." This man, before conversion, was much in the habit of contracting debts, but could not be brought to pay them. When he received grace, he was convinced that he had no right to remain in debt. He says, "I felt as great sorrow and confusion as if I had stolen every sum I owed." Now, he was not repentant for this one debt, or that other debt, but for being in debt at all, and, therefore, having a little coming to him from the estate of a relative, he bought a horse, and rode from town to town, paying everybody to whom he was indebted. Before he had finished his pilgrimage, he had paid seventy debts, principal and interest, and had been compelled to sell his horse, saddle, and bridle to do it. During this eventful journey he rode many miles to pay a single sixpence: it was only sixpence, but the principle was the same, whether the debt was sixpence or a hundred pounds. Now, as he that hates debt will try to clear himself of every sixpence, so he that repents of sin repents of it in every shape. No sin is spared by the true penitent. He abhors all sin.

The Famous Cobbler Convert,

Though no man is free from the commission of sin, yet every converted man is free from the love of sin. Every renewed heart is anxious to be free from even a speck of evil.

II. I have said enough to show that there is a repentance which is not toward God; and now let us observe that repentance is Repentance Toward God.

Lay stress on the words, "toward God." True repentance looks toward God. I will endeavour to show you this. A boy is rebellious against his father. The father has told him such a thing is to be done, and he determines that he will not do it. His father has forbidden him certain things, and he therefore defiantly does them. His father is much grieved, talks with him, and endeavours to bring him to repentance. Suppose the boy were to reply, "Father, I confess that I am sorry for what I have done, because it has deprived me of a good deal of pleasure." That would be a selfish and impudent speech, and show great contempt for his father's authority. Before he can be forgiven and restored to favor, he must confess the wrong done in disobeying his father's law. He must lament that he has broken the rule of the household; and he must promise to do so no more. There can be no restoration of that child to his proper place in the family till he has said, "Father, I have sinned." He is stubborn, unhumiliated, and rebellious till he comes to that point.

Oh sinner, you must repent before God, or you do not repent at all; for here is the essence of repentance. The man repenting sees that he has neglected God. What though I have never been a thief nor an adulterer; yet God made me and I am His creature, and if throughout twenty, thirty, or forty years I have never served Him, I have all that while robbed Him of what He had a right to expect from me. Hear how the Lord cries, "I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me." That is where the sin lies.

The penitent man sees that

of all his offences is that he has offended God. Many of you think nothing of merely offending God; you think much more of offending man. If I call you "sinners," you do not repel the charge; but if I called you "criminals," you would rise in indignation, and deny the accusation. A criminal, in the usual sense of the term, is one who has offended his fellow-man; a sinner is one who has wronged his God. You do not mind being called sinners, because you think little of grieving God; but to be called criminals, or offenders against the laws of man, annoys you; for you think far more of man than of God. Yet, in honest judgment, it were better, infinitely better, to break every human law, if this could be done without breaking the divine law, than to disobey the least of the commands of God. Knowest thou not, O man, that thou hast lived in rebellion against God? Thou has done the things He bids thee not to do, and thou hast left undone the things which He commands thee to do. This is what thou hast to feel and to confess with sorrow; and without this there can be no repentance.

To sum up: evangelical repentance is repentance of sin as sin; not of this sin nor of that, but of the whole mass. We repent of the sin of our nature as well as of the sin of our practice. We bemoan sin within us and without us. We repent of sin itself as being an insult to God. Anything short of this is a mere surface repentance, and not a repentance which reaches to the bottom of the mischief. Repentance of the evil act, and not of the evil heart, is like men pumping water out of a leaky vessel, but forgetting to stop the leak. All that is done by way of amendment without a bemoaning of sin because of its being rebellion against God, will fall short of the mark. When you repent of sin as against God, you have laid the axe at the root of the tree.

III. Thirdly, I am going to throw in a bit of my own. I confess that it does not rise to the glorious fullness of the text, but I use it as a stepping-stone for feeble footsteps. I thus apologize as I say—Those who have evangelical repentance are in Jesus Christ. Paul says that he testified of "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ;" and, therefore, where there is repentance, faith is allowable. O penitent sinner, you may believe in the Saviour! While you are laboring under your present sense of guilt, while you are loathing and abhorring yourself, while you are burdened and heavy laden with fears, while you are crushed with sorrow as you lie before the Lord, you may now trust the Lord Jesus Christ. Before you have any quiet of conscience, before any relief comes to your heart, before hope shines in your spirit; now in your direst distress, when you are ready to perish, you may at once exercise faith in Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost. There is no law against faith.

You may pluck up courage to believe when you remember this—first, that though you have offended God (and this is the great point that troubles you), that God whom you have offended has Himself provided an atonement. The sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ is practically a substitution presented by God Himself. The Offended dies to set the offender free. God Himself suffers the penalty of His law, that He may justly forgive; and that, though Judge of all, He may yet righteously exercise in the putting away of sin. When you are looking to God with tears in your eyes, remember it is the same God who is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and this offended God "so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

We testify to you "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." But that faith must be toward the Lord Jesus Christ. You must look to Jesus, to the substitute, to the sacrifice, to the mediator, to the Son of God. "No man cometh unto the Father," saith Jesus, "but by Me." No faith in God will save the sinner except it is faith in God through our Lord Jesus Christ. To attempt to come to God without the appointed Mediator, is again to insult Him by refusing His method of reconciliation. Do not so, but let your repentance toward God be accompanied with faith toward our Lord Jesus: you are warranted in thus believing.

IV. And now I come to my last point. Oh, that I might be helped by the Holy Ghost! Here I come back to the text, and get on sure ground. Repentance is linked to faith, and Faith Linked to Repentance.

We testify not only of repentance toward God, but of faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. Repentance and faith are born of the same Spirit of God. The Old Testament, with its law of repentance, must be bound up in one volume with the New Testament of the gospel of faith. These two, like Naomi and Ruth, say to each other, "Where thou dwellest, I will dwell." There are two stars called the Gemini, which are always together; faith and repentance are the Twins of the spiritual heavens. What if I liken them to the two valves of the heart? They must be both in action, or the soul cannot live. They are born together, and they must live together.

Repentance is the result of an unperceived faith. When a man repents of sin, he does inwardly believe, in a measure, although he may not think so. There is such a thing as latent faith: although it yields the man no conscious comfort, it may be doing something even better for him; for it may be working in him truthfulness of heart, purity of spirit, and abhorrence of evil. No true repentance is quite apart from faith. To the dark cloud of repentance there is a silver lining of faith; yet at the first the awakened soul does not know this, and therefore laments that he cannot believe; whereas, his very repentance is grounded upon a measure of faith.

Repentance is also greatly increased as faith grows. I fear that some people fancy that they repented when they were first converted, and that, therefore, they have done with repentance. But it is not so; the higher the faith the deeper the repentance. The saint most ripe for heaven is the most aware of his own shortcomings. As long as we are here, and grace is in active exercise, our consciousness of our unworthiness will grow upon us. When you have grown too big for repentance, depend upon it you have grown

Too Proud for Faith.

If there could be such a thing as a man who was a believer without repentance, he would be much too big for his boots, and there would be no bearing him. If he were always saying, "Yes, I know I am saved; I have a full assurance that I am saved," and yet had no sense of personal sin, how loudly he would crow! Faith cheers repentance, and repentance sobers faith. The two go well together. Faith looks to the throne, and repentance loves the cross. When faith looks most rightly to the Second Advent, repentance forbids its forgetting the First Advent. When faith is tempted to climb into presumption, repentance calls it back to sit at Jesus' feet. I will not believe in that faith which has no repentance with it, any more than I would believe in that repentance which left a man without faith in Jesus.

I have almost done; but the thought strikes me, Will these good people go home, and remember about repentance and faith? Let each one ask himself, Have I a repentance which leads to faith? Have I a faith which joins hands with repentance? Mind you do this; for there is a sad aptitude in many hearers to forget the essential point, and think of our stories and illustrations rather than of the practical duty which we would enforce. A celebrated minister, who has long ago gone home, was once taken ill, and his wife requested him to go and consult an eminent physician. He went to this physician, who welcomed him very heartily. "I am right glad to see you, sir," said he: "I have heard you preach, and have been greatly profited by you, and therefore I have often wished to have with you. If I can do anything for you, I am sure I will." The minister stated his case. The doctor said, "Oh, it is a very simple matter; you have only to take such and such a drug, and you will soon be right." The patient was about to go, thinking that he must not occupy the physician's time; but he pressed him to stay, and they entered into pleasant conversation. The minister went home to his wife, and told her with joy what a delightful man the doctor had proved to be. He said, "I do not know that I ever had a more delightful talk. The good man is eloquent and witty and gracious." The wife replied, "But what remedy did he prescribe?" "Dear!" said the minister, "I quite forget what he told me on that point." "What!" she said, "did you go to a physician for advice, and have you come away without a remedy?" "It quite slipped my mind," he said: "the doctor talked so pleasantly that his prescription has quite gone out of my head." Now, if I have talked to you so that this will happen, I shall be very sorry.

Come, let my last word be a repetition of the gospel remedy for sin. Here it is. Trust in the precious blood of Christ, and make full confession of your sin, heartily forsaking it. You must receive Christ by faith, and you must loathe every evil way. Repentance and faith must look to the water and the blood from the side of Jesus for cleansing from the power and guilt of sin. Pray God that you may, by both these priceless graces, receive at once the merit of your Saviour unto eternal salvation. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

TWO SCOTTISH BISHOPS.*

It may be said that for several centuries, preaching, as a recognized institution of the Christian Church, had been non-existent. Bishops who preached were rare exceptions. As a rule they were occupied in contests for power and honor, many of them being feudal lords, who headed their vassals clad in armor, while not a few of them led lives of shameless and unconcealed immorality. You have but to read such a book as Ranke's "Lives of the Popes" to see this. Better that these men did not try to preach, even if they were able. It would have been to add scandal and hypocrisy to sin. Scotland was then as bad as the rest of Europe—in some respects worse. You may remember the anecdote of the bishop who came to head a fray in the High Street of Edinburgh with armor beneath his gown; protesting eagerly about something, he struck his breast and the coat of mail rattled. "By my conscience!" he said. "My lord," said one of the bystanders, "your conscience is not gird, for I hear it clattering." When George Wishart was preaching in Ayr, Dunbar, Bishop of Glasgow, who had never before preached, took possession of the pulpit to exclude the reformer, but all he could say was, "They say we sold prieche. Why not? Better late thryve nor never thryve. Hold us still for your bishop, and we sall provide better the next time."

Luther's Advice.

As to the form of the sermon, Luther recommends the use of a text; but every text, even a single verse, has many things in it, and may lead many ways. The preacher, then, while he may use other parts, should seize fast hold of the main thought and keep a firm grasp of it. He cannot speak on everything; men who try to do so never reach the end. In his quaint way he compares them to a maid-servant going to market, who wastes her time in talking with this one and that one on the road, and arrives too late. We should impress the leading thought, and send away the people saying, "The sermon was on such and such a point." He makes little of the beginning or close of a sermon, of fine introductions or brilliant peroration. It is the main body of it that should be considered, and in this the preacher has two things to do—to instruct and to impress; he must tell his hearers something for the understanding, and give them some things for the heart and conscience.

A Romantic Life.

Though Hamann never founded a system of philosophy, nor wrote any epoch-making book, his conversation and his occasional writings filled men like Jacobi and Goethe with the highest admiration of his acuteness, and depth, and force of intellect. The name by which he was known among them was, "The Wise Man of the North." There was something of romance in the changes and struggles of his life. He was born in 1730, in Königsberg, in East Prussia, the country of Copernicus and Kant and Herder. The son of religious parents in humble life, he was driven from place to place till he reached London. There he fell into sin and dissipation, had to seek support by playing on the lute, and was at last struck down by disease. His distress led him to study the Bible as he had never done before, and he persevered in reading it till he became a new man. Having found in it a cure for his own sin, he learned that it supplied a test of all human knowledge and philosophy. Returning to Germany, he set himself with wonderful energy to complete and extend the education he had begun in youth, and ere long he proved himself equal to the first thinkers of his time, and superior in depth to its greatest theologians. He had a strong originality which made room for him wherever he went, and when he appeared in the circle of the Princess Galitzin, he was its presiding power. He died suddenly while on a visit there, at the age of fifty-eight, and was buried in her garden, with the inscription on his tomb: "We preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness." He was perhaps the first to strike an effectual blow at that form of Illuminism which is known as "the flat rationalism of Germany."

The Princess Galitzin.

The seat of the Princess near Münster, in Westphalia, became the resort of Germans who were interested in general literature, but specially of those who were still concerned for religion. Most of them were Protestants, although the Princess was a Roman Catholic. At that particular time Romanism was not ultramontane; the Jesuits were in discredit, and the tone of Roman Catholic devotion was that of Fénelon and Pascal. The Princess was a woman of genius and of high accomplishments. She had been one of the gayest of a gay circle, when the hollowness of the prevailing life impressed her, and she turned another way. While attracted by all questions that touch the mind and soul, by literature, art, and philosophy, she was most frequently engrossed by religious topics, which were to her of the deepest personal moment. In her doubts she turned to Hamann, who exercised a powerful religious influence over her, and all who came in contact with him.

THE LATE REV. J. DENHAM SMITH.

FEW names are more closely associated with revival work on the other side the Atlantic than that of the saintly man who entered into rest on March 5, whose portrait appears on this page. He was seventy-one years of age when he died, having been born in Hampshire, England, in the year 1818. His mother belonged to the Denham family, several members of which attained eminence—one as a poet, and one as Chief Baron of the Irish Court of Exchequer. On his father's side, too, one of his ancestors was notable. He was an Irish magistrate, and earned some unpopularity by refusing to commit John Wesley to prison when that illustrious man's enemies brought a charge of riotous assemblage against him.

Mr. Smith was converted in early life, and having consecrated his time and talents to God, he was educated at Dublin Theological Institute, and ordained in 1849 pastor of the Congregational Church at Kingstown, Ireland. During his ministry there, the condition of the fishermen on the western coast, who were sunk in a state little short of barbarism, weighed heavily on his mind, and he spent considerable time in laboring among them. This gradually led him into evangelistic work, and from that time until last year, when he was stricken down by illness, he went from city to city holding evangelistic services with extraordinary success. Wherever he went, God blessed his preaching to the salvation of many souls.

Mr. Smith was an earnest and enlightened student of prophecy. He firmly believed and taught that the Man of Sin, or Antichrist, is an actual individual person, who will presently rise to great political power in Europe, and will make a seven years' covenant with many of the Jews, according to Dan. 9: 27, but in the midst of the seven years will break that covenant and commence the final persecution of God's people for three years and a half, as predicted in Daniel 7: 25, 12: 7; Rev. 11: 2, 3; 12: 6, 14; 13: 5—this three and a half years being a time of universal Great Tribulation (Dan. 12: 1; Matt. 26: 21). He believed, also, that the personal Second Advent of Christ to raise the deceased saints from their graves, and to translate the living saints to meet Him in the air is very near at hand, and will take place before Antichrist's reign of terror.

THE DIVIDED FAMILY

"DON'T you think that you are—well, say Quixotic, to give up such a prospect as you have before you here, for the sake of those wretched Mongols?" The question was addressed to a bright, intelligent-looking young man, by a companion, as the two walked out of a medical college into the street of a large city.

"I suppose that will be the general view of it, Oscar," was the reply. "I have thought the thing out, and my conscience bids me do it; so I must let the community form its own opinion. If you had arrived at the conclusion that it was your duty, I am sure you would not falter in dread of what any one would say. That is my position, and I am going through with it. I hope inside a year I shall be preaching the gospel and healing the sick in China."

"Do the girls know?"

"Not yet; but I shall tell them to-day."

"It will be a shock for them, will it not? I fancy Maud will quarrel with you over it. The idea of her brother Harold, of whom she is so proud, deserting her and her two sisters will exasperate her. Lydia may take it better; I should not be surprised if she approves. She has your altruistic temperament. Marian is too young to count. I suppose they can get along financially without you?"

"Oh, yes; I am entitled to one-fourth of the property. Since my mother's death we have held it jointly, according to my father's will, and each of us was entitled to take a fourth on marriage or removal, but I shall leave my fourth with the girls. I can get along. I am determined to go out in apostolic fashion, exercising faith, and God will not let me starve. But I suppose that will not reconcile the girls to my going. As you say, Maud will probably be very angry about it. Well, I shall know in a very few minutes, for I am going to announce it at luncheon now. Good morning."

"Good morning, and good luck to you. I should like to see Maud's magnificent face when the bomb bursts."

The three sisters took the startling announcement very much as Harold Stanley's friend had predicted. Maud, as the eldest, and the one who had necessarily since her mother's death assumed the chief place in the household, heard her brother's announcement of his resolve to become a medical missionary with indignation. Lydia looked at him with admiration, and Marian, the youngest sat in silence, awed by her eldest sister's anger. Maud was much the best dressed of the three, and set an example of attention to her toilette that Lydia especially neglected to follow. Maud had a shrewd suspicion that the money which Lydia had to spend on dress was given away during those visits to the poor and sick, in which Lydia spent most of her time. Her dresses were worn until long out of fashion, and her general appearance indicated that she spent far less time in arranging her hair, etc., than Maud thought she ought to have done. At this very luncheon, before Harold came in, she had referred to the old-fashioned collar and loose body as unbecoming a young lady in her position, and threatened, as she had done more than once before, to stop Lydia's allowance and spend it for her in the purchase of proper attire. Harold's arrival, however, and his news diverted the storm from Lydia's quarter.

"I wonder," Maud said, "what dear papa would have said if he could have foreseen such conduct. He expected you to be our protector, and to stay with us and practice here. You would soon have plenty of patients, and might do well. I wonder how you can reconcile it to your conscience and your respect for papa's memory to desert us."

"Oh! you will be safe enough, Maud," Harold answered. "You speak as if you were in a hut surrounded by savages. What protector do you need in a city like this? You will not miss me in that capacity."

"But you seem to ignore natural affection. I should think your sisters have more claim upon you than those miserable Chinese whom you have never seen."

"He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," quoted Harold.

"Oh, I have no patience with such fanatical, self-sacrificing ideas!"

said Maud; and she sat staring before her into vacancy, her anger rising as she brooded over her brother's resolution, and all it implied. Marion rose, and bending over her, tried to soften her mood, but she turned her head away, and refused to be mollified.

Lydia had sat silent during her sister's ebullition, but now she held out her hand to her brother, and gave his, which he placed in hers, a hearty pressure. She was too much in awe of Maud to express her approval in words, but Harold understood her.

"When do you go, dear?" she asked.

Harold drew his chair close to hers, and explained his plans fully as far as they were yet made. Lydia listened intently, her warm sympathy glowing in her face, and her heart full of love and pride in her heroic, self-sacrificing brother. He was sure, evidently, of all her love and her prayers. It had cost him a struggle to make up his mind to expatriation, and the renunciation of his lucrative and honorable career in his native place. He loved his home and his sisters, and was not without ambition. He had decided, but even yet the cords of his nature were tugging hard on him to make him untrue to his conscience and his duty. Maud was making the struggle more bitter for him; but Lydia, by her love and approbation, braced him and encouraged him as only a woman can do, and in after years, when his labors were bringing forth fruit, he thanked God that in his hour of conflict his beloved sister's influence was cast on the right side.

LIMA.

THE capital city of Peru, a view of which appears on this page, is a surprise to every visitor who has not heard or read a description of it before his arrival. Though situated in the tropics, and only twelve degrees south of the Equator, he naturally would expect intense heat. Instead of this he finds the thermometer very seldom reaching eighty-two degrees in the summer, while in the winter it ranges from fifty-seven to sixty-two degrees. This is partly due to the fact that it stands on an elevation of 512 feet above the sea-level, and partly to its proximity to the snowy Cordilleras. Another surprise for the visitor comes from the absence of the splendor he would expect in the capital of a country famed for its wealth. The private houses are frail and mean looking. The necessity for this he soon learns. Lima is situated in a region notable for frequent earthquakes, and to erect high, massive structures would only be to increase the danger of its inhabitants.

The City of Lima, the Capital of Peru.

The most important buildings in the city are the Government House and the Cathedral, which occupy two sides of the wide Plaza seen in the illustration. The Plaza itself covers nine acres, and its other two sides are occupied by arcades, behind which are stores. These arcades are a favorite resort for the ladies of Peru, who there get protection from the sun, and avoid the moist and uncleanly soil of the open streets. In the centre of the Plaza is a beautiful bronze fountain supported by lions and griffins, the whole surmounted by a statue of Fame. It is of very skilful workmanship, and is believed to have been erected in 1578. The city also contains the famous university of San Marcos, founded in 1551, which is the oldest institution of learning in this hemisphere. It was erected and devoted to its present uses nearly seventy years before the Mayflower touched these shores. The city, which now contains about 100,000 inhabitants, was designated the capital of Peru by Pizarro, in 1535, and was originally called the City of the Three Kings, in reference to the visit of the Magi to the birthplace of our Saviour; and the Emperor Charles V., in allusion to the same event, granted, as the arms of the city, a rayed star on an azure field, and three crowns.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

A Talk with Mary Burton.

I MET at Castle Garden many whom I had known in the old country; but it was one particular face which I was anxious to see. A man wrapped in a thick coat, and with a fur cap upon his head, brushed against me, and before I had time to raise my eyes, my hand was grasped in his, and I heard Mary's husband say, "Oh, Sister Stenhouse, I'm so delighted to see you! I knew we should meet you in New York. Come and see Mary. She's my Mary now!" I went with Elder Shrewsbury, and I saw Mary. But oh, how greatly was she changed! When I returned from our Swiss mission and saw her after an interval of several years, I was, of course, struck with the alteration which had then transformed her from a pretty little fairy-like girl into a decorous young lady contemplating matrimony; but although I had now been absent from England a few months, I observed a much more striking alteration in her than on the previous occasion. It was not now, I thought, so much outward and personal change, as a new and striking development of her inner consciousness—her soul itself. Her form was as graceful, and her eyes as bright as ever; but from those eyes there now shone forth another light than that which I had thought so charming in the by-gone time.

Her affection for me was as warm and demonstrative as when we first met. She recognized me in a moment, before her husband had time to say a word; and, throwing both her arms round me, she kissed me again and again with all the effusion of her childish days. Taking my hand, she led me gently into a quiet corner and seated me beside her on a big trunk, and then she began to talk. It was the same soft sweet voice again, which used to be so dear to me when I was left all alone in Southampton, soon after my marriage, while my husband was on a mission in Italy.

She told me the story of her courtship—all and much more than she had told me in her letter. But it was when she came to speak of her marriage, of her husband, and especially of their pilgrimage to Utah, that I observed more especially the change which had taken place in her. She was no longer the light-hearted girl, half doubting her strange religion, and rejecting it altogether when it did not coincide with her own ideas and wishes. No; Elder Shrewsbury—had he been ten times a Mormon elder—could not have wished for a more obedient, a more earnest, I might say, a more fanatical, believer than was now to be found in his young and beautiful wife. Her eyes really glowed with enthusiasm as she spoke of "the work of the Lord" and of "gathering to Zion;" and her voice, though soft and sweet as ever, had in it, now and then, a tinge of sternness which told of a determination and spirit which the casual observer would never have suspected. I expressed some surprise that she and her husband, not being without funds, should have gone with the Hand-Cart Company when they might have waited and have gone with so much more comfort with one of the independent companies. "Why, Sister Stenhouse," she said, "we have done it simply and entirely as a matter of faith. Certainly we could have afforded to go in any way we chose, but my husband said we ought to be an example to the poorer Saints; so we gave away nearly all our money to help the emigration fund, and then we came, just as you see us, along with the rest."

"But the danger and the discomfort of emigrating to Salt Lake with the Hand-Cart Company is so great," I suggested to Mary, and added, "Surely the Lord does not want us to sacrifice ourselves when no one is benefited by it?"

"Not a bit," said she; "there's no danger, Sister Stenhouse, and if there were, it would only please me all the more. As for discomfort, why, we should have that any way, and we glory in making sacrifices. Besides which, we have been told by the Apostle that this will be the most pleasant and successful journey across the Plains that has ever been made."

"I am a little doubtful of the promises of apostles and elders," I said; "and I remember, Mary, when you used to agree with me."

"I know I did," she answered; "but Brother Shrewsbury has shown me how wrong I was—I never doubt now. I think you have a wrong notion about this Hand-Cart scheme. It is not an ordinary plan such as any man might have made. This plan has been revealed from heaven to Brigham, and in fact we call it 'the Divine plan' in our songs! Oh! you should hear our songs. They're a little rough, but the singing is so earnest, and the voices of the men and girls blend so well together, that I know you'd like them. There's only one thing that I don't like about this plan, and that I daresay is all right if only I knew it."

"I think, Mary," I said, "I could tell you a good deal that you wouldn't like if you knew it."

"No, dear," she replied hastily, as if afraid to hear me, "don't tell me any unpleasant matters. I'll tell you all I meant. The Prophet and Heber C. Kimball, and Jedediah Grant, counselled the richer emigrants to give as much as they possibly could—all their property, if they had faith enough—to help the poor brethren to emigrate; but the American elders had private instructions—so Brother Shrewsbury told me—to use the money to help out all the unmarried girls who are willing to go. I confess that this troubled me not a little; but my husband says that when we get to Salt Lake we shall find all will be perfectly right, and of course I believe him."

Mary's conversation puzzled me a good deal at the time. She had formerly been so clear-sighted and so unbiassed by prejudice, and now she seemed ready to believe anything. All her husband's enthusiasm was now her own; she saw with his eyes, and in the intensity of her love for him she believed all that he accepted as true. Long after, when I thought of that short interview, I called to mind her impulsive earnestness, and I felt that a secret misgiving, unconsciously to herself, was partly the cause of it. Unknown to herself, her excess of zeal was the offspring of doubt. Life in the future was, in anticipation, to my poor friend one long day of hope and happiness. She could not see the shadow of a cloud. Salt Lake, to her excited imagination, was the abode of peace and sanctity and joy.

I should here explain that when the Mormons quitted Nauvoo and migrated to the Great Salt Lake, that territory belonged to Mexico, but scarcely had they settled there when, by the treaty of March, 1848, it was made over to the United States, with New Mexico and Upper California, much to the annoyance of the Mormons, who well knew that they would not be able to dictate their own terms so easily with the States' Government as with the Mexican. The United States, however, were slow to extend their political jurisdiction over the new territory, and this furnished the Mormon leaders an opportunity to create a provisional, independent government for themselves, to which they gave the name of "The State of Deseret," over which Brigham Young was elected Governor. The Congress of the United States, however, ignored this State, and in 1850 included it in the State of Utah, reserving to themselves the right at any time to divide it as they might think proper. At the same time Brigham Young was appointed Governor by the President of the United States, and six other officers were appointed to assist him, three being Gentiles and three Mormons, which, with Brigham, gave the preponderance to the "Saints."

The Gentile Federal officers arrived in July, 1851, and, very soon after their arrival, found that Utah was anything but a pleasant place for unbelievers. They attended a special conference of the Church, held in September, at which Justice Brochus spoke irreverently of their practices, going so far as to assure the ladies of its immorality, and reproved the leaders for their disrespectful language concerning the Government, and their consignment of the late President Zachary Taylor to the nether regions. Such unexpected language raised a storm of indignation, and when Brigham replied, the people would have torn the Judge to pieces, had they not been restrained by their prophet. Brigham reiterated the statement as to the perdition of the recently deceased President, but the Judge put in a demurrer, on which Kimball facetiously touched him on the shoulder, and assured him that he need not doubt the statement, for he would see him when he got there; a promise that was not very reassuring to the Judge.

The outcome of this was that the Judge, thinking his life not safe, retired from the Territory, accompanied by the other two Gentile Federal officers. They were replaced by three others, of which two, though Gentiles, were very friendly to the Mormons. These remained but a short time—two of them dying, and the other removing to California—when others were sent in their place.

At this period the Government at Washington was seemingly very kindly disposed towards the Saints, for only two of the Federal offices were held by persons who were not Mormons. But a change was coming over the feelings of those in power. Not only did they feel that the general teaching of the Mormons was a grave danger to the morality of the States, but Brigham's remark of the late President, "Old Zachary (Taylor) is in hell, and I am glad of it," stirred up the anger of Taylor's friends, and in course of time Brigham's removal from the governorship was resolved upon. Brigham, however, felt secure, and he greatly annoyed his enemies by saying, "I am and will be Governor, and no power can hinder it," although he added in the printed copy of the sermon in which he had uttered the words the proviso, "Until the Lord Almighty says, 'Brigham, you need not be Governor any longer.'"

The next year—1854—Lieutenant-Colonel Steptoe, who was already in the territory, was appointed Governor, but upon a memorial from the inhabitants, to which the newly appointed Governor attached his signature, this appointment was rescinded, and Brigham reinstated. In 1855 Brigham and his council appointed a State marshal, an appointment which belonged to the President of the United States, acting under the advice of the Senate. They appointed a different man, and instantly there was a conflict as to who was to stand. Judge Stiles, who tried the case in Salt Lake City, favored the United States marshal, and brought such a storm of wrath upon his head that he hastily adjourned his court.

Some of the "good brethren" had now their attention directed to the renegade judge, and while he was absent from his office they gathered up the records of the United States District Courts, placed them in safe-keeping, and afterwards made a fire of books and papers found in his office. On his return, when he saw the fire, and saw his office ransacked, he very naturally concluded that all the books, records, and papers, were destroyed. That outrage created a great sensation throughout the United States adverse to the Saints. The attack upon Judge Stiles in a public court of the United States, and the subsequent outrage in his office, would be inexplicable to the reader had it transpired outside of Utah. To the people of that Territory it presented no such difficulty, for it occurred during that fearful period of fanaticism, known as "The Reformation," of which we shall say more further on. But from this digression I now return to the narrative of my conversation with Mary.

I asked Mary whether the Saints in England had heard any of those strange reports about Brigham Young defying the Government, which had attracted so much attention in this country.

Mary replied, "Certainly; it is because the day is so very near when all intercourse between God's people and the Gentile world shall be cut off forever that these great efforts are being made to gather the Saints together. Of course you know this, but I don't think you know all. Why, at the last general conference in Liverpool, the president had instructions from Salt Lake to propose Brigham Young as 'Prophet, Seer, Revelator, and King'!"

"King?" I said. "How can President Young ever be 'King'? Utah is part of the territory of the United States, and under their jurisdiction; it is not even a State itself yet, and Congress has refused to sanction the name of Deseret. This country will never suffer a kingdom to be set up in Utah; you must be totally misinformed, Sister Mary."

"No, Sister Stenhouse," she exclaimed, "I am under no mistake. My husband assured me that the conference accepted the proposition, and that it was received unanimously. The Saints are gathering in from all parts of the world, and when war is declared they will not be found unprepared. Why, here on board with us the American elders are all provided with swords and revolvers of the very best make that could be got for love or money, and I myself have heard them say that Brigham Young intends shortly to declare his independence of the United States. We didn't know this before we left England, but we felt sure that he had some great purpose in view which had been revealed to him."

"Before we left," I said, "the Saints were all eager to emigrate."

"Yes, dear," she answered, "but nothing like they are now. You have no idea how excited and anxious everybody is. Some of the people, in order to obey counsel, sold their watches and jewelry, and even their best clothes, scarcely keeping enough for the journey, and every one who had any money gave it away. Brigham Young set a noble example in that; why, we had on board ship with us Brother Tenant, the rich new convert, who paid $30,000 for the property which Brigham Young so generously gave to help the Emigration Fund. He hardly had enough left to carry him and his family to Salt Lake; and now he is going to cross the Plains with us, to settle in the City. He is somewhere here among the emigrants, I believe, at the present moment, and you could ask him all about it if you liked. The brethren assure him that Brother Brigham is so liberal that he will get vastly more than the value of his $30,000 when he reaches Salt Lake, and I hope he will, for I like both him and his wife."

All this was thus far true, but it was with some misgivings that I heard Mary talk about it. Still I tried to persuade myself that it was a sin to doubt. How little did either of us imagine that after poor Mr. Tenant's miserable death upon the Plains we should live to see his amiable and genial wife—destitute and defrauded of her property by generous-hearted Brigham—dragging out a miserable existence in Salt Lake, and dependent even for a crust of bread upon the kindness of the brethren. And yet, as I have previously stated, this was how the prophet, under the mask of liberality, contrived, for his own selfish purposes, to cheat this unfortunate and too-confiding Saint.

Then we talked of what more nearly interested ourselves, and Mary asked me when Mr. Stenhouse and myself were coming out. I told her that it was quite uncertain, but that we expected to do so before long.

"At any rate you will come out before the season is over?" she said.

"Most likely so," I replied; "but you will be safely there, and settled before we arrive." How little did she anticipate the fearful scenes she was to witness—the terrible sufferings she was to endure—before the season she spoke of had passed away. Could I at that time have known all, I would have prayed that sooner than set out on that fearful journey she might find refuge in the grave from the horrors which, unknown to her, were brooding over her way.

We talked long, and then my husband joined us—Elder Shrewsbury was called away by some necessary duty—and when we parted it was with many promises to write frequently to each other of our common religious interests, as well as the welfare of ourselves and those we loved. Then I spoke with several other old friends, and we exchanged greetings with all sorts of people, for my husband is always sure to be upon speaking terms with almost everybody he meets.

THE TWO GREAT COMMANDMENTS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for April 21, Mark 12: 28, 37. Golden Text, Rom. 13: 10.

The Law Fulfilled Through Love—Traps Set for the Great Teacher—Working Up a Charge of Sedition—The Question on a Higher Plane—A Frivolous Question—An Authoritative Statement on the Future Life—A Sincere Questioner—The Essence of the Law—The Measure of Love—A Constraining Power—Not From Without—Becomes a Second Nature—Love to Man a Test of Reality—Loving the Unloving and Unlovely—The Scribe's Answer.

"LOVE worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore, love is the fulfilling of the law." "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." (Rom. 13: 8, 10.) "God is love," and His law is like Him. Love is the name and nature of God, and His law is love. Every sin is a sin against love; it worketh ill to his neighbor, but "love worketh no ill to his neighbor."

The Pharisees, who were the ceremonialists, or ritualists of the day, joined with the Herodians, who were thoroughly irreligious, to perplex Jesus with questions. They approach Him with flattering words, "Master, we know that thou art true."

What Hypocrisy!

If they knew this, why did they not believe on Him? "And carest for no man; for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth." No doubt this was the reputation which Jesus had at the time among those who believed in Him. But His persecutors were only seeking to put Him off His guard. Then they proposed to Him the question, "Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar or not?" Some of His enemies had construed into an act of sedition and insurrection the triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem, sitting on an ass's colt. Now, if they can only get Him to say it is unlawful to give tribute to Cæsar, on account of the law of God that one of their brethren should reign over them, and not a stranger (Deut. 17: 15), they would have proof sufficient to convict Jesus of rebellion against the authority of Rome. But they were unprepared for the answer, which took them on to another and a higher ground than that of political questions, "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's."

Now the Sadducees, the agnostics of the day, who did not believe in any resurrection, proposed to Him a question which showed how was their conception of another state of existence. According to Jewish law, when a man died childless, his brother or nearest male heir was to take his wife, to raise up seed unto his deceased brother, that the entail of the land should not be cut off. They suppose a man with six brothers; that he died childless, and that each brother in succession took her, and also died childless—whose wife should she be in the Resurrection? This is the class of question which infidels, sceptics, and agnostics make to puzzle our sons and daughters, and to break their confidence in the Word of the living God. Jesus always took His questioners on to ground which they had never trodden. He showed them that in the Resurrection the present state of things would not exist, that marriage is a thing of time, not of eternity, and that, as regards the Resurrection, God, who calls Himself the God of Abraham and Isaac and of Jacob, is not the God of corpses, but of living men in another state of existence. Let us learn never to attempt to answer those who would puzzle us with questions, until God has told us what to say. Powerless answers only increase the darkness of those who are without God, and put us at a disadvantage. It is the entrance of His Word which gives light, and the Holy Spirit who convinces.

"And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that He had answered them well, asked Him, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength; this is the first commandment."

"Thou Shalt Love."

It is as though God would say, I love, and thou shalt love also. God's love is unlimited love, and He would have ours to be the same. "With all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." This was the measure of Jesus' love for His Father. "I came down from heaven, not to do Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me." (John 6: 38.) "I do always those things that please Him." (John 8: 29.) "The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of Myself, but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." (John 14: 10.) His first recorded utterance on earth was, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" (Luke 2: 49.) And again, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent Me, and to finish His work." (John 4: 34.) There was in the life of Jesus no question about anything else. His only consideration was His Father's will, His Father's pleasure. It is our privilege, our life's vocation, to follow Him, and live as He lived. A life less absorbed is not a life of love. But how can we ever attain to such devotion. Some will say,

Where is Your Heart?

Is God really to you nearer and dearer than husband, child, or friend? Is your life more bound up in God than in them? Is God more necessary every hour than any human being? Can you do without the counsel of even those you most esteem, and yet you cannot do without the counsel of God? Can you do without the sympathy of the tenderest heart you know, but your heart would break if, in all your affliction, He was not afflicted? If this is so, you will find no difficulty whatever in such demands upon you by Him who possesses your heart; you would count it a wrong if you were not permitted to be all for God, to give all to God.

But this law of love does not begin its action from without. It is not, "I ought to love God, and so I will force myself to undertake the difficult task." We love those on earth whom we love, not from duty, but because we cannot help it; something in them attracts us, and draws out our hearts to them. And so it is with God. By His Word, by our acquaintance with Him, by His answers to our prayers, by His strengthening and comforting us, He wins our hearts, and then He writes His law upon our hearts, until it becomes a second nature to do all and think all in relation to God. He shows us His unspeakable love in giving us Jesus to die for us, and to live in us, and to make intercession for us, and how can we not respond to such love? He is so true a Father, numbering every hair of our heads (Luke 11: 7), it would be strange if we did not love Him. The very apple of His eye is touched by one who touches us. (Zech. 11: 8.) How shall we not love Him? A less love than an all-absorbing love is not a fulfilling of the first great command, and the only possibility of obeying it is in yielding ourselves up to be filled with the Holy Ghost, who testifies of Christ, and makes us to comprehend "the breadth and length and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge" (Eph. 3: 18, 19), and which "is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost." (Rom. 5: 5.) "And the second is like; namely, this, Thou shalt love

Thy Neighbor as Thyself."

But here comes a difficulty. God is worthy to be loved; my neighbor is not worthy; he has wronged me, traduced me, spited me; how shall I love him? There is but one way, and that is yielding ourselves to the Holy Ghost, to manifest Christ's love in us. There is no guarantee that we love God, if we do not love our neighbor. If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how shall he love God, whom he hath not seen. And this commandment have we from Him, that he who loveth God love his brother also." (1 John 4: 20, 21.) It is an evidence that we have passed from death unto life, that we "love the brethren."

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

This does not mean that you shall notice every fault in him, and despise him for it, and draw the attention of others to it, and treasure it up to tell other people of it. This is not how you would have him deal with you, and yet how many, who profess to be Christians, indulge in this spirit of backbiting! "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God, and whosoever loveth Him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of Him." From this it is clear that an unloving spirit to another Christian, however much he may provoke us, is an evidence of want of love to God. When we were yet enemies Christ died for us, and it is our divine privilege to love our enemies, especially our Christian enemies. Our love to one another as Christians is the true gauge of our love to God. The world is selfish. "Every man for himself" is the world's law, and the world's gospel. But Christ "died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them, and rose again." (11 Cor. 5: 15.)

The cause of death in many of our churches is want of love. Wherever two or three bodies of Christians meet together for prayer, there always comes blessing and awakening. The Apostle John says, "Beloved, let us love one another, for love is of God, and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God." Then, on the contrary, he who is unloving is not born of God, and does not know God. One who is much in communion with God becomes very tender of the faults of others; he learns that if a brother be overtaken in a fault, it is his precious privilege to "restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering himself lest he be also tempted." (Gal. 6: 1.) When we live near God we cannot help looking at Him, and "beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, (we) are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even 'as by the Spirit of the Lord.'" (11 Cor. 3: 18.)

and "is kind to the unthankful, and to the evil." Being the source of love, He can love where there is nothing to call out His love, and if, in very deed, Christ dwells in our hearts by faith, then we shall love those who have nothing pleasing in them, those who wound and try us, for we shall see them with the eye of God, and see the possibilities of what He can do in them. Let us not deceive ourselves, no devotion to God which we feel in our hearts goes for anything unless we love others as Christ has loved us.

The scribe answered, "Well, Master, thou hast said the truth, for there is one God, and there is none other but He, and to love Him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbor as himself, is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices." This man saw deep; he comprehended that outward service went for nothing, that everything which is not heart-deep is of no account with God; and Jesus answered him, saying, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." This silenced other questioners. Now it was Jesus' turn, and He asked, "How say the scribes, that Christ is the Son of David? For David himself said by the Holy Ghost, the Lord said to my Lord, Sit thou on My right hand, until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool. David therefore himself calleth Him Lord, how is He then his son?" "God manifest in the flesh" is the only answer. This the Scribes refused to see, but for this, thank God, we can praise Him forever.

“CHRIST OUR PEACE.”

I thought upon my sins, and I was sad:
My soul was troubled sore, and filled with pain;
But then I thought on Jesus, and was glad;
My heavy grief was turned to joy again.

I thought upon the Law—the fiery Law,
Holy, and just, and good in its decree;
I looked to Jesus, and in Him I saw
That Law fulfilled—its curse endured for me.

I saw my sad estate—condemned to die;
Then terror seized my heart, and dark despair:
But when to Calvary I turned my eye,
I saw the cross, and read forgiveness there.

I saw that I was lost,—far gone astray;
No hope of safe return there seemed to be:
But then I heard that Jesus was the way,
“A new and living way,” prepared for me.

Then in that way—so free, so safe, so sure,
Sprinkled all o’er with reconciling blood—
Will I abide, and never wander more;
Walking along in fellowship with God.

A STREET SCENE IN EGYPT.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP WHATELY.

Born in 1787—Brilliant University Career—Appointed Bampton Lecturer in 1822—Accepts the Living of Halesworth—Professor of Political Economy at Oxford—Appointed Archbishop of Dublin in 1831—Writings, and Death in 1863.

THE sad news of the death of Miss Mary L. Whately at Cairo, Egypt, just received, has caused sorrow to all who knew her, or who knew of her noble work. A few short weeks ago, the fellaheen of many a village on the Nile, within a certain distance south of Cairo, were doubtless saying to one another, according to their wont in early spring, "Where is Sitt Mariam? Where is the lady of the Book? Will she come again this year, and read us the 'good words'? It is time for her to come!" Sitt Mariam came. But she had taken cold before she stepped on board the hired dahabieh. It was hoped that rest and nursing after her annual tour would have repaired the mischief. But the bronchial trouble increased, spread to the lungs, and on March 9 the self-sacrificing servant of Christ entered into rest. The lesson of her life is worth learning, so THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week publishes a brief sketch of it, with her portrait and that of her famous father, the late Archbishop of Dublin.

The Most Rev. Richard Whately was born in 1787, and died in 1863 at the age of seventy-six. He was the son of Rev. Dr. Whately, of Non-such Park, Surrey, England. His career at Oriel College, Oxford, was a very brilliant one. In 1811 he was elected a Fellow, and took his M. A. degree in the following year. Oriel was the leading college in the University; and at that time among the members of its common-room were Keble, Arnold, Pusey, Copleston, and J. H. Newman, whose names have since become historical. Whately was appointed Bampton Lecturer in 1822, in which year he accepted the rectory of Halesworth, in Suffolk, where he labored with great energy, and found time besides for writing. In 1825 he was re-called to Oxford, and appointed Principal of St. Alban's Hall. During his tenure of that post he was regarded as one of the men of most weight in the University. For one year, from 1830 to 1831, he was Professor of Political Economy at Oxford, which post he resigned in 1831, on being appointed by Earl Grey Archbishop of Dublin.

His position was a difficult one, for the Roman Catholic Relief Act had been passed only two years previously, and to him fell the duty of carrying out the principle which it embodied. After about twenty years of energetic work, particularly towards the promotion of unsectarian education, he retired from the National Board because he and Cardinal Cullen could not agree on certain points which were considered vital. He continued to interest himself, however, in educational and philanthropic work, and in addition to his archi-episcopal duties filled various offices. He was a Commissioner of National Education in Ireland until 1853; was a visitor of Trinity College, President of the Royal Irish Academy, and Chancellor of the Order of St. Patrick. He also founded a much needed professorship of political economy in the University of Dublin. Among his

may be mentioned his "Elements of Logic," a book which was a leading hand-book of the school of logicians in all English-speaking lands; "Elements of Rhetoric;" "Errors of Romanism Traced to their Origin in Human Nature;" "Introduction to Political Economy;" and "Historic Doubts respecting Napoleon Bonaparte," a jeu d'esprit intended to confute the argument employed by Hume's fallacious "Essay against the Credibility of Miracles."

His end was, like his life, that of an earnest and devout believer. Once, at a crisis of his disease, which threatened immediate dissolution, he calmly asked, on observing the anxious looks of those around him, "What is the matter?" On being told, he replied, "Do you suppose I fear to die?" When informed that the immediate danger had passed away, he gently added, "I am sorry to hear it." He longed to depart and be with Christ. A friend, who knew how earnestly he had prayed and hoped that he might retain his faculties to the last, said to him, "The Lord has heard your prayers and preserved your intellect unimpaired." He replied, with a look full of devout meaning, "It is not intellect which can avail me now, but only faith in Christ Jesus."

MISS MARY L. WHATELY.

Birth in 1824—Girlhood and School Work—Helping in Relief in the Irish Famine—First Visit to Cairo—Attendance on Her Father—Fixes Her Home in Cairo—Her First Pupils—A Boy's Pathetic Wish—The Medical Mission Founded—THE devoted Christian lady, whose nearly thirty years of missionary labor in Egypt closed on March 9, was sixty-five years of age when she died, having been born in 1824. She was the second daughter of the Archbishop, and her early years were spent in the quiet English parsonage, where she and her elder sister busied themselves, even as children, in the schools and homes of the poor. After her father's promotion to Dublin, her opportunities of usefulness extended. During the Irish famine she took an active share in the organizations the Archbishop formed for the relief of the starving poor. Thus Mary Whately passed her youth in varied and active usefulness, till, after having lost her beloved mother, her health failed, and she was ordered abroad for part of a year. Her was thus paid in the character of an ordinary tourist. She returned thither in the autumn of 1860, with the intention of opening a school for Moslem girls, and did it, notwithstanding the opposition such a Utopian idea, as it was then considered, had to encounter even in missionary circles. She went about very quietly in the lanes and by-streets near her hired house, and at length some poor mothers were persuaded to send their children, and a small troop of little dusky maidens, ragged and dirty, but full of life and spirits, were gathered in a simple school-room. The first text taught the little scholars was, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth;" the second "Jesus said, I am the way, the truth, and the life." The Bible was the foundation of everything from the first but good secular teaching was added by degrees. A traveller, who visited the country shortly afterward, saw her with her first little group of about a dozen scholars seated round her on the ground. The next winter saw her once more in Cairo, but in 1862-3 home duties claimed her. Her distinguished father's health was rapidly declining, and she could not leave his side. Unable at length to hold a book himself, he still enjoyed being read to, and one of his last interests was listening to the proof-sheets of her second volume of "Ragged Life in Egypt," which peculiarly pleased him.

First Visit To Cairo

Her home in Dublin being broken up by his death, she fixed it in Cairo for the remainder of her life. Once in three years she indulged in a visit to her native land, contenting herself with going to the Lebanon at the hottest season of the intermediate years.

Her Assistant Missionaries were Syrians from the Lebanon, and from the family of one of the well-to-do landed proprietors in the district above Beyrout, she chose a young, bright girl to educate, who became to her as a daughter, and, when old enough, was married to the chief missionary and superintendent of her schools in Cairo; for "the little one" she began with had speedily become, if not a thousand, more than half that number; and in response to the phenomenal utterance of an Arab lad, who envied his sister's reading,

"I Wish I Were a Girl,"

a boys' school had been added to the girls'. The boys learned English, and were soon able to pass an examination in Scripture history and doctrine that would have done credit to any English school boys of their standing. (On page 220 is a sketch of the interior of the school.)

In 1869 the Khedive was so much impressed with the value of Miss Mary Whately's educational work that he gave her an excellent site on which to build her Mission-House and Schools.

She sank much of her own capital in this important work, to which she latterly added the Dispensary and Patients' Waiting-room, needed for the Medical Mission, which originated in her own unassisted efforts to relieve the sick, and is now thoroughly organized and under the care of a skilful Syrian Christian doctor. Meanwhile generations of pupils have passed through her schools. They usually remain about three years, and, it is no exaggeration to say, carry away with them a competent knowledge of at least the facts of Christianity. Many of them fill good positions under Government, in merchants' houses, and on the railways. Thus "good ground" has been prepared; and "good seed" falling into it, whensoever times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, may therefore have opportunity to bring forth fruit abundantly.

Two young girls who attended the schools, and who died at an interval of about a year, gave unmistakable evidence of a conquering faith in an atoning Saviour. Miss Whately also visited, during a short illness, which terminated fatally, a Mohammedan youth, who died rejoicing in Christ as his Saviour. Among the slaves there have also been many very cheering instances of good realized, one of them being that of a poor negro who found peace through Jesus' blood by the simple reading and still more simple explanations of her master's little sons who attended the school. The work has steadily increased from year to year. At present the two schools receive an average of

of various nationalities, but Egyptians form the great majority. About two-thirds of the girls and half of the boys are Moslems, the rest mainly Copts, the descendants of the original Egyptians. Miss Whately labored on earnestly and quietly, thankful to see the fruit of her labors and enjoying the satisfaction of her home life with her adopted daughter, who, after she became a widow, still continued to be Miss Whately's zealous fellow-worker, and herself the mother of a son and daughter whose education was a source of constant interest; of late years. She had also the happiness of her elder sister's annual winter visits, and the sweet converse two such richly furnished spiritual minds were wont to hold together on the deep things of God, further helped to make good to her the promise of the life which now is, which belongs to those who follow the Lord fully; to say nothing of the intense interest of the busy days she passed, and of her opportunities of insight into many of the political problems so difficult to understand at a distance. As the years passed, her attention was given more and more to

The Medical Mission.

She said in one of her letters: "This mission to poor Moslems who come for bodily relief is the only opportunity they have of hearing anything of the good tidings of God's love through the Saviour. As a rule, the Moslem is shut out by circumstances, by bigotry, and by ignorance from hearing any good. In the lower class none of the women, and but few of the men, can read. All they have ever heard of Christianity is against it. They have been told Christians are infidels, and all that is bad. The sufferers come to our dispensary, and for the first time hear of the Physician of souls. The Egyptian peasant feels kindness, especially help in bodily suffering, very strongly; his bigotry is softened and his heart opened. He must wait awhile for his turn for the doctor, and he cannot help listening. Many a voice I have heard saying, 'I never knew these things before, this is truly a blessed word.' The poor women cluster round with sick babes on their knees, or with eyes which tell their own story of suffering; and they hear of Him who says, 'Come ye, buy and eat, without money.'

"I could give many cases that would touch heart to read; of the poor old woman who the prayer, "God be merciful to me a sinner," written out for her on a paper, that she should read it to her daily till she knew the words perfectly; of the poor negress in the Soudan, deserted by a soldier husband, and if her poor babe (cured by the doctor) did "to grow big," she would bring her to us at she might learn to read "in that book;" a patient who was rather longer under treatment than some others, and was heard explaining in her simple way the portion of a Scripture to a more ignorant friend, and saying, "it was our sins the Lord came to die."

'Read Me All; I Want It All.'

Id a poor old woman, who had listened more tentatively than all the rest, though many were interested, to the Scripture reading at our dispensary. I explained that she could not hear on one occasion, and told her to come again next Monday. "Then you will read it bit by bit, will you not?" she said, with deep earnestness. "A little every day, till I have heard all; want to hear those good words, and all about it."

As I warmly agreed, she repeated, "Bit by bit." Three days ago (this was written in 1886) this woman had never heard of a Saviour, and but for the Medical Mission would most likely have gone to her grave doubly blind; for she is under our doctor's care for very bad eyes."

Of the many trials, self-denials, and disappointments incident to her laborious work, Miss Whately seldom spoke, and never complained. Sometimes, however, the burden of straitened resources which hindered her from entering many an open door, notably on the Nile, pressed heavily. But she had full confidence that so long as the Lord had work for her to do, He would supply her with means for doing it. That her working day was so nearly ended, she seemed to have no presentiment. When in her native country last summer, in reference to advancing years, she once alluded to her possible eventual retirement. But it has been otherwise ordered for her. She has died in harness. Her regular annual Nile Boat Mission trip was accomplished at the usual season. Then she came home to die. (She always called Cairo "home.") Her beloved sister was with her, and other dear ones on whom she had bestowed so large a share of her warm affections. As to the result of her well-nigh thirty years' work in Egypt, "the day shall declare it"—the day to which she looked forward with such joyful hope, the day of

The Lord's Second Coming.

If she were at any time depressed, "Why tarry the wheels of His chariot?" was her constant exclamation, and at all times, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly," her continual prayer. "The Lord gave the word and great was the company of the women that published it." The words seem prophetic of these latter days. And among all such favored women, one more simple, more trustful, more single-eyed, more self-forgetful, would be hard to find. She rests from her labors, and her works do follow her, and when at length it shall be said, "Blessed be Egypt, my people," it may become manifest that her patient pioneering was used to prepare the way of the Lord. Meantime, who shall take up her fallen mantle?

THE EGYPTIAN BAZAR.

IN the foreground of the sook, or bazar, depicted in the illustration, is a water-carrier with his skin, or as it is called in the New Testament (Matt. 9:17), bottle. A little in the rear is a lady on an ass, accompanied by her servant, taking an airing. As is usual with ladies in the East, her face is partially hidden from view, to prevent the gratification of a too impertinent curiosity on the part of strangers and the sterner sex. On the left, and occupying an elevated position, are several of the tradespeople of the city, waiting patiently under a rude sort of shelter from the rays of the sun, for customers, two of them smoking strange-looking pipes, and their neighbors apparently absorbed in contemplation. "The majority of the stores," said Miss Whately in her book, "Among the Huts in Egypt," "are small concerns, and it often happens that you are obliged to visit half a dozen to get a very few things from the small stock in hand with each. However, the habit, still adhered to, of having particular streets for particular articles, facilitates the search a good deal. For example: you want some native slippers or shoes, for wear in hot weather; you must then go to the 'Shoe Bazar,' and find yourself in a long street with two or three very narrow ones leading out of it, all lined with small shops displaying red and yellow leather slippers of various forms and sizes: some pointed and turned up at the toe, some very wide and rounded (these are specially worn by countrymen, and have very thick soles, and are always a great deal too large) others are elegantly embroidered; these are for ladies' wear—in short, the variety is endless, and the colors being always red and yellow, the effect of the stalls is very pretty. The makers of saddles and housings for horses and donkeys, also usually in bright-colored materials, have their quarter in the same way, as have the less lively manufactures of sieves, combs, palm frames, etc., and the brass-workers, whose region is almost intolerable from the noise of their hammers on the brazen vessels used in the East."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Soldier's Testimony after Parade.—Mr. D. McLauchlan remarks: "One day I saw a soldier get up among his fellows and boldly, but most tenderly, speak for Christ, as they were lounging about after parade. 'Comrades,' he said, 'I am not much of a speaker, yet I want to tell you of my conversion. Before it I was as if I had turned my back upon God, peace, hope, salvation. But a few days ago, God said to me, "Right about turn! Quick march!" I obeyed orders, and am now going in the opposite direction to that which I pursued most of my life, and I am now serving under the Lord Jesus Christ.' That testimony was uttered before a large number of men, and God blessed it to the saving of many souls among them, who gladly enlisted under the banner of Christ that very day. 'Right about turn! Quick march!' very aptly expresses conversion, which is a turning round. We then fight against our former friends, and march shoulder to shoulder with those whom we heretofore regarded as our enemies. No longer enemies to God by wicked works; but obedient children."

How Saint Patrick Escaped Assassination.

Mr. J. H. McEwen relates: "It is told of Saint Patrick that while driving in his chariot, one day, through a certain part of Ireland, his charioteer leaned back and told him of a plot of some of his enemies to murder him while driving, and that that day, and that time, was the occasion chosen. The servant dearly loved his master, and prayed him to exchange places and clothes. For some time Saint Patrick refused, but ultimately yielding to the solicitation of his servant, he consented, and soon was seated on the driver's seat, while his charioteer reclined in the interior. As they were passing a dangerous part of the road, an arrow, sent by an unseen hand, but with unerring aim, was launched at the occupant of the chariot, finding a place in his heart. They thought they had killed the Saint, but, thanks to the self-sacrifice of his servant, he escaped. Would not Saint Patrick forever revere the memory of that noble man, when he called to mind that he had died for him? And should not we for ever honor and praise Him who died for us? How can men repel such a Saviour!"

A Fatal Fall From a Scaffold.

"I Remember a man who was being earnestly pressed by his friends to give himself to Christ. When I had opportunity I spoke to him, and, poor fellow, he was the very picture of indecision. He fidgetted to and fro, he twisted his hat in his hand, and in his distress of mind could not sit an instant at rest. He knew he was face to face with Christ, but he would not accept Him. At last he rose and slowly walked to the end of the little room. At the door he drew up, and leaning against the doorpost the battle was renewed. He was almost persuaded, but would not take the decisive step. Then he passed along the lobby, and at the outside door he brought up again; then he passed out into the night with darkness still reigning in his soul. Soon afterwards, while engaged on a scaffold at his usual employment as a builder, he fell over with a crash to the ground below. It is not for me to say if he ever had another offer of salvation, but I know that that night the Holy Spirit was striving with him."

A Slayer of Several Souls.—An Evangelist

said: "I was asked to visit a poor drunken fellow whose mother had just died, and see if by this affliction he might not be led to consider his perilous position with regard to eternity. When I called, the deceased woman's other son, a fine, manly fellow, six feet in height, and broad in proportion, of considerable intellectual ability, and comparatively spotless life, was also there, with his wife. I spoke to them of death and eternity, emphasizing my remarks by reference to the dead in whose presence we stood. I soon discovered that the younger brother, resolute, temperate, and respectable, was the key-stone to the whole position. I knew if he came to Christ the others would follow. As I was about to leave I said to this man, 'There rests a fearful responsibility on you. If you come to Christ, so will your brother, your wife, and your children. Beware how you reject Him, and lend the power of your example to a wrong course!' While I spoke, the older brother and his own wife turned their eyes towards him with watchful looks that seemed to say, 'Oh, just accept Christ and we will follow.' The man wavered; then mastering his emotion, his face hardened, and he turned away. He would not come to Jesus; neither did his wife, his children, nor his brother. Nor has one of them come yet. No man lives to himself."

The Buried Treasure Recovered.—Mr.

Willington observes: "A young man in France, received, upon the death of his grandfather, who had been a general in the French army, his grandfather's diary. Written therein he found the amount and description of a treasure which the deceased general had obtained during the campaign in Russia. But he had not been able to bring it in safety to France. Pursued by the enemy, and fearful lest it should fall into the hands of the Cossacks, he bade his soldiers halt, and dig a deep hole. Into this the casket was lowered, and hastily covered up. The general and his men escaped, but never had he the opportunity to return for his buried treasure. In the diary was a most minute description of the place where the treasure was concealed, and directions of the nearest route to the place, that the treasure lost to him might be found by his heirs. The young man applied to the Russian Government for permission to seek for the lost casket. His request was granted on condition that two-thirds of it went to the Russian Government. A party of men arriving at the place began to dig, and soon they had the oaken casket raised out of the earth, which had been buried there so many years before. That young man read in his grandfather's book of the treasure, he believed what was written, sought, and found. Similarly, our heavenly Father's book tells us of a treasure of great price. If we seek it, we shall find it; but how many do not believe the news, or believing, do not heed, and spend their life in the miserable poverty of sin, when they might enjoy the riches of God's bounteous and unspeakable grace."

The Seeking Saviour and Other Themes.

WONDERS OF DISASTER AND BLESSING.
Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached in Kansas City, Mo., Last Sunday Morning, March 31, 1889.

"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth." Joel 2:30.

The Eventful Nineteenth Century—A Period of Great Disasters—An Epileptic Earth—A Series of Earthquakes—The Appalling Cyclones—A Cyclone at Sea—Disasters Oceanic—The Roll of the Dead Shipping—The Epidemics of the Times—An Era of Blessing—Longevity Increased—Intelligence Advancing—Information Spreading—Christianity on the March—Christians in High Position—The Dying Words of Judge Black—Wonders of Self-Sacrifice—A Missionary in Rabbit-Skins—A Ride on a Locomotive—The Incoming Fleet.

DR. CUMMING—great and good man!—would have told us the exact time of the fulfilment of this prophecy. As I stepped into his study in London on my arrival from Paris just after the French had surrendered at Sedan, the good doctor said to me: "It is just as I told you about France: people laughed at me because I talked about the seven horns and the vials, but I foresaw all this from the Book of Daniel and the Book of Revelation." Not taking any such responsibility in the interpretation of the passage, I simply assert that there is in it suggestions of many things in our time.

Our eyes dilate and our heart quickens in its pulsations as we read of events in the Third century, the Sixth century, the Eighth century, the Fourteenth century, but there are more far-reaching events crowded into

than into any other, and the last quarter bids fair to eclipse the preceding three quarters. We read in the daily newspapers of events announced in one paragraph, and without any special emphasis—of events which a Herodotus, a Josephus, a Xenophon, a Gibbon, would have taken whole chapters or whole volumes to elaborate. Looking out upon our time, we must cry out, in the words of the text: "Wonders in the heavens and in the earth."

I propose to show you that the time in which we live is wonderful for disaster and wonderful for blessing, for there must be lights and shades in this picture as in all others. Need I argue this day that our time is Wonderful for Disaster?

Our world has had a rough time since by the hand of God it was bowled out into space. It is an epileptic earth; convulsion after convulsion; frosts pounding it with sledge-hammer of iceberg, and fires melting it with furnaces seven hundred times heated. It is a wonder to me it has lasted so long. Meteors shooting by on this side and grazing it, and meteors shooting by on the other side and grazing it, none of them slowing up for safety. Whole fleets and navies and argosies and flotillas of worlds sweeping all about us. Our earth like a fishing smack off the banks of Newfoundland, while the Etruria and the Germania and the Arizona and the City of New York rush by. Besides that, our world has by sin been damaged in its internal machinery, and ever and anon the furnaces have burst, and the walking-beams of the mountains have broken, and the islands have shipped a sea, and the great hulk of the world has been jarred with accidents that ever and anon threatened immediate demolition. But it seems to us as if our century were especially characterized by oceanic, epidemic. I say volcanic, because an earthquake is only a volcano hushed up. When Stromboli and Cotopaxi and Vesuvius stop breathing, let the foundations of the earth beware! Seven thousand earthquakes in two centuries recorded in the catalogue of the British Association! Trajan, the emperor, goes to ancient Antioch, and amid the splendors of his reception is met by an earthquake that nearly destroys the emperor's life. Lisbon, fair and beautiful at 1 o'clock on the 1st of November, 1755, in six minutes 60,000 have perished; and Voltaire writes of them: "For that region it was the last judgment, nothing wanting but a trumpet!" Europe and America feeling the throb; 1,500 chimneys in Boston partly or fully destroyed!

But the disasters of other centuries have had their counterpart in our own. In 1812 Caracas was caught in the grip of the earthquake; in 1822, in Chili, 100,000 square miles of land by volcanic force upheaved to four and seven feet of permanent elevation; in 1854 Japan felt the geological agony; Naples shaken in 1857; Mexico in 1858; Mendoza, the capital of the Argentine Republic, in 1861; Manila terrorized in 1863; the Hawaiian islands by such force uplifted and let down in 1871; Nevada shaken in 1871; Antioch in 1872; California in 1872; San Salvador in 1873; while in 1883 what subterranean excitement! Ischia, an island of the Mediterranean, a beautiful Italian watering-place, vineyard clad, surrounded by all natural charm and historical reminiscence; yonder, Capri, the summer resort of the Roman emperors; yonder, Naples, the paradise of art—this beautiful island suddenly toppled into the trough of the earth, 8,000 merry-makers perishing, and some of them so far down beneath the reach of human obsequies that it may be said of many a one of them, as it was said of Moses, "The Lord buried him." Italy, all Christendom weeping where there were hearts to sympathize and Christians to pray. But while the nations were measuring that magnitude of disaster, measuring it not with golden rod like that with which the angel measured heaven, but with the black rule of death, Java, of the Indian archipelago, the most fertile island of all the earth, is caught in the grip of the earthquake, and mountain after mountain goes down, and city after city, until that island, which produces the healthiest beverage of all the world, has produced the ghastliest accident of the century. One hundred thousand people dying, dying, dead, dead!

All Europe Weeping,

But look at the disasters cyclonic. At the mouth of the Ganges are three islands—the Hattiah, the Sundeep and the Dakin Shabazpore. In the midnight of October, 1877, on all those three islands the cry was: "The waters! the waters!" A cyclone arose and rolled the sea over those three islands, and of a population of 340,000, 215,000 were drowned. Only those saved who had climbed to the top of the highest trees! Did you ever see a cyclone? No? Then I pray God you may never see one. I saw and it swept us eight hundred miles back from our course, and for thirty-six hours during the cyclone and after it we expected every moment to go to the bottom. They told us before we retired at 9 o'clock that the barometer had fallen, but at 11 o'clock at night we were awakened with the shock of the waves. All the lights out! Crash! went all the lifeboats. Waters rushing through the skylights down into the cabin, and down on the furnaces until they hissed and smoked in the deluge. Seven hundred people praying, blaspheming, shrieking. Our great ship poised a moment on the top of a mountain of phosphorescent fire, and then plunged down, down, down, until it seemed as if she never would again be righted. Ah! you never want to see a cyclone at sea.

But I was in Minnesota, where there was one of those cyclones on land that swept the city of Rochester from its foundations, and took dwelling-houses, barns, men, women, children, horses, cattle, and tossed them into indiscriminate ruin, and lifted a rail train and dashed it down, a mightier hand than that of engineer on the air-brake. Cyclone in Kansas, cyclone in Missouri, cyclone in Wisconsin, cyclone in Illinois, cyclone in Iowa! Satan, prince of the power of the air, never made such cyclonic disturbances as he has in our day. And am I not right in saying that one of the characteristics of the time in which we live is disaster cyclonic?

But look at the disasters oceanic. Shall I call the roll of the dead shipping? Ye monsters of the deep, answer when I call your names. The Ville de Havre, the Schiller, the City of Boston, the Melville, the President, the Cimbria. But w should I go on calling the roll when none them answer, and the roll is as long as the wh scroll of the Atlantic surf at Cape Hatter breakers! If the oceanic cables could reco all the scattered life and all the bleached bon that they rub against in the ocean, what for both beaches! In one storm eighty fishes men perished off the coast of Newfoundland and whole fleets of them off the coast of England. God help the poor fellows at sea, and give high seats in heaven to the Grace Darling and the Ida Lewises and the lifeboat men hovering around Goodwin Sands and the Skerries! The sea, owning three-fourths of the earth, proposes to capture the other fourth, and is bombarding the land all around the earth. The moving of our hotels at Brighton Beach backward one hundred yards from where the once stood, a type of what is going on all around the world and on every coast. The Dead Sea rolls to-day where ancient cities stood. Pillars of temples that stood on hills, geologists now find three-quarters under the water or altogether submerged. The sea, having wrecked so many merchantmen and flotillas, wants to wreck the continents, and hence disasters oceanic.

Look at the disasters epidemic! I speak now of the plague in the Fourth century that ravaged Europe, and in Moscow and the Neapolitan dominions and Marseilles wrought such terror in the Eighteenth century, but I look at the yellow fevers, and the choleras, and the diphtherias, and the scarlet fevers, and the typhoid of our own time. Hear and Shreveport and New Orleans and Jacksonville of the last few decades. From Hurdwar India, where every twelfth year three million devotees congregate, the caravans brought the cholera, and that one disease slew eighteen thousand in eighteen days in Bossorah. Twelve thousand in one summer slain by it in India and twenty-five thousand in Egypt. Disasters epidemic! Some of the finest monuments in Greenwood and Laurel Hill and Mount Auburn are to doctors who lost their lives battling with Southern epidemic.

But now I turn the leaf in my subject, and I plant the white lilies and the palm-tree amid the night-shade and the myrtle. This age no more characterized by wonders of disaster than by wonders of blessing. Blessing of longevity the average of human life rapidly increasing. Forty years now worth four hundred years once. Now I can travel from Manitoba to New York in three days and three nights. In other times it would have taken three months. In other words, three days and three nights now are worth three months of other days. The average of human life practically greater now than when Noah lived his 950 years and Methuselah lived his 969 years.

Blessings of Intelligence:

The Salmon P. Chases and the Abraham Lincolns and the Henry Wilsons of the coming time will not be required to learn to read by pine-knot lights, or seated on shoemaker's bench, nor will the Fergusons have to study astronomy while watching the cattle. Knowledge rolls its tides along every poor man's door, and his children may go down and bathe in them. If the philosophers of the last century were called up to recite in a class with our boys at the Polytechnic, or our girls at the Packer, those old philosophers would be sent down to the foot of the class, because they failed to answer the questions! Free libraries in all the important towns and cities of the land. Historical alcoves and poetical shelves and magazine tables for all that desire to walk through them, or sit down at them.

Blessings of quick information; Newspapers falling all around us thick as leaves in a September equinoctial. News three days old, rancid and stale. We see the whole world twice a day—through the newspaper at the breakfast-table, through the newspaper at the tea-table, an "extra" here and there between. Pressing of Gospel proclamation: Do you not know that nearly all the missionary societies have been born in this century? and nearly all the Bible societies, and nearly all the great philanthropic movements? A secretary of one of the denominations said to me the other day in Dakota: "You were wrong when you said our denomination averaged a new church every day of the year; they established nine in one week, so you are far within the truth." A clergyman of our denomination said: "I have just set out establishing five mission stations."

Christianity is on the March,

Infidelity is dwindling into imbecility. Infidelity is thus dwindling and dropping down into imbecility and indecency, the wheel of Christianity is making about a thousand revolutions in a minute. All the copies of Shakespeare and Tennyson and Disraeli, and of any of the most popular writers of the day, less in number than the copies of the Bible going from our printing-presses. A few years ago, six weeks, more than two million copies of the New Testament purchased, not given away, purchased because the world will have it. More Christian men in high official position in Great Britain and in the United States than ever before. Stop that falsehood going through the newspapers—I have seen it in print—that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are all infidels except one. In personal acquaintance I know three of them to be old-fashioned evangelical Christians, sitting at the holy sacrament of our Lord Jesus Christ, and I suppose that the majority of them are staunch believers in our Christian religion. And then hear man who had been Attorney-General of the United States, and who had been Secretary of the United States—no stronger lawyer of the century than Judge Black—dying, his aged wife kneeling by his side, and he uttering that sublime and tender prayer: "O Lord God, from whom I derived my existence, and in whom I have always trusted, take my spirit to thyself, and let thy richest blessing come down upon my family." The most popular book to-day is the Bible, and the mightiest institution is the Church, and the greatest name among the nations, and more honored than any, is the name of Jesus. Wonders of self-sacrifice: A clergyman told me in the Northwest that for six years he was a missionary at the extreme north, living 400 miles from a post-office, and sometimes he kept out of doors in winter, the thermometer sixty and sixty-five degrees below zero, wrapped in rabbit-skins woven together. I said: "Is it possible? You do not mean sixty and sixty-five degrees below zero?" He said, "I do, and was happy."

All for Christ!

Where is there any other being that will rally such enthusiasm? Mothers sewing their fingers to educate their boys for the gospel ministry. For nine years no luxury on the table until the course through grammar school and college and theological seminary be completed. Poor widow putting her mite into the Lord's treasury, the face of emperor or president impressed upon the coin not so conspicuous as the good with which she earned it. Millions of good men and women, but more women than men, to whom Christ is everything. Christ first, and Christ last, and Christ forever. Why, this age is not so characterized by invention and scientific exploration as it is by gospel proclamation. You can get no idea of it unless you can ring all the church bells in the chime, and sound all the organs in one apasion, and gather all the congregations of Christendom in one Gloria in Excelsis. Mighty camp meetings! Mighty Ocean Groves! Mighty hautauquas! Mighty conventions of Christian workers! Mighty general assemblies of the Presbyterian Church! Mighty conferences of the Methodist Church! Mighty associations of the Baptist Church! Mighty conventions of the Episcopal Church! I think, before long, the best investments will not be in railroad stock or Western Union, but in trumpets and cymbals and festal decorations, for we are on the eve of victories wide and world uplifting.

O you dead churches, wake up! Throw back the shutters of stiff ecclesiasticism, and let the light of the spring morning come in! Morning for the land! Morning for the sea! Morning of emancipation! Morning of light and love and peace! Morning of a day in which there shall be no chains to break, no sorrows to assuage, no despotism to shatter, no woes to compassionate. O Christ, descend! Scarred temple, take the crown! Bruised hand, take the sceptre! Wounded foot, step on the throne! "Thine is the kingdom."

These things I say because I want you to Be Alert.

I want you to be watching all these wonders unrolling from the heavens and the earth. God has classified them, whether calamitous or pleasing. The divine purposes are harnessed in traces that cannot break, and in girths that cannot slip, and in buckles that cannot loosen, and are driven by reins they must answer. I preach no fatalism. A swarthy engineer at one of the depots in Dakota said: "When will you get on the locomotive, and take a ride with us?" "Well," I said, "now, if that suits you?" So I got on one side of the locomotive, and a Methodist minister, who was also invited, got on the other side, and between us were the engineer and the stoker. The train started. The engineer had his hand on the agitated pulse of the great engine. The stoker shoveled in the coal, and shut the door with a loud clang. A vast plain slipped under us, and the hills swept by, and that great monster on which we rode trembled and bounded and snorted and raged as it hurled us on. I said to the Methodist minister on the other side of the locomotive: "My brother, why should Presbyterians and Methodists quarrel about the decrees and free agency? You see that track, that firm track, that iron track; that is the decree. You see this engineer's arm? That is free agency. How beautifully they work together. They are going to take us through. We could not do without the track, and we could not do without the engineer. So I rejoice day by day."

and we may turn the crank of the Christian machinery this way or that, for we are free agents; but there is the track laid, so long ago no one remembers it, laid by the hand of Almighty God in sockets that no terrestrial or satanic pressure can ever affect. And along that track the car of the world's redemption will roll and roll to the Grand Central Depot of the millennium. I have no anxiety about the track. I am only afraid that for our indolence God will discharge us and get some other stoker and some other engineer. The train is going through with us or without us. So, my brethren, watch all the events that are going by. If things seem to turn out right, give wings to your joy. If things seem to turn out wrong, throw out the anchor of faith, and hold fast.

There is a house in London where Peter the Great of Russia lived awhile when he was moving through the land incognito and in workman's dress, that he might learn the wants of the people. A stranger was visiting at that house recently, and saw in a dark attic an old box, and he said to the owner of the house, "What's in that box?" The owner said, "I don't know: that box was there when I got the house, and it was there when my father got it. We haven't had any curiosity to look at it; I guess there's nothing in it." "Well," said the stranger, "I'll give you two pounds for it." "Well, done." The two pounds are paid, and recently the contents of that box were sold to the czar of Russia for fifty thousand dollars. In it the lathing machine of Peter the Great, his private letters, and documents of value beyond all monetary consideration. And here are the events that seem very insignificant and unimportant, but they incase treasures of divine providence and eternities of meaning which after a while God will demonstrate before the ages as being of stupendous value.

When Titans play quoits they pitch mountains; but who owns these gigantic forces you have been reading about the last two months? Whose hand is on the throttle-valve of the volcanoes? Whose foot, suddenly planted on the footstool, makes the continents quiver? God! God! He looketh upon the mountains, and they tremble. He toucheth the hills, and they smoke. God! God! I must be at peace with Him. Through the Lord Jesus Christ this God is mine and He is yours. I put the earthquake that shook Palestine at the crucifixion, against all the down rockings of the centuries. This God on our side, we may challenge all the centuries of time and all the cycles of eternity.

Those of us who are in mid life may well thank God that we have seen so but there are people here to-day who may live to see the shimmering veil between the material and the spiritual world lifted. Magnetism, a word with which we cover up our ignorance, will yet be an explored realm. Electricity, the fiery courser of the sky, that Benjamin Franklin lassoed, and Morse and Bell and Edison have tried to control, will become completely manageable, and locomotion will be swiftened, and a world of practical knowledge thrown in upon the race. Whether we depart in this century, or whether we see the open gates of a more wonderful century, we will see these things. It does not make much difference where we stand, but the higher the standpoint the larger the prospect. We will see them from heaven if we do not see them from earth.

I was at Fire Island, Long Island, and I went up in the cupola from which they telegraph to New York the approach of vessels hours before they come into port. There is an opening in the wall, and the operator puts his telescope through that opening and looks out and sees vessels far out at sea. While I was talking with him, he went up and looked out. He said: "We are expecting the Arizona to-night." I said: "Is it possible you know all those vessels? Do you know them as you know a man's face?" He said: "Yes, I never make a mistake; before I see the hulls, I often know them by the masts; I know them all, I have watched them so long." Oh, what a grand thing it is to have ships telegraphed and heralded long before they come to port, that friends may come down to the wharf and welcome their long-absent loved ones! So to-day we take our stand in the watch-tower, and we look off, and through the glass of inspiration we look off and see a whole fleet of Ships Coming In.

That is the ship of Peace, flag with one star of Bethlehem floating above the top-gallants. That is the ship of the Church, mark of salt wave high up on the smoke-stack, showing she has had rough weather, but the Captain of salvation commands her and all is well with her. The ship of Heaven, mightiest craft ever launched, millions of passengers waiting for millions more, prophets and apostles and martyrs in the cabin, conquerors at the foot of the mast, while from the rigging hands are waving this way as if they knew us, and we wave back again, for they are ours; they went out from our own households. Ours! Hail! Hail! Put off the black, and put on the white. Stop tolling the funeral bell and ring the wedding anthem. Shut up the hearse and take the chariot. Now, the ship comes around the great headland. Soon she will strike the wharf and we will go aboard her. Tears for ships going out. Laughter for ships coming in. Now she touches the wharf. Throw on the planks. Block not up that gangway with embracing long lost friends, for you will have eternity of reunion. Stand back and give way until other millions come on! Farewell to sin! Farewell to struggle! Farewell to sickness! Farewell to death! All aboard for Heaven!

A GOD-DIRECTED VERDICT.

AMONG the reminiscences of Mr. J. C. Lanphier, the founder of the Fulton Street Daily Prayer-Meeting, is the following instructive incident: A short time since a young lawyer appeared in the Fulton Street meeting. He told a simple, touching story of great faith and great deliverance. He was counsel for a young man incarcerated in a Jersey prison. He said, "My heart died within me when I saw the array of counsel, read the proof on which the prosecution relied, and the slender defence I could put forth. Believing in prayer, and as I seemed to have no other refuge, I came to this meeting and laid the case of the poor prisoner before you. The burden of my prayer was that God would appear for his deliverance, and open a way for his escape; that, if innocent, it might be made manifest, and he be saved from the brand of a felon, and an honored name be saved from disgrace. I well remember how you prayed; how fervent, how affectionate, and how effectual it seemed to me. The corporation was represented by able legal talent. It filled the court-room with prominent citizens, and brought its wealth and social influence to bear against the young man at the bar. On my conscience, I had to say that if I were on that jury I should have to bring in a verdict of guilty. I made a very short opening, and then placed my client on the stand. He told a straightforward, simple, touching story. The cross-examination failed to shake him in the least. The judge charged strongly against the prisoner, and, on the proof, could not do otherwise. As the jury drifted out the lawyers said: 'Poor fellow! he is in for it; nothing can save him from State's-prison.' In a few minutes the jury returned, and astonished everybody by rendering a verdict of 'Not guilty!' The prisoner wept like a child. 'How could you bring in that verdict in the face of such testimony?' said a man to one of the jurors. 'I cannot tell,' was the reply, 'except that his simple story carried us all with him.'

A CHRISTIAN MEXICAN PREFECT.

READERS who have been contributing to help Bishop Riley in his arduous work of spreading the gospel in Mexico will be pleased to learn that the principles of Christianity are reaching some of the governing class. A correspondent of a contemporary, who has been travelling in Mexico recently made the acquaintance of a gentleman whose conversation interested him deeply. He says: "I soon discovered that my companion was the prefect of Minatitlan, in the state of Vera Cruz, and that he had gone to Jalapa to seek an interview with the governor relative to certain difficulties which he had encountered in the faithful execution of the laws of reform, against certain priests who had thought to trample upon these with impunity. Like so many in Mexico, he had been completely alienated from Romanism in his youth, by what he had observed of its corrupting influence upon the morals of his countrymen. Being more favored than many, he had come into the possession of the Bible, which he had read with devout attention and accepted cordially as the revelation of God's will to man.

"In spite of the opposition of relatives and friends, and at the cost of social position and intercourse, he had firmly and consistently observed the scriptural precepts in the economy of his household, and had refused absolutely to receive priestly visits or to permit that his wife and children should conform to Romish customs. A true liberal at heart, as husband, father, citizen, and public official, he had long devoted himself to the emancipation of his people from ecclesiastical superstition and demoralization, and to the elevation of the family and the community, by means of intellectual culture and the diffusion of a sound, Biblical morality.

"To know the man was to love him. It is rare to find among the Mexicans so much of independent thought, so true a moral heroism and so elevated a social standard. We became fast friends, and in my next trip to Tabasco, I had the pleasure of visiting him in Minatitlan and confirming all that he had told me, by observing how, by his personal integrity, public spirit, unflinching loyalty, and general intelligence, he was aiding to lift the whole district under his jurisdiction out of the depths of ignorance, fanaticism, and social degradation under which the people have so long suffered."

TRANSFORMATION OF A VILLAGE.

IN a letter to the Independent, the Rev. H. Loomis thus describes a remarkable movement in the village of Oyama, in the province of Chikugo, Japan: The people of this village, being in great poverty, and in great distress, appealed to their deities in vain for relief, and, hearing of Christianity, and its promises of peace and rest, they decided that they would become Christians. The people of a neighboring village, learning of their resolve, undertook to prevent them by force from carrying out their purpose, but were driven off. Then the Governor of the Province attempted to influence them, and he was followed by a Buddhist, and then a Shinto priest. But all was of no avail. They destroyed their idols, removed their names from the Buddhist records, and two men were sent to Nagasaki to obtain a Christian teacher. These carried a petition signed by the heads of twenty-six families, asking for some one to come and teach them the religion of Jesus. This paper was given to the delegates who went to Nagasaki, as Cornelius journeyed to Joppa to find Peter.

The delegates there found at Nagasaki a Bible seller, who took them to the Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, who by careful inquiry satisfied himself of their honesty, and sent two native helpers to instruct the people as they desired.

After some months, an earnest request was sent for Mr. Hutchinson to come himself and visit the place. On reaching the village he was astonished to find that apparently the whole population had turned to the Lord—every one seemed to be seeking the way of life. After a careful examination, as we are told, one hundred and eight persons received baptism on the profession of their faith in Jesus as their Saviour, or because of the faith of their believing parents.

At a subsequent visit, fifty more adults and children were added to this number, and, remarks Mr. Loomis, "their new found peace and comfort are so manifest, that others who opposed at first have been made to admit that this is indeed the hand of God."

DIVINE HEALING IN NOVA SCOTIA.

A LETTER from Mrs. Georgina Morton, dated Milton, Queen's County, N. S., is published by Mrs. M. Baxter in the current number of *Thy Healer in which she thus describes her restoration to health: "I was an invalid for thirteen years. During that time I was called upon to endure many trials, both domestic and financial, but God sustained me, and I ever found His grace sufficient. During the first eight years my constant prayer was for restoration to health. At the end of that period I concluded to cease praying for health, and give myself up entirely to God's holy will, asking Him to do with me just what seemed best in His sight, knowing that He did all things well. That prayer I offered day and night for five years, at the end of which time I was entirely healed. Whilst reading my Bible one morning I was impressed with the command to 'Arise and go.' I immediately understood what was required of me. The thought of such an undertaking almost overpowered me. I dreaded a failure, and the consequent ridicule to which I should be exposed, Baxter, contains original articles on Holiness and Healing, Authentic Testimonies of Divine Healing, and Items of Intelligence from Heathen Lands where missionaries are laboring in faith, soliciting no help from man, but relying solely on God for support. but I knew in whom I believed; and, after short communion with God, I hastily dress and walked out. I felt my weakness, and occasionally leaned against something to rest moment. After having walked over a mile turned to go home, when all at once the strength seemed to leave my back, but I firmly put my trust in God for His help; the weakness was instantly forgotten, and I went on my way praising and glorifying God.

"I returned home to my family safe and well. My husband was afraid I had lost my reason, but was soon convinced to the contrary. In conclusion, I would add that my chief aim in life now is to serve God. It is my constant prayer that I may know His will, and do it faithfully. He is dealing so lovingly with me, and feel that I can trust Him."

A TRUSTEE'S DIFFICULTY.

"I HAVE a hundred dollars for the poor," said a well-known city missionary in Brooklyn, N. Y., "and it came in one of the most wonderful ways I ever knew." This was the story some months ago he met a Christian man whom he knew slightly, and on his face he recognized the marks of deep trouble. He soon learned its cause. His friend was a man with many and extensive business concerns on his hands, and though not very methodical was as honest as the day, and his record showed no blemish. All his neighbors believed in him and trusted him implicitly. But a serious charge was hanging over him. He was being called to account for a very large sum of money that he had once held as a trustee for a dear friend. He knew perfectly well how it had been used. He knew that it had been invested strictly in accordance with the terms of his trust. But it was twenty years ago; he had removed his residence more than once; he had had a fire, and in other ways the records of the transactions of that long past time had disappeared. He had no receipt, no voucher, no record of any kind. He had been engaged in so many transactions during the twenty years that had intervened, that he could not recall the names of any of the men who had been connected with him in the investment of the particular fund. He searched carefully through enormous masses of business papers, but not a clue could he find. "It will ruin me," he said, "to repay that money. It will destroy my good name; no one will ever trust me again; it will kill me." "Let us take it to God in prayer," said the city missionary. "God knows a way about it; let us ask Him to make it clear. He can vindicate you. Perhaps you may think of some collection of papers that you have forgotten." They knelt and prayed. Later, other friends were told, and together they united in prayer for the same purpose. But no light came. The missionary met the accused man frequently, and saw the traces of acute mental suffering growing deeper on his countenance day by day. "No light yet?" he would ask. The man would shake his head sorrowfully and go his way.

The day before the trial came on the missionary met his friend again, and asked him what he meant to do. "I can do nothing," he said. "I shall go on the stand and tell the plain story, and some friends are coming to say how long they have known me, and that they believe me to be an honest man. I can do no more, but they will not believe me without any documentary proof." "Trust in God," said the missionary. "I am persuaded it will come out right."

At the trial the evidence against him was very strong, and when he went on the stand and related the circumstances, and admitted that he held no receipts—had nothing whatever to show in proof—significant looks of incredulity were exchanged by the lawyers and spectators in court. It seemed, as he had expected, that his good name and all his property must be swept away. All was gloomy until the judge spoke. He reviewed the evidence against the defendant and then came to the defence. He said, "The story he tells seems incredible, but I happen to know that it is true. The deeds he speaks of were drawn out in my office, and I distinctly remember the whole transaction. It was just as he says, and it is a very strange coincidence that the case should have been called in this court."

As the man left the court, saved from ruin, he met his friend, the missionary, and grasped his hand while he raised his eyes in heartfelt gratitude to God, "Here, H—," he said, "let me give a thank-offering for this marvellous deliverance. You know, better than I do, who is in want. Take this hundred dollars and let some poor creatures have it. They are Christ's representatives. I must do something."

SIGNS IN THE STARS.

By W. Appleford.*

Signs in the Stars Predicted—Greater Frequency of Them in These Days—New or Temporary Stars—A Star on Fire—A Star Transformed Into Nebula—Lost Stars—Creation and Destruction in Progress—A Strange Appearance in Jupiter.

THROUGHOUT the whole Bible, in both the Old and New Testaments, we have numerous prophecies that in the last days of the present dispensation there will be extraordinary convulsions of nature, both in the sidereal and aerial heavens, and on the earth. Amongst the former are to be signs in the sun, moon, and stars, and tempests with fearful thunders, lightnings, and hail; while on the latter there will be earthquakes, storms, devouring fires, famines, and pestilences.

Such signs as these have not been unknown in the history of our world in the past ages. But if similar preliminary signs are now being given, shall we refuse to accept them simply because they are similar to like events that have been more or less common in all ages of the world? or shall we, as we see the greater frequency of some of these signs, and the new phenomena displayed in others, that the day of the Lord draweth nigh? When that day commences we shall doubtless see similar signs multiplied, both in frequency and power, to an alarming extent, but they will still be regarded as purely natural. These will be soon followed by others, which the most unbelieving will have to recognize, as did Pharaoh's magicians, that they betoken the finger of God. How much better to acknowledge this at the first, if we see that there is sufficient evidence to show that the Most High is at work in a special manner.

In Luke 21 : 25 we read, "And there shall be signs in . . . the stars." We ask the question, "Have there been any special signs in the fixed stars and planets lately?" Our reply is, "Yes;" and we will at once proceed to mention some of them.

One very striking feature in the sidereal heavens that has been observed of late years is the occurrence of

New or Temporary Stars.

During the last twenty-three years there have been five of these stellar apparitions observed; or, if the so-called Star of Bethlehem, seen in 1887, may be reckoned as one, then six, while another was seen no further back than April 27, 1848. We will mention two principal ones.

It was on the evening of May 11, 1866, about fifteen minutes before midnight, that Mr. John Birmingham saw with astonishment a bright star of the second magnitude, unfamiliarly situated in the constellation of the Northern Crown. Four hours earlier, Schmidt, of Athens, had been surveying the same part of the heavens, and was able to testify that it was not visible then. On May 16th it was examined by the spectroscope, and it was found that the cause of the outburst was the eruption or ignition of vast masses of hydrogen. Even in this short space of time—five days—it had declined in brightness from a star of the second to below the third magnitude, while nine days later it was invisible to the naked eye. In 1887 it was to be seen by the telescope as a star of about the tenth magnitude.

On the 24th of November, 1876, at Athens. Dr. Schmidt discovered a new star in the constellation Cygnus. It was then nearly of the third magnitude, but in its previous state, if visible at all, must have been below the ninth, since it is not shown on Ayelander's star map. Like the other one, it steadily but rapidly faded. By the end of the year it was no more than of the seventh magnitude. From March to September, 1877, it was not possible to get observations, but on September 2 it was found to be below the tenth magnitude; but stranger still, the spectroscopic lines had altogether changed from the bright ones of hydrogen, &c., to a single bright line of green, which is characteristic of gaseous nebulae. The star had, in fact, so far as outward appearance was concerned, become transformed into a planetary nebula. This star has now dropped to the sixteenth magnitude.

Although these new or temporary stars were not unknown in the past centuries, yet the records of them are few and far between, while now they appear to be getting more common.

Lost Stars.

Not only are there new stars, but there are numerous instances on record of stars formerly known which cannot now be found. Several stars in Ptolemy's catalogue, four of them of the third magnitude, are not to be seen now. In 1783, Sir W. Herschel, in a paper read before the Royal Society, mentioned eleven stars that were on Flamstead's catalogue, published about 100 years before, which, from his own observations, he could testify did not exist at that time. In 1782 Sir W. Herschel observed star 55 Herculis, magnitude 5; but nine years afterwards it could not be found, and has not been seen since. In May, 1829, Sir J. Herschel missed one in Virgo. Unfortunately, I have not at present come across a modern list of such lost stars, although several modern books on astronomy speak of them as though there had been a comparatively large number recently. In the absence of such a list I will quote a passage from Professor Steele:

"It would appear that for some time past astronomers have remarked

among the heavenly bodies: through the whole system of the universe a change seems to be proceeding. New stars have twinkled into being, old ones have burned out or dropped from their places. Stars which for centuries since they were first noted have been marked on every chart as of inferior magnitude, have suddenly increased in brilliancy and size in an extraordinary manner."

In another work he remarks: "The process of apparent creation and destruction is going on in the heavens immediately before the eye of the astronomer. New stars flash light, old stars are lost, worlds burst into flames, and their glowing embers fade into darkness. Are they re-created into new worlds? We know not. We only perceive that the same Almighty power which fitted up this earth for our home is yet at work among the worlds about us, and we are thus witnesses of His eternal presence."

In coming from the stars to the planets we have recently had a very Remarkable Appearance in Jupiter.

In 1878 M. Niesten, of Brussels, was struck with a rosy cloud attached to a whitish zone beneath the dark southern band of this planet. It was of an enormous size, being in length 8,000, and in breadth 2,000 miles. In the following year it attracted the wonder and attention of almost every astronomer. By this time its color had deepened to a full brick-red, which was set off with a white spot of unusual brilliancy. The conspicuous brilliancy of this astonishing object lasted three years (from 1879 to 1882); but it had faded so considerably by May, 1883, that it was not expected that it would be seen again. It, however, began to recover its brilliancy in December, and continued to increase till in the beginning of 1886 it presented much the same appearance as it did in 1882. While much speculation has arisen as to the cause of this phenomenon, no satisfactory solution has been given.

COMING GREAT PROPHETIC EVENT THIS YEAR.

Namely, the Third of the Four Steps or Stages in the Cleansing of the Jewish Sanctuary Predicted by Daniel to Occur Respectively in 1844, 1856, 1889, and 1901.

APRIL 2, 1889, being the first day of Nisan, and the beginning of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, is the exact termination of Daniel's Great Date of 2,345 years, starting from Ezra's completions of his Reforms of the Jewish polity and ritual at Jerusalem (Ezra 7 : 9; 9 : 17), on the first day of Nisan, 457 B. C. Hence we may expect in the Jewish year beginning April 2, 1889, an increased cleansing of the Jewish sanctuary by some further step of progress toward the deliverance of the Holy Land from the despotic rule of Turkey, such as the Sultan, by some Official Deed or Declaration, granting enlarged rights and liberties to Jerusalem and Judea (perhaps in exchange for a loan of money, or to satisfy some of his pressing creditors). The whole period of 2,345 years is foretold in two sections: viz., its first 2,300 years is mentioned in Daniel 8 : 14, and is stated to end with "the cleansing of the sanctuary" of the Holy Land, which, in an initial and primary fulfilment, took place exactly 2,300 years from Ezra's above-mentioned completion of Jewish Reforms on Nisan 1, 457 B. C. : viz., on Nisan 1 (March 21), 1844, on which day the Sultan of Turkey issued an Official Declaration of the Abolition of execution of Mohammedan converts to the Jewish or Christian religion. This remarkable ending of the 2,300 years was pointed out at considerable length in the "Guide to the Prophecies" in 1844, by Rev. E. Bickersteth, uncle of the present Bishop of Exeter. The additional forty-five years of the 2,345 years then follow from Nisan 1 (March 21), 1844, to Nisan 1 (April 2), 1889, when, therefore, a further cleansing of the sanctuary of the Holy Land from the Turkish-Mohammedan abomination of desolation may be expected. These forty-five years are the excess or overplus of the 1,335 years over and beyond the last 1,290 years of the 2,300 years according to Daniel 12 : 11, 12—the 1,290 years being stated to be the whole time of the abomination of desolation during the concluding portion of the 2,300 years.

The ultimate and secondary fulfilment of the 2,300 years was from Nisan 22, 445 B. C., when Artaxerxes gave the command to Nehemiah on the last day of Passover Week in Nisan to rebuild Jerusalem, as mentioned in Nehemiah 2, and Daniel 9 : 25. From thence the 2,300 years reached to Nisan 22 (April 27), 1856, on which day a still further "cleansing of the sanctuary" of the Holy Land took place by the ratification of the Treaty of Peace closing the Crimean War, which stipulated for religious and civil liberty and political equality and other rights and privileges for Jews and Christians in Judea and Turkey. The additional forty-five years, following this fulfilment of the 2,300 years, extends, of course, from Nisan 22, 1856, to Nisan 22 (April 11), 1901, as the End of this Gentile Age and beginning of the Millennium and the full restoration of the Jewish nation to Judea, as predicted in Dan. 12 : 12: "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the end of the 1,335 years," which therefore we may expect on Nisan 22 (April 11), 1901. CURRENT EVENTS.

An Appalling Naval Disaster at Samoa was briefly reported by cable on Saturday last. A dispatch from London stated that news had been received there of the wreck of three American and four German war vessels. Another dispatch, which comes from Auckland, confirms the news, but gives the names of only three German vessels. It says that dispatches had come in from Samoa stating that the American men-of-war Trenton, Vandalia, and Nipsic, and the German men-of-war Adler, Olga, and Eber, were driven on a reef during a violent storm and totally wrecked. Of the American crews, four officers and forty-six men were drowned, and of the German crews, nine officers and eighty-seven men lost their lives.

The Opening of the Oklahoma Lands to Settlers was duly proclaimed on March 27 by the President, in conformity with the act of Congress of March 2. The day fixed for entrance is April 22, and two land offices for the reception of claims were promptly opened. That for the eastern division of the Territory is at Kingfisher stage station, and for the western district at Guthrie. The lands have been acquired from the Muscogee or Creek nation, and from the Seminoles. The boundaries are clearly described in the President's proclamation, and he emphatically warns settlers against going beyond them, or entering before the day fixed. Transgressors are to be punished by being forever excluded from acquiring land in the Territory. A large number of boomers have disregarded the warning, and United States troops have been sent to clear them out. It is stated that near San Reno alone, upward of two thousand have congregated. There is not sufficient land to satisfy all the claimants, and it is feared that bloodshed will result from their struggle to get ahead of each other.

The Remainder of the First-Class Diplomatic places were filled on March 22, so far as the Presidential nominations could do so. The chief prize—that of Minister to England—was given to Robert T. Lincoln, the son of the martyred President. Murat Halstead, editor of the Cincinnati Commercial, was nominated Minister to Germany; Allen Thorndyke Rice, editor of the North American Review, to Russia; George B. Loring, of Massachusetts, to Portugal; John Hicks, of Wisconsin, to Peru; Thomas Ryan, of Kansas, to Mexico; and Patrick Egan, the Irish leader, to Chili. The appointment of Mr. Lincoln caused general surprise, as his name had not been associated with the English mission. It is, however, well received, and the country approves the choice, not only for his father's sake, but on account of his personal qualities. Another reason for the popularity of the nomination is that it is supposed to indicate the President's independence of spirit and freedom from Cabinet control. Mr. Blaine is credited with having urged another name for the post, and having decided objections to Mr. Lincoln on account of his remaining in the Cabinet under President Arthur after President Garfield's death. Mr. Halstead's nomination, however, is the one that has caused the greatest discussion. About three years ago, Mr. Halstead disapproved of some proceedings in the Senate, and in his paper denounced it as a whole, and singled out certain Republican Senators for particular castigation. He went so far as to say that the august body was "made up of millionaires, servants of corporations, and corruptionists. There was not a vote cast that was actuated by the slightest regard for the honor of the Senate or of purity of politics." And after mentioning several Republican Senators by name, he went on to say that he accepted "it as the highest honor of his life that he has acquired certain enemies. He has earned them by many years' hard work and close attention to business, and enjoys them. They are variously useful to him." As Democratic Senators would oppose Mr. Halstead's nomination on principle, it needed only that the few Republicans whom he had so savagely attacked by name should join the Democrats to secure the rejection of the nomination. This was done on March 28, by a vote of 27 to 13, but Mr. Sherman, who championed Halstead's cause, induced the Senate to reconsider. It is a characteristic and instructive fact that the Senators did not oppose Mr. Halstead's nomination on the ground of unfitness for the post to which he was nominated. That question does not seem to have been considered. The country might benefit, or not benefit, by the service he could render at Berlin—that was a minor consideration compared with the wounded vanity of the Senators.

The Approaching International Maritime conference is anticipated with growing interest, and it is hoped that its results will lead to the diminution of the risks of ocean voyages. The United States delegates are holding preparatory meetings to discuss the questions likely to arise. Among these are: signals and other means of indicating the movements of vessels in fogs; life-saving devices; reporting, marking, and removing wrecks and obstructions to navigation; warnings of approaching storms; fixing safe load-line of vessels; uniform system of buoys; the establishment of a permanent international Shipping Commission; regulations for determining the seaworthiness of vessels. It was suggested to the delegates that they should urge the exclusion of steamers from the neighborhood of the Newfoundland banks, on account of the danger of collision with fishing vessels, but the suggestion has not been accepted.

A Revolution in the Navy-Yards is Proposed by the new Secretary of the Navy, Gen. B. F. Tracy. In a recent speech he said: "I know that politics play a great part in the navy-yards of the country. But I say, and I will adhere to what I say, that the navy-yards during my administration shall not be asylums for the careless, poor, and incompetent workman. Whether republican or democratic, I shall insist that there shall be skilled foremen and worthy mechanics. That much I shall do. That much I promise. I propose to rid myself of every obstacle to the faithful discharge of the duties of that high office." The magnitude of this change will be understood by any one who has lived within a hundred miles of a navy-yard. Probably the Secretary will find the political pressure too strong to allow of his doing all he promises, but the effort will be worth making.

A Long and Acrimonious Debate in the Canadian Parliament on the Jesuit question was carried on through last week. It was only the legislative phase of a controversy that has agitated every city in the Dominion. It arose out of the passage of a bill by the Quebec Legislature appropriating $400,000 as compensation for certain lands once the property of the Jesuits, but now confiscated to the Crown. The land is about five hundred thousand acres, and when Great Britain acquired Lower Canada the ownership by the Jesuits appears to have been recognized. In 1763 the Pope suppressed the order of Jesuits, and the Government thereupon took possession of the land, and in 1800 issued a warrant declaring it confiscated. The priests contended that it should have reverted to the Pope. By way of compromise the Quebec Legislature appropriated the $400,000, and made the Pope a party to the bargain. This evoked a protest from the Orangemen, who objected both to the appropriation and to Papal recognition. A motion was made in the Dominion Parliament on March 26, asking the Governor-General to veto the act of the Quebec Legislature. The debate that ensued did not close until early Friday morning, when the motion was rejected by a vote of 175 to 13. The question has aroused strong religious animosity, and has threatened to split up political parties, as each party contains both Protestants and Roman Catholics. The government of Sir John Macdonald has supported the action of the Quebec Legislature, and it is expected that in doing so it will alienate the support of all Protestants.

The Death of John Bright, the Venerable and eminent English statesman, which occurred on March 27, has occasioned almost as much regret in this country as in England. It is not forgotten that during our civil war he was almost alone among English statesmen in his friendliness to the United States, and when the trouble arose over the seizure of the Confederate commissioners, and there was danger of war with England, he steadfastly and earnestly urged courteous and conciliatory measures on the English Government in dealing with the Washington Cabinet. Mr. Bright had been in failing health for over a year, and last December his death was momentarily expected. He rallied, however, but two weeks ago he had a relapse, from which he did not recover. He was seventy-eight years of age. His portrait and life appeared in this journal on Dec. 27, 1888.

News of a Victory Won by Emin Pasha over the followers of the Mahdi, was received by way of Cairo on March 23. It was to the effect that an expedition of six thousand Mahdists had been sent in steamers and barges to make an attack on Emin, who met them at Bor, which is three hundred miles from his station at Wadelai, and defeated them. The victory appears to have been overwhelming, for the messenger said that Emin captured the steamers and inflicted severe slaughter on the enemy. The messenger said that he had accompanied the expedition, and his narrative was consequently that of an eye-witness. The report lacks confirmation, but intrinsically is considered to bear the stamp of truth. If, as is probable, the Mahdists moved against Emin, they would naturally make Bor their point of entrance to his territory. It would also be his wisest policy to meet them there, as the report says he did. If the battle took place as represented, Emin probably owes his victory to the ammunition which Stanley carried to him with so great labor and peril. It is also stated, from the same source, that Emin was in good health, and that all his people and some European travellers were with him in Bahrgazel.

A New Penal Code for Germany, Which is to be submitted to the Reichstag this month, is causing some concern to the advocates of free speech in that country. On the face of them the provisions are unobjectionable, but in the hands of an unscrupulous statesman they are sufficiently elastic to silence criticism. The Code provides that persons found guilty of inciting one class against another, or of publicly attacking the bases of public and social order, especially religion, the monarchy, marriage, or property, shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three years. Persons convicted of a second offence may be forbidden to reside in certain places. Newspapers which have been twice convicted of any of the offences mentioned in the code shall be suppressed. Socialists who have been expelled from the country shall not be permitted to return within five years after the adoption of the code, unless by special permission of the police authorities.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $16.05. They are: from Tallman, Mich., $1; Beaver Dam, Wis., 25 cents; Talladega, Ala., $1.50; Centerville, Miss., $1; Tonkers, N. Y., $1; Lancaster, Pa., $1; Brick Church, N. J., $3; Bethel, Conn., $1; Brooklyn, N. Y., $2; Chicago, Ill., 30 cents; Monroe Co., Tenn., $2; Seaward, Me., $2. Our readers who are contributing to this fund will be pleased to learn that the pastors who receive the paper through their kindness are deeply grateful, and say that it is helping them very materially in their work, and God is blessing its teachings also to their own souls.

The Young Women's Christian Association of New York is undertaking a work of genuine Christian usefulness. It has hired a cottage for the summer at Asbury Park, N. J., capable of accommodating thirty girls. It is intended for the use of girls employed in stores, offices, etc., where they will have excellent board at bare cost. This arrangement will enable many to get rest and recuperation in congenial society, who would be unable to pay the cost of a week at the seaside. The Association is to be highly commended in this matter: it is practical Christianity—the kind that Jesus taught. We are also glad to learn that Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard proposes to build and furnish a house to connect with the Association building in Fifteenth Street, to be used as a lodging-house and restaurant. This will supply a long-felt want, and will materially increase the Association's opportunities of usefulness.

An Unexpected Mourner at a Funeral Caused some curiosity recently at Voluntown, Conn. The obsequies were those of a good old physician, whose practice was largely among the poor, and who was as attentive to cases from which he expected no fee as to his wealthy patients. As the procession was leaving the country church, on March 21, for the distant rural cemetery, a little girl ran across an open lot and called to the driver of the first carriage to stop. She wore very old patched clothes, and her uncovered hair was blown about by the March wind. "What is it?" asked one of the occupants of the carriage. "Oh! I want to see the doctor before you bury him," said the child. "I want to go to his grave. He was so good to me when I was sick." The tears were in her eyes, and her forlorn, and grief-stricken appearance touched the mourner. He took her into the carriage. At the grave, the little girl stood in the front rank of mourners, and watched, through her falling tears, the ceremony of committing dust to dust. No manifestation of grief that day was more sincere than hers. There are many who owe, not only all they are, but their hope of eternal life, to the Great Physician, who show no such love to Him, and who are unmindful of His claims. (Luke 7: 44-47.)

A Strange Story of a Famous Vagrant is told in connection with the discovery of a dead body found on March 24, in a cave near Sing Sing, N. Y. Two persons who visited the cave on that day were horrified to find there a corpse, which they immediately recognized as that of a tramp who has been a familiar figure for nearly forty years in New York and Connecticut, and who was known as the Old Leather Man. Since the year 1850 he has been met on the country roads of the two States, walking regularly over routes that he appeared to have laid out and followed punctually. He was clad, summer and winter, in a queer suit of leather, made of old boot-tops, which he had sewn together with string. How he lived was a mystery. Occasionally, but very seldom, he would do a day's work, taking pay in food or tobacco. Sometimes a compassionate person would give him food, but he did not beg. He had found a chain of caves on his routes, where he would sleep at night, or if he had no cave in the locality where he might be, he would creep into a barn and sleep there. About ten years ago a Frenchman came and searched for him, saying that the old tramp belonged to a wealthy family in Lyons, France, who wanted to provide for him. He found the vagrant, but could not induce him to return. It is now stated that in his youth he fell in love with a girl who worked in a leather factory in Lyons, but was prevented marrying her. She disappeared mysteriously, and he, thinking that she had been murdered in a plot to thwart the marriage, resolved to make the rest of his life a penance. Whether or not that is the true version, it may be presumed that the man was partially insane, as, if he had possessed the use of his reason, he must have seen that his life was one of inconsequent foolishness, unavailing as an atonement for his own sins or those of others. There are many people, however, who are perfectly sane, yet persist in equally futile efforts to atone for their sins, and remain strangers to their Heavenly Father's house, when they might be forgiven and received if they would accept the atonement God has provided. (Heb. 10: 8-10.)

Beauty Made to Order Forms the Basis for a novel which is having an extensive sale. The authoress does not explain the method in her work, but an enterprising reporter has gained from her conversation the principles of the beauty-producing treatment. Calisthenic exercises are to be used for developing the arms, straightening the back, and expanding the chest. Half an hour's vigorous brushing morning and night is prescribed for the production of luxuriant hair, and chewing rubber to enlarge the muscles of the face and fill out cavernous cheeks. Mechanical applications are to be used to raise the bridge of a snub nose. Bandages will compress projecting ears. Sleeping with gloves on is recommended for whitening the hands. And ladies who are anxious to keep the face free from wrinkles are advised, when drying their faces after their ablutions, to give the towel an upward motion, as rubbing it downward tends to deepen and fix the lines traced by time and trouble. It is a pity that the authoress should have omitted from her long list of recipes the most effectual of all, that which gives to the plainest woman a charm that mere personal beauty cannot give—"the meek and quiet spirit which is in the sight of God of great price." (1 Peter 3: 4.)

An Interesting Set of Books Belongs to the town of Norwich, Conn. The books are one hundred in number, and contain the record of every real-estate transaction since the town has been in existence. The first volume was begun in 1668 with the conveyance of lands by Uncas and Oneec of the Mohegan Indians. This book was sufficient for the transactions of forty-four years. When the reign of King George III. terminated in Norwich, volume sixteen had been reached. The town-clerk continued his entries in the volume, though the spaces for each record bore the words, "In the year of our sovereign lord, George III. of Great Britain, &c., King." On April 20, 1776, there was a record made, and the date was duly filled in after the printed words; but when the next record was made, which was on May 12, 1777, the reference to his majesty was erased, and continued to be erased in each succeeding record as long as a blank remained with the words upon it. The erasure is done with a black bar of ink, which seemed to portray the determination of the time to blot out all allegiance to royalty forever. There is an epoch like that in the history of every true Christian. It marks the period when his allegiance to the world, Satan, and self ended, and every act, word, and thought was consecrated to Christ. (Rom. 6: 22.)

A Cargo of Human Bones from Egypt Arrived in New Jersey on March 25. The steamer Wingates from Alexandria brought to Communipaw, N. J., eighty thousand pounds of bones to be used in fertilizing American fields. A reporter, who watched the process of discharging the cargo, was horrified to see that a large portion of the bones were human, and asked the mate of the steamer about them. He admitted that, in every bucketful taken out of the hold, there were many human bones, but said that others were those of beasts of burden. He said the cargo of the Wingates was bought of a German dealer in Alexandria, who has made a fortune by his business. He sends out caravans into the deserts, and there the natives glean a harvest without any other effort than picking it up. The great quantity of bones now found is the accumulation of thousands of years. Those who died were quickly buried in a foot or two of sand, and thus every strong wind that blows reveals new mines of ghastly treasure. This is precisely the use that the prophet said should be made of the bones of those who in his day despised God's Word. (Jer. 8: 1, 2.) It is a ghastly business and would appear more horrible to an Oriental mind than it does to us. But it is of no moment to those whose bones are being thus desecrated. For them the one overwhelming question is whether through the blood of Christ their souls are saved. (Luke 12: 4, 5.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. Thomas Harrison's services at the Beekman Hill Church, in New York, were continued last week with increasing tokens of the Divine blessing.

Gipsy Smith commenced meetings at Asbury Park, N. J., last Sunday, and expects to remain there ten days. Afterward he is to return to Long Island City for a few days.

Mr. Thomas Houston, the blind evangelist, is conducting revival services in the Mercer Street Church, Jersey City. Both his singing and preaching are being blessed to the conversion of souls.

A series of conferences with objectors to the Christian faith will be held at the church on the corner of Twenty-third Street and Lexington Avenue, New York, on Sunday afternoons at 4 o'clock, to be continued until May 26.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America will meet on May 16 in the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, of which Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby is pastor, and continue in session two weeks.

Wanted, by a subscriber, the first, second, and third volumes of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, or unbound copies prior to January 1, 1881. He is willing to pay an advance of price if they are clean and in good condition. Address, Manager, 63 Bible House.

The Young Women's Christian Association of Brooklyn has received a gift from Mr. S. B. Chittenden of a piece of land consisting of three ordinary building lots at the junction of Schermerhorn Street and Flatbush Avenue, on which to erect a building of its own. The association has 1,070 members.

Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea's four weeks' meetings at Picton, Ont., Canada, closed on March 21. A subscriber in that town writes that they "have been the means of great blessing to hundreds in Picton and the surrounding villages. One man over seventy years old was converted at the last meeting."

Arrangements are being perfected for the next national convention of Christian Endeavor Societies, at Philadelphia, July 9-11. It is expected that all the leading railroads in the country will give greatly reduced rates, and accommodations have already been secured at hotels and boarding-houses for three thousand guests.

The Rev. William W. Clark has been giving Bible addresses in Dr. Cuyler's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. The results are described as astonishing. The pastor speaks in the highest terms of the value and power of Mr. Clark's teaching. He is to be one of the lecturers at Mr. Moody's Bible Institute in Chicago this month.

The Rev. E. W. Oakes, of Manchester, N. H., expects to sail for England on April 6, by the Aurania. His church has voted him a three months' leave of absence. During the three years he has been at Manchester he has done a great work among the non-church-going population, and we hope that, through God's blessing, he will return to it with renewed energy.

The Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections in New York realized $43,843.75. Of this the exchanges and trades contributed $15,076.38, and the boxes at the Elevated stations, $457.45. The largest contribution from churches was the Episcopalian, $17,497.14. The Roman Catholic was $77.34. The money was distributed last week among the hospitals, on the basis of the number of days of free treatment to patients.

The Rev. John Dooly preached his farewell sermon in the Broome Street Tabernacle, New York, last Sunday night. This closes a term of seventeen years' missionary labor in the Fourteenth ward of the city, during which time Mr. Dooly has done invaluable service in both religious and philanthropic departments. New York will miss him sorely, and we earnestly hope that God's blessing will follow him in his new sphere at Albany, N. Y.

KNOWLEDGE OF THE SPIRIT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him: but ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." John 14: 17.

The Teacher of Truth—Works Truthfulness—Signs Surely Following—The Distinction Between the World and the Christian—I. The Spirit Known by Believers—Through Believing What is Taught by Christ—By the Spirit's Operations—Convincing, Comforting, Guiding—As a Person—II. The Spirit Known Through Himself—All Other Means Inadequate—III. A Sacred Intimacy—In the Church—In the Home—In the Body—IV. The Intimacy to Continue.

THE part of the text on which we shall meditate is this: "The Spirit of truth; ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." Observe that the Holy Spirit is here called the Spirit of truth. There is much meaning in this expression. He is the teacher of truth, unalloyed truth, practical, divinely effective truth. He never teaches anything but the truth. If it comes from the Spirit of God, we may receive it from Him without any hesitation.

He is the Spirit of truth in this sense, too, that He works truthfulness in His people. In those with whom the Holy Ghost works effectually "there is no guile;" they are open-hearted, honest, sincere, and true; they have an intense affection for the truth, and a zeal for it. They are by His truthful influence preserved from error. As He is the Spirit of truth, we may be sure that whatever He sets His seal upon is true. He will only bear witness to truth; but He will not assist in maintaining error. Mark this word: careful observation will show that in proportion as the nominal Church of the present day has departed from the truth of God, the Spirit of God has departed from her. He can never set His seal to a lie; the testimony of His sacred operation, in is borne only to the truth of God. Let us not talk, as some do, as if Scriptural doctrine were of little or no consequence; for where the doctrine is not of God, the Spirit of truth is grieved, and He will depart from such a ministry. Except we keep close to the words of the Lord Jesus, and the revelation of the inspired Book, the Spirit of truth will show His displeasure by refusing to use our utterances. In vain your music, your architecture, your learning, and your "bright services," if the truth be given up.

This is the distinction between the men of the world and the disciples of Christ. The world knows nothing of the Holy Spirit; but the disciples of Christ know Him; for the Lord Jesus saith, "He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." Forms of Church government, and modes of worship, may be important in their own place: but before the Lord the infallible test is this—Do you bear the fruit of the Spirit of God in you? Doth He indwell you? "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His"; but he that hath the Spirit dwelling within his soul, he it is that is a true-born heir of heaven.

I. To come close up to my subject the first head will be the Holy Spirit. They know Him, to begin with, by believing what has been taught them concerning the Comforter by the Lord Jesus Christ. When Jesus Christ had taught His people concerning the Holy Spirit, and they had received His teaching, He said, "Ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." If they had refused the sayings of Christ, if they had possessed no love, if they had not kept His commandments, if they had arrogantly resolved to find out this mystery for themselves by their own thinking, apart from the instruction of their Master, they would not have known the Spirit of God. We must begin our acquaintance with the Spirit by sitting at the feet of Jesus, and accepting His testimony as sure.

We know the Holy Spirit, next, by His operations upon us. We not only know about His operations, but we have been the subjects of them. All those who are true disciples of Christ have felt a divinely supernatural power working upon them. First, the Holy Spirit operates to our spiritual quickening. There was a time when we were dead in trespasses and in sins: holy feeling was unknown to us, and the life of faith was far from us. At that time we did not desire nor even know spiritual things: we were carnally minded, and the carnal mind knoweth not the things which be of God. The Spirit of God came upon us, and we were awakened, aroused, Made to Live.

Many of us can distinctly remember when we passed from death unto life. With others the visible life may have been made manifest more gradually, but even in them there was a moment when the vital force entered the soul, and they can now rejoice that they have been quickened who were once spiritually dead. You know the Spirit in measure when He breathes upon your dead heart, and it begins to throb with the heavenly life. In connection with that quickening there was conviction of sin. This revelation is the effect of light, the light of the Spirit of God; and when He convinces us of sin we begin to know Him.

When, after having convinced us of sin, He leads us to repentance, and to faith in Jesus Christ, then we know Him! How many a promise did some of you hear, but you could not receive it! How many a comforting discourse did you listen to, and yet it did not comfort you! but when the Spirit of God came, as in a moment, you saw Jesus as the consolation of Israel, the Friend of sinners, the atoning Sacrifice, the Surety of the covenant of grace, and sweet peace came streaming into your soul! At that time you did not only know that the Holy Spirit leads to Jesus Christ, but you knew that He was leading you. In that respect you knew Him by experimental acquaintance, which is

The Best of Knowledge.

Since that time, beloved brethren, we have known the Holy Spirit in many ways: restraining from evil, stimulating to good, instructing, consoling, directing, and enlivening. He has been to us full oft the Spirit of reviving; we have grown dull and cold and sleepy, but no sooner has the Spirit visited us than we have felt all alive—bright, cheerful, and intense. Then our whole heart has run in the ways of God's commands, and we have rejoiced in His name. How true is that word, "He restoreth my soul"! Thus have we known the Holy Spirit by His operations within us.

I specially note that we also know Him as the Comforter. Alas for the disturbance of heart which we receive in the world; perhaps even in the family! Few things, it may be, are as we could wish, and therefore we are sore troubled; but when the Spirit of God comes, peace flows to us like a river, and Jesus breathes on us and says, "Peace be unto you." Do you know that peace? Many saints of God have enjoyed a heavenly calm upon their sick-beds: when pain would else have distracted them, the Spirit of God has rested them in Jesus. I have heard of one saint near his end who asked, "Is this dying?" Then I should like to keep on dying for ever." May God give us the Holy Spirit as our Comforter! Happy knowledge!

I trust that we have oftentimes known the Holy Spirit as in various ways. I will not speak largely on this, for some might not understand it; but I know of a surety that the Holy Spirit does give to his favored people hints as to things to come. I say not that any man is inspired to tell the future; but I do say that choice saints have received preparations for the future, and fore-shadowings of their coming experiences. When believers come into difficult circumstances, they bow the knee, and cry for guidance, even as David said, "Bring hither the ephod." The oracle is not dumb, but in some way, not always to be explained, the Spirit of God guides our steps through life, if we are willing to obey His monitions. Is it not written, "Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it"? The

of the Holy Spirit are the precious heritage of true saints; but they are a peculiar voice to their own souls, and are not to be repeated.

But I do not think we have entered the centre of the text even yet. "Ye know Him," says the text: ye know not only His work, but Himself. I may know the great achievements of an artist in marble, but I may not know the sculptor himself. I may know a man's paintings, and therefore I may guess somewhat of his character, but yet I may not know the man himself. "Ye know him," says our Lord; and truly we know the Holy Ghost as to His personality. If the Holy Ghost were a mere influence, we should read, "Ye know it." Let us always shun the mistake of calling the Holy Ghost "it." It cannot do anything. It is a dead thing; the Holy Ghost is a living, blessed Person, and I hope we can say that we know Him as such. Others may doubt His personality; but we believe in the teaching of our Lord Jesus Christ, and behold, in the names given to Him, the emotions ascribed to Him, and the acts performed by Him, abundant proofs of His sacred personality.

II. The second head is this: Believers know the Holy Spirit through Himself. Let us read the text again: "Ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." It is not, "Ye know Him; for ye have heard gracious preaching;" nor, "Ye know Him; for ye have read about Him in the Scriptures." No—"Ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." The moon cannot help us to see the sun, nor can man reveal God. God can only be Seen in His Own Light.

No one can reveal the Holy Spirit but the Holy Spirit. I thought, this morning, coming along—I have to preach about the Holy Spirit; but what can I do without the Holy Spirit Himself? I can only preach aright concerning Him by His own presence with me; and if He be not there, I shall only darken counsel by words without knowledge. Why is it that we know the Holy Ghost only by the Holy Ghost?

I answer, first, on account of the inadequacy of all means. By what methods can you make a man know the Holy Ghost? He is not to be discerned by the senses, nor perceived by eyes or ears. What if the preacher should be as eloquent as an angel, in what way would that make you know the Holy Ghost? You would probably remember more of the man than of his subject. Nothing is more to be deplored than a hungering after mere oratory. No outward ordinances can reach the point any more than human speech. We greatly rejoice in the baptism of believers, and in the breaking of bread, in which the death of the Lord Jesus is set forth before us; but in what symbol could we fully see the Holy Spirit? It is not possible for God to reveal Himself fully by His works: He is seen only by Himself. Hence the Son of God himself has come to us as "God with us." In Him we see God. The Holy Spirit must Himself come into the heart to which He Makes Himself Known.

The facts of the case prove this. I shall not it to any believer here who can humbly say, "I know Him; for He dwelleth with me, and is in me." How do you know the Holy Ghost but by the Holy Ghost? Did you learn your religion of me? Then you have it all to unlearn. Did you learn it out of a book? You have need to begin again. Did you inherit it from your parents, or borrow it from your friends? Then you are still ignorant of the vital point. God is only known through Himself; the Holy Spirit by the Holy Spirit. Have you not found it so in your own case? Why, you have sat and heard a sermon which was in itself cheering, comforting, and quickening; for your neighbor said, "What a happy time we have enjoyed!" Alas! you thought you had never felt more stupid and lifeless. Have you not gone down the Tabernacle steps, and said to yourself, "I am as hard as stone, and as cold as a winter's fog. What shall I do?" Thus are you without the Spirit of God; but when the divine Spirit comes upon you, such complaints are at an end; then doth the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb is made to sing. Then are you full of living joy in listening to the gospel; every word you hear seems to be on wheels; and towards you the cherubim fly swiftly, bringing live coals from off the altar.

III. My third head is, believers enjoy

with the Spirit of God. I am not going to withdraw that word intimacy. It is warranted by the language of our Lord; for He says, "Ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." First, He says, "He dwelleth with you." The Holy Spirit is now upon earth, the vicar and representative of the Lord Jesus Christ, who said, "I will send you another Comforter"—that is, another Helper and Advocate, like Himself. Consider how our Lord dwelt with His disciples; for after the same fashion the Spirit of truth dwells with us. Jesus permitted to His disciples the most intimate intercourse with Himself; they ran to Him with their troubles, they told Him their difficulties, they confessed their doubts. He was their Master and Lord, and yet He washed their feet. He ate and drank with them, and permitted the freest intercourse. You never find our Lord repelling their approaches, or resenting their familiarities. He did not draw a ring round Himself and say, "Keep your distance!" Now, in the same manner, the Spirit of truth deals with believers. "He dwelleth with you."

Dwelling with us, He is in our assemblies. It is He who fulfils the promise of our Lord, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." He also comes into our homes—"He dwelleth with you." Where do you dwell, O true believer? Is it in a very poor lodging? "He dwelleth with you." It may be, dear friend, you live on board ship, and are tossed upon the sea; but "He dwelleth with you." Perhaps you go to work in a mine, far beneath the surface of the earth; still, "He dwelleth with you." Many choice saints are bed-ridden, but the Spirit dwells with them. I commend to all of you who love the Lord these gracious words: "He dwelleth with you."

The second sentence runs, "He shall be in you." This is

A Greater Marvel.

"Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" Take care of them; never defile them; let not the idea of drunkenness, gluttony, or lust come near you; for it is written, "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." With what reverence should we look upon the body, now that it has been redeemed by the Lord Jesus, and is indwelt by the Holy Spirit! The Spirit also dwells within your minds. We possess Him, and He possesses us. "He shall be in you," as a king in his palace, or a soul in its body. I am afraid that many professors know nothing about this. I must be talking nonsense, in the esteem of some of you; if it seems nonsense, let that fact condemn you. You cannot be right before God unless the Spirit of God be in you, in your mind, your heart, your desires, your fears, your hopes, your inmost life.

Brethren, when our Lord Jesus Christ came upon the earth, and was beheld as God in human flesh, that was to us the pledge of the indwelling of the Holy Ghost in us: for, as God dwelt in the human person of the Lord Jesus Christ, even so doth the Spirit abide in our humanity. Our Lord's life on earth was the picture of the Spirit's indwelling. As He was anointed of the Spirit, even so are we in our measure. "He went about doing good." He lived consecrated to God, loving the sons of men; and thus will the Spirit of God within us cause us to live: we shall imitate Christ through the Spirit.

When our Lord rose from the dead we had the guarantee that even so the Spirit of God would quicken our mortal bodies, and renew us into newness of life. But it was when our Lord ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, that the Holy Spirit was, to the full, actually given.

Your ascended Lord gives you this token of His love—the indwelling of the Holy Ghost in you: prize it above all things. Do you know it? It seems like an impertinence for me to put this question to some of you, who are gray-headed, and yet there is need. I trust you knew the Holy Spirit before I was born; but yet I cannot help pressing the inquiry, for you may not know Him even now. I have urged the question upon myself, and therefore I urge it upon you. Does the Spirit of truth dwell in you? If not, what will you do?

IV. I come to a conclusion with one more observation. Believers shall have of the Spirit's intimacy. "He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." Mark well the increase. Is it not a blessed step from with to in? "He dwelleth with you"—that is, a friend in the same house; "and shall be in you," that is, a spirit within yourself; this is nearer, dearer, more mysterious, and more effective by far. The bread yonder is "with" me. I eat it, and now it is "in" me. It could not nourish me until it advanced from "with" to "in." What a distinct advance it is for the child of God when he rises from the Spirit of God being with him to the Spirit of God being in him! When the Spirit of God helped the apostles to work miracles, He was with them; but when they came to feel His spiritual work in their own souls, and to rejoice in the comfort which He brought to them, then He was in them.

As we have noticed the increase, so remark the continuance: "He shall be in you." There is no period in which the Holy Spirit will have finished His work so as to go away and leave the believer to himself. Our Saviour says of the Comforter, that He "shall abide with you for ever." Grieve not the Spirit of God, I pray you; quench Him not, resist Him not, but carefully cherish in your hearts this divine word, "He shall be in you." What comfort is here! You dread the days of age and infirmity, but "He shall be in you." You tremble before that trial which threatens you, but "He shall be in you." You do not know how you will answer the gainsayer: take no thought what you shall speak, it shall be given you in the self-same hour what you shall speak, for He shall be in you. And when the last moment approaches, when you must breathe out your soul to God, the living Spirit who dwelleth with you shall then be in you, and by His living power within, shall transform death into

The Gate of Endless Life.

This is our great reliance for the future upholding of the Church as a whole, and of each individual believer: the Spirit of God dwelleth with us, and shall be in us. The Church of God will never be destroyed; the gates of hell shall not prevail against her; for the Holy Ghost dwelleth with us, and shall be in us to the end of the world. This is the reliance of the child of God personally for his perseverance in grace. He knows that Jesus lives, and therefore he shall live; and the Holy Spirit is within him, as the life of Christ, which can never die. The believer pushes on, despite a thousand obstacles, knowing that God gives him the victory through the Lord Jesus Christ, out of whose hand none can pluck him.

I have done; and yet I have done nothing unless the Spirit of God shall bless the word spoken. Oh, that some of you who have never known the Spirit of God, may feel His power coming upon you at this moment! Come, Holy Spirit. Come even now. Let us implore His presence and power. Pray for a closer, clearer knowledge of Him, O ye children of God. Pray also that sinners may be met with by His grace. The first token of the Spirit's work will be that they will begin to feel their sin, and cry for mercy; and when that is done, the glad tidings of pardon are for them. To them we say, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." The Lord make the word effectual, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

THE age of Daniel being only vaguely described, we may not be far from the truth, perhaps, if we suppose him to have been about seventeen years old at the time of his captivity. Assuming this to have been the case, and working backwards from the year 606 B. C., in which he first appears to us, we are brought to the year 623 B. C. as the possible date of his birth. In any case Daniel must have been born during the reign of Josiah. The year which has been suggested as Daniel's birth year is one of vast importance in Jewish history, being that in which Josiah effected his notable reformation in Church and state.

Daniel as a child must have heard of all these events, and of the horrors which had accompanied idolatrous worship. He had been educated upon the principles of the Bible, though his Bible was small compared with that which we now possess. However, with such a solid foundation of true practical religion laid in him, we shall not be surprised when we see what was his conduct in Babylon, when he was brought into contact with idolatry as a living power; when, in the very centre of heathenism, we find him bravely refusing to comply with a royal edict, though his refusal would cost him his life.

His Education.

We would gladly learn what secular education was common among the Jews at this period of their history; but, unfortunately, little can be discovered about the matter. We know that "Schools of Prophets" had formerly existed throughout Palestine. We are also informed that, in Hezekiah's time, a college of learned men had been very active in collecting what remains of ancient Hebrew literature could then be recovered. One subject, evidently, was taught, namely, geography, for without a knowledge of this a large portion of the sacred Scriptures would have been unintelligible. We may be sure, however, that whatever subjects of study may have been prescribed, the Hebrews took immense pains with the education of those who were destined to rise in life. They were aware that the main purpose of education was to form habits of attention, and that when these had once been secured, the pupil would be capable of mastering any subject that Divine Providence should put before him. Upon such principles must Daniel and his three companions in exile have been educated. We shall shortly see that they had not been so very long in Babylon, before those habits of attention and application which had been formed by their education at Jerusalem enabled them not only to master the wisdom and learning of the Chaldeans, but actually to surpass these Gentile scholars in their own science.

A Walk in Babylon.

When Daniel first arrived in Babylon the city retained much of its old form. It was not till many years afterwards, when the outlying provinces of Nebuchadnezzar were quieted, that the old city was restored, and the new public buildings were erected. However, the old city must have been a magnificent place, even before the great alterations were made; and as Daniel walked along one of the broad quays abutting upon the river, he would have pointed out to him the tower of Babel, the ruins of which were then of a far greater size than they are at present. . . . Daniel turns from the quays to one of those streets or squares which distinguish Babylon from other Oriental cities. The houses are different from what may be seen elsewhere. They are lofty, extending to three or even four stories, and are alive with business.

At every corner of the streets stands a temple dedicated to one or more of the many gods of Babylon. The walks are made of plaster, in which here and there a row of bricks is imbedded. The portico stands before us, and a grand flight of steps leads up to the temple door. The lintel, bolt, and lock are overlaid with gold, and the cedar roofs are overlaid with silver in some parts, and in others with fine burnished gold. The external decorations are of the most magnificent description; massive bulls of bronze and huge serpents guard the entrance. As Daniel passes by, he sees the provisions being delivered for the daily use of the gods—that is, of the priests: "A fine bullock a fatling, a bullock full grown, food of fish, fowl, flesh, vegetables, tokens of abundance, mead, spiced wine, date wine, heady liquor of the hills, pure wine, honey, milk, curd, the first of the oil"—all these provisions are being carried into the temple. And how is it that the temples are able to provide such rich stores? It is because they are endowed.

A DEAD FATHER'S INFLUENCE.

AN incident reported by the Rev. Maurice Phillips, a missionary in India, shows how the example and teaching of a Christian father may be blessed, though he may not live to see it. Mr. Phillips says:

"One very interesting incident came under my notice. Some years ago a Sudra farmer in one of the out-of-the-way villages was baptized under the name of Israel. He had a wife and a large family, but they positively declined to follow him to Christianity. At first they gave him a great deal of trouble, refusing to associate with him for fear of defilement, and his wife even declined to give him food. He gradually overcame these difficulties, but his family seemed as far as ever from Christianity. When I visited the family in 1884, just before going home, I asked his wife and each of his sons whether they intended to become Christians, and the answer was 'No.' I prayed with them, and urged them to follow their father, who was following Christ;

but I had no reason to believe that any impression had been produced.

"When camping last month within seven miles of Israel's village, a young man came to the tent, and said he was Israel's eldest son."

His father, he said, was dead. The family had respected his faith, and had not burned his body, as the heathen do, but had dug a grave, and given him Christian burial. The son himself had officiated, reading the twenty-third Psalm at the funeral. Asked about Israel's last days, the son said that during his father's sickness he wanted some one to read the Bible to him, and he (the son) had done so. He had read all the Psalms and the Gospels. Not only had the reading been a comfort to the dying Christian, but it had led to the reader's conversion, and now both he and his wife wished to be baptized, and make public confession of Christ. More than that, the young man was anxious for the salvation of the other members of the family, and, as he departed, asked our prayers for a blessing on his efforts to win them.

CRUELTY OF AFRICAN HEATHEN.

IN a survey of the work in Africa, the Missionary Herald groups together some startling facts from various reports. It says: The Batende are only a few hours' distant from Bobangi, and a feud is kept up between the two tribes. Dr. Sims, of the Baptist mission, recently went to a point about an hour inland, reaching the Batende plantations, where he was anticipating a friendly interview, when an angry man appeared on the scene, and others came and leveled their guns at the doctor. He says in his letter that "the muzzle of any gun within a foot of the pit of my stomach always makes me feel creepy." For some reason the guns did not go off, and the doctor fled, and reached his place of safety, sore from the blows of sticks and stones.

As to the character of the people, Mr. Grenfell says that it is terribly bad, "untellably bloodthirsty and lascivious." "Their laws are ratified by blood, and their burials are opportunities for gratifying the public taste for it." A few weeks ago, in coming up the river, they saw the body of a man hanging from a tree, and found that the chiefs had had a council and passed certain laws, and as a seal to these laws these chiefs immediately purchased a slave and killed him on the spot, and hanged his body in this conspicuous place. Mr. Grenfell tells of the burial of a young man the previous week. One of his wives was made to sit in the grave and support the corpse on her knees, and thus was buried alive with him. Four people were decapitated as a testimony of their respect for the dead. How much the gospel is needed in this land of darkness and cruelty!

A STRANGER AT CHURCH.

A LOVELY summer morning in the village of Cleethorpe. It was Sunday, and the old gray stone church was filled as usual with the farmers and their families, the farm-hands, and the few store-keepers of the village.

This morning, however, in a pew far away from the pulpit, sat a stranger. She was attired in deep mourning, and seemed desirous of avoiding the inquisitive looks of the people. She kept her veil down during the earlier portion of the service, but the vicar could see that she was weeping bitterly. Who could she be? The vicar asked himself the question, not in idle curiosity, but because he felt drawn toward her in a strange, unaccountable manner. He did not give the question a second thought, however, but resolved that if a wounded heart had come there for comfort, he would, with the help of the Holy Spirit, endeavor to administer it.

Mr. Fairbairn's sermons were not of the polished, carefully prepared type. His hearers would not have understood them if they had been anything but what they were—the simple exposition of the Word, and the offer of salvation made in the plainest and most homely language. It cost him no effort to lay aside the sermon he intended to preach, and leaning forward on the cushion, as his manner was when very much in earnest, he spoke from the words, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." But a few words had been spoken when the vicar noticed that the strange lady put aside her veil and looked at him steadily, drinking in every word.

Earnestly and pathetically he pleaded with the sorrowing and despairing, preaching Jesus as the Redeemer, the panacea for all woe. He preached no theory, no doctrine; it was the Saviour, who had comforted his own heart in many a bitter hour, that he held up before the people, and urged them to apply to the same Source for relief.

The service concluded, Mr. Fairbairn waited in his vestry until all the congregation had left the building, hoping that his strange hearer might confide to him the story of the sorrow which he felt sure filled her heart. But she did not come, and at last he rose to return to his home.

As he passed through the churchyard he looked a man whom one might well confide in. A refined, gentle face, framed in a setting of long white hair, and his bent form speaking of years that had not been passed without their tale of trouble. Yes, he was a man who would sympathize with the despairing; and one whose heart was breaking watched him as he wended his way between the gravestones, and vaguely hoped that he might sympathize with her.

He had been at home some two hours when he was informed that a lady desired to speak to him. He at once divined who was his visitor, and entering his library he found there the hearer whom he had seen in his church that morning. She rose as he entered, and he said, "I am glad to see you; you were in church this morning, and I feared you were suffering under some bitter sorrow."

"I am indeed, sir," she answered; "it is too deep for healing, but I thought I would like to tell my story to you before I die. I meant to have carried my secret to the grave untold, but your sermon this morning drew me toward you, and I should like to confide it to you."

"I wish my sermon had drawn you toward Jesus, my dear lady; 'He has carried our sorrows.' I can do little for you, but if I can lead you to Him you will find peace."

"There is no hope of that, sir, there is no peace in this world for such as I. I do not deserve it if there were. But you will hear my story?"

"Assuredly; but it can contain no evil that the Saviour is unable to relieve."

She told her story, one of the saddest this world of sadness sees, but which it sees only too often. It was one of a deserted home, loving parents forsaken for a comparative stranger unworthy of her; of the enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season, and then to the very dregs the bitter cup of shame, humiliation, and remorse. In her agony she had resolved on suicide, but determined once more to look on the home she had deserted seven years before, and if possible see her father and mother again before she died. Travelling on wearily, on foot, for her money had been exhausted in the long journey, she had passed through the village of Cleethorpe on her way, and had rested for an hour on the bank of the deep, swift river. Arrived at her village home, she found the farmhouse closed, and learned that both father and mother were dead. Then her heart broke, and she traveled back to Cleethorpe, drawn by the recollection of that river by which she had rested. That, she resolved, should be her grave. She arrived on the Sunday morning, and had entered the church that she might hear a prayer before she died, feeling too sinful to pray for herself.

It was in truth a pitiful story, and the sorrow of it was that she had returned too late. Her father and mother could never know now that she had been sorry, and had come back. Mr. Fairbairn listened attentively and with much sympathy. He knew that the balm of consolation would not be readily received into a heart so torn by unavailing sorrow. He must have time. Gently he pleaded with her, and finally induced her to remain for a few days as his guest at the vicarage, she giving her solemn promise not to make any attempt to commit suicide.

The few days stretched to weeks, and Mr. Fairbairn saw with gratitude a more hopeful spirit springing up within her. His wife grew to love her as a daughter, and in the quiet atmosphere of that Christian home the girl's soul thawed from its icy bonds. It was long before she would admit that there was a possibility of forgiveness for her, but at last the light broke upon her, and she was melted in a flood of grateful tears. Mr. Fairbairn succeeded in procuring employment for her in the village, and he had, to the end of his life, no more devoted friend than she whose soul had been given him from the verge of the grave.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

A Welcome Arrival.

UP to the year 1856 the Mormon emigrants made the journey from the frontiers across the plains by ox-teams, as I have already described, and every season some of the wealthier Mormons formed themselves into an independent company, paid their own expenses, and travelled with more comfort. The expense to the poorer emigrants was very small, for they performed the greater part of the journey on foot—the ox-teams being used for transporting provisions and baggage—100 pounds of the latter being allowed to each emigrant.

Brigham Young's "plan" of emigrating by ox-teams was, so far, a success, and the settlements of the Saints increased thereby, slowly, but surely, in population and wealth. There were, however, at that time, thousands of saints in Europe anxious to emigrate, but too poor to provide the small sum requisite for that purpose. During the winter of 1855 this difficulty was discussed in conference by Brigham and the leading men in Salt Lake, and some one suggested what was afterwards known as the "hand-cart scheme."

The idea of this "scheme" was to transfer the people from Liverpool to the frontiers in the cheapest possible way, and for them then to cross the Plains with light-made hand-carts, just strong enough to carry the fewest possible necessary articles, but sufficiently light for the men, women, and even young girls to draw them. This "plan" would not perhaps have been a bad one if it had been properly carried out, and if Brigham Young had seen, as he might have done, that suitable preparations were made beforehand. But the Hand-Cart Emigration Scheme began with a lie and ended in ruin.

The confiding Saints were told that "God" had specially inspired His servant Brigham for this purpose, and that the scheme was a revelation direct from on high. No proper measures were taken to provide for the emigrants—all was done upon faith—faith on the part of the people in their—as they supposed—inspired leaders; deception on the part of those leaders towards the people, whose only fault was that they trusted them too well, and were deceived by them.

Mormonism from the first was founded and built up upon false prophecies and spurious revelations. The founder, Joseph Smith, was a man of obscure origin, and if we may believe the testimony of his "Gentile" neighbors, of a most disreputable character. According to the statement of his friends, about the year 1820 or 1821 he came under the influence of some revival meetings, conducted by the Presbyterians, Baptists, and Wesleyans, under which he was greatly exercised in mind, but could not determine which sect to join. In his bewilderment he gave himself up to prayer that the truth might be revealed to him; when, one day, while so engaged, he states he saw a very bright and glorious light in the heavens, which descended to the earth and enveloped him in its midst, when he saw two glorious personages, who exactly resembled each other in their features and form. After informing him that his sins were forgiven, they told him that none of the sects was the true Church of God, and he was not to go after them, but that in due time the fulness of the Gospel should be revealed unto him.

On September 21, 1823, he alleged that he had a second vision in which the house seemed to be filled with fire, enveloping a glorious personage, who declared himself to be an angel of God, and who stated that God's covenant with His ancient people Israel was about to be fulfilled; that the preparatory work for the second coming of the Messiah was about to commence; and that he (Smith) was to be the instrument in the hand of God to bring about some of His marvellous purposes in this dispensation.

He was further informed that the North American Indians were a remnant of Israel, who, upon their first arrival in America, possessed a knowledge of the true God, enjoyed His favor, and had continued revelations until they wandered from Him, when they were brought down and many of them destroyed; but the records of the revelations had been preserved, and were now hidden, and if faithful he would be the instrument who should bring them before the world.

During that night and the following morning he had several other visions in which he was instructed to go to the place where they were hidden and view them. He repaired to the Hill Cummorah, near Palmyra, New York, where he found the treasures in a stone chest, but was prohibited by the angel, who, according to his statement, again appeared, from touching them, being informed that they were only to be obtained by prayer and faithfulness in obeying the Lord. Four years later, on September 22, 1827, the angel delivered the records into his hands.

The records were said to be engraved on gold plates, from seven to eight inches in width and length, being not quite as thick as common tin. With them was found an instrument, consisting of two clear crystals set in the two rims of a bow like a pair of spectacles, called the Urim and Thummim, which had the wonderful property of enabling the wearer to translate the plates, to see any distance, and to obtain revelations upon every kind of subject he desired.

According to Orson Pratt, "The plates were filed on both sides with engravings in Egyptian characters, and bound together in a volume as the leaves of a book, and fastened at one edge with three rings running through the whole. The volume was something near six inches in thickness, a part of which was sealed." A fac-simile of three lines was published several years before Smith's death in The Prophet, a Mormon journal, but instead of the characters being Egyptian, they were the pure invention of some ignorant person, and bear no resemblance to any ancient writings whatever. It is one of those self-evident frauds by which an ignorant impostor is almost sure to expose himself sooner or later.

When Smith lyingly affirmed that these records had been placed in his hands by the angel, several attempts were made to rob him of them, which, although unsuccessful, caused him so much trouble that he left his home and settled in Pennsylvania. From December, 1827, to February, 1828, he translated several of the plates by means of the so-called Urim and Thummim, which, with a copy of the characters, he sent by his friend, Martin Harris, to Professor Anthon, of New York, a celebrated classical scholar and Egyptologist. Harris states that the Professor pronounced the characters to be Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyrian, and Arabic, and that he entirely approved of his translation. The Professor, however, in a letter dated January 17, 1834, distinctly denies having seen a translation of any kind, and asserts that the characters which Harris showed him were anything but Egyptian.

Mr. Anthon says in this letter that the copy exhibited by Harris contained characters arranged in columns, imitating Greek and Hebrew letters, crosses, flourishes, Roman letters inverted, and that these columns were terminated by a clumsily-drawn circle, divided into several compartments decked with various strange marks evidently copied from the Mexican calendar given by Humboldt, but so copied as to conceal the source from which it was taken.

Harris, upon his return, commenced his functions as secretary to Smith, and while separated from him by a curtain so as not to see the plates, he copied out what the translator read by means of the Urim and Thummim. When he had thus written out 116 pages, he obtained permission to take away his copy to read to his wife and some other persons pointed out by special revelation, but by the connivance of his wife he was robbed of it, and this portion of the manuscript was for ever lost to the Mormon prophet.

It would naturally occur to any one that with his constant visits from the angels, and with the supernatural powers of the Urim and Thummim, there would have been no difficulty in getting another translation of the lost manuscript, especially as the original plates were still in his possession; but no: he received a special revelation warning him to avoid the attacks of the wicked, who would not fail to compare the new translation with that which had been stolen, and to single out any discrepancies between them; to prevent which he was to abstain from re-translating the stolen part. A neat way this to escape the detection of an imposture, but scarcely a way out of a difficulty that we should expect from an heavenly messenger.

The translation was continued; and during its progress the plates were by special revelation shown first to three witnesses in a vision; and afterwards the identical plates were shown by Smith to eight others, and were by them handled and examined. The translation was completed in March, 1830, upon which a revelation was made to Joseph Smith commanding Martin Harris, under pain of damnation, to sell his effects to cover the expenses of its publication.

Such, in brief, is a history of the Book of Mormon, and indeed of the origin of Mormonism. It is easy to see that having begun this religion with forged revelations, it was necessary to support it with others of a similar character. Thus Smith was always receiving alleged Divine messages, and those who had accepted the first lie could not but regard the voice of such a man as the voice of God, to disobey which was a deadly sin. This gave him an authority and power that his successor, Brigham Young, was not willing to forego, but to possess which he also must have revelations. They came at his bidding, and notwithstanding the events proved many of them false, still the people were so deluded by believing the first lie, that they accepted any explanation rather than acknowledge that they had been deceived by a false prophet.

It was thus that the "Hand-Card Scheme" was so readily accepted by the Mormon emigrants as a Divine plan. The prophet had given it out as a revelation, and it must be so, to entertain doubt of which would bring trouble on the doubter.

The Millennial Star proclaimed the Hand-Card Scheme to the Saints in Europe, and so great and immediate was the response to this special summons that in that year—1856—it was estimated that no fewer than five or six thousand Mormon emigrants travelled from Liverpool to Salt Lake City. It was the first company of these emigrants that Brother Benton alluded to when he told Mr. Stenhouse that "they" were expected that night or the next; but in those days emigrant vessels were frequently delayed by adverse winds and other circumstances, and no one could calculate upon the exact time of their arrival.

The following morning, my husband, when he returned from the Mormon office, brought with him a letter bearing the English post-mark, and addressed to me in the neat, unmistakable handwriting of Mary Burton. I had been waiting and watching for a letter from her ever since our arrival; I was anxious to hear from her, and I hastily tore it open, so impatient was I to know how she was getting on. What I read interested me deeply, though it did not surprise me. I had seen Mary many times after the interview which I have already related, and our conversations and discussions were to us of all-absorbing interest; but as they were mostly personal I have not cared to record them in this narrative.

To tell the truth, her love affairs with Elder Shrewsbury occupied more and more the most prominent place in all our discussions. His enthusiasm was perfectly infectious. As long as Mary absolutely refused to see him, her love for him, and her faith in Mormonism were anything but overpowering. But Elder Shrewsbury was one of those peculiar persons who have a sort of magnetic charm about them; who, without our knowing it, or even, in some instances, contrary to our will and reason, enlist all our sympathies and leave behind them an impression that we vainly try to efface. He only wanted opportunity, and his success was sure. Opportunity he had had for pressing his suit with Mary and making an impression upon her heart, ever since the day when they met at my door, and had taken that walk together, as Mary said, for the purpose of discussing important matters.

Now the letter which I received opened to me another chapter in Mary's life, which without the gift of prophecy I might have easily predicted. Elder Shrewsbury's unwearying patience and perseverance met with their due reward, and Mary promised to become his wife; but fascinated though she was, and herself almost as deeply in love as he was, she nevertheless made one condition, which showed that she had not entirely lost that prudence and determination which she had shown in the early days of their courtship.

"When he spoke to me in that way—you know how, Sister Stenhouse"—she said in her impulsive way, "How could I persist in saying No to him? It wasn't in my heart to do so. I didn't say 'Yes' in so many words, but I simply said nothing, and he took my silence for consent. Then—but no, I won't even tell you everything. I know he thought he was going to have it all his own way; but I didn't think so. I told him then that I had firmly resolved upon one thing—that I never would marry him unless he made a solemn vow and promise before God that he would not countenance the heresy of a plurality of wives. I could not hide from him that I loved him—he knew it, and could see it; but I said I never would go to Salt Lake alone, and I certainly never would marry at the risk of my husband taking another wife. No; I was willing to give him my heart, my all—it was only fair for him to do the same by me."

"He was very near me then, and my hand was in his; and he was looking into my eyes. Then he whispered the promise I had asked of him, and, dear Sister Stenhouse, I know I can depend upon his word. We shall be happier in this world by ourselves, and we feel quite sure that God will not ask us to do anything in heaven that would make us miserable. Perhaps I oughtn't to say this, but I'm so happy that I cannot allow myself one single wretched doubt about the future or my husband, such as I used to have. We were married on the 27th of January."

"And now we are getting ready for Salt Lake, and are busy day and night. Of course you have heard of the 'Divine Plan'—the Hand-Card Scheme. Oh, Sister Stenhouse, I am so very, very much ashamed of myself for all the unjust things that I used to say about the Apostles and the Elders. Since our marriage Elder Shrewsbury has explained everything to me and set things in their right light. It is a glorious privilege for us to be permitted to gather to Zion, and now that I know my dear husband will never even think of another besides myself, I glory in the thought of leaving the Gentile world and all its wickedness. We go with the first company this season. I will tell you all the rest of the news when I meet you."

So Mary Burton was married, and coming with the Hand-Card Company. "Why," I said, turning to my husband, "they'll be here in a day or two now." "Perhaps to-day," he replied. They did not, however, arrive either that day or the next; but toward the end of the week we were told that their vessel was in the river, and I accompanied my husband to Castle Garden.

A very strange spectacle was presented to our view. More than six hundred Mormon emigrants were gathered there, all on their way to Salt Lake, and burning with zeal and enthusiasm worthy of a better cause. There were aged men and women, whose heads were hoary with the snows of many a winter, and whose tottering steps had borne them to the verge of three-score years and ten; there were stout-hearted fathers of families, and matrons with sons and daughters growing up around them; there were young men in the pride and strength of manhood; and maidens in the modest blush of womanly beauty; and little toddling children, and babes in their mother's arms—all obedient to what they thought was the command of God Himself—all with their faces set Zionward.

Let not the reader smile at the blind infatuation of those poor emigrants. Would he or she have suffered so confidently—so faithfully—for his or her religion? They might be mistaken; but truly theirs was a faith which "hoped all things, believed all things, endured all things." Surely, in His sight—who judges the heart—the blind obedience of those men and women to the craft of the Mormon leaders who were ready to suffer and to endure unto the bitter end, because in their child-like faith they thought it was His holy will—such practical devotion was more truly acceptable than the formal professions of an untested faith.

THE REJECTED SON.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for April 14, Mark 12: 1-12. Golden Text, John 1: 11.

No Home for Him in Jerusalem—The Fig-Tree a Type of the City—The Faith that Moves Mountains—Jesus Challenged by the Pharisees—His Rejoinder—A Test for Critics—The Vineyard Planted—His Demand Strictly Just—The Messengers—The Coming Catastrophe Foreseen—The Fruits of the Vineyard Still Refused.

"He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." It was strangely significant that Jesus, after His triumphal entry into Jerusalem, should have found no lodging-place within her walls! "He left them and went out of the city into Bethany, and lodged there." The stones of Jerusalem were as dear to Him as the stones of Bethany, but at Bethany were hearts which owned and loved Him, while Jerusalem said, "Who is this?" God had chosen Zion; He had desired her for His habitation; He had said: "This is My rest forever: here will I dwell, for I have desired it." (Ps. 132: 13, 14.) Yet Zion and found no beauty in Him that she should desire Him. He wept over her, yearned to save her, fain would have gathered her children as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, but she would not.

On the following morning, as He took His way into Jerusalem, He saw a fig-tree, which, in its leafy promise, but real fruitlessness, was like Jerusalem, and like every human soul where Jesus does not dwell. Jesus said unto it: "Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward forever." And the word which called all things into being was as powerful in taking away life. "Presently the fig-tree withered away." It was the exception when Jesus exercised His mighty power in destruction. Generally He spoke—sight, hearing, life, health, reason, comfort—into souls and bodies. But Jerusalem was courting judgment, rushing to destruction, and choosing

The Fate of the Fig-Tree.

The disciples remarked on the suddenness of the fig-tree's withering, and Jesus took occasion to tell them that if they had faith, and doubted not, all things, whatsoever they should ask in prayer, they should receive. Jesus would encourage us to ask in faith, just as though He entreated us to stay Him from words and works of judgment, by showing the almightiness of real faith in God to stay it. It is as though He said, "I am powerless; I must judge, but I put in your power authority to move mountains if you have faith and doubt not." Jerusalem was destroyed, but not before thousands of redeemed souls were safe in the arms of Jesus—men and women who, at this very time, took their part against Jesus, and, so soon after, swelled the cry, "Crucify Him, crucify Him!"

When He was come into the temple, the chief priests and elders of the people, who always stood upon their dignity, came unto Him, as He was teaching, and said, "By what authority loest Thou these things?" What things? Jesus had never worshipped any God but One, His Father; Jesus had made no graven image to worship; Jesus had never taken His Father's name in vain; had never really broken the Sabbath-day; had never failed to honor His father or His mother; had not killed, but saved life, and healed disease; had never done, thought or spoken impurely, but had saved many, many an outcast; had never borne false witness, but was Himself the Faithful and the True; had never coveted, for all things were delivered unto Him, both in heaven and on earth. And now the elders of the people want to know by what authority He lived a life so holy and so faultless,

By What Authority

He "went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil." (Acts 10: 38.) Alas, the same spirit is abroad to-day. A man swears, gambles, commits the most flagrant sins against common morality, and no one asks him his authority! But let this man be converted, and stand up in the street to warn others of the ruin he has escaped, and of the sin from which God has delivered him, and, very often, clergy and magistrates come and ask him "by what authority" he does these things! A so-called aristocrat, who is really only a bond-slave of Satan, may ruin the life and break the heart of a fair young girl, but if any one pulls off the mask and exposes the hideous wickedness of her betrayer, the authorities compass sea and land to know "by what authority" sin is dragged to light, as though sin were not sin unless people know about it! As though the guilt did not lie in the breaking of God's law, and the ruin of a fellow-creature, but only in the widely deserved shame of a man whose interest it is to walk about as a whitened sepulchre! Man needs no authority for doing evil—alas, it is such a common thing!—but he needs

Authority for Doing Good!

He may ruin souls, and no one interferes with him; but he must ask the clergyman, the minister, the magistrate, the mayor, the police, for leave to do what he can in saving them. Perhaps nothing more manifests the spirit of enmity to the gospel than this common interrogation, "By what authority" do you do this? Oh how men reject the Son of God! Men make up their minds that there is something unlawful in people being healed of disease by the hand of Jesus alone, and that it is absolutely wrong, sinful, and "tempting Providence," as it is called, to go out as a missionary on apostolic lines, without purse or scrip or outfit, living on the food and wearing the clothing of the natives, and trusting God for supplies day by day. Whence comes this thought? Surely from an absolute disbelief in God, a putting of God out of the question. If God were shut out of the universe we should have to do the best possible for ourselves, but the terrible anomaly that we see around us is that God is outwardly acknowledged; but when it comes to a practical issue, God is set aside, and man's devices take precedence.

Jesus answered by another question, "The baptism of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men?" The elders, who were ready enough to assert their dignity when questioning Jesus, quite forgot themselves when He questioned them. There was no dignity, but quite the contrary, in their reasoning with themselves. "If we shall say, From heaven, He will say unto us, Why, then, did ye not believe him? But if we shall say, Of men, we fear the people; for all hold John as a prophet." These would-be administrators of justice and righteousness did not want to know what was true, or what would be a righteous answer, but only what would best. They would not say, "From heaven," or they would condemn themselves; they would not say, "Of men," because of the popular voice; so they took neutral ground, and said, "We cannot tell." Whereupon He also said, "Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things." What a lesson for us in dealing with questioners. First prove them, as to whether they are real. Then, if they shuffle, simply refuse to enter into an argument. There is such a thing as casting pearls before swine. Jesus next spoke the parable of the two sons; the professing Jew, who said, "I go, sir; and went not" into the vineyard, and the converted Gentile, who said, "I will not," but afterwards he repented and went. And Jesus showed them how publicans and harlots are the first to enter into the kingdom of heaven. These appreciated John the Baptist, whom the scribes could not condemn, and yet the rulers of the people received him not.

Thus Jesus Was Rejected,

not only in His own person, but in that of His forerunner, and always because of the pride and self-sufficiency of those who rejected Him. He then spoke another parable: "There was a certain householder which planted a vineyard, and hedged it round about, and digged a winepress in it, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into a far country; and when the time of the fruit drew near, he sent his servants to the husbandmen, that they might receive the fruits of it." It was but his right; it is true he was a non-resident landlord, but it was his due that he should get in the rents or the crops, at any rate a large share of them. But his claim was disputed, and his messengers killed. He sent again a larger deputation, but with a similar result. Last of all, he sent unto them his son, saying, "They will reverence my son." Now things came to a crisis, and the revolt in the vineyard grew desperate. They said, "This is the heir; come, let us kill him, let us seize on his inheritance. And they caught him and cast him out of the vineyard, and slew him." It was a prophecy, in large part, fulfilled. "This people have I Formed for Myself"

(Isa. 43: 21), was God's claim, yet the house of Israel had gone astray from Him, turned every man to his own way, rejected God's rule, chosen them a king, and then fallen into idolatry. And now, centuries after their return from captivity in Babylon, their religion was all outside; they drew near to God with their lips, but their hearts were far from Him, and, whether in worldly matters or religious, self was still their centre; if they prayed, it was to be seen of men; if they did alms, it was to gain glory for their religiousness; they disputed the fruit of the vineyard with the Owner, and persecuted all who asserted His claim! But is not this the spirit of the age in which we live? Is it not still a fact that "all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's"?—from the comfortable minister who rides to church in his carriage, in spite of the fourth commandment, and when he gets there, enjoys the flattery of the people, to the millionaire who gives his thousands, and then expects to get the worth of it in flattery, or the luxurious hearer who enjoys the eloquence of the preacher, or the earnest worker who loves to be the idol of the souls which he has gathered. Where is God getting the fruits of the vineyard? Where is the evidence that He rules, and that He is Lord and Master? The object of the vineyard is that God shall have His due, and that Jesus, the Son of God, shall be glorified. "Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken." Jesus has power to break down the pride and self-importance, and use His vessel to His own honor, "but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder." Christ must either break our hearts with His love now, or execute vengeance by and by.

The Christian Herald Binder.—Numerous applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar. We have also a cheaper binder, with lace instead of steel fastenings, for 50 cents, postage paid. Subscribers in Canada ordering the binders are, we believe, required to pay customs-duty upon them.

LEAD, KINDLY LIGHT.

Lead, kindly Light! amid the encircling gloom,
Lead Thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead Thou me on;
Keep Thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.

I was not ever thus, nor prayed that Thou Shouldst lead me on;
I loved to choose and see my path; but now,
Lead Thou me on;
I loved the garish day, and, spite of fears,
Pride ruled my will. Remember not past years!

So long Thy power hath blest me—sure it still Will lead me on O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone;
And with the morn, those angel faces smile,
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.

ASTOUNDING ATTACK UPON THE PLYMOUTH ROCK PANTS CO.

In a recent number of a trade paper devoted to the interest of the retail clothing trade, an article appears which, after discussing the causes for last year's depression in ready-made clothing, concludes as follows: "Perhaps not all of our members appreciate the effect upon our trade of the enormous business that the PLYMOUTH ROCK PANTS CO. is doing through EVERY post-office and express office in the UNITED STATES. It is not an uncommon sight to see of a Saturday a line of people waiting at some post-office in Maine, Illinois, or even California for parcels of this concern's custom clothing to be delivered there. Backed by ample capital, and with astonishing energy, they have pushed their business up to such a magnitude, that a profit per pair which to us would hardly pay rent, to them means a handsome return upon their capital. Representing as they probably do over a MILLION CONSUMERS of cloth, they demand and obtain cloth in the woolen markets of the East at LOWER figures than ever before quoted. By the system that they originated, they never have to carry any ready-made clothing, but CUT EVERY GARMENT TO ORDER, which of course attracts a great many customers, as their prices are even lower than the same garment ready-made. It is useless to deny that they have treated their customers with a liberality which THEY CAN AFFORD TO DO, where our trade cannot, even to the extent of refunding money at a buyer's request, or making a new garment when customers sent wrong measures. It has been suggested that a memorial be addressed to Congress by the clothing dealers, calling attention to the operations of this company through the post-offices and express companies, asking if some action cannot be taken to protect the trade against such competition."

We have read the above with great attention, but fail to see how Congress could be induced to interfere with a business that has REDUCED THE COST OF CLOTHING to the people. We leave it for our friends and customers throughout the country to let their representatives in Congress understand whether or not our enterprise has been a benefit to the people.

In the meantime we shall continue, upon receipt of 6 cents, to send our packages containing twenty samples cloth, from which we make to order our famous custom-made Plymouth Rock $3, $4, and $5 pants, and $13.25, $16.75, and $20.50 suits, together with a linen tape-measure and guaranteed self-measurement blanks.

A SCENE ON THE ROUTE OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

THE HON. JAMES R. HOSMER,
United States Consul General in Guatemala.

THERE is a very rapidly growing public interest in the countries of Central America which is due to the importance they must assume to this country when the canal that is to pierce the isthmus is completed. That work will undoubtedly lead to the development of those lands, and to bringing them into closer relations with the United States. Recognizing this natural interest, we this week publish a description of one of those lands—Guatemala—with an account of the journey thither by the Hon. James R. Hosmer, and, on the first page, his portrait, and that of Barrios, the patriotic ruler of Guatemala, and a picture of the route through which M. de Lesseps attempted to cut the Panama Canal. A glance at the map will convince any one of the inestimable value of a waterway through the isthmus. When it is cut, as it undoubtedly will be, by the Nicaragua Canal Company, a vessel from New York bound for San Francisco will no longer have to sail southward the whole length of the coast of South America, and then rounding Cape Horn to sail northward a corresponding distance, but will pass through the canal and avoid the long and dangerous voyage. The traffic through the canal will be enormous, and the countries that abut on the great highway of commerce cannot fail to become better known to us. Of these Guatemala is one of the most important.

Mr. James R. Hosmer, who is our Consul General there, is fifty-five years of age. He was born in New York in 1834. He studied in Columbia College, and after his graduation read law in the office of Charles O'Connor. He subsequently practiced in New York, Chicago, and Baltimore. During the war he served with distinction in the Union Army, and after the war he held for a time a post in the United States Legation in London. He was appointed by Mr. Bayard to his present position, which includes the oversight of diplomatic relations with Costa Rica, Honduras, Nicaragua, and San Salvador. His bright and lucid description of his experience cannot fail to interest our readers.

JUSTO RUFINO BARRIOS.
The Garibaldi of Guatemala.

A REMARKABLE combination of soldier and statesman is found in the character of the man who so long governed Guatemala. He was fifty years of age when he died, having been born at San Lorenzo in 1835. He was educated for a lawyer, but the miserable condition of his countrymen aroused his patriotism, and he set himself to the task of their deliverance. He hated with the intensity of a fiery nature the Roman Catholic hierarchy and the nobles, both of whom he recognized as jointly responsible for the degraded condition of the people. In 1867 he had sufficiently aroused public opinion to make an insurrection possible, and at the head of an armed force he scored his first success by capturing the barracks of San Marcos. It was not until 1871 after hard fighting, in which Barrios had been severely wounded, and after many battles, with varying results, that the insurrection finally triumphed, and Granados, the ally of Barrios, was made President. Barrios had command of the western departments, and the people were not long in perceiving that those departments were the best governed in the country. The result was that Barrios was called to the Presidency, to which he was continuously re-elected until 1885. He suppressed monasteries and convents, and drove the Jesuits out of the country. He governed with a strong hand, but under him the country thrived, and his patriotism was undoubted. In 1885 he was seized with an ambitious desire to unite all the Central American countries in one federation, and failing to accomplish this scheme peaceably, he took up arms. San Salvador was his first opponent. A fierce battle was fought at Chalchuapa on April 2, in which Barrios was killed. He was succeeded by the Vice-president, Manuel T. Barillas, who has been elected President.

A JOURNEY TO CENTRAL AMERICA.

By the Hon. James R. Hosmer, United States Consul General in Guatemala.

I EMBARKED on board of the fine steamer Newport, of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's line, on the 10th of December last, bound for Central America, via the Isthmus of Panama. Almost immediately after losing sight of land we fell into the rough embrace of a triple cyclone. The Atlantic Ocean is, as you may know, very like the little girl of the nursery rhyme—"When she is good she is very, very good, but when she is bad, she is horrid." Out of our smooth bay into rough seas, the first night's promise was decidedly discouraging. The wind increased to a terrific gale, and on the second and third days from port there seemed to be a genuine knock-down and rough-and-tumble encounter of the storms which were struggling for an "outing" upon the ocean. Happily, and I should say providentially, for our safety the northern cyclone prevailed in the free fight for supremacy between the conflicting gales, and assisted rather than retarded our voyage down the coast toward the Caribbean. When we reached the Windward Passage all signs of elemental disturbances ceased. The turbulent sea became as smooth as a millpond; the waters a turquoise blue, and the verdure of the islands, with the charming effects of light and shade in color, gave a restful influence to eye and mind.

We arrived off the port of Colon (Aspinwall) on the evening of the 18th, and rode at anchor all night within sight of the electric lights of the town. On the morning following the steamer fastened to the company's wharf, and we made ready for our prompt departure, by rail, to the city of Panama. I found Colon improved, physically at least, since my visit of some twenty months previous. The main street on the sea front had been relaid with solid planking, and the sidewalks evidently renewed with more substantial timber. The shops, too, looked cleaner, and in the distance along the shore, several new and comfortable cottages had been erected, showing signs of a respectability to which the town had been hitherto a comparative stranger.

The Canal.

The French settlement, at the entrance of the canal, known among foreigners generally as "Frenchtown," but styled by the company "Cristofer Colomb," presented a very pretty combination of tropical verdure surrounding tastefully constructed residences, and wide avenues macadamized with shells. Beyond this, however, on the line of the railroad, the transition to huts which rose out of black mire, the embodiments of an indescribable squalor, was very sudden, and the more painfully evident by their sharp contrast.

The canal work seemed to be going on in patches, as it were, here and there, over the line. Apparently there were as many idlers hovering about the stations, like birds of bad omen, and lounging around the numberless shanties devoted to the sale of a variety of cheap wares as well as beer and fire-water, as there were in active employment on the canal itself. A motley and a dangerous crowd, I thought, in case of trouble in the company's affairs. And strange enough, when we reached Panama, I was shown the telegraphic announcement of the withdrawal of the head and front of the undertaking—Monsieur de Lesseps. But this fact, shortly followed by the discomfiting news of the refusal of the company's agents in New York to honor the drafts of the creditors of the canal, was not generally known at that time. Since then I have been informed that our Government, as well as that of the English and French, have taken precautions to protect the lives and properties of the people of the Isthmus against any possible riotous indulgences growing out of the stoppage of the work.

At Panama we were transferred, without delay, by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's tender to the steamer San José, Captain William T. Russell commanding, bound for San Francisco, up the Pacific coast. Like the rest of the steamers of this old and well-regulated line, the San José was a model of cleanliness and comfort with the best of captains; polite to his passengers, efficient and attentive to his duties, and adding much to the pleasure of the voyage by his unvarying kindness to all with whom he came in contact.

Owing to the unusually large amount of war freight, our steamer was obliged to stop at all the ports of the five Central American Republics, on its voyage north. Although this circumstance somewhat protracted the length and duration of the trip, it added, nevertheless, much to its pleasurable enjoyment. It gave the charm of variety and novelty, by finding its way into snug harbors of picturesque locality, and quaint looking little pueblos, while cool breeze wafted over the ocean made the rest at anchor refreshing and comfortable in spite of the burning tropical sun.

At Guatemala.

Our sea voyage came to an end with the old year. We landed at San José de Guatemala on the morning of the 31st of December, and took the train, at once for the capital city of the Republic, the city of Guatemala.

It would be impossible to convey by pen a word of mouth, an adequate idea of the grandeur and beauty of the scenery which is the remarkable feature of the journey by rail from the port to the capital, a distance of seventy-two miles, and an ascent of nearly five thousand feet. The first twenty-eight miles present nothing particularly attractive to the eye beyond the novelty, to a stranger from the north, of profuse tropical vegetation, with an occasional potrero, or pasturage ground, where cattle are browsing; and a small stream of limpid water courses through the rank growth of grass and bush and tree. But the significant fact that the time of the year was December, and that doubtless, our northern home was sheeted over with snow and in the icy embrace of winter rendered the contrast of a temperature of perhaps 80° in the shade the more vivid and extraordinary. So it was, and hard to realize when the mind dwelt upon a retrospection of comparatively few days' time, while the eye roamed over the fresh verdure of one's surroundings.

On the Heights.

The grand scenery opens out at a point just beyond Escuintla, a small town, and the breaking station en route. Then begins the steep climb of a five per cent. grade up the mountains. Here it is that the extinct volcano "Agua" raises its lofty peak some 12,000 or 13,000 feet above the sea, while near at hand "Fuego," out of which a thin column of smoke constantly ascends, and "Acateango," its close companion, respectively 13,000 and 14,000 feet above the sea level, confront the view. A series of foothills roll up, like the undulating waves of the sea, to the base of these volcanoes, broke into various fantastic shapes, and all covered with a dense growth of shrub and tree, rich in verdure, and occasionally tipped with a fleecy fringe of floating clouds of vapor.

Looking backward one can now see the valley which had been passed over, with its sugar plantations and their mills and viaducts, and the occasional pueblo of whitewashed wall thatched huts, and the chapel facing the plaza which invariably distinguishes every collection of inhabited abodes in this Republic, and in the dim distance the streak of silver which marks the smooth surface of the great Pacific Ocean.

Farther on the beautiful Lake Amatitlan is reached, stretching some seven miles in length and about two in width. On all sides the rugged outline of the volcanic foothills pierces the clear blue sky, and thick with natural growth of varied timber tapers down into the waters of the smooth inland sea. This lake is evidently the bowl of an extinct volcano, and the jets of steam, which float above a portion of its border, show that there are still hidden fires in it.

whence He ascended on high, and where soon His blessed feet will again stand at His second advent. It will be cleft in twain, which will be tantamount to being destroyed, and then presumably this Tower will sink into the chasm formed by the parting asunder of the Mountain (see Zech. 14: 4). When we come to consider that the Lord is just in all His dealings, we can account for all.

"The ancient Temple the Lord hallowed by His presence and sanctified, but man defiled it with idols, and, therefore, God destroyed it, as He will the Mount of Olives. The Lord made it holy by choosing it for His frequent resort when on earth, but now men have filled the place with idolatrous worship and defiled it by their practices; therefore the Mount will be destroyed and all the earth will be burnt up, and a new heaven and a new earth shall be, in which dwelleth righteousness: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it (see II Pet. 3: 13)."

PROPHETIC NOTES.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

DANIEL's prophecies clearly show that the Balkan States will become united together so as to form one of the Ten Prophetic Kingdoms denoted by the ten-horned wild beast. The other nine will be Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Turkey. We may therefore expect Roumania, Bulgaria, and Servia to be united together, except such part of Servia, as may be added to Austria.

The resignation of King Milan is looked upon as tending to increase Russian influence in Servia. The Scotsman says; "The 'powder-magazine of Europe'—the Balkan Peninsula—is once more full of smoke and flying sparks. Bulgaria is unsettled and full of intrigue; there is disaffection in Macedonia and in the Bosnia, and incipient revolt in Albania. Beyond the Danube, in Hungary and in Roumania, there have been outbreaks of popular excitement, and attacks upon the ministry, of almost unparalleled violence. In the midst of all this agitation, Servia can no longer be looked upon as supplying anything resembling a nucleus of peace and settled rule in the East. Instead, it has become for the time the 'danger point' to which the eyes of statesmen are turned." This of Servia, is an exceedingly curious one, for King Milan is not yet thirty-five, and his son is only twelve. The ex-king, who was divorced from his Russian wife last October by subservient ecclesiastics, assumed the Government of Servia as prince before he was eighteen, and was proclaimed king in 1882. The quarrel between King Milan and Queen Natalie excited a considerable amount of interest. Queen Natalie, though she had undoubted wrongs, has a great talent for political intrigues. The struggle was, in fact, between Austria, which sided with the king, and Russia, which took up the cause of the wife. For a time Austria prevailed; the Servian Metropolitan took upon himself to dissolve the marriage, and the Constitution was revised to meet the needs of the hour. Now, however, the tables have been turned; it is King Milan who withdraws, and it is thought that his wife will be recalled. The three Regents, of whom M. Ristitch is chief, will of course have the policy of the country in their hands meanwhile, and, though their late master departs with assurances of his sympathy with Austria-Hungary, Russian influence is obviously in the ascendant in Servia. The outgoing monarch remains commander-in-chief of the Servian Army till his son's majority.

is thus stated by the senior Admiral De Horsey: "I submit the following axioms as incontrovertible and as supported by the wisdom and experience of all far-seeing statesmen and qualified experts: 1. The population of the British Islands is dependent for its food supply on foreign imports. 2. The financial prosperity of the country is solely dependent upon our commerce by sea. 3. Our commerce by sea is solely dependent on the ability of the navy to protect it. From these axioms it follows as a logical consequence that if our navy suffer defeat we can in a few weeks be starved into submission. No invasion is required for this purpose; not a foreign soldier need be landed on our shores, and if we possessed five millions of the best troops in the world, and if we spent 100 millions in land defences the result would be the same. We should be absolutely at the mercy of the enemy who had acquired command of the sea, and who could impose conditions involving our being stripped of all our colonial possessions, of our position as one of the Great Powers, of our commerce, and of our cash and credit."

THE GREAT TRIBULATION.

By Rev. A. B. Simpson.*

What its Characteristics Will Be—I. A World Without a Church—II. A World Full of Wickedness—III. Overshadowed by the Judgments of God—The Jews the Chief Sufferers—Some Brought to Repentance—The Fall of Babylon the Closing Catastrophe.

DANIEL foretells that there shall be "a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time." Zechariah describes it as a fire, a siege and a sack of Jerusalem. Jesus Himself declares that "there shall be great tribulation such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no nor ever shall be, and except those days should be shortened there should no flesh be saved, but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." And in St. Luke He adds: "There shall be on earth distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring, men's hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things that are coming upon the earth." And John, in the Apocalypse, speaks of "the hour of temptation coming on all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth."

Dark and terrible it must indeed be if it is to be such as was not since the creation of the world unto that hour, for this old world has gone through some awful storms. What will be the special features of this time of trouble?

A World Without the Church.

I remember the weeks I spent in southern Italy before Rome and Naples were open to the Gospel. How desolate and God-forsaken the land seemed! How horrible the universal atmosphere and breath of evil! And when sickness began to steal over the frame, how we fled on wings to find a Christian land, and never rested until, after three days of travel, we found ourselves on a sweet Sabbath morning in Protestant Geneva, and it seemed like heaven to be among God's children once more. But what would it be to live in a world without God's people—a world where the songs of His praise are never heard, and the sweet incense of prayer and all the purifying influences of religion are unknown. Such will be the tribulation time—churches enough there perhaps will be, but not the presence of His Spirit or the preciousness of His name. Nominal Christianity will be the open handmaid of the world and the counterfeit of Satan, and the Church of Christ shall be in the presence of the Lamb.

Take all the sanctified men and women out of the United States, and give up everything to the saloon, the theatre, the trade and the formalities of a religious ceremonialism, and you have some conception of the world's dark future.

A World Full of Wickedness.

In the sixteenth chapter of Revelation, the Holy Ghost gives us a picture of the peculiar forms of evil which are to overshadow the world during these last fearful days. They are described as three unclean spirits like frogs, out of the mouth of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet, who are to possess and instigate the rulers and people of the world in the last conflict. They vividly describe the forms of evil which are already beginning to muster the alien ranks. They are like frogs in their filthiness, their love of the low and swampy places, their noisy loquacity, their nocturnal habits and love of the darkness, and their low, gloomy, sepulchral notes, and their fitness to represent the under world of evil. The first of these spirits, coming from the dragon, is undoubtedly spiritualism. The second is probably socialism, and all the kindred forms that come from the beast, the world power. The third is false religion, whether Romanism, Ritualism, Mohammedanism or Pagan theosophy. They are all abroad already. But they are to swarm like the spawn of a thousand marshes in the unhealthy waters of the dark night that is coming soon, and to gather the nations to the war of Armageddon.

The tribulation will be overshadowed by

The Judgments of God.

On this devoted earth His hand shall pour the plagues of His wrath. We are strongly inclined to believe that the eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh chapters of Revelation describe the events of this period after the translation and resurrection of the saints, and that the horrors and woes there described have, as yet, never been fulfilled in human history. To apply them exclusively to the Saracen and Turkish wars is as unsatisfactory as to find the meaning of the convulsions, described in the closing verses of the sixth chapter, realized in the fall of Rome. They may have been foreshadowed by those events, but they would seem, both by their place in the progress of events and their strange and supernatural character to belong to this time. The trumpet shall seem to belong to the tribulation time, and the "last trumpet" shall usher in the glorious announcement: "The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ."

This object of the divine judgments during this dark period, is to bring men to repentance and avert the more fearful judgments of His appearing. These judgments are not altogether in vain. At last "the remnant are affrighted" and "give glory to the God of Heaven." There would thus seem to be some cases of repentance and salvation even through the tribulation times, and these shall doubtless share the resurrection and glory of the saints who shall descend with Christ.

during this period will be the restored Jews. Probably they will be converted to God at the commencement, and will naturally be the objects of the world's hate and persecution, and at last will be assailed by the whole power of the nations in one closing and terrible conflict, which will be brought to a close by the appearing of the Saviour, and the destruction of their enemies.

Another event which will also signalize the close of this period will be the fall of Babylon—that is, of Rome. It is one of the series of events given in Revelation as just preceding the revelation of Christ, and it will probably be the closing catastrophe of the series of God's judgments. The days shall be shortened for the elect's sake, and shall at last suddenly be brought to a close.

But may God grant that we shall "escape all these things that shall come to pass, and stand before the Son of Man," and that our Lord shall keep us "from the hour of temptation that shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." Amen.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1889.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Welcome Innovation in Presidential Appointments has been made by President Harrison. Both the political parties have adopted in their platforms the principle of choosing for the Governors and other officers of Territories men actually resident in those Territories. Heretofore Presidents have ignored this principle, though cognizant of party pledges. President Harrison, however, has been guided by it in the nominations he has made so far. A continuance of this course will be gratifying to the citizens of the Territories, and its justice and wisdom will be recognized by the country at large.

The Nomination of Four Ministers for Foreign courts furnished the chief subject of political discussion last week. That the selections should give satisfaction to the whole party could not, of course, be expected, for the President has been beset by crowds of importunate men urging rival claims, some of whom must necessarily be disappointed. Doubtless this fact accounts for much of the unfavorable criticism which the nominations have called forth, and the same fact would probably have led to similar criticism had the President nominated other men. The most important of the nominations was that of Whitelaw Reid to be Minister to France. This is in many respects a better choice than if he had been nominated to the English mission, which was the nomination generally expected. Diplomatic business can be conducted with greater advantage to both nations when the representative of one nation has not excited personal prejudice against himself in the other. Mr. Reid wrote so acrimoniously in his newspaper against England during the presidential campaign that he would not have been well received in London, though almost any man representing the United States would be sure of a courteous reception in his representative character. In Paris there will be no prejudice against him, and his residence there will therefore be more congenial. The nomination of Colonel Fred Grant to the Austrian mission is understood to be a tribute to the memory of his distinguished father rather than an expression of confidence in himself. The Government has very little business of importance with Austria, so the Colonel's incorrigible faculty for blundering will have but slight opportunity for doing mischief. Our representative at the court of Sweden and Norway is to be Mr. William W. Thomas, Jr., of Maine. This is an excellent nomination. Mr. Thomas has occupied the same position before, and acquitted himself with credit. He is, besides, married to a Swedish lady, and is familiar with the language and the affairs of the court to which he goes. Mr. Samuel R. Thayer, of Minnesota, who was nominated for Minister to the Netherlands, is not so well known to the public, as he has never held office before, but his fellow-citizens in Minneapolis hold him in high esteem, and prominent men in the Republican party, who know him well, vouch for his fitness for his duties in the strongest terms.

The Investigation into the Ceiling Scandal at Albany, N. Y., has been carefully conducted with the evident intention of shielding prominent men whom public opinion holds responsible for the wrongdoing. It has, however, shed light on several points which the citizens will do well to remember. The most important of these came out in the examinations on March 21. It appeared, from the evidence of the Attorney-General, that the law under which frauds such as it is alleged have been committed in the matter of the ceiling should be punished is ineffective. Whether designedly, or through legislative incapacity, the law cannot reach a contractor who has drawn money on false vouchers, or who has charged for more labor and material than has been used under his contract. We are not sure whether the legislators who framed this law are most sensitive as to their character for integrity or their character for skill, but whatever may be the true reason for the state of the law, there can be no question as to its being a bad one, nor as to the advisability of sending to the Legislature in future, men who can and will make a better law.

An Important Question Comes Before the United States Supreme Court this week for decision. It involves the constitutionality of the Chinese Exclusion act, and the admission to the country of about three thousand Chinamen depends on the decision. The appellant in the case is a Chinaman, who in June, 1877, left the United States to visit his native country. He applied for and obtained a certificate authorizing his return. But about a week before he arrived on our shores the President had signed the exclusion bill, and the Chinaman's certificate was declared void. His case is now being made a test case, and the Supreme Court is asked to decide whether the bill is constitutional. On the side of the Government it is argued that the admission of Chinamen is a privilege which could be revoked at any time; and on the side of the Chinaman it is contended that his certificate was a contract the Government is bound to fulfil.

The Death of Mr. Stanley Matthews, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which took place on March 22, removed an official whose name at one time was a signal for fierce contention in whatever company it was uttered. When President Hayes nominated him for the Supreme Court in 1881, the Senate held back confirmation and it was given with manifest reluctance when President Garfield renewed the nomination. Mr. Matthews had displayed eminent legal ability which would have been quite sufficient to prove that he was eligible for the high office, but he had taken so prominent a part in the proceedings of the Electoral Commission of 1876 that opposition to his confirmation was inevitable. Mr. Matthews was sixty-five years of age. He was a native of Cincinnati, and was all his life identified with the State of Ohio. He occupied several important judicial positions in that State, and for about a year and a half was a member of the United States Senate in succession to John Sherman when that statesman was Secretary of the Treasury. He had been in ill health for a long time, but it was only three weeks ago that he was totally laid aside from duty.

Another Manifesto by Mr. Chamberlain on the Irish question was published last week. In a letter to the people of Birmingham, whom he represents in Parliament, he says that the time has arrived when the Government should prove its readiness to propose a substitute for Mr. Gladstone's rejected Irish bills. He thinks that if a large and final land purchase measure were passed with the consent of all parties, it would immensely lessen the difficulty of giving Ireland a liberal local government measure. He indicates that his land scheme is a measure to enable tenants to become owners on liberal terms. It is substantially a scheme which he has previously explained. The local government project, which he thinks should follow it, has also been defined, but it did not receive the approval of the Irish members. The issue of the manifesto is not important in itself, as it contains nothing new, but it is significant because it is an indication that one of the shrewdest politicians in England perceives that public opinion is veering round in favor of granting concession to Ireland.

The French Cabinet has Gained the Approval of both the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies to the action against the Boulangist organization known as the Patriotic League. It is admitted that the law which is to be put in force against the League has long been regarded as a dead letter, and that many other societies exist in open violation of it. The Government, however, defend their invidious action in singling out the Patriotic League for prosecution on the ground of public danger. They contend that the League has repeatedly shown itself ready to go to any length, even to resort to violence. They allege that it is an army of more than two hundred thousand men which has been organizing itself in Paris, ready to rise at the first signal. The judicial proceedings that have been commenced have in part the object of collecting evidence on which may be founded an indictment against Boulanger and the leaders of the Boulangist party, to be tried by the Senate sitting as a court of justice.

An Important Disclosure Discreditable to Bismarck is made in a book just issued by the British Government. The book contains the diplomatic correspondence relating to Samoan affairs which has passed between England and Germany during the past four years. The dispatches show that England has been throughout in cordial accord with America, and that she declined to accede to Germany's request for assistance and co-operation in the restoring of order in Samoa until she had learned the American Government's views on the subject. On January 29 last Lord Salisbury complained to Count Von Hatzfeldt, German Ambassador in London, concerning Prince Bismarck's statement in the Reichstag that in Samoa Germany and England were "advancing hand in hand." The British Prime-Minister said that the views of the two countries were identical as far as the future government of Samoa was concerned, but not otherwise.

Events in Serbia are Being Watched with apprehension by European statesmen. The little country, insignificant as it is, occupies an important strategic position. It is feared that the long-standing jealousy between Austria and Russia may culminate in that land. The abdication of King Milan is clearly a triumph for Russia, Russian influences having made his position untenable. If, as now seems probable, Queen Natalie, the wife of Milan, recently unjustly divorced from him, returns and becomes the guardian of the boy king, Russian influences will be paramount, Natalie being under Russian protection. Milan anticipated her return, and warned her that if she came, the army, of which he retains command, would be arrayed against her. Press correspondents in Serbia aver that Milan has been promised Austrian support in a civil war, so that Russia and Austria would be indirectly engaged, the one on the side of the wife and the other on the side of the husband. All the efforts of diplomacy are now being directed to avert such a conflict, which would probably involve other Powers.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Christian Convention and Bible Institute, to be conducted by D. L. Moody, in Chicago, for two months from April 4, will open at 10 A. M. on that day in the Chicago Avenue Church, corner Chicago and La Salle avenues. Mr. Moody will lecture on the twelve fundamental doctrines of the Bible; Rev. W. G. Moorhead, D. D., on Systematic Bible Study and kindred topics; and Rev. W. W. Clark, of Brooklyn, N. Y., on Methods of Bible Study; others will lecture upon special themes. The afternoons and evenings will be devoted to practical Christian work, under the direction of Mr. Moody. Already quite a large number of churches have applied for Special Services. Several evangelists have signified their intention of being present, so that Mr. Moody will have practical and experienced workmen to assist and direct the labors of the beginners. Board can be had for from $5.00 to $8.00 per week. No charge will be made for instruction; the students will pay their own expenses for board and incidentals. The Evangelization Society cannot furnish employment, nor does it promise any financial assistance whatever. A list of boarding-places and further particulars can be obtained of F. G. Ensign, 154 Madison Street, Chicago, by enclosing a two-cent stamp. No reduced rates are expected on the railroads.

An Example of Christian Magnanimity has been recently given by Mr. A. M. Mackay, the intrepid missionary in Uganda, whose portrait appeared in this journal on February 20. Mr. Mackay was kept a prisoner for many months by King Mwanga, who frequently threatened to kill him as he had killed Bishop Hannington. King Mwanga is now himself a prisoner, and is being threatened with death by his Arab captors. In his terror he has made an abject appeal for help to his former prisoner, Mackay, imploring him to come to Magu, where he is imprisoned, and intercede with the Arabs for his release. He offers to go to Europe, or to do whatever Mackay may wish. "Take me anywhere you like, or slay me if you like" was his message. At last accounts Mr. Mackay was setting out to see him, and return good for evil.

A Protest Against a Government Order is being made in the press. The rear-admiral commanding the North Atlantic station has directed the captain of the Yantic to prepare to return to Hayti. The Yantic was one of the vessels sent a few months ago to Hayti, to demand the surrender of the steamer Haytian Republic. On her return voyage yellow fever broke out on board, and two of the crew died of the disease. Since then the vessel has been thoroughly fumigated, and it may be assumed that the Government think there is no danger in sending her back. Specialists say, however, that when yellow fever has once broken out on a wooden vessel, it is impossible to destroy the germs of that disease. Naval officers are of the opinion that it is absolutely wrong to send her to a climate where she will be exposed to every influence favorable to the propagation of the germs. It may be hoped that the protest will lead to the order being countermanded. So long as it is not certain that the germs are exterminated, it would be deplorably imprudent to subject the ship to exactly the conditions which develop such germs. This is generally recognized, but too often the principle is disregarded in far more momentous cases. Young people in whose nature are the germs of evil, are placed in positions involving fierce temptation, if in those positions there is a prospect of worldly advancement. (Rom. 14:13.)

A Coat Cost a Life at a Fire in New York on March 19. Four German bakers were at work in a bakery on Third Avenue, when one of them, who was frying at the furnace, accidentally tipped a pan of fat into the fire. Instantly the flames shot out, and the room was speedily burning. The fire worked its way upward, and when it reached the elevator shaft, it roared through it like a chimney. The alarm was given to the tenants of the upper floors in time for them to make their escape. Some who had not risen ran out in their night-clothes. The four bakers were the first to rush out, but one of them who had left his coat behind, thought he would be able to get it. He returned in spite of the warnings of his companions. He was seen no more alive. When the fire was extinguished by the firemen, his body was found in the bakery. He had succeeded in finding his coat, but was unable to make his way out of the burning building. He had fallen down, probably suffocated by the smoke, and perished there—the only person in the building whose life was lost in the fire. It will be so with many who to secure worldly possessions, put their souls in peril. The man who risked his life to save a coat, is not so foolish as he who risks his soul to gain a fortune. (Matt. 16:26.)

A Sick Man's Unsuccessful Efforts to Gain admission to a hospital were followed by his death in Brooklyn, N. Y., on March 16. He attended the inauguration ceremonies in Washington on March 4, and caught cold while standing in the rain watching the procession. On his return to his home in Brooklyn the cold grew worse. Two friends who saw him a few days later were convinced that he was suffering from pneumonia, and as he was a bachelor advised him to go to a hospital. A hack was brought, and the man was driven to the Homeopathic Hospital, but he could not be admitted there, as the institution was already full, even the emergency beds being occupied. He was then taken to the Brooklyn Hospital, but that, too, was full. He lost heart with this second disappointment, and would try no further. He had a cousin living in the city to whom he went, and was welcomed, but the exposure had given a fatal impetus to his disease, and he died that night. No such calamity can happen to the sin-sick soul who seeks to enter the refuge God has provided. He is sure of admission if he seeks aright, and sure of being cured when admitted. (John 6:37.)

An Interesting Electrical Experiment was witnessed last week in Boston, Mass., by a party of gentlemen concerned in metal working. The manager of an electric company, who invited them to be present, said that he had discovered a simple and marvellously effective method of welding metals by electricity. Two bars of iron, each two inches in diameter, were brought together so that the ends exactly met. An electric current was then run through them, and when the current was established the ends were slightly separated. The resistance of the air to the current produced intense heat, and the ends of the bars soon showed white heat; they were then gently united and the current was shut off. When they cooled it was found that the two bars were firmly united, with scarcely a mark of the join. The same work was done with copper and brass, with the same result. To demonstrate the completeness of the weld the iron bars were bent until one of them broke, but it did not break at the weld. The point of junction was thus shown to be stronger than any other point of the bar. That is the case with the living union which takes place between Christ and the soul that trusts in Him. Affliction and trial may come upon the Christian so heavily that he breaks down under them, but if he has really been united with his Lord, that union is never sundered, neither on this side the grave nor the other. (Rom. 8:35-39.)

A Man's Life Was Saved by His Teeth in a severe storm, according to a report in the Sentinel, of Eastport, Me. It states that a fishing schooner was anchored in the harbor, but when the gale blew up in the night she was dragged from her moorings, and went adrift. The captain heard that she had gone ashore at Spruce Island Point. He went there with all speed and found his ship. He climbed on board, and with his own hands hoisted a sail. The vessel soon floated off, but no sooner was she in deep water than she began to sink. She had injured her keel on the rocks, and filled rapidly. The captain jumped into the boat which was made fast to the stern of the schooner, and tried to untie the line which connected it with the sinking vessel. But the schooner was going down so fast that it drew the line tight, and the knots resisted all the captain's efforts to loosen them. He had no knife with him to cut the rope, and as the boat was fast disappearing below the surface, and himself with it, he grabbed the rope with a splendid set of teeth with which nature had furnished him, and by dint of vigorous gnawing, finally succeeded in cutting in two a nine-strand rope and freeing his boat, but not until his head had been drawn under water a number of times in his efforts to cut the rope. It is doubtful if under any other circumstances he could have gnawed his way through the rope, but when he was being dragged to his death he would make extraordinary exertions. Such a supreme effort is sometimes needed to save a soul from perdition. When evil associations, and evil habits are dragging a man down, no effort to cut himself free ought to be too arduous or too painful for him to make. (Matt. 5:29.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Chicago has now one hundred Societies of Christian Endeavor.

President Harrison took the inaugural oath upon the family Bible brought from his home in Indianapolis.

The Rev. S. H. Pratt and Mr. R. M. Birdsall have been holding successful revival services at Northampton, Mass.

Four hundred and eighty-two works on theology and religion were published in the United States during the year 1888.

A Young Men's Christian Association for French-speaking young men was opened last week at 128 West 23d Street, New York.

The theatre services in Philadelphia, conducted by the Rev. J. E. Johnson, continue to be crowded, and will be carried on as long as funds will permit.

In Delaware the W. C. T. U. is working to secure legislative action raising the age of protection for girls from the present legal period of seven years to eighteen.

Gipsy Smith commenced work in Long Island City on March 17. The pastor, Rev. N. B. Randall, writes that it is being greatly blessed. Thirty-five conversions were reported at the outset.

The Oregon Legislature, through the influence of the W. C. T. U., has voted an annual appropriation of $2,500 to the work of the "Refuge Home" for fallen women located at Portland.

The committee on transportation for the delegates to the World's Sunday-School Convention in London, in July, have secured the Cunard steamship Bohnia as a special transport. She will sail from New York on June 19, and will be due at Liverpool on June 28.

An all-day prayer service was held in Washington, D. C., on March 19, to pray that the President might be divinely guided in the choice of Commissioners of the District. Commissioners are needed who will enforce the Sunday-closing law, grant no new liquor licenses, and suppress disorderly houses.

The Rev. B. Fay Mills is holding union meetings in Springfield, Mass., amid much expectancy and promise of a great blessing. On Sunday, March 17, the large City Hall was twice crowded to its utmost capacity. Mr. Greenwood has charge of the singing. Daily services are held, and the interest is increasing.

A widespread revival is in progress in Sacramento, Cal. Mr. A. J. Bell, of Chicago, is holding services at the Tenth Street M. E. Church, Messrs Clagett and Avis at the First Baptist, and Mr. C. S. Mason, the Young Men's Evangelist, at the Calvary Baptist Church. All are largely attended and many souls are being saved.

Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea is holding services in Picton, Ont., Canada. The Times of that town says that they are crowded to overflowing, and there are no unconcerned hearers. At the men's meeting on Sunday afternoon, twelve hundred men and boys succeeded in getting into the building. The number of inquirers is large.

The Rev. C. H. Yatman's meetings in Youngstown, Ohio, have stirred up the young men to organize a Young Men's Christian Association. Efforts are being made to raise a fund for the erection of a suitable building. Six young men have, through the blessing of God on Mr. Yatman's labors, been led to consecrate their lives to the Christian ministry.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings in the Academy of Music, Pottsville, Pa., were crowded to excess on Sunday, March 17. At the afternoon meeting for women only, there were many affecting scenes. Upward of one hundred women of all classes made profession of faith. At the evening meeting for men only, there was a similar blessing. During the week two services were held each day—the afternoon service in the Evangelical church, and the evening in the Methodist church.

BREAKFAST WITH JESUS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

Jesus Makes the Meal—His Concern for His Hungry Disciples—Workers Refreshed by Communion—I. The Importance of a Meal with Jesus—They Were in Need—Their Night of Fruitless Toil—Converts Taken and Counted—Frogs Among Them—A Preparation for Searching—For Receiving a Commission—II. Jesus Acting as Host—Preparing the Feast—Waiting at Table—Showing Himself—III. The Provision—Two Kinds—Natural and Supernatural—IV. How the Guests Behaved.

"Jesus saith unto them, Come and dine. And none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord."

Or, as we have it in the Revised Version,

"Jesus saith unto them, Come and break your fast. And none of the disciples durst enquire of him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord."—John 21:12.

THE Lord Jesus is thoughtful of bodily wants. In His earlier days He fed multitudes of people, on two grand occasions, with bread and fish. And now that He has died and risen from the dead, and is in the body of His glory, He still thinks of the hungering bodies of men, and calls to the fishermen, "Children have ye any meat?" Finding that they have nothing, He makes a breakfast for them.

Our Lord and Saviour was particularly mindful in this case, of the wants of His own people. These seven apostles were Supplied by His Care.

If any of you are in needy and trying circumstances, catch at this fact, and be encouraged. He that said to the seven, "Come and break your fast," will not forget you in the time of your need. On your part, now is the time for the exercise of faith; and on His part, now is the season for the display of His power. If you look to your fellow-men, perhaps they may fail to help you: they are far too apt to give the cold shoulder to those who are not well-to-do; but if you look to Him,

"In some way or other the Lord will provide."

I cannot tell how, any more than I can tell you how our Lord lighted that fire of coals, or how He procured the fish which was broiling on the fire; but there was the fire, and there was the fish; and so, in the Lord's own way, even in the mount of the Lord, it shall be seen that the Lord will provide. "Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." He that taught you to say, "Give us this day our daily bread" did not teach you an empty phrase. O ye whose need presses so closely as even to make you acquainted with hunger, behold how Jesus pities you, and look to Him to aid you.

The Essential Thing.

Go a step further. As Jesus is so careful of the condition of His people that He will have their bodies fed, we may be sure that He will have their souls nourished. I said to myself, as I considered my return among you, "The first thing we will do when I get home shall be to feed the servants of God, that so they may be in good working order." Our Lord began this third manifestation of Himself, not with prayer, but with provender. Much had to be said and done: but they must breakfast first. They were to be questioned, rebuked, instructed, commissioned, warned; but they must first be fed. The essential thing that morning was a fire of coals, and broiled fish and bread; for they must be put into good condition, and then they would be ready to hear what their Lord should say to them. Now, if it was so with the body, how much more is it so with the soul? I want you, therefore, this morning, to ask the Lord to spread a table for you in the wilderness.

Many things call for your earnest attention; but it will be poor haste if you rush to work without refreshing the inner man. Pause a while, and feast with your Lord, in order that you may be able to attend to your pressing duties. If you had a tree to fell, you would count it no loss of time first to sharpen your axe. When the axe is sharp, then the tree will come down all the sooner: sharpen, therefore, the axe of your mind. This morning have nothing to do but to attend to the commissariat of your soul.

I. First, I shall invite you to see the importance of a feast with Jesus. It was peculiarly because they were in a needy condition. Jesus does not like to see His servants wet and cold, and hungry; and so He provides for the removal of these discomforts. Depend upon it, what Jesus does not like to see is not good for us. It is not well for us to be unhappy. If, therefore, you feel, this morning, in your inmost souls, uncomfortable, and much out of sorts, your Lord does not wish you to be so. The thoughts of your own misery will hinder your thoughts of Him, and prevent your rendering Him good service. My Master bids me, this morning, see to it that all hands are provided with good cheer. Gladly, therefore, do I invite you to the fire of coals which is furnished by His glowing love. Cheerfully do I set before you the holy food of sacred truth furnished by His word; and I would thus fulfil His command to me, "Feed my sheep."

Needful to These Men,

Besides, they were weary with a night's fruitless toil. As I told you in reading, it was "night" and "nothing" while Jesus was away. Have I not before me some servants of God who have not seen any good following their exertions of late? They have fished for men, but the nets have remained empty. It is dreary work, toiling all night and taking nothing. I know this, because I know still better the reverse of it. Oh, it is a blessed thing to have a successful season by the little river of retirement, when one is away from the city!

it has seemed to me that the fish kept coming up to my line, and biting at my hook, though I had not of purpose baited it for any. The Lord sent me persons to receive a blessing, and they had a quiet word, and went on their way rejoicing. Alas! it is not always so. You may have a widespread net cast into the great sea, and no end of fishes all around you, and yet you may take nothing: that night's work yielded nothing but splash and haul, disappointment and fatigue. If you are in that condition, you evidently need encouragement. Times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord will be your present want. The Saviour calls to you, "Come and breakfast. Leave the boat and the nets, and forget the night's vain toil, and come and commune with me." Weary worker, worried and weeping, cease your complaining, and now come to the fire and the food which Jesus provides for you.

You will remind me that, before the breakfast, the disciples had taken a great number of fish, and had counted them. Just so; and that is another reason for calling them to feast with Jesus. Catching fish is a fine business, but being fed is equally needful. No fisherman can live on catching and counting. It is a very deceptive thing for a man to sustain his faith upon the success of his labors. Our tendency in a revival is to rejoice over converts, and count them: "a hundred and fifty and three." It is not wrong to count your converts if Christ gives them to you: the awkward part of it is, that you are apt to count in with the fish a number of frogs—I mean a sort of convert that Jesus never sent. You may if you please, count every convert, and say, "a hundred and fifty and three;" but do not think that this will nourish your own soul. The successful evangelist, if he attempts to live on his work, will suck up the wind. Again, dear friends, I think it was a very necessary thing that they should break their fast, for the Lord Jesus their hearts. "When they had dined": notice that, not till then, Jesus questioned Peter. When they had breakfasted, "Jesus saith, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me?" "When they had breakfasted," not before. He would not deal with Peter, or any of them, while they had empty stomachs. I beg you to feed well this morning, because you will have to be overhauled before long, and it will be well to have heart to bear it. Truth will be preached to you another day which will blow quite through you like a mighty wind—truth which will burn as an oven, and like a refiner's fire. Prepare your soul for the hour of trial, when the business of the hour will be to answer the question, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me?"

Remember, also, that they were about to receive a commission: they were to be told to feed Christ's lambs and sheep. But I think I hear you say, "That commission, like the examination, was directed to Peter." I know it; but I am also sure that when the Lord said to Peter, "Lovest thou Me?"

to them all. The Lord was going to give them a blessed work to do, and therefore He would put them into working order before He allotted it to them. O brothers and sisters, it may seem a very small thing for you to feed your own selves, but it is not so. I would have you strong yourselves, that you may labor for others. You cannot be made a blessing to those around you till you are blest yourselves.

Once more, our Lord was going to give to one of them a warning, and by that one to hint much the same heritage of trials to the others. "Another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not." Crucifixion awaited Peter, and a martyr's death in some form awaited all those who were present, except John. This the Master lets them know; but He does not mention it till they have dined. Do not reckon upon an easy journey between here and heaven. If you do, you will be mistaken; for "in the world ye shall have tribulation." But while we give you that warning, we invite you to come and feed on heavenly bread, and refresh your souls with those spiritual luxuries whereby men are made ready for labor and suffering.

II. Secondly, I want you to see

Jesus Acting as Host.

It was Jesus who cried to them, "Children have ye any meat?" It was He that said, "Bring of the fish which ye have now caught." It is He that gives the invitation, "Come and break your fast." Jesus is master of the feast. Is it not wonderful that the holy Lord should have communion with His faulty followers? Yet He will breakfast with us—with us who doubted Him, as Thomas did; with us who denied Him, as Peter did; with us who forsook Him and fled, as all the rest did. He had risen from the dead, and He did not need to eat, yet did He still have familiar fellowship with sinful man. On one occasion He ate a piece of a broiled fish and of a honeycomb; and I suppose that on this occasion He also ate with them; one does not ask others to come and dine, and then himself refrain from eating. He communed with them by that bread and by that fish. It was wonderful condescension. Come along with you, you child of God, conscious of your gross unworthiness; come, for He invites you now to feast with Himself. This shall be your nourishment not alone the food which He prepares for you, as His own company.

Notice, that Jesus, as the host,

Prepared the Feast.

We shall never know how that fire of coals was kindled; some speak confidently of it as the work of angels; but why introduce angels where they are not needed? Where did He get the fish? All sorts of idle speculations have been raised about His having bought it from a passing boat. There is no need of such inventions. Doubtless both fire and fish were the products of creative power. Dear friends, your soul can never feed except upon what Jesus has prepared for you. His flesh is meat indeed; but there is no other meat for souls. There was never food yet for a true heart but it came from Him. "How can this man give us His flesh to eat?" said they of old; but that is exactly what He does. All that He gives to us of spiritual nourishment is of His own preparing.

What is equally wonderful to me is this, that, after the Lord had prepared it, He Himself was The Waiter at the Feast.

Read verse 13: "Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise." When there are seven at table, a host might well be justified in saying, "Dear friends, you are welcome to all that is before you; pray help yourselves." But we cannot help ourselves; He who prepares the feast must also bring the food to us. "Jesus then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise." Only one serving man, and that the Lord Himself! O Master, we know there is good spiritual food in Thy Word, but we are not able to appropriate it. Come thou, and Thyself lay home the promise to the heart.

All the while He was doing this He showed Himself. "This is now the third time that Jesus showed Himself to His disciples." Jesus feeding us is Jesus revealed. If He had stretched out His hand for them to examine the nail-prints, they would not have seen Him so well as when that hand gave them food. Oh, if the Lord Jesus will come to you individually, as I pray He may, and bring you heavenly food this morning, you will see Him—see Him with eyes full of tears. Are there not times with you when divine truth comes home to you in such a sweet, comforting, nourishing way, that you have said, "It is the Lord; He is Himself the sum and substance of His own blessed gospel"? This is your morning's portion: do not miss it. "He showed Himself."

III. Now see the provision. I have tried to beckon you in to the feast, and I have also tried to point out our Host. Now, attentively regard

The Provisions.

There are two parts. First, there was what He had mysteriously prepared—the fish laid upon the coals; and, secondly, what He had graciously given; for He said, "Bring of the fish which ye have now caught." It was the same sort of fish, no doubt; but it came in two ways.

First, let us note the mysteriously prepared provision. See the fish which is broiling on the coals! Mysterious fish! Mysterious coals! Feed now with all your hearts upon the mystery of everlasting love.

Here is another fish of the kind found only in the sea of mysterious love—I point you to His effectual atonement. He has finished His life-work for you, and poured forth the price of your redemption, minting it from His own heart. He has washed you from your sins in His own blood. He hath made you kings and priests unto God.

He Has Bought You

with a price, so that you are not your own. The dying Christ bore your penalty: the living Christ has ensured your acceptance and your immortality. "Because I live," saith He, "ye shall live also."

But the feast was also made of what the Lord had graciously given, and they had drawn out of the deep. The Lord has caused us to obtain many precious things by His own Spirit; and these we have made our own, taking them in our net and dragging them to shore. Let us feed on mercies experienced. Just now to myself these are very many—"a hundred and fifty and three." I can scarcely count the favors the Lord has given me of late. My net is not broken, but I wonder it is not; for the draught of benefits is so great; He daily loadeth me with benefits. I desire abundantly to utter the memory of His great goodness. Cannot you do the same, and in the memory find a feast for love?

The provision on the lone lake shore was more than enough for seven men, however hungry they might be. Was it not? They might eat as much as they liked without any fear of exhausting the supply. Now, dear friends, try for a minute or two to dwell upon the wonders of God's truth and grace to you. Think of what He did in your conversion; what He has done in the time of temptation; how He supplied your needs; and how He has given you enjoyments of His love. All this will be to you a fire of coals, and fish drawn from the sea.

IV. But, lastly, see

themselves. I hope if you are fed well, you will behave in the same way. These guests of our Saviour, we find, "durst not ask Him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord." When a soul draws near to Jesus, its words are few or none. That devotion which must always show itself by shouting may be very genuine, but it is to be feared that it is superficial. Deep waters run silently. Great feeling is dumb; there is a frost of the mouth when there is a thaw of the soul. Words are often a wall between our spirit and the Great Spirit. A big mouthful of words is fine food for fools. Some preachers seem to think that saints can feed on their eloquence, but they need more substantial meat.

As there were no words, so there could be no doubtful questions. Whenever a man gets away from communion with Christ, he begins to ask a host of questions. Persons who have no religion have always a selection of religious questions, varying from the stupidity of "Who was Cain's wife?" onward to, "What will man become by evolution?" When a soul has drawn near to Jesus, and has been fed by Him, it is no more troubled with doubts than a man at the equator is bitten by frost. "I believe in the Bible," said one. "How can you do that?" sneered another. "Because I know the Author," was the reply. If you are walking in the light with your Lord, questions and doubts are heard no more, but you adore in restfulness of soul, "knowing that it is the Lord."

They ate the bread and fish that morning, I doubt not in Silent Self-Humiliation.

Peter looked, with tears in his eyes, at that fire of coals, remembering how he stood and warmed himself when he denied his Master. Thomas stood there, wondering that he should have dared to ask such proofs of a fact most clear. All of them felt that they should shrink into nothing in His divine presence, since they had behaved so ill.

Yet were they also silent for joy. Did you ever feel the bliss of dying to self? As you near the vanishing point of self, the glory of the Lord dawns on you with immeasurable splendor. To grow bigger, and bigger, and bigger, until you fill the halls of fame, and your name echoes round the world, is the ambition of the vain, and it is an abomination. But to grow less and less, till the Lord God is all in all, is the joy of saints.

They were silent in wonder as they gazed on the risen One. He was all over wonder to them—a world of beauties and of miracles. When He fed them, when He gave them the bread, when He gave them the fish, it was a melting season. They remembered how He washed their feet; but then He was in His state of humiliation; and they marvelled yet more that now He was risen He would still be among them "as one that serveth." They were dumb with surprise, and gratitude, and love.

Brethren, have you fed? Have you breakfasted with Jesus? If so, I am well content. But I would remind you that when you come hither again, you must hear what your Lord has to say by way of question and command; for, "when they had dined," began. It must not be with us as with Israel: "The people sat down to eat, and to drink, and rose up to play"; but we rise to work, and suffer, and to go far towards heaven in the strength of the meat we have enjoyed.

Some one will ask, "Have you not a word for the unconverted this morning?" Indeed, I have something better than words. When we set forth the provisions of grace before the godly, we are really inviting poor hungry sinners. The sight of food is a fine creator of appetite. I do hope some people will feel an appetite coming to them this morning, and will cry, "I long to feed on heavenly bread, and to have my heart refreshed in the presence of the Lord Jesus." O poor heart, believe in Jesus, and He is yours! Children of God, just as you can enjoy Christ, and show that enjoyment in your lives, you will be fascinating others to your Lord, and thus by your means I shall not have preached in vain to the unconverted. The Lord send His blessing upon this word, for His name's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

DRIVEN TO GOD BY SORROW.*

THE old minister loved to preach; but he seldom used much of that order of talk to his son. Once in a while the impulse came over him so strongly that he could not refrain from speaking of that which was uppermost in his thought.

"My boy, you are working too hard," he said one morning when Edgar was hurrying downtown. That was when he was East on his second visit, about five years after his son's marriage. "You are both working too hard. You work beyond all reason. What do you think? Is this sort of life going to pay? . . . No doubt, Edgar, you are planning plenty of good to be done some time or other; but what the Lord wants is you, yourself, now—your heart's confidence and love. And I'm sure He will have you before many years; but I want you to come back before you are driven by sorrow."

"O dear! father," said Edgar, crowding his feet into his rubbers, with an impatient air, "I wish you wouldn't be forever preaching at me."

There was plenty of loving dignity in the answer, "I think, my son, I am pretty careful what I say to you."

"Why, yes, of course—pardon me, father. But then I know what you're thinking about all the time."

"And praying for," said the minister; "and I shall have the answer, even though it comes in a night of storms." And so it did come ten years later.

Edgar Elberton had gone on prospering and to prosper. But one wintry day a bolt fell from the heavens, that seemed to shiver the world. Rob, his brave, beautiful Rob, lay before him—dead!

So while he sat beside his dead son, stunned and helpless, the light that had shone down into his father's place of prayer came into his soul, also; and he saw the rocks upon which his tilting craft was driving.

The text of one of his father's old sermons came to the surface of his thought, and stayed there persistently, like a floating, drowned, reproachful face: "But they that will be rich, fall into temptation, and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition." In the new light that seemed to make its way through his soul slowly and painfully, like the warmth of a fire threading the nerves of a frozen limb, he saw that in his wicked mistake he was losing the best of this life, as well as of that which is to come. He had been bending to the business oars like a galley slave, while all of his, and Anna's plans had gone by the board. He saw, in the sharp and smiting light, how worn and pinched was the face of his once bonnie bride.

Besides keeping up with his financial schemes, and the claims of society, she had to do the work of both parents for the last ten years. But she had done her work well—that was one comfort. . . . She had kept her boy as tender of soul, and pure of thought as any girl could be. Dear little mother heart! How could she live without her child? Yet she seemed braver far than he under this storm of sorrow. He even leaned upon her for help. She had bent, but he was broken.

While his heart rose in rebellion against the loss of what his boy would have become to him, he saw that which he had long shut his eyes from seeing—what he ought to be, and was not to his own father. Hurried letters, generous gifts, an occasional flying visit, are a pitiful substitute for the loving care due from a son.

Poor men, wage-workers, with families dependent upon their day's work, might be obliged to neglect wife, children, and father as he had done; but he was altogether without excuse. He wondered that his selfishness had not made his heart as hard as the nether mill-stone. For a moment he was almost glad of the blow that had shown him that he was not past feeling.

From this self-reproach, his thought was led into the deeper depths, and he began to see the heinousness of his neglect of the loving Heavenly Father. A sense of sin settled upon his soul, quite outweighing his grief. Beside his dead child, he repeated the promise he had made when the small trembling hand nestled in his for the last time, to seek again the faith of his own childhood.

MR. JOSEPH THOMPSON.

The Explorer of Morocco.

EARLY last year the Royal Geographical Society of England decided to undertake the organization of an expedition into Morocco to study the physical features of the country with its fauna and flora. The expedition was placed in charge of the distinguished naturalist, whose portrait appears on this page. Mr. Thompson has now returned with a report that adds materially to scientific knowledge, and is interesting geographers and naturalists all over the world. In the course of his journey he ascended and crossed the Atlas mountains at six different points, collecting specimens, and making photographs of the most important scenes. The work was done at imminent peril, for not only did he travel by paths never before trodden by Europeans, and therefore in constant danger from natural causes, but was several times in jeopardy from fanatical natives.

When at Casablanca in October last, and about to undertake another journey into the interior, Mr. Thompson was suddenly summoned home by the East African Company to take the head of an expedition for the contemplated relief of Emin Pasha; but that project having been abandoned, Mr. Thompson is now preparing a more elaborate account of his journey to the Atlas Mountains, which will shortly be published. He has also, besides contributing papers on Africa to several magazines, produced, in conjunction with Miss Harris Smith, a work called "Ulu," in which are embodied some of his studies of African character, and some sketches of tropical scenery.

This is Mr. Thompson's fourth exploration in Africa. In 1882 he explored the Rovuma in the employ of the Sultan of Zanzibar. In 1884 he made a thorough examination of Masai land, penetrating to Mount Kenaia, and in 1885 he went across Central Soudan on a diplomatic mission for the British Government.

Mr. Thompson is a Scotchman, and is thirty-one years old. He obtained his early education in the parish school of his native place, from which he went to the University of Edinburgh. There a predilection for natural history which he had early displayed, and which he evidenced by collecting fossils and geological specimens in the ravines and mountain-gorges, in the neighborhood of his home, led him to enter the science classes, in several of which he gained honors, carrying off the gold medal in geology and zoölogy.

A RESCUED SLAVE.

THE picture on this page is taken from the photograph of a boy who was one of a party of slaves kidnapped by the Arabs in Africa. The British ship Boadicea, one of the combined English and German blockading squadron, caught sight of a dhow leaving the East African coast. She gave chase and captured her. The little vessel of only four tons burden was found to be crowded with negroes captured in the Nyassa district, no less than forty-six of them being packed on board. The condition of the boy, which may be inferred from the picture, was one of extreme emaciation, and was a specimen of the condition of the whole party. Their persons showed not only that they had been almost starved, but numberless bruises and stripes proved that they had been brutally beaten. The poor creatures, when liberated, were placed under the charge of missionaries.

CARDINAL LAVIGERIE.

WHEN the Protestant Evangelical Alliance is found supporting a Cardinal of the Roman Catholic Church we may be sure that he is engaged in some work of a supremely beneficent character. It must be a cause of mighty and transcending import that could unite two such colleagues. That cause is opposition to the cruel and iniquitous traffic which the Arabs are carrying on in Africa in human flesh. Cardinal Lavigerie, whose portrait appears on this page, is Archbishop of Algiers, and is sixty-four years of age. He has recently made a tour of Europe with the object of informing the public of the horrors he has witnessed in Africa, and inducing European governments to interfere for the protection of the helpless natives. He told his audiences that 400,000 men, women and children were seized every year in the African villages, driven to the coast, and sold into slavery. He said that he had reason to believe that this number, actually sold, represented but a small portion of the evil, for they are only those who survive the terrible journey. He believes that when the caravans start the stolen creatures are five times that number. Not less than two millions are seized every year, but so many die on the road that only one in five reaches the coast. The Cardinal thought that Protestants and Catholics alike would be stirred by such a story. It must, however, have surprised him to find that Catholic France was apathetic, and that the two nations who were most deeply moved by his appeal, and took practical measures at great cost to suppress the iniquity, were the two Protestant nations of England and Germany.

"WHAT a grand old fellow he is!" said a lawyer as he and a friend descended the steps from a law court. "I suppose if he had chosen to decide otherwise he might have made a million, and without taking it as a bribe either. It could have been done easily on Wall Street and no one have been any the wiser. Stern, inflexible justice—that is what any man gets in Judge Bertram's court; no more and no less."

"No mercy, eh?" asked his companion.

"Not a bit. Why the old judge actually tried to put his only son behind the bars a few years ago. The young man was in a scrape, and he helped himself out of the safe of a bank where he was employed. He was not detected, but I suppose he feared it, so he went to his father and confessed, and asked the old man to let him have enough to replace his stealing. Instead of doing so, the judge sent for a policeman, and Ed. Bertram had to jump through a window and run for it, or he would have been caught. He is away in Canada now."

"Bertram did not like to lose the money I guess. Was it much?"

"Oh no! A mere nothing to him. It was not that. He went to the bank the next day and paid the whole of it. It was the crime he looked at. The majesty of the law—that is his pet phrase—the majesty of the law must be vindicated."

"Well, that was pretty hard for a father; but I wish we had more such judges."

While this conversation was going on, the subject of it was making his way homeward. He intended spending the evening on the study of a case in which he had reserved judgment, and he was soon busy in his private sanctum going over the papers. It was late when the work was done, but the judge was satisfied; he was sure that he thoroughly understood the case, and had expressed his decision lucidly. He read it over when he had finished it, and liked it. He was going to look for his daughter Dora to ask for a little music before retiring to rest, when she knocked at the door.

"May I come in, papa?" she asked timidly, for it was a serious matter to disturb the judge in that room. She entered now, on his permission, and going up to his chair, held a letter out for him to read. "Do read this papa," she said. "It is from Alice, and it is such good news. Edward is doing well now. Alice says that they are both members of a Presbyterian Church, and they are putting aside money every month toward the sum you paid for Edward in that dreadful time. And Edward is really contrite, and is praying always that you will forgive him. Alice thinks if you would do that, he would be the happiest of men. Oh papa, you will forgive him now, will you not?"

"Do not ask me, Dora," said the judge. "You have that false idea of justice that seems inherent in the female mind. Your brother is simply an escaped criminal. His reformation and reparation, if he makes it, will not undo the crime. I am glad for his sake that he has reformed, but the old crime stands against him; he cannot purge himself of that by repayment."

"Oh papa, do forgive him for my sake."

"There are few things I would refuse to do for your sake," said the old man, tenderly; "but I cannot do that."

Dora said no more. She knew too well the inflexibility of her father's character to hope for success after that answer. She wrote cheerfully to her brother and his wife, but she could give them no hope of the forgiveness they craved. She resumed her old life of devotion and loving attendance on her father, and was, as she had long been, the light of his home. The judge seemed to need her more than ever that year. The winter was severe, and a cold which he caught in the early part of the season clung to him. He had always been a robust, healthy man, but this year, for the first time in his career, there were several days when he could not leave his house. He would be all right, he said, when the spring came, and he could shake off that cold; but meanwhile he suffered and grew weaker, until he was confined to his bed.

Dora did her utmost to alleviate the trial. He would have her read the newspapers and the new books, but as the days passed he took less interest in them, and cared for nothing so much as to hear her read the Bible. She read chapter after chapter, and the judge grew to love it more and more. The Epistle to the Romans was his favorite book, and his keen judicial mind followed the masterly argument step by step with evident delight. Dora longed to make another appeal in her brother's behalf, but feared to agitate her father. One day, however, after the judge had been lying silent some time, he said to her, "You may write to Edward, if you will; tell him of my illness, and say I would like to see him now."

Dora wrote immediately, for it was evident that her father was sinking, and even the physician, who had been hopeful until now, was despondent. Fearing that the old man might not live to see his son, and knowing how much in that case Edward would value a message, Dora said to her father, "You will give Edward your forgiveness when he comes?"

"Yes, oh yes! my child," said the judge; "since I have been sick I have seen all things in a new light."

The sands of life ran out very fast. Edward's arrival was eagerly looked for, but it was a long journey, and time had been lost. The judge lay in semi-stupor, and Dora stood watching him, weeping silently. Suddenly a light came on the vacant face. He did not open his eyes, but his lips moved; Dora listened. "I plead guilty," said the dying man, solemnly. Then after a pause, and as if in answer to a question, "Nothing but the merits of Jesus. The law of the Spirit of Life hath made me free from the law of sin and death." They were his last words. The upright judge, the blameless citizen, the honored man, found in death all his record worthless before God, and could find strength alone in the refuge of the sinner—the atonement of Christ.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

The Mormon Canaan.

SOME years before this—in 1846-47—John Taylor had taken a part with others in another emigration in which great suffering had been experienced. Those who pass through affliction and trouble are generally more sympathetic to others in like difficulties; but sometimes the reverse is the case, it having a hardening influence, making them callous of the sufferings of those who come after them. It appears to have been so with John Taylor. The emigration to which we refer was the exodus of 2,000 Mormons from Nauvoo to the Salt Lake, which is graphically described by Hepworth Dixon as follows:

"Finding that through recent troubles their position on the Mississippi had become untenable, Young advised his followers to yield their prize, to quit the world in which they had found no peace, and set up their tabernacles in one of those distant wilds in the far West, which were then trodden by no feet of man except those of a few Red Indian tribes, Utes, Pawnees, Shoshones, in what was called the American Desert, and was considered by everybody as No-man's land. It was a bold device. Beyond the western prairies, beyond the Rocky Mountains, lay a howling wilderness of salt and stones, a property which no white man had yet been greedy enough to claim. Some pope, in the Middle Ages, had bestowed it on the crown of Spain, from which it had fallen, as a paper waste, to the Mexican Republic; but neither Spaniard nor Mexican had ever gone up north into the land to possess it.

"In the centre of this howling wilderness lay a Dead Sea, not less terrible than Bahr Lout, the Sea of Lot. One-fourth of its water was known to be solid salt. The creeks which ran into it were said to be putrid; the wells around it were known to be bitter; and the shores for many miles were crusted white with saleratus. These shores were like nothing else on earth, except the Syrian Ghor, and they were more forbidding than the Syrian Ghor in this particular, that the waters of Salt Lake are dull, impure, and the water-lines studded with ditches and pools, intolerable to the nostrils of living men.

"To crown its repulsive features, this desert of salt, of stones, and of putrid creeks, was shut off from the world eastward by the Rocky Mountains, westward by the Sierra Nevada, ranges of Alps high as the chain of Mont Blanc, and covered with eternal ice and snow. The red men who roamed over this country in search of roots and insects, were known to be the most savage and degraded tribes of their savage and degraded race.

"A herd of bison, a flight of gulls, a swarm of locusts, peopled the plain with a fitful life. In spring, when a little verdure rose upon the ground, a little wild sage, a few dwarf sunflowers, the locusts sprang from the earth and strip the few green plants of every leaf and twig. No forests could be seen; the grass, where it grew, appeared to be rank and thin. Only the wild sage and the dwarf sunflower seemed to find food in the soil, plants which are useless to man, and were then thought to be poisonous to his beast.

"Trappers, who had looked down on the Salt Valley from peaks and passes in the Wasatch Mountains, pictured it as a region without life, without a green slope, even without streams and springs. The wells are said to be salt, as the fields were salt. Finding no wood, and scarcely any fresh water in that region, these explorers had set their seal upon this great American desert as a waste unfit for the dwelling, incapable of the sustenance, of civilized men. But Young thought otherwise. He knew that where the Saint had struck his spade into the ground—at Kirtland in Ohio, at Independence in Missouri, at Nauvoo in Illinois—he had been always blessed with a plentiful crop; and the new Mormon seer had faith in the same strong sinews, in the same rough hands, in the same keen will, being able to draw harvests of grain from the desolate valley of Salt Lake.

"A carpenter by trade, Young knew how to fell trees, to shape logs, to build carts and trucks, to stake out ground, to erect temporary sheds. The Saints whom he would have to lead were inured to labor and privation; being chiefly New England artisans and Western farmers, men who could turn their hands to any trade, who could face any difficulty, execute any work. An equal number of either English or French converts would have perished in the attempt to move across the plains and the mountains; but the native American is a man of all trades—a banker, a butcher, a carpenter, a clerk, a teamster, a statesman, anything at a pinch, everything in its turn—a man rich in resources and ingenuities, so that a baker can build you a bridge, a preacher can catch you a wild horse, a lawyer can bake you hot cakes.

"Young knew that in crossing the great plains and climbing the great ranges, which are loosely clubbed together under the name of the Rocky Mountains, the privations of his people would be sharp; but to his practical eye these sufferings of the flesh appeared to be such as brave men could be trained by example to bear and not die. Food and seed might be carried in their light wagons, and a little malt whisky would correct the alkali in the bitter creeks. In his band of disciples every man was master of some craft; every woman was either a dairy-maid, a baker, a seamstress, a laundress; nay, the children could be turned to account in the desert roads, for every American girl can milk a cow, every American boy can drive a team.

"A party of pioneers having been sent forward to explore and report, the word to move on westward was at length given by Young; and in every family at Nauvoo preparations were made for a journey unmatched in history since the days when Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt. The Saints broke up their cheery homes. They gathered in their haste a little food, a few roots and seeds, a dozen kegs of spirits. Then they yoked their mules, their oxen, to the country wagons. Those who were too poor to buy wagons and oxen made for themselves trucks and wheelbarrows.

"Pressed upon by their foes, they marched away from Nauvoo, even while the winter was yet hard upon them, crossing the Mississippi on the ice, and starting on a journey of 1,500 miles, through a country without a road, without a bridge, without a village, without an inn, without wells, cattle, pastures, and cultivated land. As Elder John Taylor told me, they left everything behind; their corn-fields, their gardens, their pretty houses, with the books, carpets, pianos, everything which they contained. The distance to be conquered by these emigrants was equal to that from London to Lemberg, six times that from Cairo to Jerusalem. Their route lay through a prairie peopled by Pawnees, Shoshones, wolves and bears; it was broken by rapid rivers, barred by a series of mountain-chains; and the haven to be reached after all their toils and dangers, was the shore of a Dead Sea, lying in a sterile valley; a land watered with brine, and pastures sown with salt."

The sufferings of these Mormon pilgrims from insufficiency of food and clothing, from rheumatism, frost-bites, were such that they were soon unable to travel more than a few miles a day. And in the spring, when the ground became soft with rain, they sometimes only travelled through the mud as much as one mile a day; and had to wait on the banks of some rivers until the floods subsided enough to permit them to cross upon rudely constructed rafts. Their first year's journey was marked by a thinly scattered line of gravestones as their numbers were thinned by death. Their emigration train, consisting of 2,000 wagons, was attacked by Indians in some places. They suffered also from fevers and other illnesses, and at last only a part of the 2,000 emigrants reached Salt Lake.

Having passed through these troubles, Taylor

did not think, or at any rate did not act as if he thought that the European emigrants needed much sympathy. We, however, may be allowed to think differently.

One of these sufferers very recently related to me some of the painful circumstances through which he passed at that time. He told me that he walked the streets of Williamsburgh for three days and three nights without a mouthful of anything to eat, or a place to lay his head; he could obtain no work, and at length, in sheer desperation, he was forced to beg. The Mormon Church authorities knew the misery of the people, but took no adequate steps to alleviate it.

During the first weeks after our arrival in New York city, we had nothing to depend upon but the provisions which we had saved from the ship's rations. I had known what it was to be in a foreign country without money and without food; and on board ship I took care of our rations when they were not consumed by Harry or "the rats;" for I thought that if I did not need them—which, indeed, I sincerely hoped might be the case—I could certainly find some one who would be thankful for them. These rations consisted chiefly of sugar that was almost black; very bad black tea, which when made looked like dye; the poorest kind of sea-biscuit; and other things accordingly. The provisions for the Mormon emigrants were purchased in bulk by the Church authorities, who made their own profits out of them, and the Apostle at Liverpool had the benefit of all that could be saved out of them during the voyage. It was commonly said among the people that the sight of them alone was quite sufficient for any one who was not half-starved; and yet they had paid the price of the best.

We had been in New York several weeks when one day my husband called at the office of a paper called The Mormon, and there met with the Apostle Taylor, who conducted that paper. The Apostle expressed great regret that Mr. Stenhouse should be without occupation at that season of the year, and with a family of children upon his hands. This sympathy, coming from a brother missionary, was, I thought, very tardy, for my husband had then devoted over ten years of his life to the cause, and his record in the Church had been untarnished. The Apostle was living in an elegant house, surrounded by every comfort and luxury, while he knew that we had not so much as a chair, or even a bed to lie upon. What had he done for the Church more than my husband had done? Indeed, I firmly believed that he had not endured half so much, but—he was an Apostle! His unhelping sympathy appeared to me a little more than questionable.

He told my husband that he might come into the office of The Mormon, and write the addresses on the wrappers, and that he would give him a few dollars a week "to help things along," until something better presented itself. My husband thought this a disinterested action on the part of the Apostle John Taylor, but my experience in Mormonism led me to be distrustful and suspicious of everything that an elder or apostle said or did. This offer, however, came when we really had nothing to look to, and dared not refuse any assistance that was offered, however small it might be. But I must admit that my ideas of apostolic liberality were very much shocked when at the end of the week Mr. Stenhouse informed me that he had been allowed four dollars for his services, and that out of that magnificent sum the Apostle John Taylor had deducted twenty-five cents which sheer necessity had compelled him to borrow for the week's ferriage.

The apostle-editor had two assistants from Utah with him in The Mormon office—the one a "Seventy," and the other a "High Priest"—terms and titles which I shall presently explain. A few weeks after my husband entered the office, the "Seventy" who had charge of getting out the paper was allowed to return to Zion. The High Priest remained in the Eastern States visiting alternately the various branches of the Church, and doing some very zealous courting with a young English girl who lived in Williamsburgh, while his two unsuspecting wives at home in Salt Lake City were earnestly praying the Lord to bless him in his "mission." Whatever the Apostle may have thought of his associate, he could not very well remonstrate with him, for he himself was, and had been for some time, doing a good deal in that line with an amiable Connecticut girl, and was only waiting for special permission from Brigham Young to add her to the half-dozen wives he already had in Utah.

There was, moreover, another High Priest attached to that office, but no one seemed to understand his exact position. To all appearance his principal occupation was travelling from New York to Connecticut and from Connecticut back again to New York. He was a very robust-looking man, but it was reported that he was troubled with heart disease, and that the purer air of Connecticut was a great relief to him. This I fully believed when, some time after, I discovered that the young lady engaged to the Apostle had a charming sister, for I thought it very probable that she rendered no small assistance to the Connecticut air in giving relief to his diseased heart.

My husband not being at that particular time under the influence of "heart disease," soon became very useful on the editorial staff. In fact, pretty well everything was left to him, and not unfrequently for two or three days he saw nothing of the Apostle or either of his associates, and the whole responsibility of getting out the paper—at the magnificent salary of four dollars a week!—rested upon him. He was told that he must regard it as a mission, and be prepared to act accordingly.

In course of time, however, the visits to Connecticut came to an end. The Apostle obtained Brother Brigham's permission to marry Miss Young, and she made him an excellent house-keeper in a handsomely furnished house in Brooklyn. The poor High-Priest and the "Seventy" did not fare so well; they were expected to wait until they reached Zion. The two young ladies to whom they were engaged were amiable and good girls, who would without doubt have met with excellent husbands either in or out of the Church; but the name of an Apostle or High-Priest carried with it many charms, and won the hearts of the foolish young ladies and their friends.

The Apostle returned home with his youngest bride; but the High-priests realized the adage "The course of true love never did run smooth." The first wife of one of them refused to have anything to do with his new bride, and kept him at a respectful distance from herself then and for ever afterwards; while the first wife of the other declined to acknowledge the claims of her youthful rival. The first High-priest is now dead; the other, in the course of time, gave a full divorce to his wife. What happiness either of these girls found in the Mormon heresy to which they were parties they best know, but the young widow appears decidedly the happiest of the three.

One Sunday morning in early spring I attended a meeting of the Saints in Williamsburgh. My husband was there, and took part in the service, and so did the Apostle Taylor, and one or two other Utah elders. I went to that meeting in a very desponding state of mind, for our prospects since the day of our arrival had not brightened very much, and I felt the need of some comforting and cheering words. Whether it was the influence of the clear spring morning, or that the elders had noticed the depression of spirit among the Saints, I cannot tell, but I know that on that particular occasion their words seemed to me more earnest and encouraging than they had been for a long time past.

As we came out from the meeting, Brother Benton, one of the elders, stepped up to my husband, and said, "Brother Stenhouse, they are expected to arrive to-night or to-morrow; I suppose you will be down at the 'Garden' to meet them." I knew well enough who "they" were who were expected to arrive, and so did Mr. Stenhouse. "Yes," he said, "of course I shall be there, but most likely we shall have to wait a few days before they come." Then he stopped and talked over the matter with Elder Benton.

Now it chanced that at that time Brigham Young was trying an experiment. The false "Prophet of the Lord" sometimes finds it necessary—notwithstanding the "revelations" which he is supposed to receive—to try experiments like other men before he can feel sure that his plans are likely to succeed. The only difference between him and other men is, that he—knowing himself that his plans are his own inventions, or the inventions of the leaders—gives out that they come direct from God, thereby deceiving the ignorant, innocent, and confiding people; and when his plans fail, as they often do, he never confesses that he is wrong or mistaken, but lays all the blame on some other person. In the present instance Brigham Young tried an experiment upon a rather large scale.

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for April 7; Mark 11:1-11. Golden Text Zech. 9:9.

The Unique Pageant—Not Captives but Ransomed Followers—The Steed Secured—The Owner's Consent Assured—A Simple but Sufficient Answer—The Essence of Consecration—What the Lord Hath Need of—His First and Last Recorded Ride—The Children's Cry—The Multitude Curious but Engrossed in Business—Christ's Mission to Jerusalem—To Suffer not to Fight—The Believer's Approaching Triumphs.

THE kingdom of Jesus was "not of this world" (John 18:36), and yet it was destined to be "an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed" (Dan. 7:14). Therefore the triumph of Jesus was "not of this world." The kings of the earth, in the hour of their triumphs, seek, by every means, to impress on the crowds who gather to any courtly pageant, how great, how rich, how powerful they are. In old times the captives of war were led in chains, and the spoils of the enemies were displayed. But in the triumph of Jesus, all was different—the only preparation was the finding of an ass's colt; no proclamation announced His coming, and, although multitudes were around Him, it was which attracted them; they consisted of those whose bodies had been healed, whose sorrows had been taken away, and whose souls had been saved by the humble Son of Man who was in their midst.

A company who hung upon "the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth" (Luke 4:22) followed Him as "He steadfastly set His face to go to Jerusalem." He had passed through Jericho, and the once blind Bartimeus now followed Him with the rest. "They came nigh to Jerusalem, unto Bethphage, and Bethany, at the mount of Olives." Just there, Jesus paused in His teaching, and sent two of His disciples, "and saith unto them, Go your way into the village over against you: and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon never man sat; loose him and bring him." Here were plain directions to follow, but to take another man's ass without asking him would be an unrighteous thing, and Jesus would never command an unrighteous act. Thank God He is ever the same.

"The Lord Shall Provide"

runs all through His commands. He never sends us a warfare at our own charges, or puts us into an untenable position. We may find ourselves in such a position by our own foolish haste, but He never sent us where it was impossible to go forward. "And if any man say unto you, Why do ye this? say ye that the Lord hath need of him: and straightway he will send him hither." Here was the provision. Jesus knew that He had a loyal heart which He could count upon in the owner of the ass, before He sent His disciples forth. Where would be nervousness and timidity? where would be anxious forebodings about the result of any trying interview, any important errand, if we were quite sure we were sent of God, and quite sure He had made Himself responsible for the consequences? All the element of fear and of uncertainty in our lives, comes from a want of ascertaining the direct leading of God, and a want of confidence in His certain guarantee that they that trust in Him shall not be put to confusion.

The disciples "went their way, and found the colt tied by the door without [just ready for them], in a place where two ways met; and they loose him." As might reasonably have been expected, they were asked what business they had with the colt, and they gave the answer which Jesus had charged them with, "The Lord hath need of him." So short, but so pithy. There was no further question, no contention, "they let them go." No human argument has the same power as a word from the Master. Just in the measure that the Word of God is a power to our own souls, and in our own lives, shall we use it in our relations with others. "The Lord hath need of him" was enough for one who knew the Lord as his Lord. But this is

It does not consist just in the giving up of some habits of self-indulgence, such as smoking, wearing jewelry, novel reading, card playing, or any other form of self-indulgence, it strikes at the root of all this; the Lord hath need, not of thy gifts, or thy sacrifices, but of thyself, of all thou art, all thou hast been, all thou ever wilt be, and of course all thou hast. That past of thine with all its sins, and all its failures, He wants it that He may forgive, blot out, remember no more against thee all thou hast been and done. He wants thy present, to cleanse, and sanctify, and conform to Himself. He wants thy future, that in real blessed communion with Himself, He may lead thee into all truth, and use thee as His witness in the world, known or unknown. The Lord hath need of thee. As the vocation of the ass's colt was to bear Jesus, and put Him in prominence above the crowd, while itself hidden among the throng, so the Lord needs thee, thy life, to be a pedestal for Him, where He can manifest Himself, and where thou canst be hidden. "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3:30).

"And they brought the colt to Jesus, and cast their garments on him, and He sat upon him." No gorgeous trappings, only the outer garments of one or two of His followers! No harness of any kind, except, perhaps, a bridle; but the unbroken colt knew the Master whom he bore, and, like the winds and waves, was subject to Him. The forces of nature and of the animal kingdom never contended for mastery with the Son of God,—a word, or a touch, and they were subdued; the unclean spirits sometimes attempted it for a moment, but soon yielded; it is man who dares to contend with the Most High, and the clay says to Him that fashioned it, "What makest Thou?" (Isa. 45:9.)

This was the first time that we hear of Jesus during the time of His ministry travelling in any way but on foot, and a kind of enthusiasm appears to have seized upon the multitude to do Him honor. There were many who believed He was but He had not fulfilled their expectations: they wanted to have some stir made which should arouse the attention of the great and noble to His claim upon the throne of David. Before this time, they had wanted "to take Him by force to make Him a king" (John 6:15), but He whose kingdom was "not of this world" escaped from them. Perhaps there were some who thought that now they might proclaim Him, and make an impression on Jerusalem. "Many spread their garments in the way; and others cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way. And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord: Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest."

Many took up the cry; the very children, many of whom knew Him, repeated the words, and a questioning arose, "Who is this?" only to bring forth the answer, "This is Jesus, the Prophet of Nazareth of Galilee" (Matt. 21:10, 11), and the questioners asked no more, and Jerusalem went on with her buying and selling, and planting, and building, and marrying, and giving in marriage, and little knew that He who just now had entered her streets was indeed the Saviour of the world, and about to die without the gate, tasting death for every man.

Jesus entered into Jerusalem, not to attack the palace of Herod, or to convince the Sanhedrim that He was indeed the lineal descendant of David, and that He claimed the throne, and would exercise His miraculous power to overcome the usurpation of Rome, and deliver His people, as Moses had done, by mighty signs from heaven. No, His kingdom was "not of this world," and the point of attraction to Him was the temple where His Father was worshipped; thither He went, and there the disappointed crowd left Him: He "looked round about upon all things, and now the eventide was come, He went out unto Bethany with the twelve." "But what a waste of His miraculous power!" some of these patriots may have said: "Why does He stop by the way to heal a blind beggar rather than bring fire from heaven to convince the Sanhedrim?" They did not understand that Jesus had a kingdom in the hearts and souls of men; that He was overturning a mightier power than Herod's or Caesar's in the overthrow of the kingdom of darkness, and for an indwelling God. Kingdoms, circumstances, business, and all outward things form but the scaffolding of the living temple, built without hands, of living stones, and destined to be the Bride of the Lamb. Most surely the kingdom will be restored to Israel; most surely, the promises of God to the Jews will be fulfilled; but, before that external kingdom shall be restored, the kingdom of Christ will become a glorious reality; and Christ shall reign and His chosen people with Him, "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." Many of us are looking for perpetual triumphs—triumphs in our work, triumphs in our own souls, which may be visible to other people. Let us take care that our kingdom is "not of this world." Our Master was "despised and rejected of men," not applauded by them, and "it is enough for the disciple that he be as His Master." Triumphs there will be wherever Jesus is exalted, but often they are triumphs which the world will either disbelieve or laugh to scorn. To the world a man who has ceased to live for self is a fool; one who does not resist evil is a milksop; one who loves his enemies deserves to be put upon; and yet such men are triumphs of the kingdom of God. Let us be content with the triumphs of Jesus, and let the world know us not, because it knew Him not.

PRIMULA OBSCURICA. As will be seen from the illustration of a two-year-old plant, Primula Obscure is a profuse-flowering Primrose, and is as near an everblooming plant as it is possible to obtain. The flowers are white, shading to lilac, and have the true Primrose fragrance. The plants produce, on long stems, spikes containing 10 to 15 flowers; upon two plants picked at random, we counted 45 and 52 flower spikes, and they had been in and steadily blooming for one year. A most attractive novelty. Good, strong plants 30 cts. each, or four for $1.00, post-paid.

THE CABINET.

PORTRAITS of the eight statesmen whom President Harrison has chosen as chiefs of the respective departments of the Government and members of his advisory council, appear on the preceding page. The task of selecting them was probably the most difficult that the President ever took in hand. There were many considerations which had to be carefully weighed. It was necessary to take the sectional apportionment into account, for every section of the country expects to have at least one representative in the Cabinet. If the President has blundered anywhere, it is here; for the South, which, being solidly Democratic, would naturally be most sensitive on the point, and the section most in need of conciliation, has been left out in the cold.

Then there were personal considerations involved. Though General Harrison was declared to be absolutely unpledged when he was nominated and elected, he could not forget that he was under obligations for important services rendered. Especially in the case of Mr. Blaine the personal element could not be ignored.

With that one position so filled, it became necessary to fill the others with due regard to it. Peace and harmony in the Cabinet being indispensable, no statesman could be invited to enter it who, like John Sherman, had antagonized Mr. Blaine, or who, like Mr. Edmunds, had displayed apathy in supporting him in 1884. This rule barred out many prominent men otherwise eligible, and the result of this and other considerations is the Cabinet as we now see it. It is, on the whole, a respectable Cabinet, and the fact that the Senate confirmed the eight nominations in ten minutes, shows that the leaders of the Republican party are satisfied.

MR. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Secretary of State.

PROBABLY there is no man in the United States whose record is so well known as is that of Mr. Blaine. All that can be said in his favor and all that can be charged against him, was thoroughly canvassed in 1884. The most minute details of his private and public life were fully set before the people then, when they were required to decide whether he was a fit man to occupy the highest place in their gift. How they decided we well know. It is therefore unnecessary here to do more than mention the bare historical facts of his career, without making an attempt to analyze a personal character which has been so exhaustively examined by campaign speakers and writers.

James Gillespie Blaine is fifty-nine years of age, having been born January 31, 1830, at West Brownsville, Washington County, Pennsylvania. At the age of thirteen he was sent to Washington College, Pa., from which he graduated with credit four years later. He taught school in Kentucky for two years, and then commenced the study of law. In 1853 he went to Augusta, Me., and entered into partnership with a prominent lawyer of that city. The two lawyers bought The Kennebec Journal, and Mr. Blaine became its editor. On this, and other journals, he did a considerable amount of editorial work for six years, at the end of which time he was elected to the Maine Legislature. He served two years on the floor and two years in the chair, and was then elected to Congress.

He was elected in 1862, and though he did no service in the war that was then raging, he did effective service for his party in Congress, where he soon established a reputation as a ready and effective debater. In 1869 he was elected Speaker, and continued to occupy that post until 1874, when the Democratic party gained control of the House. In 1876, his State sent him to the United States Senate, where he served until 1881, when he left it to become Secretary of State in President Garfield's Cabinet. After Garfield's death he retired to his home in Augusta, Me., and devoted his time to the composition of his history, "Twenty Years in Congress." Mr. Blaine had been a leading candidate for the Presidency since 1876. At the Convention held in Cincinnati that year, he and Senator Conkling were rivals. Their friends could not be reconciled, so Hayes was nominated. In 1880 Blaine and Grant led at the Chicago Convention. Once more was Blaine beaten by a compromise, General Garfield being nominated. In 1884 he secured the nomination and was defeated by Grover Cleveland.

MR. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Secretary of the Treasury.

THE brilliant record Mr. Windom made during the few months that he was Secretary of the Treasury in President Garfield's Cabinet renders his selection for the same office by President Harrison thoroughly acceptable. He is sixty-two years of age, having been born May 10, 1827, in Belmont County, Ohio. His father was a pioneer farmer, but he apprenticed his son to a tailor in Fredericktown, Ohio. Young Windom turned from the trade in disgust, and, much to the grief of his parents, who were Quakers, commenced the study of law. He made so rapid progress in his studies that at the age of twenty-three he was called to the bar, and soon established an excellent reputation for learning and talent. In 1855 the West strongly attracted him in common with many enterprising young men, and he went to Winona, Minn., which has ever since been his home.

In 1859, Mr. Windom was elected to Congress, and he was re-elected at four successive elections. He declined a fifth re-election, but accepted a seat in the Senate, to which the Governor appointed him, to fill the unexpired term of the late Senator Norton. At the end of that term he was unanimously re-elected by the Legislature, and continued to serve until 1881, when he was chosen by President Garfield for Secretary of the Treasury. The achievement by which he signalized his term of office was one of the most brilliant in financial history. The Government was paying five and six per cent. on the bulk of the public debt, though money was worth only three to four per cent. in the market. He boldly announced that in three months he would pay off $202,000,000 of the debt bearing six per cent. interest, excepting any of the creditors who might in the interval offer to exchange their bonds for bonds bearing three and a half per cent. Had the creditors chosen to wait for payment Mr. Windom might have found himself embarrassed. It is doubtful if he could have paid, but he knew human nature, and long before the three months had expired the creditors were eagerly rushing in to accept the three and a half per cent. Similar measures were then taken with the $470,000,000 of five per cents, with a like result. The cost to the country of the exchange was about $10,000, and the saving was $10,500,000 a year. And this was achieved without the assistance of Congress, and in the face of the determined opposition of the moneyed class.

COL. REDFIELD PROCTOR,
Secretary of War.

THE new Secretary of War is fifty-eight years old. He was born on June 1, 1831, at Cavenish, Vt. He studied at Dartmouth College until 1851, when he graduated and settled down to farm life. In 1859 he commenced the study of law, but before completing his studies President Lincoln's call to arms stirred his blood and he enlisted as a private soldier. General Davis, however, knew the spirit of the young recruit, and made him quartermaster of the Third Vermont Regiment with the rank of Lieutenant. He distinguished himself at the engagement of Lewinsville, Va., and was recommended by General McClellan for promotion. He was made Major, but soon afterward was prostrated by typhoid fever, and nearly lost his life. On his recovery he rejoined his regiment, and continued to serve until 1863, when he was mustered out with the rank of Colonel.

Returning to Vermont, Colonel Proctor passed his time partly in the practice of law and partly on his farm until 1869, when he took hold of the affairs of an embarrassed marble industry, which he managed so successfully as to completely rehabilitate it and double its means and value. He served two terms in the Assembly, and one term in the State Senate. In 1876 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor, and in 1878 Governor of Vermont. He was chairman of the Vermont Delegation to the Chicago convention, and kept his State in line for Harrison.

GENERAL B. F. TRACY,
Secretary of the Navy.

THE representation of the Empire State in the Cabinet has fallen to General Tracy through the irreconcilable enmity existing between the two wings of the Republican party. To have chosen the chief of either wing would have been to repeat the blunder of 1881, when Presidential interference in the New York quarrel led to the disruption of the party, and prepared the way for the Democratic victory in 1884. The choice of General Tracy shows a sagacity on the part of President Harrison that augurs the success of his administration.

Benjamin F. Tracy is fifty-nine years old. He was born at Owego, Tioga County, New York, on April 26, 1830. After completing his school education he entered the law office of N. W. Davis, of Owego, and was called to the bar at the age of twenty-one. He was twice elected District-Attorney for Tioga County, and in 1861 was elected to the Legislature. In 1862 he was appointed by Gov. Morgan military commandant of the Twenty-fourth Senatorial District, with headquarters at Binghamton. There he organized three regiments, and went to the front as Colonel of one of them, the One Hundred and Ninth. He engaged in the battle of the Wilderness, and shortly afterward was breveted Brigadier-General, and placed in command of the prison camp and draft rendezvous at Elmira, a position that he held until the close of the war. In 1866 President Johnson appointed him United States District-Attorney for the Eastern District of New York, and he was reappointed to the same office by President Grant, but declined it. He built up a successful law practice, and for a time avoided politics. In 1881 he was nominated for mayor of Brooklyn, but withdrew in favor of Seth Low when he found that Mr. Low's candidacy would unite his party. In 1882, and again in 1886, he was a candidate for office, but on both occasions was defeated.

GEN. JOHN W. NOBLE,
Secretary of the Interior.

ONE of the best appointments, commanding the approval of men of all parties, is that of John Willcox Noble, of Missouri, to the Department of the Interior. Gen. Noble is a man of integrity, industry, and learning, far removed from the mere politician by his strong principle and sturdy independence. He first came into prominence as Colonel of the Third Iowa Cavalry in the war, having been promoted to that office for distinguished service. A brave, enterprising, and capable officer, his dash and prudence won the esteem of his superior officers, and his name frequently appeared in the dispatches as the leader of some gallant charge. When the war closed he held the brevet rank of Brigadier-General, and none more worthily.

After the war he established a law practice at Keokuk, Iowa, but afterward removed to St. Louis, where he was made United States District-Attorney, and did effective work in breaking up the illicit whisky trade. During the great railroad strike of 1877 he went to the Governor's assistance, and, by organizing his fellow-citizens, did much to prevent the disorder and bloodshed with which the city was threatened. Gen. Noble is an old classmate of President Harrison, and a warm friendship, dating from their youthful days together in Miami University, subsists between them. Gen. Noble is also a graduate of Yale. He is fifty-eight years old, having been born at Lancaster, Ohio, October 26, 1831.

WILLIAM H. H. MILLER,
Attorney-General.

HERE is a touch of sentiment about the ointment of Mr. Miller which renders it interesting. He was the President's law partner in Indianapolis, and will be his personal friend in Washington. By his position the President necessarily be a lonely man. Surrounded by scheming politicians having no interests at all but their own, some of them aspiring to the Presidency, others plotting to advance their local prestige, the President needs some one in his political family to whom he can turn for disinterested advice, and to stand by him personally in the Cabinet in opposition to self-seeking, ambitious men, who would not hesitate to injure the administration if by so doing they could improve their own prospects. Mr. Miller is a man whom the President can trust, and has acted wisely in having such a man near him in Washington.

William Henry Harrison Miller is the youngest member of the Cabinet. He was born at Augusta, N. Y., in 1841, and is now, therefore, forty-eight years old. His father was an enthusiastic admirer of the President's grandfather, and so Mr. Miller comes by his first name. He studied at Hamilton College, and after a brief service in the war he went to London, to study law in the office of Chief Justice Waite. In 1865 he was admitted to the bar, and settled at Peru, Ind. There he became acquainted with General Harrison, who offered him a partnership. That was in 1874, and during the fifteen years that have elapsed since that time, the two men and their families have been inseparable. Mr. Miller has an excellent reputation as an able and careful lawyer.

JOHN WANAMAKER,
Postmaster-General.

ONE of the new men has had so remarkable a career as the distinguished citizen of Philadelphia, who is now Postmaster-General. It extends from the brick-field, in which he carried on as a boy, to the magnificent opulence of a merchant's palace. With everything against him, he made his way by sheer grit and business acumen to wealth and honor, and now is selected to manage Uncle Sam's largest business enterprise. If he manages the Post Office with the same success as he has managed his own business, we may hope that the wretched system, a creak of system, which has so long embarrassed persons doing business through the mails—newspaper publishers particularly—will give place to order and regularity.

Mr. Wanamaker is fifty-one years old. He was born in Chambersburg, Pa., July 11, 1838. His father was of German and his mother of French descent. The first money he earned was two cents a day, for which he had to turn in a hundred bricks in a brickyard before going to school, and he assisted in the brick-making on holidays. His father died when John was thirteen years old, and the boy then left home to obtain a situation in a clothing store in Philadelphia. Two years later he became the salaried secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association. In 1861 he gave up this position and engaged in the ready-made clothing business with Nathan Brown. Between them they had $3,500 in cash. In the meantime he had married the sister of Nathan Brown. The business prospered from the beginning. In 1868 Mr. Brown died, and Mr. Wanamaker bought the firm name. Since then he has added other branches of business to the original one, and he now has one of the largest retail stores in the United States.

In 1858 Mr. Wanamaker began a Sunday-school in southwest Philadelphia, out of which grew the Bethany Presbyterian Church. This church and its institutions have received over $300,000 from him. He was one of the founders of the Christian Commission, and was president of the Young Men's Christian Association in 1883. To this association he has given $100,000, and it was under his presidency that the present magnificent building was erected.

Mr. Wanamaker gave $10,000 toward the fund for securing the election of General Harrison, and by personal effort raised among his brother merchants a further sum of $80,000 for the same fund. The amounts in both cases are said to have been much larger, but the figures here given are correct.

GENERAL J. McLAIN RUSK,
Secretary of Agriculture.

THE gallant hero who takes charge of this newly organized department is a typical Western man. Active, vigorous, and self-reliant, there is no kind of work that his fellow-citizens of Wisconsin would not confidently entrust to his hands, and feel satisfied that it would be well done. He is fifty-nine years old, having been born in Morgan County, Ohio, in 1830. When he was fourteen years old his father died, and the lad undertook the support of his mother and sisters. He managed the farm and drove a stage between Zanesville and Newark, and afterward opened a hotel. In 1853 he removed to Vernon County, Wisconsin, where he took an interest in politics and filled several minor offices. In 1861 he was elected to the Legislature. He could have been re-elected at the end of his term, but he preferred to go into the army. He was made Major of a Wisconsin regiment, and was offered a higher place, but declined it on the ground of inexperience.

His army record is a succession of notable and brilliant achievements, culminating in his command of the Seventeenth Army Corps in Sherman's famous March to the Sea. He came out at the close of the war with the rank of Brigadier-General. After the war he was elected Bank Controller of Wisconsin, retaining that office four years. Then he entered Congress and served six years, distinguishing himself in pension legislation. In 1881 President Garfield offered to send him to Paraguay and Uruguay as Chargé d'Affaires, and offered him the post of Public Printer. He declined these offices, and that fall the Wisconsin Republicans made him Governor of that State. In that office he gave such general satisfaction that he was twice re-elected, and he might now be serving his fourth term had he not declined to run again. He prevented a railroad riot by sending food to the starving laborers instead of troops, and this and similar acts inspired for him the love of the working classes and the confidence of capital. He went out of office the most popular Governor Wisconsin ever had.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Twice-Born Brahmin.—The Rev. J. G. Gregson said: "I had a high-caste Hindoo staying with me recently, a twice-born Brahmin, as he had been wont to call himself; one of the proudest of mankind, who would not even deign to return a salutation by a stranger. He said to me, when speaking of his having accepted Christ: 'When I asked God to give me rest, He showed me myself, and I saw that within my breast all was corruption and filthiness; my heart seemed a veritable nest of vipers. But in His mercy and righteousness He gave me more light, which showed me the cross of Christ, where all my sins would fall; and from that cross has continued to come the light which lights me on my road, bringing me closer and closer to God.' The light which led and still leads him who was a Hindoo Pharisee, is able to lead us. Let us look to the cross, and our way will be illumined till we reach the heavenly land."

Six Weeks of Needless Misery.—The Rev. Mr. McKay observes: "I recently visited Inverness, and met there three young men from Skye, whom I spoke to about their souls, and invited to the Saviour. 'No,' replied one, 'I cannot come; the Holy Spirit has not yet called me. For six weeks I have been very anxious and waiting for Him, but He has not yet come to me!' 'You have been troubled about your soul for six weeks,' I answered, 'then who was it that made you anxious?' The young man thought for a time, then said, very slowly, 'I don't know.' 'Was it the devil?' I asked. He smiled and replied, 'Well, no; that is scarcely in his line.' For six weeks the Holy Spirit had been striving with that young man, and he was most miserable, almost in despair; all that time he had been doing his best to quench Him. I pleaded with him long and earnestly; he wept and sobbed as though his heart would break; but I am glad to say that before we parted he came to a decision, and closed with Christ. How many, like this young man, are waiting for a special manifestation, a special call, while all the time they have the most personal of invitations in the Bible, to trust in Christ for pardon, acceptance, and eternal life."

Story of a Girl from Ireland.—The Rev. Mr. Campbell says: "Some time ago a poor young girl arrived one Sunday morning in the city. All her relatives had died, except two brothers. She lived in Belfast with them until they, too, were taken from her by death, and she was left alone in the world. Christmas-time came on, and brought with it memories of happy days never to return to the heart-broken girl. She could bear her anguish no longer; she left her old home in Belfast, and soon found herself in a hotel alone in Glasgow, without money and without friends. From the hotel she went to lodgings. God guided the poor young woman to a gospel meeting, where she surrendered herself to Christ. And oh! what a beautiful life she lived! She worked and spoke for her Divine Master continually. God raised up friends for her on every side; but a few weeks ago she was laid low with brain fever, which proved fatal. Three friends and myself stood by her as she peacefully passed away."

Clara's Prayer for Her Father.—A Minister remarks: "I knew a young girl named Clara, who by the grace of God had been brought to Christ. No sooner did she realize that she herself possessed eternal life, than she began to yearn after the souls of those around her. She knew her father was not a Christian, and after she had prayed her usual prayer at her mother's knee one evening, she said, 'Mamma, may I pray another prayer?' 'Yes, darling,' her mother answered. Then shutting her eyes and clasping her hands together, she prayed, 'Oh, God, just save my dear father, for Christ's sake. Amen.' And God heard that prayer of the young disciple of His Son, and answered it. The father was almost immediately converted, and is now a most useful man in leading others to the Saviour he himself has found. Many of us say we can do nothing. We cannot speak; we cannot teach; we cannot sing; we are even afraid to lift up our voices in prayer in public. But surely every one can do as that child did, and pray for the soul of one whom we know."

A Beggar Becomes a Daughter.—Mr. D. McLauchlan observes: "When Mr. Moody was last in Edinburgh there was a lady very much impressed at one of his meetings. She waited till the close, that she might have a word with him in private. When most of the people had left the hall, she approached him and said, 'You made the way of salvation very plain. I saw myself as a beggar, who had only to take Jesus as He is offered.' 'Dear lady,' replied Mr. Moody, 'it is not I who would say that, but the Bible does,' and opening it, he read, 'The Spirit and the Bride say, Come, and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.' She marked the place in her Bible, and went home, determined to have the matter settled that night. She sat late, reading and thinking over God's invitation; then by His grace she was enabled to close, accept it, and say, 'Yes, Lord, I come!' Then the beggar was raised from her knees, and accepted as a daughter of the Most High. We must all come as suppliants to the throne of Mercy, pleading no merit of our own, but that Christ died for us."

THE MOONLIGHT RIDE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 17, 1889.

"Then went I up in the night by the brook, and viewed the wall, and turned back and entered by the gate of the valley, and so returned." Neh. 2:15.

A DEAD city is more suggestive than a living city—past Rome than present Rome—ruins rather than newly frescoed cathedral. But the best time to visit a ruin is by moonlight. The Coliseum is far more fascinating to the traveller after sundown than before. You may stand by daylight amid the monastic ruins of Melrose Abbey, and study shafted oriel, and rosetted stone and mullion, but they throw their strongest witchery by moonlight. Some of you remember what the enchanter of Scotland said in the "Lay of the Last Minstrel":

Wouldst thou view fair Melrose aright,
Go visit it by the pale moonlight.

Washington Irving describes the Andalusian moonlight upon the Alhambra ruins as amounting to an enchantment. My text presents you Jerusalem in Ruins.

The tower down. The gates down. The walls down. Everything down. Nehemiah on horseback, by moonlight looking upon the ruins. While he rides, there are some friends on foot going with him, for they do not want the many horses to disturb the suspicions of the people. These people do not know the secret of Nehemiah's heart, but they are going as a sort of body-guard. I hear the clicking hoofs of the horse on which Nehemiah rides, as he guides it this way and that, into this gate and out of that, winding through that gate amid the debris of once great Jerusalem. Now the horse comes to a dead halt at the tumbled masonry where he cannot pass. Now he shies off at the charred timbers. Now he comes along where the water under the moonlight flashes from the mouth of the dragon after which the gate was named.

Heavy hearted Nehemiah! Riding in and out; now by his old home desolated, now by the defaced temple, now amid the scars of the city that had gone down under battering-ram and conflagration. The escorting party knows not what Nehemiah means. Is he getting crazy? Have his own personal sorrows, added to the sorrows of the nation, unbalanced his intellect?

The Midnight Exploration

goes on. Nehemiah on horseback rides through the Fish gate, by the tower of the furnaces, by the King's pool, by the Dragon well, in and out, in and out, until the midnight ride is completed, and Nehemiah dismounts from his horse, and, to the amazed and confounded and incredulous body-guard, declares the dead secret of his heart when he says, "Come, now, let us build Jerusalem." "What, Nehemiah, have you any money?" "No." "Have you any kingly authority?" "No." "Have you any eloquence?" "No." Yet that midnight moonlight ride of Nehemiah resulted in the glorious rebuilding of the city of Jerusalem. The people knew not how the thing was to be done, but with great enthusiasm they cried out, "Let us rise up now and build the city!" Some people laughed, and said it could not be done. Some people were infuriate, and offered physical violence, saying the thing should not be done. But the workmen went right on, standing on the wall, trowel in one hand, sword in the other, until the work was gloriously completed. At that very time, in Greece, Xenophon was writing a history, and Plato was making philosophy, and Demosthenes was rattling his rhetorical thunder, but all of them together did not do so much for the world as this midnight moonlight ride of praying, courageous, homesick, close-mouthed Nehemiah.

My subject first impresses me with the idea what an intense thing is Church Affection.

Seize the bridle of that horse and stop Nehemiah. Why are you risking your life here in the night? Your horse will stumble over these ruins and fall on you. Stop this useless exposure of your life. No; Nehemiah will not stop. He at last tells us the whole story. He lets us know he was an exile in a far distant land, and he was a servant, a cup-bearer in the palace of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and one day, while he was handing the cup of wine to the king, the king said to him, "What is the matter with you? You are not sick. I know you must have some great trouble. What is the matter with you?" Then he told the king how that beloved Jerusalem was broken down; how that his father's tomb had been desecrated; how that and defaced; how that the walls were scattered and broken. "Well," says King Artaxerxes, "what do you want?" "Well," said the cup-bearer Nehemiah, "I want to go home. I want to fix up the grave of my father. I want to restore the beauty of the temple. I want to rebuild the masonry of the city wall. Besides, I want passports, so that I shall not be hindered in my journey. And besides that," as you will find in the context, "I want an order on the man who keeps your forest for just so much timber as I may need for the rebuilding of the city." "How long shall you be gone?" said the king. The time of absence is arranged. In hot haste this seeming adventurer comes to Jerusalem, and in my text we find him on horseback in the midnight, riding around the ruins. It is through the spectacles of this scene that we discover the ardent attachment of Nehemiah for sacred Jerusalem, which in all ages has been the type of the Church of God, our Jerusalem, which we love just as much as Nehemiah loved his Jerusalem. The fact is that of God so much that there is no spot on earth so sacred, unless it is your own fireside. The Church has been to you so much comfort and illumination that there is nothing that makes you so irate as to have it talked against. If there have been times when you have been carried into captivity by sickness, you longed for the Church, our holy Jerusalem, just as much as Nehemiah longed for his Jerusalem, and the first day you came out you came to the house of the Lord. When the Temple was in ruins, as ours was years ago, like Nehemiah you walked around and looked at it, and in the moonlight you stood listening if you could not hear the voice of the dead organ, the psalm of the expired Sabbaths.

The Temple Had Been Dishonored

What Jerusalem was to Nehemiah, the Church of God is to you. Sceptics and infidels may scoff at the Church as an obsolete affair, as a relic of the dark ages, as a convention of goody-goody people, but all the impression they have ever made on your mind against the Church of God is absolutely nothing. You would make more sacrifices for it to-day than for any other institution, and if it were needful you would die in its defence. You can take the words of the kingly poet as he said, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." You understand in your own experience the pathos, the homesickness, the courage, the holy enthusiasm of Nehemiah in his midnight ride around the ruins of his beloved Jerusalem.

Again, my text impresses me with the fact that before reconstruction there must be an exploration of ruins. Why was not Nehemiah asleep under the covers? Why was not his horse stabled in the midnight? Let the police of the city arrest this midnight rider out on some mischief. No. Nehemiah is going to rebuild the city, and he is making preliminary exploration.

In this gate, out that gate, east, west, nor south. All through the ruins. The ruins may be explored before the work of reconstruction can begin. The reason that so many people this day, apparently converted, do not stay converted is because they did not first explore the ruins of their own heart. The reason that there are so many professed Christians who in the day lie and forge and steal and commit adultery and go to the penitentiary, is because they first do not learn the ruin of their own heart. They have not found out that "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." They had an idea that they were almost right, as they built religion as a sort of extension, as an ornamental cupola. There was a superstructure of religion built on a substratum of sins.

The trouble with a good deal of modern theology is that instead of building on the right foundation, it builds on the debris of an ungenerated nature. They attempt to rebuild Jerusalem before, in the midnight of conviction they have seen the ghastliness of the ruin. They have such a poor foundation for their religion that the first northeast storm of temptation blows them down. I have no faith in a man's conversion if he is not converted in

The Old-Fashioned Way

—John Bunyan's way, John Wesley's way, John Calvin's way, Paul's way, Christ's way, God's way. A dentist once said to me, "Do that hurt?" Said I, "Of course it hurts! It is in your business as in my profession: we have to hurt before we can help." You will never understand redemption until you understand ruin. A man tells me that some one is a member of the Church. It makes no impression on my mind at all. I simply want to know whether he was converted in the old-fashioned way, or whether he was converted in the new-fashioned way. If he was converted the old-fashioned way, he will stand. If he was converted in the new-fashioned way, he will not stand. That is all there is about it.

A man comes to me to talk about religion. The first question I ask him is, "Do you feel yourself to be a sinner?" If he says, "Well, yes," the hesitancy makes me feel that the man wants a ride on Nehemiah's horse by midnight through the ruins—in by the gate of his affections, out by the gate of his will; and before he has got through with that midnight ride he will drop the reins on the horse's neck, and will take his right hand and smite on his head, and say: "God be merciful to me a sinner;" and before he has stabled his horse he will take his feet out of the stirrups, and he will slide down on the ground, and he will kneel, crying, "Have mercy on me, O God, according to thy loving kindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions. For I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sins are ever before thee." Al my friends, you see this is

That is what makes some people so mad. It comes to a man of a million dollars and impenitent in his sins and says, "You're a pauper." It comes to a woman of fairest cheek, who has never repented, and says, "You're a sinner." It comes to a man priding himself on his independence and says, "You're bound hand and foot by the devil." It comes to our entire race and says, "You're a ruin, a ghastly ruin, an illimitable ruin." Satan sometimes says to me, "Why do you preach that truth? Why don't you preach a gospel with no repentance in it? Why don't you flatter men's hearts so that you make them feel all right? Why don't you preach a humanitarian gospel with no repentance in it, saying nothing about the ruin, talking all the time about redemption?" I say, "Get thee behind me, Satan." I would rather lead five souls the right way than twenty thousand the wrong way. The redemption of the gospel is a perfect farce if there is no ruin. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." "If any one, though he be an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel than this," says the apostle, him be accursed." There must be the midnight ride over the ruins before Jerusalem can be built. There must be the clicking of the hoofs of the horse there can be the ringing of the trowels. Again: My subject gives me a specimen of triumph and Triumphant Sadness.

There was any man in the world who had a right to mope and give up everything as lost, it was Nehemiah. You say, "He was a cup-bearer in the palace of Shushan, and it was a good place." So it was. The hall of that palace was two hundred feet square, and the roof hovered over thirty-six marble pillars, each over sixty feet high; and the intense blue of the sky, and the deep green of the forest foliage, and the white of the driven snow, all hung in the upholstery. But, my friends, I know very well that fine architecture will not put down homesickness. Yet Nehemiah did not give up. Then when you see him riding among these desolated streets, and by these dismantled towers, and by the torn-up grave of his father, you would suppose that he would have been disheartened, and that he would have dismounted from his horse and gone to his room and said: "Woe is me! My father's grave is torn up. The Temple is disordered. The walls are broken down. I have no money with which to rebuild. I wish I had never been born. I wish I were dead." Not so says Nehemiah. Although he had a grief so intense that it excited the commentary of his king, yet that penniless, expatriated Nehemiah uses himself up to rebuild the city. He gets a permission of absence. He gets his passports. He hastens away to Jerusalem. By night, on horseback, he rides through the ruins. He overcomes the most ferocious opposition. He arouses the piety and patriotism of the people, and in less than two months, namely, fifty-two days, Jerusalem was rebuilt. That's what I call busy and triumphant sadness.

My friends, the whole temptation is, with you, When You Have Trouble, do just the opposite to the behavior of Nehemiah, and that is to give up. You say, "I have lost my child and can never smile again." You say, "I have lost my property, and I never can repair my fortunes." You say, "I have fallen into sin, and I never can start again for a new life." If Satan can make you form that solution, and make you keep it, he has ruined you. Trouble is not sent to crush you, but to rouse you, to animate you, to propel you. The blacksmith does not thrust the iron into the forge and then blow away with the bellows, and then bring the hot iron out on the anvil and beat with stroke after stroke to ruin the iron, but to prepare it for a better use. Oh that the Lord God of Nehemiah would rouse up all broken-hearted people to rebuild.

Whipped, betrayed, shipwrecked, imprisoned, Paul went right on. The Italian martyr Alferius sits in his dungeon writing a letter, and he dates it "From the delectable orchard of the Leonine prison." That is what I call triumphant sadness. I knew

A Mother Who Buried Her Baby

On Friday and on Sabbath appeared in the house of God and said, "Give me a class; give me a Sabbath-school class. I have no child now left me, and I would like to have a class of little children. Give me real poor children. Give me a class off the back street." That, I say, is beautiful. That is triumphant sadness. At three o'clock this afternoon, in a beautiful parlor in Philadelphia—a parlor pictured and statuetted—there will be from ten to twenty destitute children of the street. It has been so every Sabbath afternoon at three o'clock for many years. These destitute children receive religious instruction, with cakes and sandwiches. How do I know that that has been going on for many years? I know it in this way. That was the first home in Philadelphia where I was called to comfort a great sorrow. They had a splendid boy, and he had been drowned at Long Branch. The father and mother almost idolized the boy, and the sob and shriek of that father and mother as they hung over the coffin resound in my ears to-day. There seemed to be no use of praying, for when I knelt down to pray, the outcry in the room drowned out all the prayer. But that sorrow. They did not forget their trouble. If you should go on the snowiest winter afternoon into Laurel Hill you would find a monument with the word "Walter" inscribed upon it, and a wreath of fresh flowers around the name. I think there has not been an hour all these years, winter or summer, when there was not a wreath of fresh flowers around Walter's name. But the Christian mother who sends those flowers there, having no child left, Sabbath afternoons mothers ten or twenty of the lost ones of the street. That is beautiful. That is what I call busy and triumphant sadness.

Here is a man who has lost his property. He does not go to hard drinking. He does not destroy his own life. He comes and says: "Harness me for Christian work. My money's gone. I have no treasures on earth. I want treasures in heaven. I have a voice and a heart to serve God." You say that that man has failed. He has not failed—he has triumphed. Oh, I wish I could persuade all the people who have any kind of trouble to Never Give Up.

I wish they would look at the midnight rider of the text, and that the four hoofs of that beast on which Nehemiah rode might cut to pieces all your discouragements and hardships and trials. Give up! Who is going to give up, when on the bosom of God he can have all his troubles hushed? Give up! Never think of giving up. Are you borne down with poverty? A little child was found holding her dead mother's hand in the darkness of a tenement house, and some one coming in, the little girl looked up, while holding her dead mother's hand, and said: "Oh, I do wish that God had made

More Light for Poor Folks."

My dear, God will be your light, God will be your shelter, God will be your home. Are you borne down with the bereavements of life? Is the house lonely now that the child is gone? Do not give up. Think of what the old sexton said when the minister asked him why he put so much care on the little graves in the cemetery—so much more care than on the larger graves, and the old sexton said, "Sir, you know that 'of such is the kingdom of heaven,' and I think the Saviour is pleased when He sees so much white clover growing around these little graves." But when the minister pressed the old sexton for a more satisfactory answer, the old sexton said, "Sir, about these larger graves, I don't know who are the Lord's saints and who are not; but you know, sir, it is clean different with the bairns." Oh, if you have had that keen, tender, indescribable sorrow that comes from the loss of a child, do not give up. The old sexton was right. It is

All Well With the Bairns.

Or, if you have sinned, if you have sinned grievously—sinned until you have been cast out by the Church, sinned until you have been cast out by society, do not give up. Perhaps there may be in this house one that could truthfully utter the lamentation of another:

Once I was pure as the snow, but I fell—
Fell like a snowflake from heaven to hell—
Fell, to be trampled as filth in the street—
Fell, to be scoffed at, spit on and beat;
Praying, cursing, wishing to die,
Selling my soul to whoever would buy,
Dealing in shame for a morsel of bread,
Hating the living and fearing the dead.

Do not give up. One like unto the Son of God comes to you to-day, saying, "Go and sin no more," while He cries out to your assailants, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone at her." Oh! there is no reason why any one in this house, by reason of any trouble or sin, should give up. Are you a foreigner, and in a strange land? Nehemiah was an exile. Are you penniless? Nehemiah was poor. Are you homesick? Nehemiah was homesick. Are you broken-hearted? Nehemiah was broken-hearted. But just see him in the text, riding along the sacrilegious grave of his father, and by the Dragon well, and through the Fish gate, and by the King's pool, in and out, in and out, the moonlight falling on the broken masonry, which throws a long shadow at which the horse shies, and at the same time that moonlight kindling up the features of this man till you see not only the mark of sad reminiscence, but the courage, the hope, the enthusiasm, of a man who knows that Jerusalem will be rebuilt. I pick you up to-day out of your sins and out of your sorrow, and I put you against the warm heart of Christ. "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

A LARGER STRANGELY FILLED.

MISSIONARIES whilst prosecuting their work have at times to bear many hardships and to feel many anxieties; but they often find that "man's extremity is God's opportunity." Witness the case of the Rev. Dr. Douthwaite, of the China Inland Mission, who thus records the way in which much-needed supplies of food and money were obtained from God in answer to prayer: When I was in the city of Wunchau, with two other families of our missionaries, we were a long time without a supply of funds. We had run very short of money, and, as it drew towards Christmas-time, we began to expect some from England, which was our usual source of supply. All the money was used up, but we said, "The steamer will be in at Christmas, and then we shall surely get some more." Christmas evening came, and with it the steamer, but no money for us, nothing to encourage us at all. Our hopes seemed dashed to the ground. We knew that we could get no more money from our usual source for probably fifteen days. We went as usual, and told the Lord all about it, for we went out to China knowing that we had only God to depend upon; and we were quite satisfied that that was enough for us, and we told our wants to Him.

Now you will see how that day, the Lord having shut up one source to try our faith, opened others. Before dinner-time a Chinaman came along with a large piece of beef, and said, "I want you to accept this as a present. I have received a great deal of medicine from you. You have done me good, and you would not take any money. Will you please take this?" I took it, and thanked God for it. Soon afterwards, in came another Chinaman, a gentleman, with a coolie walking behind him with a large bamboo over his shoulder, and a basket hanging from each end. The man put the things down in the reception-room, and I was asked to come down. I went down and opened the basket, and found in it four hams and some little things besides. He said, "I want you to accept this as a present." I did so, and thanked God for it. In came another Chinaman with a fat pheasant and some chickens and a basket of eggs, and he asked me to accept these; I did accept them, and thanked God for them. But that was not all. Before evening a European, connected with the consular service, came along, bringing with him a coolie carrying a huge turkey. He said, "See, I have been feeding this turkey for you six months. Will you accept it?" Thus the Lord provided for us, and we had an abundance of food for the whole of us, although our usual supply was cut off.

Toward the evening I received a letter from the Custom-house officers, saying that, as I had gratuitously attended to them in cases of sickness, they had subscribed to purchase a case of instruments for me, but not knowing what I wanted, would I kindly accept the money? Of course I kindly did. They sent with the letter a roll of $70. Our hearts were full of joy. We gave God thanks for all He had done for us; and it is always a joy to me to look back upon that occasion and other similar ones, and remember what God has done.

THE INDIAN ORPHANS.

A LETTER just received from Rev. W. F. Re Qua, contains the welcome intelligence that he has received eight offers from different parts of the country, to adopt the orphans of Indians. The friends who are thus obeying the command of the Master in caring for the poor and friendless, are all Christians, and the orphans will therefore have Christian care and training, and will grow up in Christian homes. After they have been taught, and have learned the ways of civilized life they will be allowed, if they so desire, to return to their tribes, and spread the knowledge they have gained. Mr. Re Qua has applied to the railroad companies for reduced rates in sending them to their new homes. We cannot imagine any work more thoroughly in accord with Christ's example and teaching than this. Our readers who have thus opened their homes to the poor little waifs, may be sure that at the last day such service will receive recognition from Him whom they thus serve.

The work of the Orphanage is to be begun in the best and humblest way. A few children will be taken into the log mission-house, as soon as sufficient clothing and bedding has been contributed. Already several barrels have been sent. As God sends more means, others will be taken. Unhappily there is no lack of the poor creatures. The young lady who has given up her pleasant home and gone out to aid Mr. and Mrs. Re Qua in the work is a thoroughly consecrated, devoted Christian girl, and she will act as matron and teacher. Meanwhile a building-fund is commenced, and as it grows, plans will be made for erecting a substantial orphanage, which will bear the name of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in recognition of the fact that nearly all the funds for Mr. Re Qua's work have come from the readers of this journal, who are thus giving practical evidence that the teaching in its pages is being blessed of God to their consecration.

THE HINDOO CHILD WIDOW.

OUR readers will be glad to learn that the slow-moving English Government has been unable to withstand the pressure of the English Christians, whose indignation was stirred by the story of Lachmin. The details of this shameful story were published in these columns on February 6 (p. 86). She was actually torn from the home of the missionaries by her mother and sold for vicious purposes to a debauchee, and when the missionaries appealed to the law to prevent the outrage, the magistrate declined to interfere, and ordered the child to be given up to her unnatural mother. Mr. Dyer, the missionary who has championed the cause of the girl, sent to friends in England, who made a vigorous appeal in the House of Commons to the statesman at the head of the Indian office, and he also lodged a formal appeal to the High Court in India against the decision of the magistrate, Mr. Quinn. The High Court at Calcutta, in January, issued a rule calling upon the magistrate to show cause why his order, which consigned the girl to an infamous life, should not be set aside.

The case came on for argument on Monday, February 18, and the High Court not only set aside the magisterial order, but took a step towards recovering possession of the child, as will be seen from the following telegram, which has been received from India:

"Rule issued on Radakissen and Mahatabo to show cause why order should not be made to restore status quo, and give back Lachmin to Mission, or other suitable order."

Radakissen is the man who falsely claimed to be the husband of the girl, and Mahatabo is the girl's mother, who sold her to Radakissen. They are the two to whom the magistrate consigned her. The cause for anxiety now is lest the girl, who was carried off by her captors directly they got hold of her, may not be found. But with the order of the High Court before it demonstrating the iniquity of Mr. Quinn's unjustifiable order, the Indian Government must see that it is bound to exert itself to the utmost to find her, that she may be set free.

The Anglo-Indian papers have been asserting that the Government had authorized Mr. Quinn to prosecute Mr. A. S. Dyer for his determined championship of this girl's cause. The decision of the High Court that Mr. Quinn was wrong, demonstrates that Mr. Dyer was right. We shall, therefore, now hear nothing more of these suggestions of a Government prosecution, but may expect a Government condemnation.

A TREACHEROUS MURDER.

THE London Missionary Society has received, through its agents at Zanzibar, a report of a statement made by one Amani-wad-Mabruki, of Mungopani. He arrived at Zanzibar, on the East Coast of Africa, on January 24, with the news that Mr. Brooks, one of the Society's missionaries, had endeavored to make his way to the coast, and had been killed at Mkange on January 21. He gives the following account of Mr. Brooks's murder: "I was engaged as a porter in the caravan of Mr. Swann, and went with him from Zanzibar to Ujiji. I received at Ujiji a note for balance of wages. (This note he produced.) On my return journey I took service at Urambo as porter in the caravan of Mr. Brooks. When we left Mamboia the caravan consisted of Mr. Brooks, twenty-four Wanyamwezi, and ten Zanzibar men, carrying twelve guns in all. At Semagombe Mr. Brooks wrote a letter and forwarded it by two of his men to Bwani Heri, at Saadani. Mr. Brooks went on with the caravan to Mkange. The messengers returned to Mr. Brooks there on January 20, and reported that their guns had been taken from them at Saadani, but they brought no reply to Mr. Brooks's letter. Mr. Brooks then decided to return to Mamboia the next day. On Monday, at sunrise, two armed parties of Wazeguha and Saadani men came round the tent. Mr. Brooks asked them, 'What do you want?' and they replied, 'We come to ask you the news from the interior, and to give you the news from the coast.' One of the men then took Mr. Brooks's hand, as if to shake hands with him, while another shot him in the back, and a third shot him in the chest. I then fled into the bush, and reached Saadani by the road leading from Bagamoyo, and found a dhow, which brought me to Zanzibar. The men who killed Mr. Brooks were Bwani Heri's people. I should not recognize the men who shot Mr. Brooks." The Society's agents add that, although no other porters of Mr. Brooks had arrived, the above account had been confirmed by four slaves of an Arab trader who had travelled with Mr. Brooks from Mamboia.

CHRONIC PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

THAT God is stirring up the Jews to return to their own land by making their residence in other lands impossible, as prophecy indicates that He will do in these last days, is evident from the following remarks by Mrs. E. A. Finn, the well-known evangelist among the Jews, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on Dec. 1, 1887: The position of the Jews in Europe is daily becoming more and more critical and difficult. The persecutions which six years ago roused so much attention have passed from the acute into the chronic stage. The newspapers are no longer filled with accounts of wholesale massacres, though violent outbreaks against Jews do still occur in Russia, and Jewish towns and villages are still burnt down by incendiaries whose object is pillage, often ending in murder.

But there are other ways of harassing and tormenting this afflicted people so as to "make life impossible" for them, at least in Russia. Jews are now shut out of educational institutions and forbidden to open schools of their own. In one place, where the attendance of Jewish boys averaged eighty or ninety, only two were admitted in the year 1887. In the same year only four Jews were admitted into the Technological School, and none at all into the Institution of Civil Engineers. Jews were expelled at the Universities, and those Jews have, in former years, successfully passed examinations in law, medicine, and chemistry, now forbidden to practice.

By a hundred such contrivances as these is made unbearable for them. Sudden edict expulsion are issued by the police authority and these edicts are enforced with extreme severity. Poor people, who have lived twenty or thirty years in the same city, have been given from three to eight days' notice winding up their affairs. These things were done in the depth of last winter—and now at this year the expulsions have been renewed; the enforced exodus is going on. It has been observed that these expulsions are always incident with the approach of winter, and a high official admitted that, in his opinion, expulsions are happily timed if the inclemency of the season should kill off a few thousand of the Jews. Driven from one trade after another, driven from villages into towns, from towns of the country altogether, what is to become of this unhappy people? It is impossible to see in England, or indeed in any other country, tens of thousands of Jews who are being repatriated from Russia and other European countries. They naturally turn to the land of their fathers, and all who can go thither to seek shelter if not home.

A CHIEF'S REMORSE.

BEFORE the introduction of Christianity to the islands of the South Sea, the inhabitants were accustomed to destroy a large number of their children. At a meeting recently held Raiatea, after many persons had been brought under the influence of the truth, a venerable chief rose, and addressed the assembly with impressive action and strongly excited feelings. Comparing the past with the present state of the people, he said, "You all know me, and you know that I was considered a mighty chief; spot on which we are now assembled was by me made sacred for myself and family; large my family, but I alone remain; all have died the service of Satan; they knew not this good Word which I am spared to see; my heart longing for them, and often says within me, 'That they had not died so soon; great are my crimes; I am the father of nineteen children, all of them I have murdered; now my heart longs for them. Had they been spared, I would have been men and women, learning the Word of the true God. But while I was thus destroying them no one, not even my own cousin (pointing to Tamatoa, the king who presided at the meeting), stayed my hand or said, 'Spare them.' No one said, 'The good word, the true word, is coming, spare your children; and now my heart is repenting, is weeping for them!' To-day there are many sincere Christians in the South Sea Islands."

CONVERSION OF A JAPANESE FAMILY.

IN a letter from the Rev. T. C. Winn, from Kanazawa, Japan, to the Church, he thus describes the remarkable conversion of a family in the mountains: Last Sabbath was the regular communion season in the first church here. To attend this service a farmer came in from home eighteen miles distant, a village among the mountains. This man's son went to school of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in Kyoto, and became a Christian while there. He carried to his distant country home the good news of salvation, and now both parents, three sons, and two daughters, are all Christians. There are ten small children in the family who are taught at home, and not allowed to attend the public schools, because their parents are so desirous of guarding them against the evils which they would learn from associating with the children of heathen. As I saw this man sitting with his family in meetings, and at the table of the Lord, I was filled with a feeling of strange joy that the whole family, away out in that mountain town should be made members of the household of faith. The son was at prayer-meeting last evening, and said he wanted to bear testimony to the fact that, while they had no fellowship with Christians, or very little, at home, yet they enjoyed the presence of God.

When this family first began to talk to their neighbors about Christianity, nobody would listen to them at all. Now everybody is ready to hear what they have to say. The elder son of the family has recently been elected to fill the office of mayor in his town. A few years ago that would not have been thought of. Cases like this show how the truth is finding its way into the remotest parts of this land, and is making conquests over hearts.

MORE LIBERTY ASKED FOR JUDÆA.

THE following recent facts are noticeable as pointing to the approaching fulfilment of our prophetic expectation that some notable step of progress in the increased liberation of Jerusalem and Judæa will take place this year, 1889, as being the end of Daniel's great period of 2,345 years from 457 B. C., when Artaxerxes gave the command to Ezra, as set forth in Ezra 7, to institute certain reforms in the Jewish polity. Then in its secondary ultimate fulfilment the 2,345 years dated from Nehemiah's commission to rebuild Jerusalem in 445 B. C., will end in 1901 as the End of this Age.

Mr. H. Guedalla is stated in the Jewish Chronicle of February 15, 1889, to have received the following Letter From Jerusalem,

dated January 23: "The English Jewish press has recently published news to the effect that the decree of the Turkish Government prohibiting new Jewish emigrants coming from foreign countries to settle in Palestine was henceforward to be applied only to Israelites coming in large numbers, but not to Israelites coming in small numbers. The Governor of Jerusalem, however, maintains that this favorable modification of the decree does not apply to Russian and Roumanian Jews, who are, as heretofore, to be sent back to Russia or Roumania by the Government after a stay of three months. It is hoped that the Anglo-Jewish Association and the Board of Deputies will do something in the matter, but letters addressed to them on the subject by the Rabbis of Jerusalem have remained as yet unanswered. You are doubtless aware that a great number of our co-religionists, originally of Russian nationality, have enjoyed British protection ever since

The Crimean War Treaty of Peace, and this protection was extended to their children born in Judæa. Five years ago, notice was given to these British protégés that protection would cease in the year 1890. About three years ago an appeal was made by the Jewish authorities here to the Queen, and letters were likewise addressed to the Anglo-Jewish Association and to the Board of Deputies, but the results were not favorable. The present year 1889 is therefore, according to present arrangements, the last year that British protection will be granted to about 500 families, and every European who has visited this semi-civilized country well knows what it means not to be under Consular protection. Could you possibly inquire in high quarters whether something can yet be done in favor of so many families who are guilty of no offence whatever, but who are doomed to forfeit, at the end of 1889, the British protection they have been enjoying to the present? The question of

is a matter that concerns all the community here, and yet nothing is done on the subject. It is clear that the present inhabitants must be turned out, but it is quite as clear that they ought to be compensated in consideration of their great poverty. My personal opinion is, that should the Committee of the Sir Moses Montefiore Testimonial Fund earnestly wish to interfere in the case in favor of the poor of the Holy City, they could achieve a great deal through their former agent, Mr. Pines, should they be inclined to re-employ him. We have this winter, thank God, a great abundance of rain, thus doing away with the water famine, which so seriously oppressed our poor last year. It is also rumored that a certain English Baronet has gone to Constantinople to obtain permission for carrying out his project to provide Jerusalem with a permanent water supply."

A Railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem

is likewise stated by Dr. Thomas Chaplin to be about to be commenced in March, 1889. He says that the Sultan of Turkey has granted a firman to Mr. Joseph Navon for the construction of a railway from Jaffa, the seaport on the Mediterranean Sea, to Jerusalem, and that a company has been formed to make this railway, which is expected to pass near the Artuf colony of the Jewish Refugees Aid Society.

PALIGGENESIA.

By Rev. A. C. Tric.

IN Eph. 1:10 Paul says, "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times (the Father) might gather together in one (head) all things in Christ, both, which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in Him." This apostolic declaration tallies exactly with Rev. 21:3, 4, 24-26, "Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them. . . . Come hither, I will shew thee the Bride, the wife of the Lamb . . . that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God . . . the kings of the earth shall bring their glory into it." The pleroma of the times means fullness—means a unit—not only of the arisen bodies and souls of the saints, but also of the members of the Ecclesia, and of the subjects of Christ's kingdom—Christ, the head, Christ, the king, Christ all and in all.

We could adduce more solid proofs, but let them suffice, as giving us incontestable evidences: That the day of death, and the intermediate state between the day of our death and the day of the Resurrection is not the goal of the highest glory and joy. Pre-eminently the day of Christ's personal appearance, and the resurrection of the body, united with the sanctified and glorified soul is the mark which is set in the holy scriptures, as the place where the Christian warrior shall be crowned with the garland produced from the tree of life, and which shall be worn through all eternity. (1 Cor. 15:40-49.)

Glorious Thoughts.

What a grand thought it is, to contemplate: that this present earth (11 Peter 3:7, 11) cannot be dissolved by fire until the day of the resurrection shall be passed. The bodies of the saints, moulded to dust, are deposited in the earth as a precious legacy, and as a sure pledge, yea, they keep this globe as by mortgage-bond, as the true owners of the earth. (Matt. 5:5; Ps. 37:9); and no dissolution or destruction can come to the earth as long as that mortgage-bond is not cancelled; the precious dust bought by Christ, and once the temple in which the Holy Spirit dwelt, must be redeemed: "And be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." (Rom. 8:21.)

At Home.

What a joyful thought must arise in our minds to contemplate: That the arisen saints shall be in their natural element, and will be at home in the fullest sense of the word, and being children of the resurrection of the just (Luke 14:14), they will speak and have communion with Christ and their friends, as Moses and Elijah had with the Apostles on the mount of transfiguration (Matt. 17:2); and, as Christ had during the forty days after His resurrection, "speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God." (Acts 1:3.)

Hallowed Spots.

What a glorious thought, that should stir up and quicken our slow hearts to contemplate: That the saints shall revisit their former scenes and their hallowed places—their Bethels and their Peniels, and the places where they suffered for their Lord and Master. We read in Matt. 28:

16, "Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee into a mountain, where Jesus had appointed them." (Matt. 26:32). We find the Master at the Lake of Gennesaret, and on the Mount of Olives "the most hallowed and sacred spots," where they had been before, and, if the Master did give such an example in the forty days when He was among His disciples, how can we doubt that the saints after the Resurrection shall not visit those places where their Ebenezers were raised?

Celestial Delight.

Let us stretch out our holy desires in contemplation of the fact: That the Paliggenesia shall be a place of communion so glorious and heavenly, and so full of celestial delight, that no one, at this present time, can make an estimate of "their pleasures for ever more" Ps. 16:11; neither can survey the beauty and the boundaries of the renewed earth; only by comparison can we catch a glimpse of that glorious subject.

Many questions may be asked, which we have to leave to the curious ones, and to the philosophers; we only desire to consider: What hints, we can gather in the Bible concerning this subject, and truly: If Abram had a visit from the Angel Jehovah, and of heavenly messengers, Gen. 28:1-15, and also, as we know, that Archangels talked with men. (Dan. 9:21, Luke 1:19, 1:28), and had intercourse with prophets and apostles yea, that "God the Logos was tabernacled in the flesh" (John 1:14), and has been revealed as the God-man on earth, who of us can doubt that the future shall not be still brighter and more glorious? Who of us will venture to deny that there will not be a daily intercourse between the arisen saints and those beings who belong to the highest celestial orders? The visions in Rev. 1:13-18, and Rev. 5:11 lead us to such a unit, and the Apostle Paul expresses it plainly in Eph. 1:10, 3:10-21.

Finally: Let us never forget: "That He that sat upon the throne said: Behold, I make all things new." (Rev. 21:5), and consequently this marred and sin-stricken earth will be again the theme of song and of joy and melody of the celestial anthem and choir. When the Lord laid or fastened the foundations of the earth, and laid the corner-stone, thereof, then, "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." (Job 38:4-7.) When, the God-man, Jesus, the Christ, was born, (Luke 2:14), the fields of Ephraim echoed the sweet strain and melody of a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men;" and no song shall be heard on earth, until that Adonai, (Ps. 110:1, 2,) shall return to the earth. Then (Hebrews 1:6) when the Father "again bringeth in the firstborn into the world, He saith, And let all the angels of God worship Him" (Rev. 5:11-13.) then shall be seen the fulfilment of the anthem sung in Bethlehem, "Peace on earth, the Prince of Peace reigning in the city of Peace, and good-will in men." Indeed the Paliggenesia will be glorious far beyond our comprehension, and the more we have a glimpse of that unspeakable glory, the more shall we cry out with John, in his last words: Amen—Even so, come Lord Jesus." (Rev. 22:20.) Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and princes unto God, and His Father, to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever, Amen." Let it be so.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Three Important Nominations were Sent to the Senate on March 14. They were of the men chosen to represent the United States in the conference on Samoan affairs at Berlin, in which Germany and England are to participate. They appear to have been chosen with excellent judgment. Mr. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, the head of the commission, has been Minister to Germany and is therefore familiar with Bismarckian diplomacy. Mr. William Walter Phelps, the second member, is Mr. Blaine's most intimate friend, and therefore knows the attitude of the State Department. The third member, Mr. George H. Bates, of Delaware, was the American Commissioner sent out by Mr. Bayard in 1886. He made a long and interesting report. Most of it was printed by the State Department. A part, consisting of opinions, and including a strenuous argument for the getting up of an American protectorate, was dropped by Mr. Bayard, and was afterward published by Mr. Bates in an interview in the New York Tribune. They are to have the assistance of our ex-consul in Samoa, whose vigorous opposition to Germany led to his recall. It may be hoped that so strong a commission will be able to ensure to the people of Samoa freedom of action, and relieve them of German interference.

Two of the Foreign Missions were Filled on March 12 by presidential nominations. They were those of Italy and Denmark. To the former, Ex-Governor Porter, of Indiana, was nominated. Besides having filled creditably the post of governor of his State, he has served two terms in the House, and the office of First Controller of the Treasury under President Hayes. Mr. Enander, of Illinois, who goes to Denmark, will find himself in familiar ground. He was born in Sweden and did not come to the United States until he was twenty-seven years old. He is the editor and part proprietor of a Swedish journal, published in Chicago, and is the recognized leader of Swedish Republicans in the West. He has written extensively on Scandinavian mythology. Both the nominations are favorably regarded by both political parties. Two other foreign missions have also been filled by Ex-Senator Palmer, of Michigan, who goes to Spain, and Mr. John F. Swift, of California, who goes to Japan. Mr. Swift was one of the Commissioners who in 1880 negotiated the new treaty with China. To the general surprise the nominations for the British, French, and German missions were not sent in last week. It is understood that there is a difficulty about them. Mr. Whitelaw Reid, editor of the New York Tribune, and a close and faithful friend of Mr. Blaine, expected to have the English mission, and the public fully expected that nomination. But it is now stated that the President, in making his Cabinet selections, being obliged to pass over Warner Miller, of New York, for the Cabinet, desires that he should be sent to London. Whether the President or Mr. Blaine will carry the point remains to be seen.

An Important Change in the Inter-State commerce law has been made at the suggestion of the commissioners. As was foreseen, when the much debated measure was passed, its operation would reveal defects in the law, and some of these are remedied by these amendments. One of them deals with joint tariffs, which were not affected by the law. The law only dealt with individual roads, while most of the freight is carried over roads operated at different sections by different companies. The amendment extends the law for individual to joint tariffs. Another amendment provides that directors or officials breaking or evading the law may be imprisoned for two years as well as fined. A third amendment is launched against shippers who by false billing, weighing, or classification obtain transportation at less than regular rates. The offence is made a misdemeanor, and the maximum penalty imprisonment for two years and a fine of five thousand dollars. The same penalty is prescribed for the official who permits such discrimination. These changes will obviously render observance of the provisions of the law a very serious matter for directors and shippers.

An Extensive Strike Took Place in Fall River, Mass., on March 11. About fifty mills, employing six thousand weavers, were involved. The strike was general throughout the city, the number of skilled hands who have not joined in it being not sufficient to keep one mill going. The men say that at present prices the manufacturers could well afford to give the ten per cent. advance in wages asked for, while the demand for goods is so brisk that they cannot afford to have the mills idle. There are 43,000 looms in Fall River, and of these not 500 were in motion. The employers firmly resist the demand of the weavers, and have hitherto rejected all overtures for settlement. The State Board of Arbitration advised a conference with the strikers, but the employers declined.

Considerable Uneasiness has been Produced in Europe by the abdication of the King of Servia. Unimportant as the incident is in itself, it is regarded as an event likely to imperil peace by adding a further strain to the relations of Austria and Russia. A European press correspondent says that as time passes, the danger increases rather than diminishes. As the crisis which the act of King Milan has produced is studied, it means the return of his wife, Queen Nathalie, in triumph, and the restoration of the Pan-Slavist Metropolitan, Michael, and the complete control of the Russian party. St. Petersburg papers in exultation declare that Prince Ferdinand in Bulgaria, and even King Charles in Roumania, must be similarly cleared out without further delay, and, in truth, it looks as if both would have difficulty in riding out of the Slavic storm which has suddenly begun to rock the Balkans.

The Japanese Constitution, Recently Promulgated, is an excellent instrument, showing remarkable sagacity on the part of the statesmen who framed it, and great magnanimity on the part of the monarch who, in endorsing it, voluntarily relinquishes many of his prerogatives. The most important provisions, according to the summary published by the New York Herald, are as follows: The Mikado is the source of honors, appoints executive and administrative officers and judges, may proclaim martial law, is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and declares war, makes peace, and concludes treaties. The legislative functions are vested in an Imperial Diet, which consists of two houses—of peers and of representatives. The House of Peers consists of members of the imperial family, princes and marquises in their own right, and counts, viscounts, and barons, if they have been elected by the members of their respective orders, but in these cases for seven years only. The remaining peers are persons above thirty years of age, who may be named by the Emperor for meritorious services to the state. These are to be life members. The members of the House of Representatives are to be elected by the people. The electors must be male Japanese subjects not less than twenty-five years old, with a fixed residence and paying direct national taxes not less than fifteen dollars a year. Taxes can be imposed only by authority of the Diet, and appropriations must originate in the House of Representatives. The Mikado reserves the right of veto.

The Whole of the Evidence Against Mr. Parnell and his colleagues has now been presented to the Commission. On March 13 the counsel for the London Times announced that its case was closed, and the Commission thereupon adjourned to April 2. The Times on the last day of the session again had to acknowledge its credulity. It produced a witness named Coffee, a reporter from Cork, who had made a statement to a policeman incriminating Mr. Parnell. The Times subpoenaed him, and took him to London to give evidence before the Commission. He was paid $575. When he was put on the witness stand he nonchalantly said that there was no truth in the evidence he was expected to give. The story he had told the policeman was fictitious, and was gotten up to get money from the Times. He wanted to see London, and was aware that if he made up a sufficiently sensational story he would have the expenses of a trip to the metropolis paid for him. The audacity of his admission, and his flippant manner, exasperated the judges, who sent him to prison for contempt of court.

One of the Royal Exiles from France, Banished under the decree issued against all members of reigning families, is permitted to return. On March 9, the official journal published a new decree authorizing the Duke d'Aumale to return to France. The decree is by the President, and was approved by the chamber of Deputies. A representative of the Government, in explaining this step, said that by his three years' exile the Duke d'Aumale had been sufficiently punished. The Duke was exiled not because he was a pretender to the throne of France, but for addressing a disrespectful letter to the President of the Republic. The Government, in revoking the decree of exile, did not act from political motives, but merely desired to do an act of justice to an old soldier who loved France above all things, and whose presence would in no way endanger the country.

Mr. H. M. Stanley is Reported to be Making his way to Zanzibar, on the east coast of Africa. The news was cabled here last week, and the best informed geographers and explorers give credence to it. The New York Sun, in the course of an article on Stanley's probable route, says: "It is reasonable to suppose that Stanley reached Wadelai with the remainder of Emin's stores about the middle of last November. The purpose for which he went to Africa was then fulfilled. His duty done, it seems evident that he would make his way to the coast as speedily as possible. In the unsettled condition of the Victoria Nyanza region, it might be impossible for any explorer but Stanley to utilize that route. But he has with him a very strong force, and his prestige is great, not only among the natives, but among the Arabs, with whom his relations have been very friendly. At all events, it will not be surprising if we hear, before very long, that the intrepid traveller is nearing Zanzibar, where his eventful mission will terminate."

stor C. H. Spurgeon, whose Sermons ar from week to week in these columns, returned from Mentone to London, fully red in health. A reporter says that at his service in the Tabernacle, with the excep- of a slight limp due to the injury which he ved to his knee in slipping on a marble case, he looked well and hearty, though at first his voice seemed "rusty," as he self termed it. This, however, speedily ed, and with the old clear tones it rang oughout the building. The Mediterranean zes had imparted a bloom to his cheeks, h rendered the recent additional silvern hes to his locks the more noticeable. He in excellent spirits, overjoyed, as he always t the prospect of again meeting his people. ad a cheery "I shall do" for his friends as owly mounted the staircase leading to the ernacle parlors. An unusual interest ated to Mr. Spurgeon's home-coming, and as welcomed by one of those crowded con- ations which always mark the pastor's re- . When he made his way to his chair on platform the congregation of over six isand persons rose and acknowledged the lness of God in the return of their pastor ing the Doxology.

Major Whittle has been Doing Grand Work in Edinburgh. His first meeting in the circus held on Sunday evening, and on the same noon, at 5, there was a meeting for men he Free Assembly Hall, special seats being rved for students. Professor Henry Drum- nd, who is holding Sunday evening meetings students, as in former years, attended, and t part in the afternoon meeting, with Pro- or Simpson. Fifty young men rose for ver. On arriving at the circus it seemed as if any, nearly, were outside as in, and it was with t difficulty that Major Whittle reached the form. Close on four thousand persons must e been present, and as the Gospel was forcipresented, the vast audience sat spellbound. he Result of the Presidential Election is t appears, formally communicated to the e successful candidate. A gentleman who was in shington on March 4, to witness for the first e an inauguration, was curious to learn all iculars about the system followed, and ng other questions which he addressed to ator Edmunds, was: "Who notified General rison that he had been elected President of United States?" "Nobody," replied the ator. "The law makes no provision for such ification. The President-elect takes cogni- ce of the fact by general report, the same as Supreme Court Justices, and," continued Vermont Senator, with a merry twinkle in eye, "in one hundred years there has never n a case of failure on the part of the right n to learn of his election in time to be pres- on inauguration day." Considering that Presidency of the United States is the high- office on earth, it would have been very re- kable if there had been such a failure, yet en men are told that the still higher privilege being kings and priests unto God may be irs, comparatively few show any concern to ain it. (Rev. 5: 10.)

Four Lives were Saved by a Dog on Sunday, ch 10. About four years ago a little black wfoundland puppy quartered himself on a ily living in the upper part of New York. e family not being able to discover the owner he dog, kept him, and he grew up devotedly ached to the children. On Sunday he ac- npanied two of his young masters, who are ectively eleven and thirteen years old, and o playfellows about the same age, on a walk e riverside. The boys saw an old boat ached to the shore by a rusty chain, and they nbed into it. They were rocking it and ening the fun, when the chain broke and the t drifted out into the middle of the river d floated down. The children were alarmed, there was no oar in the boat, nor anything t could be used as one. They were still e scared when they saw that the boat was drifting toward a dam where the water falls twenty feet on a mass of jagged rocks. They began to cry and shout for help. The dog swam out to them, and swimming around the boat, whined piteously in sympathy. One of the boys leaned over and patted his head and the dog turned and swam vigorously toward the shore. His act gave the boy an idea. The dog returned to the boat, and the boy took a firm hold of the leather collar around the animal's neck. The dog gave a joyous bark and once more started for the shore, his powerful paws doing good work. In a few minutes he had arrested the boat's progress, when it was only a dozen yards from the dam, and towed it safely to shore. But for his intelligence and power all the boys must have been killed. The awak- ened sinner, drifting to perdition, may be saved as the boys were. He must make no effort to save himself, but simply lay hold on Christ, trusting only to Him. (Heb. 7: 25.)

An Effort to Get Warm Cost a Man His life in New York recently. During the recent cold snap a man was noticed walking on Pier 13 about midnight. He was shivering violently, and appeared to be suffering intensely from the cold. He crept along the pier to a spot where a tugboat was moored. The window of the tug's boiler-room was not fastened, and the man opened it, and crawled in feet foremost. There was but a small space between the boiler and the side of the room, and in some way he got wedged in. He was unable to extricate himself, and in his struggles to get free he kicked the upright glass water-gauge, and broke it. There was a pressure of thirty pounds of steam on the boiler at the time, so that the moment the gauge was broken steam and water shot out into the room. The man's screams aroused the crew of the tug, who went to his rescue. No one, how- ever, could enter the room for some minutes on account of the escaping steam. When at last he was released he was so dreadfully scalded that he died before reaching the hospital. Severe as his sufferings from the inclemency of the weather probably were, they were trivial to those he en- dured in trying to escape them. It is so with those who try to escape poverty and the hard- ships of life by resorting to wicked pursuits. Though they may not be punished under human laws, they cannot escape the judgment of God. (Mark 8: 36.)

A Romantic Marriage is One of the Biog- raphical incidents that have come to light in con- nection with President Harrison's appointments. A Washington journal, in the course of a sketch of the new private secretary, says that some years ago, when he was a reporter on the Indian- apolis Journal, he became acquainted with a young lady employed as teacher of music in a seminary in that city. Mutual affection devel- oped, and they were engaged. The young lady after a time left the seminary to accompany her parents to Elgin, Ill. A correspondence was kept up, and separation seemed to increase rather than diminish the love on both sides. It was agreed that they should marry at the first opportunity, and when the reporter was able to furnish a suitable home he should claim his wife. The opportunity soon occurred. The lady, ac- companying her parents on a visit, made a stay for three hours in Indianapolis. She rejoined the party at the depot at the end of that time, and proceeded with them on the journey. In the interval she had been married, but she said nothing about it. The bridegroom went back to his work in the Journal office, and he, too, was silent about the important event. He contin- ued to work and save until he had a nice little home furnished, and when everything was ready, he went to Elgin to fetch his bride. He received a cordial welcome, and the lady re- turned with him to her new home. The young man would have been deeply hurt had he found his wife, when he went for her, oblivious of her obligations, engaging in flirtations, and other- wise forgetting her relations to him. Yet that, there is reason to believe, will be the conduct of the Church, Christ's bride, when He returns according to His promise to take her to the man- sions He is preparing for her. (Luke 21: 34.)

Christian Worship Was Marred by an Eel at Binghamton, N. Y., on March 3. Elaborate arrangements had been made at Christ Episco- pal Church for an ornate musical service appro- priate to the pre-Lenten season. The congre- gation was, however, astonished when in the midst of one of the finest passages the grand organ was suddenly struck dumb. The residue of the morning service was necessarily clipped and halting. After service an investigation showed that the stoppage was due to a strange cause. The organ bellows is driven by a water motor, supplied from the city water works. An eel, pumped up from the depths of the Susque- hanna River, had got stuck in the pipe which supplies the motor, shutting off the current and silencing the swelling tones of the fine instru- ment. The service rendered by human voices was doubtless quite as acceptable to God with- out the organ accompaniment if it was rendered sincerely and with the heart. Sometimes, how- ever, the song of praise which should contin- ually go up to God from the believer's soul ceases, and the cause of that, too, is generally the pres- ence in the soul of something which should not be there—sin or unbelief. (Isa. 59: 2, 11.)

BRIEF NOTES.

An international Sunday-school Conference is to be held in London in the first week of July.

The Forsyth Street M. E. Church, New York, cele- brated its ninety-ninth anniversary on Sunday, March 17.

The Rev. George C. Needham is holding daily meet- ings at the Y. M. C. A. rooms, Aldersgate St., London.

Captain John Ericsson, the famous engineer, and the inventor of the Monitor, died on March 8. He was 86 years of age.

The Rev. C. H. Yatman has been conducting union revival services at Youngstown, O. There were 1,000 inquirers. All of the churches are greatly strengthened.

The Rev. Jacob Freshman stayed a few days in Lon- don on his way to Jerusalem. On March 3 he preached for the Rev. J. Jackson Wray in Whitefield Tabernacle.

The Baptist Year-Book for 1889 gives the following figures. Total number of churches, 32,900; ordained ministers, 21,420; total membership, 2,997,794, a net gain over last year of 80,479.

Earthquake shocks were felt in Pennsylvania, Mary- land, and Delaware on March 8. In Baltimore buildings swayed perceptibly, and the people ran terror-stricken from their houses. No damage was reported.

Diphtheria of a violent and malignant type is prevail- ing at St. Petersburg, Franklin County, Pa., to such an extent that the town council has issued an ordinance closing all churches, schools, and singing classes.

The Italian Young Men's Christian Association of New York celebrated its seventh anniversary at Associa- tion Hall, on March 3. The Association now has 200 members, and the Young Women's Association sixty-two.

The Rev. Thomas Harrison's revival services in the Beekman Hill M. E. Church, New York, have so far been blessed to the conversion of over six hundred per- sons. The work is still going on with increased fervor.

Dr. Pentecost's evangelistic meetings in the Christian Institute, Glasgow, have been most successful. On March 3 he began a two-weeks' service in Cowcaddens Free Church; and later on he is to conduct similar work n Bethany Hall, Glasgow.

A wonderful revival is reported from Bainesville, Ga. A correspondent in that city writes: "Pray that the good work may go on. We have 230 students in our school, many of them far away from home. We ask your prayers especially for them."

Isaiah Vansant Williamson, the Philadelphia philan- thropist, died at his home, No. 1,829 Chestnut Street, on Friday, March 8, age eighty-six. He recently gave $5,000,000 for the founding of the Williamson Free School of Mechanical Trades. His gifts to various phil- anthropic institutions include several sums of $100,000.

The Rev. B. Fay Mills has closed his services in Jersey City. The results have been extraordinary. The num- ber of cards filled in by converts, declaring their resolve, in the power of God, to lead a Christian life henceforth, and applying for membership in various churches, is 1,250. Mr. Mills has now gone to Springfield, Mass., where he is to hold services for three weeks.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is holding union services in Potts- ville, Pa. He is assisted by Prof. and Mrs. J. J. Lowe. The meetings are held in the Academy of Music, which holds over 1,200 persons. Large numbers were unable to gain admission at the earlier services, and the interest is increasing. In addition to the evening meetings, Dr. Munhall has a Bible Reading every afternoon at 3 o'clock.

A PORTRAIT AND A PROMISE.

"To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and . . . trembleth at my word." Isa. 65: 2.

Portrait painting is a great art. Many pretend to it, but the masters of the art are few. In the Word of God we have a gallery of portraits so accurate, so striking, that only the hand of the Lord could have drawn them. Most of us have been startled to see our own portrait there. The best of all is, that at the bottom of each likeness we have the Lord's judgment upon the character, so that we are able to form an estimate of what our true condition is before the Lord. Here you have

he is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembles at the word of the Lord. Here, also, you have the Lord's estimate of him: "To this man will I look." I hope to dwell chiefly upon the character described in the closing words, "And trembleth at my word." Support the text by the fifth verse, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at His word." This trembling is, in God's esteem, an admirable trait in their character. The glorious Jehovah, from His throne in heaven, speaks of those contrite ones who tremble at His word: and then the prophet takes up the strain, and cries, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at His word." It is a very great mercy that there are descriptions of saints given in the word of God which go very low, and reach the feeblest degrees of grace, and the saddest frames of mind. We find the children of God sometimes upon very high places: their spiritual life is vigorous, and their inward joy is abounding. Yet, we have to thank God that, in His priceless Scripture, He has painted for us portraits of the believer in his low estate.

In the Picture-Gallery

of those saved by faith we find Rahab as well as Sarah, and erring Samson as well as holy Samuel. In the family register of the Lord we have the names of believers who were weak and sad and faulty. We have instances in the sacred record of undoubtedly gracious men who were in very uncomfortable and undesirable conditions. Men are spoken of as the Lord's people when their souls are sick, when grace is at a very low ebb, and when joy is eclipsed.

"Trembleth at My word." This is the description to which I call your attention. Here are the elect men upon whom the Lord looks, and with whom He dwells. They are not the chivalry of earth, but the chosen of heaven. They are not dancing, but trembling; and yet they have more reason to be happy than those have who laugh away their days.

I. Who are these

at God's word? I think I hear your hearts crying, "Oh, that we may be numbered among them!" Let me begin to answer the question by telling you who they are not. They are not a proud people: they do not cry, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey His voice!" They are humbly hearing; hearing the word of God, and inwardly reverencing the heavenly monitor. They are no longer careless and reckless, for the voice of the Lord has brought them to their bearings. They have bowed their heads before Jehovah, and they listen with rapt attention to everything that He may speak. They are like the child Samuel when he said, "Speak, Lord; for Thy servant heareth." They are teachable, and lowly, and by no means belong to the school who correct the infallible.

I must put down the careless in the same list, and say of the Lord's tremblers they are not indifferent people. We have among us a class who cause us great sorrow of heart. They are not likely to jest at God's word, but yet it has no power over them; they do not scoff at it, but they do not feed on it. They have too much thought and sense to become infidels; but yet they overlook the importance of the truth which they accept. God's book lies in their houses honored, but unread. They do not much trouble to go and hear about its meaning; or if, through custom, they become attendants at the house of God, they hear the gospel, but it goes in at one ear and out of the other. There is no practical regard to it, no weighing it, no considering it, no meditating upon it, no applying it to the conscience and the daily life. Those cannot be said to tremble at God's word who neglect the great salvation. These were

Not a Critical People.

They trembled at the word, and did not sit down on the throne of usurped infallibility, and call the Scriptures to their bar. There are men abroad nowadays—I grieve to say some of them in the ministry—who take the Bible, not that it may judge them, but that they may judge it. Their judgment weighs in its balances the wisdom of God Himself. They talk exceedingly proudly, and their arrogance exalteth itself. O friends, I know not how you feel about the prevailing scepticism of the age, but I am heart-sick of it! I shun the place where I am likely to hear men who do not tremble at God's word.

"Oh, but surely you are open to conviction?" they say. We are open to no conviction that shall be contrary to the

from going down to the pit. We are open to no conviction that shall rob us of our eternal hope, and of our glorying in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. We do not deliberate, for we have decided. To be for ever holding the truth of God as though it might yet turn out to be a lie were to lose all the comfort of it. To be for ever prepared to desert our Lord and Master, to follow some brand-new philosopher, would be perpetual disloyalty. Nay, we have not come thus far at a guess. We have known our Lord and His truth for these forty years, and it is not may-be or-may-not-be with us now. We neither speculate, nor hesitate; but we know whom we have believed, and by His grace we will cleave to Him in life and in death.

Those who tremble at God's word are not presumptuous people, who derive fictitious comfort from it. We meet at times with a vain-confident man, who puts behind his back every warning and threatening, and only appropriates to himself every promise, though the promise be not made to him. Some of God's dearest children are so afraid of presumption that they go too far the other way, and hardly dare to be as confident as they might. Some of the holiest people that I know are afraid to say what they might say; for they scarcely dare to call themselves the children of God. On the other hand, I have heard others say what I fear they never ought to have said, for they have boasted that they never had a doubt. I heard one minister of great experience, who believes in assert very plainly that he had lived in the midst of the church of God for many years, and that he had seen many persons who claimed to be perfect, but he did not think that any one agreed with them; and, on the other hand, he had known intimately certain other persons whom he thought to be as nearly perfect as men could be, but in every case they had been the first to disown all notion of personal perfection, and mourned their own conscious imperfection. That is my observation also. I distrust the men who publish their own perfection: I do not believe one of them, but think less of them than I care to say. There is too much brass, and too little gold, about the perfection of the present day. It hath a brazen forehead, and hath a way of sitting by the roadside—a way which in old time belonged not to purity. I had rather tremble at God's word than testify to my own excellence.

I have largely told you what these tremblers are not; and I must now tell you a little what these people are. They are that there is a revealed Word of God. There plenty of persons who profess and call themselves Christians, and yet do not believe this sacred Book is the very Word of God, that it is inspired, and they answer, "Is the Koran, and so are the Vedas." They after this fashion: "This is the religious of the ancient Hebrew nation. A very respectable book it is, but infallible, certainly, the very Word of God, certainly not." Then, we distinctly part company with talkers. We can have no sort of fellowship with them in any measure or degree with regard to the things of God. They are to us as heathen men and publicans. If we are to come to the head of those that tremble at God's word we must believe that there is a Word of God to tremble at, as we do most assuredly believe, let others talk as they may.

They are a people who are acquainted with God's Word. An

of the Word of God can alone make a man tremble at it; and the more he understands the more cause for trembling will he see. Ay, and the more he enjoys it, the more will he tremble. The highest joy which it yields to mortal men is attended with a reverent and a holy trembling before God. If the believer went beyond the enjoyment of the living Word, and saw the Incarnate Word Himself all the splendor of His person, he would tremble still more; for what said John? "When I saw Him, I fell at His feet as dead." As the Word of the Incarnate Word would create even greater trembling than the full understanding of the Word as it is written and revealed, such trembling is a sign of grace, and by no means to be censured.

But what meaneth this trembling? Believe me, it does not mean a slavish fear. They tremble at God's word at the first may do because the word threatens them with death. But afterwards, as they advance and grow in grace, and become familiar with the God of love, and enter into the secret of His covenant, they tremble for a very different reason. They tremble because they have a holy reverence for God, and consequently of that Word in which He resides so much of the power and majesty of His Most High. These are they that reverence the Word, who would not have a syllable touched, who regard it as being divine after all measure, and therefore sacred as

George Fox, the famous founder of the Society of Friends, was called a "Quaker" for no other reason than this: that often, when the Spirit of God was upon him, and he spoke the Word with power, he would quake from head to foot beneath the burden of the message. It was an honorable title. No man need be ashamed to quake when Moses said, "I exceedingly tremble and quake." In the presence of God a man may well tremble. Surely he is worse than a devil if he does not; for the devils believe and tremble. Demons go the length of that; they hate that knoweth God, and hath any sense of His infinite power, and inconceivable purity of justice, must tremble before Him. I believe George Fox not only quaked himself, but made others quake; and if we tremble at God's word, we shall make others tremble. The power, when it rests upon us, will discover our own weakness, but it will not be hindered therefrom.

II. I have described these tremblers so far as my scant knowledge and brief time will allow. The time has now come to inquire,

Why do They Tremble?

I have been trenching upon this field of inquiry already. They do not tremble because they are going to be lost. Those who are going to lost are pretty generally free from trembling: "there are no bands in their death; but their strength is firm." I would, my hardened hearer, that you did tremble; and because you do not tremble for yourself I tremble for you. Oh, that you judged yourself, that you might not be judged! I would that you condemned yourself, that God might acquit you; I would that you were horribly afraid; for then the great cause for fear would be over. See how the text blesses all the contrite and the trembling; and, when you have seen it, seek to be among them.

God's people tremble, first, because of His exceeding majesty. Note what becomes of Ezekiel, of Daniel, of Habakkuk, of John the beloved, when they had visions of God. No man could see God's face and live. There must always be some sort of cloud between. Through the veil of Christ's manhood

We See God and Live.

But God absolutely is beyond all creature ken—the sight were far too much for us. Even a glimpse of His skirts is something overwhelming! They that have seen God at any time have trembled at Him and at His Word. For the Word of the Lord is full of majesty. There is a divine royalty about every sentence of Scripture which the true believer feels and recognizes, and therefore trembles before it.

They tremble at the searching power of God's Word. I can personally bear my witness to the way in which the solemn word of the Lord makes my whole soul tremble to its centre. The word of the Lord has cut very close sometimes with many of you, and made you cry, "Am I saved or not?" The man that did never tremble before the Lord does not know Him. It is very easy to take the matter of your soul's salvation for granted, and yet to be mistaken. It is infinitely better to ask your way twenty times than miss your road home. And I do not blame the man who with holy anxiety says, "Is it so, or is it not so? for I want to know and to be sure." Oh beloved, I am not sorry that you tremble before the refining fire of sacred truth; I should be much distressed if you did not.

He that knows the Lord aright also trembles with fear lest he should break God's law. He sees what a perfect law it is, and how spiritual it is, and how it and the man cries, "It is high; I cannot attain unto it; O my God, help me, I pray thee." "Oh," says one, "if he trembles like that, it shows he does not know the love of God." It shows that he does know it. Have you heard of the boy whose father was exceedingly fond of him? He was asked by some other boys to go and rob an orchard with them, but he said, "No, I will not go." They replied, "Your father won't scold you, nor beat you, you may safely come." To this he answered, "What! do you think because my father loves me, that therefore I will grieve him? No, I love him, and I love to do what he wishes me to do. Because he loves me, I fear to vex him." That is like the child of God. The more he knows of God's love, the more he trembles at the thought of offending the Most High.

We, also, tremble lest we should miss the promises when they are spread out before us, sparkling like priceless gems. We hear of some who "could not enter in because of unbelief;" and we are taken with trembling lest we should be like them. We tremble lest there should be any passage of Scripture or doctrine of revelation that we are not able to believe; we pray for grace that we may never stagger at anything in the Word. We tremble lest we should misbelieve; and tremble more—if you are as I am—lest we should mistake and misinterpret the Word. You and I, who are ambassadors for God, must not trifle, but we must tremble at God's word.

III. Now we have got through the description of these trembling ones, and we have shown why they so exceedingly fear and quake, our third question was to be, What does God compare them to? Harken, for here is a thing to be noted and thought upon. The Lord compares the tremblers at His word to a temple. "Where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest. To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word."

They Are His Temple.

And to the Jews the temple was something very wonderful. There stood the holy and beautiful house, the joy of the whole earth—lined with unrotting wood, and overlaid with pure gold, and its hewn stones put together without hammer or axe. To the Israelite's mind there never was such a building before. Yet the glorious Jehovah speaks lightly of the temple, and says, "Where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest? To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word."

Note that the Lord does not merely compare us with the temple, but He prefers us to the temple; and further, He prefers us even to the great temple of the universe not made with human hands, which He Himself sets so much above the house that Solomon built. The Lord says, "The heaven is My throne, and the earth is My footstool;" and yet He seems to say, "All this is not My rest, nor the place of mine abode; but with this man will I dwell, even with him that trembleth at my word." It is a sublime comparison; ye are the temples of God, and something more. The more you study these verses, the more you will be astonished.

And what does God say He will do? He saith, "To this man will I look"—look first with approval. The Lord seems to say, "I will not look on proud Pharisees; I will not look on the presumptuous; but I trembling trusters. I will fix my eye upon him; he shall be countenanced by me. I will lift up the light of my countenance upon him. He is right with me, and I will show myself gracious to him." It is right that the creature should tremble at the Creator; right that the sinner should tremble before his Judge; right that a child should give due honor to his august Father; therefore will the Lord look upon such a one with approval.

The text means, next, that He will look upon him with care. You know how we use the expression, "I will look to him;" thus will God look to the man that trembles at His word. You that can stand alone may look to yourselves; but he that trembles shall have God to look to him. When you are afraid, cry, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe," and your tottering footsteps shall be firmer than a giant's tread. When you grow so self-satisfied that as the young man you can run without weariness, you shall both weary and fall. Oh, trust not in yourselves, but tremble before the Lord, and He will look to you, and see that no evil shall come nigh unto you!

He that goes through life fearing has Nothing to Fear.

"Happy is the man that feareth alway," says the Word of the Lord. He that is afraid of falling under trial, and cries, "Lead me not into temptation, but deliver me from evil," he shall be kept from sin; but he who rashly rushes into temptation shall fall by it. He who watches by day as well as by night, puts on his armor when there seems no war, and carries his sword always drawn even when there is no enemy visible, oh, that is the man who shall cope with the deadly enemy of souls! The Holy Ghost is in him, and the Lord has regard unto him; he shall not fall by the hand of the enemy. Though oftentimes he trembles, he shall be safe at last. Glory shall thus be given to God that helped him. The self-confident would not have glorified God if he had succeeded, for he would have thrown up his cap inside the gates of heaven, and magnified his own name. As for this man, he doffs his crown. "Non nobis, Domine," he cries, when he enters heaven. "Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord," is still his cry. Unto

Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His blood; unto Him that kept us from falling, and preserved us to His kingdom and glory, unto Him shall be all honor. Every man who this day trembles at God's word says "Amen" to this. God bless you, my beloved! The Lord Himself look to you, and dwell with you!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A TUMOR HEALED.*

"I COUNT it a blessed privilege," says Mrs. E. W. Oakes, of Manchester, N. H., "to testify to the goodness and willingness of God to exercise His power in the healing of my body. After an illness of three years, I was examined by two physicians as to the cause of my suffering, and a tumor decidedly incurable was the result of both examinations. Feeling my utter helplessness, I rested alone on God's Word (1 John 5: 9): 'If ye receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater.'"

"So, in obedience to James 5: 14, I was anointed by my pastor, and, through the merits of my Saviour Jesus Christ, I gained a complete deliverance, which has remained with me ever since—now four years this September, 1887. I know whereof I speak. There is deliverance in the salvation of our Lord for all His suffering, weary children who simply trust Him."

A Sufferer Eleven Years.

"I was born of godly parents," says Miss Carrie Nichols; "at an early age was thoroughly converted, and continued faithful in God's service for many years, growing in grace, but in body a poor sufferer."

"At the age of nineteen years, a terrible stroke of paralysis laid me very low, and for eleven years I lay between life and death; at this time the Lord spoke to me as He never spoke before, and gave me a call as a missionary to leave all and walk alone with Jesus. After some careful searching, God gave me grace to say, 'Yes, all for dear Jesus,' and from that moment of yielding my will to God, strength was given me to obey."

"I went out from a loving home, a sweet mother who loved me so dearly, to be a pilgrim and gather gems for my dear Lord."

"I am now nearly forty-three years old, and just a year ago this very month, October, 1888, I was taken again with consumption, and given up by physicians to die, in Greenville, New Jersey. Again the Lord raised me up, to the astonishment of everybody, by His own divine power, and now, to His glory, Carrie Nichols lives without an ache or pain, to witness and tell to all His children and the world, Jesus saves me, and keeps me whole, without medicine or any earthly power. I am so wonderfully kept and sustained in Christian working, in singing and praying—all by dear Jesus! It is simply by believing the word and promise of a faithful God and Saviour."

Faith Before Feeling.

Mr. H. W. Beadle, late of Washington, D. C. says: "In August, 1884, I visited Berachah Home, on Twenty-third Street, New York City, at the suggestion of a friend, for the purpose of obtaining, if possible, a deeper spiritual experience than I had before attained. I had no thought, at the time, of seeking or obtaining any physical benefit. I had, it is true, been using a support for twenty years, and could not do without it for a single day without great pain and weakness. Its use, however, so fully met my need that I was hardly conscious, ordinarily, of having any physical defect. When, therefore, Mr. Simpson asked me at his first interview with me, if I were there for healing, I answered, 'No.'"

"I spent five days at Berachah Home. I was very deeply moved by Mr. Simpson's presentation of the truth, and was led thereby to surrender myself to the Lord Jesus as never before. I felt that I could trust Him absolutely for everything for soul and body."

"Under the impulse of my new trust, I longed with a great longing to give my Lord and King some tangible evidence of my willingness to trust all to Him. While influenced by these feelings, the thought was given to me that I might lay aside my support, and trust my Lord to supply my need. My heart instantly responded to this thought with great joy and gladness: 'Yes I can trust my Lord.'

"On that day I laid aside the support forever, and on the following day I was, with others, anointed for healing by Mr. Simpson. The day after this I left the Home. I was suffering pain constantly then, and I could not see the slightest evidence that any change had occurred in my physical condition. The following morning, as I lay in my bed, a great darkness came over my soul. It seemed that I had risked, and lost all.

"The darkness was not of long duration. Text after text occurred to me, and finally Mark 11: 24, 'When ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them.' The cloud was gone, and I sprang from my bed rejoicing. I do not know when the pain entirely ceased, but a month or two afterwards I was conscious of being free from pain, and capable of doing the hardest work without any fatigue. It is now two years since that happy experience, and I am now rejoicing in physical strength and vigor."

REV. W. WILSON, Missionary in Fiji.

THE public interest aroused in the South Seas by our national complications in Samoa will render welcome the portrait of Mr. Wilson, whose labors in the islands of the Pacific, especially in Fiji, have been so signally blessed of God. William Wilson is a Scotchman, about fifty-five years of age. He was converted in early life, and consecrated himself to mission work. He offered himself to the Wesleyan Missionary Society, for service in any part of the world, but expressed a personal preference for the South Pacific. He was appointed to Fiji. He promptly set out, and reached his sphere of labor July, 1854. The scenes of conflict and savage cruelty which he witnessed during his labors there were horrible in the extreme. He himself narrowly escaped martyrdom. His companion and dear fellow-laborer, the Rev. J. Baker, was killed and devoured by the cannibals, and on one occasion Mr. Wilson was designed for the table. A Fijian, with whom he talked, passed his hand over his person with ghoulish interest, and said to his friends that the white man was "malumu sara"—in very fine order. Happily Mr. Wilson was preserved for many years of labor among the South Sea Islands. He is now in his native country, arousing and stimulating the interest of Christians at home in mission work. At a recent meeting he said that he had left on his circuit 13,000 converts, and only one native teacher to superintend the work.

A VISIT TO SAMOA.

(See Illustration.)

AN artist who recently visited Samoa on board the Pacific steamer Alameda sent home the vivid sketch from which the accompanying illustration is taken. He says that as soon as the vessel came to anchor the natives swarmed on the deck, offering curiosities for sale. They were chiefly weapons of war, which found ready purchasers among the passengers. The natives, he says, have magnificent figures, and are of a light copper color, with long hair, being an entirely different race from the dusky-blackish, woolly-haired Melanesians and Papuans, who inhabit adjacent islands.

It is gratifying to learn that the new administration at Washington intends making a determined effort to prevent Bismarck gaining possession of the Islands. A strong representation is to be sent to Berlin to express forcibly the protest against the arrogant pretensions of Germany. It will be supported by the consul who represented our Government in Samoa during the recent troubles, who will be able to keep our plenipotentiaries posted as to the actual facts. The United States are not concerned in the question whether Malietoa or Tamasese shall be king, but they are deeply concerned, on principle, that the Samoans shall decide.

"HAVE you seen Mr. Drake, Miss Marion's husband as is to be?" said widow Rose, as she met a neighbor on the bright summer morning of the day on which Marion Greville, youngest daughter of Squire Greville, was to be married.

"Yes," said the neighbor, "he was up at the house last week when I was helping in the clearing up. Not much of a man, and a good deal too old for Miss Marion, but they say he's powerful rich."

"Well, that's one comfort, for the Squire won't have much to leave her. He's made the money fly. His parties, and his horses, and his goings on in New York haven't been done for nothing. But I wish Miss Marion could have been married to a handsome young man as would have made her happy. If any girl deserves a good husband, she does."

"That's so; and we'll all miss her. Why, there isn't a house in the village where she ain't been a friend. And if there's sickness, no matter what it is, she's bound to be there, with her beef-tea and her chickens and things."

"Ah! she was good to me in my trouble; I'll never forget it; I hope she'll be happy."

The sentiment was heard in every home in the village, but those who uttered it would not have been very sanguine could they have looked into Marion Greville's room that morning. The beautiful girl, with her curling chestnut hair, and long eyelashes shading eyes of wonderful brightness and depth, was on her knees, praying earnestly and weeping bitterly. She rose from her knees, effaced as far as she was able the traces of her tears, and descended to the breakfast-room, where her widowed father was waiting for her. She kissed him tenderly, and sat down to the meal.

"You will not forget me, Marion," the Squire said, "when you go away and leave me here lonely and desolate?"

"Dear papa," Marion answered, "can you doubt me for a moment? I can never forget you. I am doing as you wish, and I hope it will make you happier."

"I know, it, my child, but I hope you will be happy too. I feel sure you will. You have never known the hardships of poverty, and it would have been terrible to me to witness your suffering. You are a brave girl, and I am sure you will do your part well, and thank me, one day, for this arrangement."

"Ah, papa, I would rather have borne the poverty, and have lived frugally with you, than have entered into this union, but it will comfort me to know that it brings help to you."

"My child, nothing else could save me. Drake cancels all my indebtedness to him to-day, and he has promised to be a good husband to you, and I believe he will. He has sown all his wild oats now, and you will find him a steady-going, domesticated husband."

No more was said then, but Mr. Greville had an uneasy consciousness that he had sold his daughter for money, and that he was a selfish, craven-hearted man. He was giving his daughter to the wicked rake who held him in his power, and, while she was going to a fate she loathed, he was to enjoy the fruit of her sacrifice. Oh, it was a bitter thing to do, and though Mr. Greville tried to cheat himself into the belief that Marion would be rich and happy, he knew in his heart that the virtuous Christian girl would be wounded every hour, and that she had sacrificed herself for his sake.

As he sat and pondered over these things, and reproached himself for the extravagance and carelessness which had rendered the sacrifice necessary to preserve his reputation and the honor of his name, Marion was taking her usual morning walk through the shrubbery, the last walk through the dear, familiar scenes she was to enjoy for she knew not how long. As she passed out through an opening into her own special garden, she came across two of her little Sunday-school pupils with their arms full of wild flowers, gathered for dear Miss Marion, at the risk of dirtying their new frocks. And near them was widow Rose, with a huge bouquet, which had stripped her garden of every blossom it contained.

"It is not much," said the widow, referring to the value, not to the size, of her offering, "but it's the gift of love, and it's all I have fit to give you. We all wish you well, Miss Marion; if you have all the joy we hope you will, you'll be a happy wife."

"Thank you, Mrs. Rose," said Marion; "it is very good of you. I shall often think of you all. I hope you will pray for me. You do not know how much I may be in need of the grace that God gives in answer to prayer."

"That I will, Miss, and so will many more. We'll never forget you."

Marion stooped and kissed the little girls, and then turned to receive another floral gift which a servant brought to her with a kindly message from a sick villager. It was all very delightful, except the one sad, woeful thought crushing her spirit, that she was about to wed a man who was not a Christian, and who could not sympathize with her in the best and most cherished feelings of her heart. Marion was doing it for her father's sake, to rescue him from impending ruin. It seemed to be a duty, but how gladly would she have avoided it, and borne the poverty and humiliation with him, rather than have married Mr. Drake, if her father had but have had her faith in God to cheer and support him. There was no escape now, but the cup was very bitter.

The leave-takings were all said at last, the ceremony performed, and Marion and her husband set out for the seaport from which they were to sail on their wedding trip to Europe. As the villagers wended their way homeward, having been royally entertained by the Squire, their talk was not of the feast, but of Miss Marion's sad looks, and the pity that such a good and beautiful girl should have such a forbidding-looking husband.

They heard but little of her afterward, but in the homes in which she had been an angel of mercy she was not forgotten. How much she had really needed their prayers they never knew, but when they saw her, many years afterward, as she returned, a widow, to her girlhood's home, they had a suspicion. Her face was prematurely aged, and her luxuriant dark hair was thickly streaked with white. She still moved with the same easy grace as in her youth, but the elasticity and buoyancy of youth had departed long before their time. What she had suffered she never told. That the harrow had passed over her soul was plainly written on her face. She had groaned under a bitter bondage, and had learned how much the human heart could suffer and yet not break. She had not even the comfort of knowing that her sacrifice was necessary to her father's deliverance. Not many weeks after her marriage, wealth in abundance had come to him through the death of a distant relative, and if father and daughter had only waited and trusted in God the sacrifice need never have been made.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Taylor's Record.

VERY cold and dark and dreary were the first days which we spent in America. That faith which once had led me to hope and believe and "endure all things," was now powerless to nerve me to any new course of action for my religion's sake; for the dark shadow of the accursed heresy had come across my way; hope had fled, and my love, with the love of many other faithful Saints, had waxed cold. To my husband and children I was, of course, devotedly attached, and was willing to combat any difficulty or endure any trial with them, or for their sake; and it was not long before my constancy was put to the test.

The Mormon emigrants have always a Captain and two "Counsellors" to every company. The Captain on board the Emerald Isle—the vessel in which we came—was a returning Utah Elder; one of his Counsellors was also a returning Elder, and my husband was the other. As soon as the Mormon Captain had come on shore, and had reported to the Apostle in charge of the New York Saints, he left to visit his friends. The Utah Counsellor had a young lady in the company to whom he had become very much attached, and who afterwards became one of his wives. I was not, therefore, surprised that, as soon as he could get his baggage, he also should disappear; but my husband—the other Counsellor—being encumbered with a wife and family, was obliged to remain, and consequently the whole charge of seeing to the company devolved upon him.

We had, therefore, to remain in Castle Garden until the whole company of emigrants was provided for; and during all the next week I, with my four children, remained in that public place, sick and weary, and as destitute of bedding and covering as we had been on board ship. The weather was intensely cold, and, unaccustomed as we were to the severity of an American winter, we suffered very greatly indeed. The other unfortunate victims to faith in Mormonism were in the same condition, with the exception that they had something to sleep on at night while I had nothing but the bare boards for my bed since we left Liverpool; all I could gather together had been reserved for my babes. How we lived through that journey I know not, but I am certain that, could I have foreseen what we should have to endure, I could never have left England, whatever my refusal might have cost me.

I could not refrain from contrasting my life before and since I knew Mormonism. Before, I scarcely knew what suffering was, so little had I been called upon to endure. I never knew what it was to be without money, or to want for anything; but now I was in a strange land, in the depth of a most bitter winter, without a home, without a pillow to rest my weary head upon, and with a future before me so dark that not a ray of light gave to it the promise of hope. Could any slavery be more complete than mine? My fanaticism and zeal were all gone, I had nothing to sustain me.

Certainly, I was still held by the fear that Mormonism, after all, might be of God, and that all this suffering might be necessary for my salvation—but if at that time I had only had a friend whose mind was clear from all the nonsense of Mormonism, and who had felt sufficient interest in me to advise me for my good, I think even then, God helping me, I might have freed myself from the mental slavery in which I was bound. But I had no intercourse with any but Mormons; and, indeed a wish to form Gentile friendships I should then have considered a positive sin.

A week after our arrival my husband found time to seek for apartments for his family, and

I was thankful to leave our miserable quarters at Castle Garden. The Mormon authorities had, meanwhile, given instructions to the other emigrants how to act, and they did little more than this. Those who had not found work or places to go to were ordered to leave the Garden, and received permission to occupy an old dilapidated school-room in Williamsburgh, which had been used for preaching.

I went there almost daily to see them, and therefore state what I saw as an eye-witness, and neither exaggerate nor misrepresent. There they huddled together—about 150, men, women, and children. Most of the men had been respectable mechanics in their own country; many of them I had known personally, and had visited in their cozy English homes; and their wives and families had been decently brought up. What they must have suffered under this change of circumstances I leave the reader to guess.

In that miserable place they lived day and night—the poor, dispirited mothers (many of them very ill) having to cook, and wash, and perform all the necessary domestic duties, round two small sheet-iron stoves. It was not long before the room became like a pest-house from so many persons being confined in so small a place, and breathing the same fetid and pestilential atmosphere; and many of the young children died of an epidemic which was raging among them.

They had saved some of the ship's provisions, and that was all they had to eat, but it did not last long. To me it was most distressing to witness so much misery without being able to render any assistance, particularly to see the poor little children shivering and crying with hunger and cold, while many of their mothers were in such a miserable state of apathy that they paid little or no attention to them. I often tried to awaken in them feelings of human sympathy, but I was invariably met with a murmur of discontent.

The people—men and women alike—seemed to be utterly demoralized. Nor can this be a matter of wonder; for in England the men had been told that, while at home they could only earn four or five shillings a day, and would never be able to put by enough to carry them all the way to Utah, in New York they would be able to earn two and a half to three, and even four dollars a day—equal to from ten to sixteen shillings English—and that employers would even come on board ship anxious to engage them. Thus they had by false statements been allured from their homes and plunged into the most abject and helpless poverty.

Day by day they went out seeking work, but finding none; willing to do anything to provide bread for their families, but returning nightly, unsuccessful, to their starving wives and children. My own resources were gone. I could do nothing. When we left Castle Garden I think we only had about five dollars left, while the heavy snow which covered the ground, and the intense cold, promised many weeks of unusual severity. Needing so greatly pity myself, how I sympathized with those poor sufferers, how I pitied them!

In the midst of all this the Apostle John Taylor learned that some of these poor individuals had been seen begging. So he came from his comfortable boarding-house in Brooklyn, well wrapped up in a handsome overcoat, and violently scolded these poor, starving creatures, and harangued them concerning the meanness of begging. With great swelling words he spoke of the dignity of the Saints of the Most High, and told them that he despised a Mormon who could fall to the level of a common street beggar. Could he have heard the unspoken maledictions of the poor wounded hearts of those who listened to him, as they thought of his brother "Apostle" in England, and of how he had deceived them, and sent them into a strange country, in the depth of winter, to beg, to starve, or to steal, he would have learned that, though the victim of a delusive faith may mentally submit to man-made creeds and priesthoods, in his heart he will judge not so much the words he hears as the man who utters them.

The "Apostle," John Taylor being now the President of the Mormon community, I will here give a few particulars of his career. He is of English birth, and emigrated to the United States when very young, where he soon became a favorite of Joseph Smith, who in a pretended revelation of January, 1841, when reorganizing the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, appointed Taylor an Apostle, styling him "John Taylor, the Champion of Right." He was with the "Prophet" in the jail at Carthage, Illinois, at the time Smith and his brother were assassinated, and was himself wounded. Expecting violence, the whole party were not unnaturally very gloomy that night, when to cheer them a little, Taylor sang Montgomery's hymn, to a plaintive air, which was so much in accordance with their feelings that after a little time Hyrum Smith asked him to sing it again, and although he felt very much depressed he complied with the request. He had only just finished the song when the mob, who had forced their way into the prison, fired a volley through the door, and Hyrum fell down dead, and Taylor was severely wounded. Joseph made a desperate resistance, when, going to the window to escape, he received a volley from those below, and fell into the courtyard, where he was instantly dispatched.

Taylor was subsequently sent on a mission tour by Brigham Young, for, being a man of marked talent, his presence at home might have been rather inconvenient in the early days of his presidency. He went to France in 1849, and in 1852 he founded a Mormon school in Paris, called l'Etoile du Deseret. He has also translated the "Book of Mormon" into French and German. He returned to America when the President was firmly established as the "Lord's Anointed," and through some of the apostles being excommunicated he eventually attained the priority.

It was in a great measure through him that what is known as the "Handcart Emigration Scheme" ended so fatally. At this time (1856) the English agency of the Mormon emigration was a very profitable appointment, and one coveted by the apostles as a means of replenishing their purses. The "Apostle" Richards was president of the European Church, and urged the converts to emigrate via Liverpool to Salt Lake. Taylor, at the same time, was presiding over the Mormons in the New England States, with New York for his headquarters. Being at the head of the "Apostles," he thought that he should have precedence of Richards, and wished to make arrangements for the passage of the emigrants through the States, by which he would get the commission from the railway companies in New York; and that, also, on the outfit, food, and utensils that were required for the journey.

Richards did not approve of this; and while the two were quarrelling the preparations were neglected, so that when the emigrants landed they found that instead of having arrived in the land of plenty, there was nothing for them. When they started on their journey they were insufficiently supplied with food and clothing, and being overtaken by the rigors of winter they died in large numbers on the road. Taylor went to "Zion" and explained his action in the matter, which then appeared satisfactory, so that when Richards came he was blamed for all the mischief, and Brigham having spoken, he dared not defend himself.

Taylor had very lofty notions respecting the dignity of the "Saints" as a people, and would not submit to their holding a secondary position. Major Van Vleit, in a report to the Secretary of War at Washington in the year 1857, says: "I heard Elder John Taylor, in a discourse to a congregation of 4,000 Mormons, say that none of the rulers of the earth were entitled to their positions unless appointed to them by the Lord, and that the Almighty had appointed a man to rule over and govern His saints, and that man was Brigham Young, and that they would have no one else to rule over them."

When Brigham Young died, in August, 1877, it was confidently expected that Mormonism would crumble to the dust. The "saints" had been bound by an arbitrary rule, and it was expected that when that was removed the rebound would be so great that the system would all collapse. Unfortunately this opinion has proved erroneous. Brigham Young, junior, failing to obtain his father's office, John Taylor was elected as successor to the second prophet, a position he was well fitted for, being adroit, shrewd, subtle, unprincipled, and what neither of his predecessors were, a well-educated man and a good writer. He is now about seventy-five years old, distinguished in his personal appearance, and has the winning arts which culture and travel frequently give to a man of wit. Some one has said of him, "He is the sweetest and most plausible sophist on earth."

In a former number we gave an illustration of his utter disregard for truth, in a statement made by him in 1850, and he has not improved since then. According to the Salt Lake Tribune of October 18, 1884, in an examination before Judge Zanes he affirmed that he did not know how long he had been president, that he did not know where marriages were celebrated except at the Endowment House, although he acknowledged that most of them were performed elsewhere; and many other things he expressed his ignorance about that he must have known. But it is a principle of Mormonism that falsehood is to be indulged in whenever it will conduce to the benefit of the Church and shield her members from harm. A Mormon apostle, in an address, once cautioned the children, when asked a certain question, to reply at once that they didn't know. "I'd rather have you tell a lie," he said, "to defend your friends and parents, than tell the truth that will bring trouble on them."

The wisdom of John Taylor found out a remedy for the prevailing distress among the helpless emigrants, and the "begging" which was fast becoming a public scandal. He "counselled" the men and boys to buy shovels, and go forth into the streets and clean away the snow from the fronts of the doors and from the sidewalks, and told them that they would thus get plenty of money to keep them until winter was over. One elderly brother, who had a little money left, bought a stock of shovels; but the emigrants found that there were plenty of others who were as eager as they for work, and who were much better acquainted with the way of obtaining it. The shovel experiment was a total failure, and the poor old brother lost his money in the investment.

For whatever the Apostle Taylor may have contributed to these unfortunate persons—whether in "counsel," money, or provisions—he will doubtless have his reward; and, for aught I know, he may have been unable to give anything more than counsel; but, at the same time, my opinion of the value of such counsel as his remains unchanged. There has been no lack of "counsel" or counsellors in the Mormon Church. "Counsel has been given in abundance to all, and by no means always for the benefit of those who received it. It was not, however, because he failed to assist them practically that the people disliked the Apostle Taylor, and have done so ever since; but it was for his pride and offensive arrogance, and the way in which he dared to talk to free-born Englishmen and Englishwomen about the dignity of the Mormon Priesthood, and the contempt in which he held them in the hour of their humiliation and distress—for that they bitterly disliked him.

I do not, of course, wish to justify the people in begging; such conduct would have been undesirable if they could have found employment of any sort. But when I saw the starving condition of those men and their hopeless families, in that wretched school-house, in my heart I honor them for having the courage to do so, but I thanked heaven that the "mean Gentiles"—as the Elders taught the people to call American citizens who did not believe in Mormonism—were able and willing to do so.

SATISFACTION, OR SATISFYING GOD.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

"I WANT to feel." How often we hear these words! "I wish I could feel I was saved," says an anxious soul; and many there are who make themselves feel as they think they ought to feel, only to fall back, and find themselves disappointed. They seek to bring about effect without the cause. When the sun is warm, we are warm, not because we think we are; we feel warm, but because the shining of it is warming in itself, and if we are in it, it must be warm. We cannot really take Jesus as our Saviour, and let Him have the whole of our sins, without feeling safe; but we must first feel safe and happy, and bring these things to Him that we may deserve by them to be made safe. Deep down in our human nature there is a strong desire to be something, to do something that we may take credit to ourselves for, and this is at the bottom of much of our cry, "I want to feel." The real desire is, not to be satisfied with myself, pleased with myself, convinced that I come up to the mark, but that God can find no flaw in me. Now this is a state of soul which hinders God's salvation. He never was, never is, and never can be satisfied with any man since Adam and Eve fell. Just because Adam and Eve fell and brought sin upon all men, that Jesus, the second Adam, came to die in our place, and to live for us, in which He said, "The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of Myself, but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." (John 14:10.) During a revival, some twenty-three years ago, a young woman came to the lady who was conducting the services, and said she was in the greatest distress about her soul. "Are you a Christian?" was asked her. "Yes; worse than any I know, because I have made a profession, and I am not really converted." "Did you on the cross do enough to satisfy God's love for your sin?" "Oh I have not repented enough." She wanted to feel repentance, she might be satisfied with her own repentance, and bring it to God as something glorious. "I did not ask you about your repentance," said the lady. "I asked you about what Jesus had done; has He satisfied God's love for you?" "I don't feel I love Him as I ought to," was the answer. "But I asked you about your love for Him," and again the question was repeated. "I fear I have not the right of faith," was the third reply. Then the lady said, "Three times I have asked you a question about Jesus; you have always answered something about yourself; I cannot help you to do this; once more, Has Jesus, by His death on the cross, satisfied God's just law for our sins?" Then she answered, "Why, yes, yes, yes." "Then God is satisfied, and you are saved." Instantly she fell upon her face, and "O God, have mercy on me that I have not appreciated what Jesus has done for me," and there and then she believed, and became a most useful Christian. She had wanted to be satisfied with her own repentance, her own love to God, and her own faith, and she did not think that it was God, not she, who had to be satisfied.

A true Christian never attains to self-satisfaction; he gives self over to God, and becomes satisfied with Him. A young Christian was full of zeal to live a life of holiness; she used to practice constrained silence in order to subdue her tongue, and rigid fasting to subdue her appetites; she never spent a penny upon herself that was not the most absolute necessity, and she had, before all this, consecrated herself in the most complete way to God, but she was she took a satisfaction in doing what others could not do on account of circumstances and weak health. At last the Lord allowed ill health and sore temptation to come upon her, until she cried, like Elijah, "Let me die, for I am not better than my fathers." (1 Kings 19:4.) She had gloried in the feeling of her own holiness; now she could see that pride and vanity and temper had just as much power over her as ever, and that all her holiness had been like an empty egg-shell. Then she saw how, not only our salvation or justification is all of Christ, but our sanctification too; how Christ is of God "made unto us wisdom and righteousness, sanctification and redemption" (1 Cor. 1:30); all which she had formerly wanted to feel in her own heart, and which, when she thought she had it, had filled her with self-complacency, she now saw to be in Christ dwelling in her; so that she ceased to take credit to herself, or to desire it; it became a joy to her to be nothing, and to give all the glory to her Lord. Now she began to learn how much more blessed it is to be satisfied with God than satisfied with self, and how, almost unconsciously, the feelings cannot but be happy when God is honored.

"I want to feel I have a spirit of prayer," say many. The idea is to be able to command communion with God, so as to pray at will about anything, and feel one has prevailed. But this would be to take the upper hand of God, to be greater than He. Real prayer springs from listening to God, learning God, getting to know and understand His heart, and the truth and faithfulness of His promises, so as to be united with His purposes, and to will with Him. Prayer does not make God our servant, to do our will, but makes us His sons, to enter into and to claim His will. It is very blessed to be in communion with God, but it never comes from a self-satisfaction in our side of that communion, but from an appreciation of the wondrous condescension of God, who consents to talk with us and to listen to us. Prevailing prayer does not result from gigantic efforts to pray with fervor, but from a calm, steady persuasion that God is to be trusted, and that He really and truly meets with us when we pray, and takes notice of us, and undertakes our plea, so that He makes it His business. "I want to feel" does not occur to one whose eye is fixed upon his covenant-keeping God. To pray "in the Holy Ghost" (Jude 20) is to pray as yielded instruments, following rather than dictating to God. A man who prays in the Holy Ghost does not first think what he would like, and then set himself to bring God round to it; he thinks of

What God Would Have,

and then he prays according to His will, and knowing that God hears him, he knows that he has the petition which he desired of Him. (1 John 5:14, 15.)

"I want to feel I am in my right place," says one, who has a strong feeling that the right place is one where he would be very prominent as a worker. "If only I had money, if only I had more education, if only I had more time, how much I could do for God." Does God know your desire? And does He still leave you where you are? And does He do right in doing so, or can you say you think in this He has made a mistake? Dear friend, it may be you think yourself of more value than you are, and your right place is to remain where you are until God makes a way out. He cannot will you to be elsewhere, and yet keep you there. "But," you say, "it is circumstances, and not God, which keep me where I am." Is there a circumstance which God does not permit? Is He ignorant of where and what you are? "Your strength is to sit still," and when He wants you to move, He says, "Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee saying, This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right hand and when ye turn to the left." (Isa. 30:21.) The prison was Joseph's right place, although he was placed there unjustly, until God brought him out; and the Lord was with him there. The den of lions was Daniel's right place until God brought him out; and God was with him there. Amidst ungodly companions or relatives, where everything is trying, there is your place until God leads you fairly out. Take God into everything with you.

His Presence Makes All Right.

"But," you say, "I have powers which might be used for God." Then use them just where you are, and they will be exercised for further use when God opens the way for you. It would not have been recorded of Joseph that "the Lord was with Joseph," if all through his slavery and his imprisonment he had been restless and anxious because he did not feel he was in the right place.

"I wish I could feel the same zeal for the salvation of souls which I see in others!" Oh how many mourn in this strain! They do not want the salvation of immortal souls half so much as they want to be satisfied with their own zeal. But zeal is no fire of human kindling which we can create and bring to God. He kindles it by the Holy Ghost in the hearts of those who value Jesus and His salvation, and whom He brings into fellowship with Him in His love for a lost world.

is to begin praising God for what He is to us, and what He has done for us, and when we appreciate His love to us, then to let Him fill us with His spirit for work among others. Giving way to sulky complaining of our own coldness only leads us farther out into the fog, but being willing to be the little insignificant creatures we are, utterly helpless and utterly nothing in ourselves, brings us so low down that there is room for God to come in and fill our life with His radiance. If the true motives of many hearts could be read by them they would be surprised, for they would find that the real desires of their hearts would run something like this: "I want to be saved, that I may be satisfied with myself; I want to be holy, that I may be really a Christian to be admired and thought much of; I want to be useful, because I should like to be one of God's favored instruments." But all this is exactly the contrary of true Christianity. "Christ pleased not Himself," but His Father; sought not His own glory, but His Father's, and He left His disciples greater works to do than He did (John 14:12), because He lived to satisfy His Father. Let us also live, not unto ourselves and our feelings, but unto Him which died for us and rose again. (11 Cor. 5:15.)

Through all these strifes and tears
I have a friend.
He'll safely guide and comfort
To the end.
Through sickness, pain and death,
He has my hand.
He'll bring me safely through them all
To Canaan's land.
What care I if the way is hard and cold,
He knoweth best.
When I am faint, and can no further go,
He'll give me rest.
And such a rest as that is worth
All pains and tears.
In Him I'll rest and feel secure
From all my fears.
So take and lead me Lord wherever thou wilt,
But bring me safe at last
To Zion's hill.
Where I no more shall know what here,
Is ill.
And there with lov'd ones and my Saviour blest,
I'll lay my weary burdens down,
And take my rest.

REV. EGERTON R. YOUNG, Missionary Among Canadian Indians—Scenes in His Life.

REV. EGERTON R. YOUNG.

Missionary Among the Indians of Canada,

Born in 1840—Pious Parentage—Early Conversion—Commences His Ministry at Hamilton in 1863—Goes as Missionary to the Crees in 1868—Begins Work Among the Saulteaux in 1873—Success of His Efforts—The Indian Class-Leader, Benjamin—A Merciful Deliverance on Lake Winnipeg—Nearly Over the Falls—Capturing a Bear—Travelling on Thin Ice.

ON the preceding page is a portrait of the Rev. E. R. Young, and pictures of some interesting incidents in his life and work among the Indians of the far Northwest of Canada. The missionary's life in such a region is one both of difficulty and hardship, and perpetual peril, but even here he has found, as have missionaries in other quarters of the globe, the savage nature of man is subdued and its sinfulness expelled by the might of the gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

Egerton Ryerson Young was born at Crosby, Ontario, Canada, in 1840, so that he is now forty-nine years of age. He is the son of the Rev. W. Young, one of the early pioneer Methodist ministers in the province of Ontario, who from early manhood until the present time, when he is eighty years old, has continued with unflagging zeal, and in a spirit of apostolic consecration, to do efficient service for Christ. After spending the usual period at school and college, the lad Egerton was led to reflect seriously on the future business of his life. He had enjoyed the inestimable advantage of and both his father and mother sought to train him in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. They were known throughout the entire Province as persons of exemplary godliness, whose lives were spent in prayer and in carrying the message of the salvation of Christ to the settlers, and to the Indians in their reserves and encampments. Before her marriage, Mrs. Young was a beloved teacher among the Ojibway Indians, a large and powerful tribe from which the Methodist missionaries have had the joy of winning many to the acceptance of Christ. When her boy was very young his mother had the satisfaction of seeing him accept Christ for himself, and heard him promise that if his life were spared to manhood he would serve Him even as his father and mother had done.

He Commenced His Ministry in 1863

in a church in the Province of Ontario, having after adequate preparation been ordained by the Methodist Conference. He wrought well, and was rewarded by the affectionate esteem of his congregation and colleagues, and the blessing of God. Five happy, useful years passed away, when in 1868 he was solemnly set apart for evangelistic work among the Indians of the far Northwest, his last charge being in the city of Hamilton. Dr. W. Morley Punshon delivered the valedictory address on the occasion at Toronto. It took Mr. Young no less than two months and nineteen days to reach Norway House, an old Hudson's Bay Company's port and settlement on the northern shore of Lake Winnipeg, and which had by this time become the headquarters of the mission in the Province. The journey was exceedingly tedious, most of it through a country comparatively unfamiliar, and destitute of the ordinary conveniences of travel, and the last fourteen days were spent in an open skiff, several Indian boatmen rowing the missionary to his destination

At Norway House,

as the settlement was called. Mr. Young settled down to hard and persistent work—evangelizing, teaching, and in every possible manner trying to Christianize the pagan Cree Indians, many of whom had their camps and hunting-grounds in the locality. Once more much blessing enriched and crowned the faithful, prayerful efforts which were made, and the adjacent forest was made vocal with praise to Christ. At times the weather is so cold at the north of the lake that "fat meat is the coveted food, and children prefer tallow candles to candy and sugar." Mr. Young had fully his share of hardship and discomfort arising from the severe rigor of the climate; but his heart was aglow with love to the Saviour and sinners, and from time to time he extended the area of his operations, until eventually his "circuit" comprised a region 500 miles long and 350 miles wide, his journeys in summer being made in birch-bark canoes, and in winter in sledges drawn by dogs; his bed, while the thermometer was many degrees below zero, was very often a hole in the snow, where he slept or shivered with his faithful Indians and dogs around him. His home, when he was at home, was 400 miles from the nearest doctor or post-office. On leaving the Crees for his next field of service, there was a community of no fewer than 1,100 professed Christians at Norway House—more than 400 being communicants.

In 1873, in compliance with the request of the Methodist Conference, Mr. Young went as a very dangerous tribe of Indians, whose wigwams were pitched on the northeast coast of Lake Winnipeg. This tribe was exceedingly superstitious, and though not absolutely destitute of all idea of the existence of a Great Spirit, were most ardent believers in the idle incantations of the "medicine men," and the legerdemain of the rapacious and insatiable "conjurers." Among this people Mr. Young found it was the invariable custom to put to death the aged and infirm, and all who were unfitted to earn their own living by joining in the chase or catching fish in the lake. One chief, a magnificent specimen of physical humanity, with whom the missionary had an early interview, positively gloried in having choked his own mother because she was no longer able to snare rabbits or catch fish. But though thus imbruted and depraved, and from time immemorial characterized by relentless selfishness and ferocity, Mr. Young found that the Saulteaux were Willing to Receive the Gospel.

His success among them constitutes one of the miracles of modern missionary enterprise. Having gained their confidence, and made them understand that his only object in coming to them was their good, he set about improving their condition. Among other things, he taught them the art of agriculture. He had taken with him in his portmanteau some small potatoes; these he sowed, and year after year carefully husbanded the produce; until now, from those original potatoes, the Indians are annually raising thousands and thousands of bushels. Socially, religiously, and in every other way, their condition was immensely improved through the loving labor of Mr. Young amongst them.

The following incident will illustrate the sad state of the Indian before the gospel reaches him, and also show the reality of evangelical conversion when it takes place. As Mr. and Mrs. Young were coming down Lake Winnipeg to Manitoba, one summer, in an open rowboat manned by a few Indian oarsmen, they stopped one day to prepare their dinner on what is known as Sandy Bar. Presently a company of Indians, who lived on the mainland, came in their canoes to pay a visit to and have

A Talk With the Missionary.

Mrs. Young, at her husband's desire, commenced to converse on the things of God with an old man and his wife, who had come in one of the canoes. After an hour or so had passed away, and the Indians had again left, Mr. and Mrs. Young and the attendants gathered at the campfire, where dinner was prepared. Mr. Young then asked his wife: "Well, what do you think of my old Indian class leader, Benjamin?" "Think of him!" she replied, "I think he is one of the most glorious Christians with whom I have ever talked. He spoke most beautifully of Jesus as his loving and almighty Saviour, and has most clear and Scriptural views of salvation."

Mr. Young looked into the bright face of his wife, whose radiance was so confirmatory of her story, and smilingly said: "I am really delighted to hear you say you have had such a pleasant and profitable talk with Benjamin, and that you have formed such a high opinion of him, for after years of acquaintance with him, this is just what I think of him; but, my dear, what do you think of this fact? He was once a cannibal, and Ate His First Wife!"

With a womanly shudder, Mrs. Young replied: "Oh, is it possible!" and then, after a pause, said: "I am so glad that I did not know that about him before I had that pleasant chat with him; for I am afraid I should have been thinking of his old sad life, and would not have so enjoyed the interview with him."

There was no doubt about the facts, for the dreadful story was told by the murderer himself. It appears that one autumn, as usual, he set out with his traps, accompanied by his wife, who trudged along with about three-fourths of the load for the distant hunting-ground. Hoping to be successful in capturing the fur-bearing animals, they went far into the depths of those virgin forests which extend for thousands of square miles beyond the fertile prairies. The snow fell to an unusual depth, and the animals they expected to kill for food were not so plentiful as usual. Seeing that the prospect for abundance of food was very uncertain, the man deliberately killed his wife, and put the dead body up on a staging outside of his wigwam, where, in the almost arctic cold, it was soon frozen quite solid. When, during the winter, he had poor success in the chase, he would take a piece of the human body and cook and eat it; and in this way, as he afterwards confessed, he eventually completely devoured it. Years after the occurrence he heard the missionary preach the glad tidings of salvation even for the vilest sinner. His heart was strongly affected, and, after a time of intense mental conflict and tribal persecution, he accepted Christ, and was completely transformed. He became a most gentle, self-denying, and exemplary Christian.

By the year 1877 other missionaries had entered the field opened up by the brave pioneering efforts of those who preceded them, and to this hour the triumphs of the cross of Christ have continued to multiply. At that time Mr. Young was desired by the Conference authorities to vacate his sphere of work and ever-growing prosperity, that he might visit the churches for the purpose of giving them information, deepening their sympathy and interest in the enterprise, and securing their financial aid. Accordingly for the past ten or eleven years he has gone throughout the length and breadth of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and many of the States of America, lecturing and preaching, and advocating the cause of missions among the Indians of the Great Lone Land. This year he has gone to Great Britain on the same errand, and, it may be hoped, with like success.

A Narrow Escape from Drowning is one of Mr. Young's reminiscences of his work. (It is illustrated in panel No. 1 of the first page picture.) One night, or rather, about 3 o'clock one morning, when thus travelling on the ice of Lake Winnipeg, Mr. Young's Indian guide fell very lame, and he took his place for a time. He was running on ahead at a considerable speed, when, most unexpectedly, he was startled by seeing the reflection of the stars just before him on what he at first thought was the clear transparent ice, but instantaneously discovered it was water of unsounded depths, into which the party had so nearly fallen. Mr. Young shouted to his men and dogs, who were close at hand, to stop, and the whole party came to a stand on the very edge of the chasm. They were several miles from the shore at the time, but the Lord mercifully preserved His servant and those who accompanied him, and guided them into safety.

An Adventure With a Bear.

Where so many and such long journeys had to be undertaken in a frail canoe, it was physically impossible to carry any considerable quantity of food. The voyagers consequently depended almost entirely on their guns to furnish them with supplies, as they travelled from one Indian camp or settlement to another. The country abounds with both large and small game of various kinds. Once, when going along the river Nelson, from Norway House in a birch-bark canoe guided by two trusty Indians, just as they were approaching an island, of which there is quite an archipelago in that splendid river, Mr. Young, much to his delight, for the supplies were running low, caught sight of some fine ducks disporting themselves on the left side of it, and said to his men, "Let us go for them!" At once they headed for the ducks, and paddled away vigorously. Just as they were nearly within gunshot, a heavy splash and a roar on the other side of the island diverted their attention. A huge fat bear, alarmed probably by the approach of the canoe, had sprung from among the short trees on the island into the water, and was swimming for the shore.

"Let Us Go for the Bear!"

said Mr. Young, and the next moment the canoe, obedient to the steering paddle, was heading in that direction. The bear swam bravely, but the light canoe skilfully propelled flashed through the water like a ray of light, and almost as noiselessly. When the animal was only a few yards distant, Mr. Young took aim at him (see Illustration No. 2), but the gun missed fire. The bear, conscious of pursuit, turned at that moment and made for the canoe. What a moment of suspense it was! But another cartridge was inserted, and just as the enraged animal was only eighteen inches away Mr. Young again fired, with fatal effect. The bear was killed instantly, and its carcase was dragged ashore, where its flesh was cooked for food and its skin dressed for a travelling-robe.

A Crippled Craft.

The missionary tells a story of grave peril from another cause. He was in his birch canoe with two Indians. No danger of any kind was apprehended, when suddenly, and just as they were entering the water whose current was somewhat accelerated by the near neighborhood of some falls, the paddle of the steersman snapped asunder, and all control over the frail craft was at an end. (See Illustration No. 3.) What was to be done? Dismay was manifest on the countenances of the Indians, and with a beating but still trusting heart the missionary looked to Heaven for aid in the emergency. Meanwhile, the stream runs fast, and the canoe is borne rushing onward on its foam-flecked bosom. Faster, faster, still they go. But help is most opportunely at hand. Just as the light canoe had reached the very brink of the heavy rapids, some Indians who had witnessed the danger of their beloved teacher dashed forward in their better-manned canoe, and seizing the apparently doomed vessel with a mighty grip, dragged it away out of the momentum of the hastening current, and did not let go of it again until they had piloted it into smooth water.

Through Thin Ice.

Mr. Young had another narrow escape on the ice of Lake Winnipeg (which is illustrated on panel No. 4). He started in his dog-sledge to visit a beloved dying teacher many miles down the lake. There were two trains of dogs, the missionary being in charge of one, and his Christian Indian attendant taking control of the other. To avoid skirting the numerous inland bays, as time was pressing the sledges were driven almost in straight lines from one headland to another. Presently, when a long distance from the shore, the ice was so thin that the sledge actually cut through it, as the dogs, which are very light, dashed onward upon the surface without making any impression on it. The missionary knew the ice was thicker farther on, and standing on the board at the rear of the sledge up to his knees in water, tilted the sledge to the angle of safety, and continued so until the sledge touched solid ice. The dying teacher was reached at last, and his farewell hours on earth were greatly cheered and brightened by the tender ministries of Christian love.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"Hallelujah Joe."—An Evangelist Sneaking at a mission said: "I remember hearing a man testifying how Christ had saved his soul. He had been a confirmed drunkard and a most inveterate swearer. He had been in the army, and was marked all over with wounds and bruises and scars which he had received through his own and companions' carelessness when intoxicated. Even after his conversion he was afraid to testify lest in the middle of his testimony he should let drop an oath, so habituated had he become to the use of foul language. And that man can now bear confident and grateful witness to the fact that God saved him, took him from the depths of degradation, took away from him the terrible longing for strong drink, which formerly drove him before it as by a whirlwind of desire, and now enables him to live a quiet, consistent Christian life. He is now called 'Hallelujah Joe,' because he is constantly praising God, who has done so much for him."

Jenny's Rap at the Door.—A Christian worker relates: "I was visiting a poor woman who lay ill on what proved to be her death-bed. She had two little girls, one of whom was away on an errand when I called, and the other sat by the bedside, ready to tend her mother, and do anything to alleviate her pain. I read from the Bible, and spoke to her, trying to comfort and prepare her for that journey which she must soon take; and then the girl and I knelt in prayer, and while we were thus engaged, the other daughter came to the door and knocked. Neither of us rose to answer, and soon there came another and more impatient rap. But we still continued in prayer. After a pause there came a third series of knocks, and this was kept up incessantly, until I was obliged to close my prayer hurriedly, and hasten to the door and admit the child. As I was leaving, I said to the little ones, 'Now, girls, there is a great lesson to you in the way Jenny knocked at the door. She kept knocking and knocking until it was opened. Now, just you do the same in prayer; keep praying to God, and He will most assuredly answer you with an abundant blessing.'"

The Boy with the Milk.—Mr. Richie remarks: "I was passing along a country road one very sultry day, and noticing a number of laboring men and women at work in a large field, I leaned over the hedge and watched them. It was extremely warm, and many of the men were much fatigued, and longing for a drink, yet none ceased their labors to satisfy their thirst. But it was noon, and from a distant corner of the field a boy appeared carrying two cans of milk. He placed them on the ground and shouted, 'Hallo!' Almost instantly every implement was thrown aside, and the men all trooped toward him, and soon he was busy dealing out bowls of refreshing milk to the thirsty toilers, who afterward resumed their work. And as I turned away I thought, What a picture that is of this world! God comes into the midst of men and calls out, 'Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.' But, unhappily, thirsty men and women do not flock to Him with the same alacrity as the field-laborers to the boy, though He would give them refreshing drink, and after having drunk which, they would never thirst."

A Penitent Sceptic's Confession.—A Friend of mine in London was visiting a sceptical acquaintance, and as they sat talking the visitor took up a book entitled 'Relying on Jesus.' As he turned over the leaves he remarked, 'That is just my position.' His host looked at him in surprise, and seemed to say, 'I am astonished to think that a man of your calibre should believe that!' 'Do you believe in Jesus?' he asked, recovering from his feigned amazement. 'Yes, I do,' was the reply. 'Some time ago I had an aching void in my heart; I tried everything to satisfy it—pleasure, reading, science, and everything I could think of, but nothing could give me satisfaction until I came to Christ, and now that I have Him I am quite contented. That is a fact.' Then the poor infidel, who but a few minutes before had been boasting of his unbelief gave vent to the true feelings of his heart, and exclaimed, 'For years I have yearned to be satisfied. Will you tell me all about it?' His guest suggested they should kneel, and there on his knees he prayed that Christ might manifest Himself to this anxious one, and soon his friend was able to join in a prayer for himself. Nor did they rest until they could thank God that He had lifted that halting one clear over all the doubts and difficulties that had seemed to beset his way. There is none but Christ can satisfy, and none other can do a helpless sinner good."

An Officer's Cruel Pity.—An Evangelist said: "I heard lately the affecting story of an officer in the army. He had married a very beautiful wife, and God had blessed their union with an only child, of whom both were intensely fond; but the child fell ill, and soon it became evident it would die. It did so. Shortly after the little one's death the mother fell very ill, partly through grief from her painful and irreparable bereavement. Gradually she sank, until at length the Christian doctor gently informed her husband that there was no hope of her recovery, and suggested that he should speak to her about her soul; but the husband would not. Again and again the doctor renewed his appeal, but the husband still refused to speak to his wife of spiritual things, or even tell her that soon she must die. He moreover strictly forbade the doctor doing so. The poor woman herself said, one day, as she held her husband by the hand, 'Oh, John! tell me, tell me the truth; am I dying?' But the husband, from a false and most cruel pity, replied, 'Oh, no! there is very little danger. You will soon be up and about again.' But the end came before she realized how near she was to eternity. She passed away with her sins unforgiven, for she knew not the Saviour. Oh, friends! it is a false delicacy that refuses to warn a fellow-creature who is walking at the edge of the precipice of time, over which they may at any moment topple into eternity."

Mary the Field-Worker's Surprise.—Mr. Love says: "When I resided in one of the most beautiful districts near Glasgow, I was in the habit of speaking to the field-workers, many of whom were Roman Catholics, about their souls. I never ridiculed their religion, and they generally listened to me with great attention. There was one worker—a tall, handsome woman—to whom I spoke repeatedly, and when I would say, 'O Mary, if you but knew my Saviour,' she would reply, 'O laird, laird, it is easy for you to speak, but if you had as many troubles as I, or as bad a wife as I have a husband, it would be quite different.' 'No, I do not think that, Mary; I rather think that troubles would only make me creep closer to Him,' I responded. The other day, as I was walking along the Rutherglen Road, I saw a figure with whom I thought I should be familiar, and as it approached I recognized Mary, the Roman Catholic field-worker. As she came near to me she put out both her hands and exclaimed, 'O Mr. Love, I am so glad to see you! I scarcely thought you would have lived through all your recent misfortune and business losses. If it did not kill you, I was sure you would commit suicide.' 'Far from that, Mary; now I can honestly say I have more joy than ever I had in all my life. Burnside, where I resided for years, was taken from me, but Burnside was not the source of my joy; Jesus Christ is my sure support and the spring of my gladness,' I answered. Mary looked surprised, and replied, 'Oh, what a Saviour you must find Jesus to be!'"

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H.

Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

WRONG USES OF MONEY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 10, 1889.

"They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition." 1 Tim. 6:9.

I. Its Use in Elections—Twenty Millions Spent in Bribery—A Monster Sin—Illustrious Victims—Why Women are Insulted—The Evil in the Nursery—The Bribe an Everlasting Possession—II. In Abuse of Trust Funds—Imprudent Executors—Widows and Orphans the Victims—Cities Defrauded—Frauds in New York—Immunity for Large Offences—Temptations to be Avoided—Mistakes of Parents—An Abbot's Crop of Acorns—A Defective Quarter given to Governor Grimes—The Duke of Wellington's Distresses—Dr. Livingstone's Ancestor—A Railroad Disaster Averted by a Girl

THAT is the Niagara Falls over which rush a multitude of souls, namely the determination to have money anyhow, right or wrong. Tell me how a man gets his money and what he does with it, and I will tell you his character, and what will be his destiny in this world and the next. I propose to speak this morning about the ruinous modes of getting money.

We recently passed through a national election, in which it has been estimated that thirty million dollars were expended. I think about twenty million of it were spent in out and out bribery. Both parties raised all they could for this purpose. But that was only on a large scale what has been done on a smaller scale for fifty years and in all departments.

Politics from being the science of good government has often been bedraggled into the synonym for truculency and turpitude.

A Monster Sin,

plausible, potent, pestiferous, has gone forth to do its dreadful work in all ages. Its two hands are rotten with leprosy. It keeps its right hand hidden in a deep pocket. The left hand is clenched, and with its ichorous knuckle it taps at the door of the court-room, the legislative hall, the congress, and the parliament. The door swings open and the monster enters, and glides through the aisle of the council chamber as softly as a slipped page, and then it takes its right hand from its deep pocket and offers it in salutation to judge or legislator. If that hand be taken, and the palm of the intruder cross the palm of the official, the leprosy crosses from palm to palm in a round blotch, round as a gold eagle, and the virus spreads, and the doom is fixed, and the victim perishes. Let bribery, accursed of God and man, stand up for trial.

The Bible arraigns it again and again. Samuel says of his two sons, who became judges, "They took bribes and perverted judgment." David says of some of his pursuers, "Their right hand is full of bribes." Amos says of some men in his day, "They take a bribe, and turn aside the poor in the gate." Eliphaz foretells the crushing blows of God's indignation, declaring, "Fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery." It is no light temptation.

The Mightiest Have Fallen

under it. Sir Francis Bacon, Lord Chancellor of England, founder of our modern philosophy, author of "Novum Organum," and a whole library of books, the leading thinker of his century, so precocious that when a little child he was asked by Queen Elizabeth, "How old are you?" he responded, "I am two years younger than your Majesty's happy reign;" of whose oratory Ben Jonson wrote, "The fear of every man that heard him was lest he should make an end;" having an income which you would suppose would have put him beyond the temptation of bribery—thirty-six thousand dollars a year, and Twickenham court a gift, and princely estates in Hertfordshire and Gorbury—yet under this temptation to bribery, falling flat into ruin, and on his confession of taking bribes, giving as excuse that all his predecessors took them; he was fined two hundred thousand dollars—or what corresponds with our two hundred thousand dollars—and imprisoned in London Tower. So also Lord Chancellor Macclesfield fell; so also Lord Waterbury perished.

The black chapter in English, Irish, French, and American politics is the chapter of bribery. Some of you remember the Pacific Mail subsidies. Most of you remember the awful tragedy of the Credit Mobilier. Under the temptation to bribery Benedict Arnold sold the fort in the Highlands for $31,575. For this sin Gorgey betrayed Hungary, Abithophel forsook David, and Judas kissed Christ. When I see so many of the illustrious going down under this temptation, it makes me think of the red dragon spoken of in Revelation, with seven heads and ten horns and seven crowns, drawing a third part of the stars of heaven down after him. The lobbies of the legislatures of this country control the country.

The Land is Drunk with Bribery!

"Oh," says some one, "there's no need of talking against bribery by promise or by dollars, because every man has his price." I do not believe it. Even heathenism and the Dark Ages have furnished specimens of incorruptibility. A cadi of Smyrna had a case brought before him on trial. A man gave him five hundred ducats in bribery. The case came on. The briber had many witnesses. The poor man on the other side had no witnesses. At the close of the case the cadi said: "This poor man has no witnesses, he thinks; I shall produce in his behalf five hundred witnesses against the other side." And then pulling out the bag of ducats from under the ottoman, he dashed it down at the feet of the briber, saying, "I give my decision against you." Epaminondas, offered a bribe, said: "I will do this thing if it be right, and if it be wrong all your goods cannot persuade me."

The president of the American Congress during the American Revolution, General Reed, was offered ten thousand guineas by foreign commissioners if he would betray this country. He replied: "Gentlemen, I am a very poor man, but tell your king he is not rich enough to buy me." But why go so far, when you and I, if we move in honorable society, know men and women who by all the force of earth and hell

Could Not be Bribed.

They would no more be bribed than you would think of tempting an angel of light to exchange heaven for the pit. To offer a bribe is villainy, but it is a very poor compliment to the man to whom it is offered.

I have not much faith in those people who go about bragging how much they could get if they would only sell out. Those women who complain that they are very often insulted, need to understand that there is something in their carriage to invite insult. There are men at Albany, and at Harrisburg, and at Washington, who would no more be approached by a bribe than a pirate boat with a few cutlasses would dare to attack a British man-of-war with two banks of guns on each side loaded to the touch-hole. They are incorruptible men, and they are the few men who are to save the city and save the land. Meanwhile, my advice is unless you are invulnerable to this style of temptation. Indeed, if you are naturally strong, you need religious buttressing. Nothing but the grace of God can sustain our public men, and make them what we wish. I wish that there might come an old-fashioned revival of religion, that it might break out in Congress, and in the legislatures, and bring many of the leading Republicans and Democrats, down on the anxious seat of repentance. That day will come, or something better, for the Bible declares that kings and queens shall become nursing fathers and mothers to the Church, and if the greater in authority, then certainly the less.

My charge also to parents is, remember that this evil of bribery often begins in the home circle, and in the nursery. Do not bribe your children. Teach them to do that which is right, and not because of the ten cents or the orange you will give them. There is a great difference between rewarding virtue, and making the profits thereof the impelling motive. That man who is honest merely because "honesty is the best policy," is already a moral bankrupt.

My charge is to you, in all departments of life, steer clear of bribery, all of you. Every man and woman at some time will be tempted to do wrong for compensation. The bribe may not be offered in money. It may be offered in social position. Let us remember that there is a day coming when the most secret transaction of private life, and of public life, will come up for public reprehension. We

we cannot bribe sickness, we cannot bribe the grave, we cannot bribe the judgments of that God who thunders against this sin. "Fie!" said Cardinal Beaufort, "fie! can't death be hired? is money nothing? must I die, and so rich? if the owing of the whole realm would save me, I could get it by policy or by purchase—by money." No, death would not be hired then; he will not be hired now. Men of the world often regret that they have to leave their money here when they go away from the world. You can tell from what they say in their last hours that one of their chief sorrows is that they have to leave their money. I break that delusion. I tell that bribe-taker that he will take his money with him. God will wrap it up in your shroud, or put it in the palm of your hand in resurrection, and there it will lie, not the cool, bright, shining gold as it was on the day when you sold your vote and your moral principle, but there it will lie, a hot metal, burning and consuming your hand forever. Or, if there be enough of it for a chain, then it will fall from the wrist, clanking the fetters of an eternal captivity. The bribe is

An Everlasting Possession.

You take it for time, you take it for eternity. Some day in the next world, when you are longing for sympathy, you will feel on your cheek a kiss. Looking up you will find it to be Judas, who took thirty pieces of silver as a bribe, and finished the bargain by putting an infamous kiss on the pure cheek of his divine Master.

Another wrong use of money is seen in the abuse of trust funds. Every man during the course of his life, on a larger or smaller scale, has the property of others committed to his keeping. He is, so far, a safety deposit, he is an administrator, and holds in his hand the interest of the family of a deceased friend. Or he is an attorney, and through his custody goes the payment from debtor to creditor, or he is the collector for a business house, which compensates him for the responsibility; or he is treasurer for a charitable institution, and he holds alms contributed for the suffering; or he is an official of the city or the state or the nation, and taxes and subsidies and salaries and supplies are in his keeping. It is as solemn a trust as God can make it. It is concentrated and Multiplied Confidences.

On that man depends the support of a bereft household, or the morals of dependents, or the right movement of a thousand wheels of social mechanism. A man may do what he will with his own, but he who abuses trust funds, in that one act commits theft, falsehood, perjury, and becomes, in all the intensity of the word, a miscreant. How many widows and orphans there are with nothing between them and starvation but a sewing machine, or held up out of the vortex of destruction simply by the thread of a needle, red with their own heart's blood, who a little while ago had, by father and husband, left them a competency. What is the matter? The administrators or the executors have sacrificed it—running risks with it that they would not have dared to encounter in their own private affairs. How often it is that a man will earn a livelihood by the sweat of his brow, and then die, and within a few months all the estate goes into the stock-gambling rapids of Wall Street. How often it is that you have known the man to whom trust funds were committed taking them out of the savings bank and from trust companies and administrators, turning old homesteads into hard cash, and then putting the entire estate into the vortex of speculation. Embezzlement is an easy word to pronounce, but it has ten thousand ramifications. There is from the abuse of trust funds. Where is the court-house, or the city hall, or the jail, or the post-office, or the hospital, that in the building of it has not had a political job? Long before the new court-house in New York City was completed, it cost over $12,000,000. Five millions six hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars for furniture! For plastering and repairs, $2,370,000. For plumbing and gas works, $1,231,817. For awnings, $23,553. The bills for three months coming to the nice little sum of $13,151,198.39. There was not an honest brick, or stone, or lath, or nail, or foot of plumbing, or inch of plastering, or ink-stand, or door-knob in the whole establishment.

That bad example was followed in many of the cities, which did not steal quite so much because there was not so much to steal. There ought to be a closer inspection, and there ought to be less opportunity for embezzlement. Lest a man shall take a five-cent piece that does not belong to him, the conductor on the city horse-car must sound his bell at every payment; and we are very cautious about small offences, but give plenty of opportunity for sinners on a large scale to escape. For a boy who steals a loaf of bread from a corner grocer, to keep his mother from starving to death, a prison; but for defrauders who abscond with half a million of dollars, a castle on the Rhine, or, waiting until the offence is forgotten, castle on the Hudson!

Another remark needs to be made, and that is that people ought not to go into places, into business, or into positions than their character. If there be large sums of money to be handled, and the man is not sure of his own integrity, you have no right to run an unseaworthy craft in a euroclydon. A man can tell by the sense of weakness or strength in the presence of a bad opportunity whether he is in a safe place. How many parents make an awful mistake when they put their boys in banking houses and stores and shops and factories and places of solemn trusts, without once discussing whether they can endure the temptation. You give the boy plenty of money, and have no account of it, and make the way down become very easy, and you may put upon him a pressure that he cannot stand. There are men who go into positions full of temptation, considering only that they are lucrative positions.

An abbot wanted to buy a piece of ground, and the owner would not sell it, but the owner finally consented to let it to him until he could raise one crop, and the abbot sowed acorns,

A Crop of Two Hundred Years!

And I tell you, young man, that the dishonesties which you plant in your heart and life will seem to be very insignificant, but they will grow up until they will overshadow you with horrible darkness, overshadow all time and all eternity. It will not be a crop for two hundred years, but a crop for everlasting ages.

I stand this morning before many who have trust funds. It is a compliment to you that you have been so intrusted, but I charge you, in the presence of God and the world, be careful; be as careful of the property of others as you are careful of your own. Above all, keep your own private account at the bank separate from your account as trustee of an estate, or trustee of an institution. That is the point at which thousands of people make shipwreck. They get the property of others mixed up with their own property, they put it into investment, and away it all goes, and they cannot return that which they borrowed. Then comes the explosion, and the money market is shaken, and the press denounces, and the Church thunders expulsion. You have no right to use the property of others except for their advantage, nor without consent, unless they are minors. If with their consent you invest their property as well as you can, and it is all lost, you are not to blame; you did the best you could; but do not come into the delusion which has ruined so many men, of thinking because a thing is in their possession, therefore it is theirs. You have that God has given you. In this vast assemblage there may be some who have misappropriated trust funds. Put them back, or, if you have so hopelessly involved them that you cannot put them back, confess the whole thing to those whom you have wronged, and you will sleep better nights, and you will have the better chance for your soul. What a sad thing it would be if, after you are dead, your administrator should find out from the account-books, or from the lack of vouchers, that you were not only bankrupt in estate, but that you lost your soul.

A Blustering Young Man

arrived at a hotel in the west, and he saw a man on the sidewalk, and in a rough way, as no man has a right to address a laborer, said to him, "Carry this trunk up-stairs." The man carried the trunk up-stairs and came down, and then the young man gave him a quarter of a dollar which was plugged, and instead of being twenty-five cents it was worth only twenty cents. Then the young man gave his card to the laborer and said, "You take this up to Governor Grimes; I want to see him." "Ah," said the laborer, "I am Governor Grimes." "Oh," said the young man, "you—I—excuse me." Then the governor said: "I was much impressed by the letter you wrote me asking for a certain office in my gift, and I had made up my mind you should have it; but a young man who will cheat a laborer out of five cents would swindle the Government of the State if he got his hands on it. I don't want you. Good morning, sir."

I do not suppose there ever was a better specimen of honesty than was found in the Duke of Wellington. He marched with his army over the French frontier, and the army was suffering, and he hardly knew how to get along. Plenty of plunder all about, but he commanded none of the plunder to be taken. He writes home these remarkable words: "We are overwhelmed with debts, and I can scarcely stir out of my house on account of public creditors, waiting to demand what is due to them." Yet at that very time the French peasantry were bringing their valuables to him to keep. A celebrated writer says of the transaction: "Nothing can be grander or more nobly original than this admission. This old soldier, after thirty years' service, this iron man and victorious general, established in an enemy's country at the head of an immense army, is afraid of his creditors! This is a kind of fear that has seldom troubled conquerors and invaders, and I doubt if the annals of war present anything comparable to its sublime simplicity."

Oh! is it not high time that we preached

right beside the faith of the gospel? Mr. Froude, the celebrated English historian, has written of his own country these remarkable words: "From the great house in the city of London to the village grocer, the commercial life of England has been saturated with fraud. So deep has it gone that a strictly honest tradesman can hardly hold his ground against competition. You can no longer trust that any article you buy is the thing which it pretends to be. We have false weights, false measures, cheating, and shoddy everywhere. And yet the clergy have seen all this grow up in absolute indifference. Many hundreds of sermons have I heard in England, on the divine mission of the clergy, on bishops, and justification, and the theory of good works, and verbal inspiration, and the efficacy of the sacraments; but, during all these thirty wonderful years, never one that I can recollect on common honesty."

Now, that may be an exaggerated statement of things in England, but I am very certain that in all parts of the earth we need to preach the moralities of the Gospel right along beside the faith of the Gospel.

My hearer! What are you doing with that fraudulent document in your pocket? My other hearer! How are you getting along with that wicked scheme you have now on foot? Is that a "pool ticket" you have in your pocket? Why, O young man, were you last night practicing in copying your employer's signature?

Where Were You Last Night?

Are your habits as good as when you left your father's house? You had a Christian ancestry, perhaps, and you have had too many prayers spent on you to go overboard. Dr. Livingstone, the famous explorer, was descended from the Highlanders, and he said that one of his ancestors, one of the Highlanders, one day called his family around him. The Highlander was dying; he had his children around his death-bed. He said: "Now, my lads, I have looked all through our history as far back as I can find it, and I have never found a dishonest man in all the line, and I want you to understand you inherit good blood. You have no excuse for doing wrong. My lads, be honest."

Ah, my friends, be honest before God, be honest before your fellow-men, be honest before your soul. If there be those here who have wandered away, come back, come home, come now, one and all, not one exception in all the assemblage, come into the kingdom of God. Come back on the right track. The door of mercy is open, and the infinite heart of God is full of compassion. Come home! Come home! Oh, I would be well satisfied if I could save some young man this morning, some young man that has been astray, and would like to get back.

A Girl Heroine.

I am glad some one has set to music that scene in August of 1881, when a young girl saved from death a whole rail train of passengers. Some of you remember that out West in that year on a stormy night, a hurricane blew down part of a railroad bridge. A freight train came along and it crashed into the ruin, and the engineer and conductor perished. There was a girl living in her father's cabin, near the disaster, and she heard the crash of the freight train, and she knew that in a few moments an express train was due. She lighted a lantern, and clambered up on the one beam of the wrecked bridge on to the main bridge, which was trestle work, and started to cross amid the thunder and the lightning of the tempest, and the raging of the torrent beneath. One misstep and it would have been death. Amid all that horror the lantern went out.

Crawling sometimes, and sometimes walking over the slippery rails, and over the trestle work, she came to the other side of the river. She wanted to get to the telegraph station, where the express train did not stop, so that the danger might be telegraphed to the station where the train did stop. The train was due in five minutes. She was one mile off from the telegraph station, but fortunately the train was late. With cut and bruised feet she flew like the wind. Coming up to the telegraph station, panting with almost deathly exhaustion, she had only strength to shout, "The bridge is down," when she dropped unconscious, and could hardly be resuscitated. The message was sent from that station to the next station, and the train halted, and that night, that brave girl saved the lives of hundreds of passengers, and saved many homes from desolation.

But every street is a track, and every style of business is a track, and every day is a track, and every night is a track, and multitudes under the power of temptation come sweeping on, and sweeping down toward perils raging and terrific. God help us to go out and stop the train! Let us throw some signal. Let us give some warning. By the throne of God let us flash some influence to stop the downward progress. Beware! Beware! The bridge is down, the chasm is deep, and the lightnings of God set all the night of sin on fire with this warning: "He, that, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy."

PERSECUTION OF A CONVERT.

WHAT it costs to become a Christian in Turkey may be inferred from an incident reported to the Missionary Herald by Dr. Parmelee, who thus writes from Trebizonde: A short time ago, the youngest of three brothers belonging to a wealthy Greek family of this town began attendance on our chapel services and identified himself with the Protestant community. It seems that he had been reading the Testament for eight years, but had never before ventured to approach the Protestants. If men in the humble walks of life are violently persecuted, how much more one of the rank of this man! As the youngest brother, whose affairs are subject to the direction of his oldest brother, after the manner of this country, he is of comparatively slight influence; and as the honor of the family was involved, the older brothers sharply resented the affront to their name. They have induced his wife to discard him, and for some two weeks he has been refused entrance to his own house. He was once assaulted when on his way home from an evening service. The excitement has become so general that for two or three Sabbaths great throngs have gathered about our chapel door, waiting for this man, Stephanos, to come out. Until last Sabbath there seemed no special necessity to call in the police, but last Sunday two policemen were sent by the government, and had their hands full to maintain order, as a crowd of five hundred or more was surging to and fro in front of our chapel during the afternoon service. As Stephanos is a Russian subject, it was hoped that the Russian consul would send his cavass to assist in maintaining order and to protect his own subject, but it became evident that he, as a member of the Greek Church, was in hearty sympathy with the persecutors, and even rejoiced at the indignities heaped on poor Stephanos, and was ready to send him into exile. It has seemed best for Stephanos to retire from the popular gaze for a season, until the excitement somewhat subsides. He seemed brave and cheerful, as he started yesterday, putting his trust in the Master, and ready for the worst if called to meet it for His name.

AN INVITATION FROM A PRIEST.

THE waning popularity of Buddhism in Midzumo, a village in Japan, about twelve miles from Nagoya, has had a remarkable result. The Rev. H. Loomis, writing from Yokohama to the Church thus tells the story: It is the history of Buddhism in Japan, as in other countries, that it has adopted and attempted to combine into one all the various systems of worship with which it has come in contact; and so the priest thought that it could be done in the case of Christianity as well as any other creed. Some persons think that his principal object was in this way to increase his own popularity, and also his income. So he invited Rev. Mr. Yamamoto, of Nagoya, to come and tell his parishioners about this new method of securing happiness both in this life and in that to come.

Mr. Yamamoto accepted the invitation, and the temple was thus opened for Christian preaching. The result was such a complete change in the minds and hearts of his hearers that they lost all confidence in their old religion, and they eagerly and sincerely accepted the new. In a short time the priest found himself deserted, and no one seemed to care any more for the Buddhist services; so he went to Nagoya, and the temple is now used for the village school.

In the meantime the number of believers increased, and the good work extended to other and neighboring places. A church has been formed, consisting of about forty members, and a suitable house of worship was recently completed. Three weeks ago last Sabbath I had the great pleasure of being at that place, and uniting with the people in their regular worship. Arriving at the church, we found that just before the service there was a Bible-class, at which nearly the same number was present as were gathered for the preaching. Nearly every person had a copy of the reference New Testament, and their close and serious attention showed that they loved and prized the Word of God. There was no doubt whatever, but that these people had been taught of the Holy Spirit, and had tasted of the sweetness of the blessed hope which is the happy privilege of the true believer.

A BOY'S START IN BUSINESS.

THE following incident in the life of a gentleman, now the President of a bank in New York, is related by Mr. Lanphier, the founder of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting: "A minister died and left two children, a boy and a girl. The widow had only a small pittance to live upon. She was often in great fear that her children would not have bread. When her son reached the age of ten years, he refused longer to be a burden to his mother. The lad resolved to try his fortune in the great centre of trade. He had a distant relative in New York, who offered the boy a home until he could get employment. The lad kissed his mother good-bye, and started out on foot to make, as he said, a man of himself. It was no easy thing to find a position. Bad business was easy to be had. Doors stood wide open where bad men congregated, and the boy had many chances to work in bar-rooms, and wait and tend where liquor was sold. The banks were all full; the insurance companies did not need any one, and to the often repeated question, 'Do you want a boy, sir?' the dry-goods men shook their heads and said, 'No; we have all the help we need.' But Charlie was not discouraged.

"One day he crossed the threshold of a well-known business man. He found the merchant reading the morning paper, and said to him, 'Do you want a boy, sir?' The gentleman looked at him and said, 'What can you do?' 'I will do anything that will give me an honest living.' 'Well, take these boots down-stairs and black them.' Charlie was at home blacking boots; he had been trained to it. His father used to say that blacking ministers' boots was washing disciples' feet. The boy soon returned. The handsome polish on the boots attracted attention, and the merchant said, 'Why, my boy, you have done those very well.' 'Mother told me always to do well whatever I did.' 'Come here to-morrow morning and I will try you, my lad.' He became a success; stood high as a merchant; and he is now a bank-president."

A MISSIONARY'S HEALING.

DURING a recent long missionary journey in Morocco, the Rev. E. F. Baldwin had a remarkable experience of Divine healing. He has been doing his work in strict observance of our Lord's instructions (Matt. 10, Mark 6, &c.), and when he was overcome by sickness he concluded that the plan which had worked so well as to the supply of his physical needs, might wisely be extended to the diseases of the body. He says: After leaving Morocco city, and journeying west towards home, we had to ford many icy streams from the Atlas snows. Yet never once did we take cold. We both had perfect health the entire trip, after getting under way, though Satan made a determined onslaught to turn us back through a stubborn sick headache with which I started, and which hung on for two days. But the Lord healed me of that in answer to prayer, as also He did the night before we left Mazagan, of a troublesome hard swelling in the throat, which I had long had, and which would not yield to remedies. That night I asked the Lord to remove it as an earnest of His approval of our journey. In the morning there was no trace of it. It never returned. Neither did the headache after it was healed, notwithstanding fasting, exposure, sleeplessness, and the excitement of our oft-recurring perils. I mention this to the praise of God's grace. I also confidently expect that those who go out thus, taking God at His word, will find that He will give them "boldness, by stretching forth His hand to heal." (Acts 4: 29-30.) "Heal the sick," is part of the marching orders of Matt. 10, and, according to Mark 16, part of the heritage of those who "believe." It only awaits faith and obedience.

In crossing a swift stream I lost one of my native shoes. So the latter half of the journey was slowly and rather painfully made, for everywhere the road was strewn with stones. However, the circumstance wrought patience, and showed us that the Lord would not have us push on rapidly, but pause and preach in every possible place. These few trials I mention were the richest part of our experience.

A SWEDISH STEWARD'S STORY.

AT the business-men's prayer-meeting in the old John Street church, New York, a few days ago a seaman named George Wilson, a native of Sweden, told a remarkable story. He said that some years ago he was converted in that very church, and from that time on he had been earnestly seeking to lead a consistent Christian life. About two years ago he shipped as steward on board a steamer bound for Cuba. Captain Munsen, who commanded her, was unknown to him, but before many days had elapsed he discovered that he was one of the most cruel, despotic captains afloat. His temper was ungovernable, his conduct brutal, and his language so profane and blasphemous, that it made even ungodly men shudder. Like most men of his stamp, he had an abomination of professors of religion. He made no complaint of Wilson's service. The steward was all that could be desired, for knowing that his faithful discharge of his duties was one means of glorifying his Master before ungodly men, he took extra pains to do his work well. But that did not secure him immunity from the captain's displeasure, no save him from suffering.

One day the captain overheard him praying in his room. He immediately called him, and sternly ordered him to "drop all that." He would have no praying on board his ship. The steward was silent. Would he promise to obey? the captain asked, fiercely. Then Wilson had to speak. As respectfully as he could, but firmly he told the captain that he must pray. He would sooner die than live without prayer. At the ferocity in the man's nature was aroused by the reply. With an outburst of awful profanity he fell upon the steward and beat him unmercifully. It was of no use, Wilson would not promise, and the captain feeling himself defied, struck him several murderous blows, which left him unconscious and disabled for service. At first the crew thought he was dead, but he revived, and when Cuba was reached he was carried to the hospital. He lay a long time, hovering between life and death, but eventually recovered. His ship had sailed on her voyage home, and Wilson, weak from his long illness, was without money in a strange land. In his extremity he applied to the United States Consul, who had compassion on him, and sent him back to New York.

Wilson soon found employment on another ship, and continued his Christian life, speaking for Christ whenever he had opportunity, afloat or ashore. A short time ago, he was at a point in Nova Scotia, and while waiting for his ship to sail, he heard that a seaman lay sick and friendless in a wretched place in the city. Recollection of his own experience in Cuba, and a hope that he might do a service for Christ prompted him to visit the man. As he entered the room, what was his amazement to recognize in the sufferer no other than the Captain Munsen who had nearly murdered him. The recognition was mutual, and the captain started up in terror. At first he supposed it was the ghost of the man whom he had done his utmost to kill. Then when he found that his visitor was really flesh and blood he supposed that he had come to have him rested. He appealed piteously for mercy. "I am dying," he said; "do not prosecute me now. Have pity on a poor dying man!" Wilson speedily reassured him, and told him why he had come. The captain was astonished. That a man whom he had so seriously injured should show so much magnanimity was inexplicable to him. Wilson read the Bible to him, prayed with him, and left a little money to relieve his most pressing wants. When he went to see him again, he found that his kindness had completely broken down the captain's heart. He was humble, child-like, and subdued. Wilson continued to visit him while in port, and was enabled to lead him to Christ. Since that time he has been mercifully restored to health, and in a letter to Wilson, said that he is now a member of a Methodist church.

PALIGGENESIA.*

The Three Days Before Christ's Resurrection—An Intimation of the Believer's Condition—II. Light from the Apocalypse—III. Paul's Expectation—IV. The Lord's Promise—V. The Fullness of Times—The Christian Warrior at Home—The Restitution.

WHEN the weary traveller reaches the top of Mont Blanc, he sees as a unit, lying at his feet, the shores and the blue waters of the Mediterranean Sea, and the beautiful landscapes of France and Italy. It seems as if he takes in the utmost limits at once, and is passing by unnoticed, smaller objects between those outstretched boundaries; and it is a similar experience that we have in the diverse subjects treated of in the Word of God.

There is a line drawn where the beginning is closely connected with the end. Events which should happen between those two periods are scarcely mentioned, and this a close observer of the Holy Writ will find to be a common rule. God overlooking the ages, stands, as it were, on the holy mount of His foreordained plan and purpose, and speaks of everything as an accomplished fact, without mentioning every particular link in that chain. The fall of man and his restoration are found in Gen. 3: 16, in a few words; and yet ages have elapsed, and will elapse before the fulfilment shall be accomplished.

The Abrahamic and Davidic Covenants manifest the same character, and so are the different dispensations which are mentioned by the prophets of old—yea, we find that same peculiar unit about the first and the second coming of our Lord. Often in one verse we read of both, and we can see the utmost boundaries spread before us at once. (Isa. 9: 6, 7; Isa. 11: 4-9; Isa. 54: 8; Ezek. 39: 26, 29; Matt. 3: 12; Matt. 18: 19, 20; Acts. 4: 27, 28.)

We find that same view everywhere in Scripture, in regard to the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and of the glory which shall be revealed; the intermediate state or the departure of the souls of the believers, although explicitly declared in the Old and New Testaments, is far from being as lucid as the glorious doctrine of the Paliggenesia, the glorious return of our Lord Jesus Christ to the renewed earth, and the resurrection of the dead—and the reason why it is so—we answer: Man, being a unit in body, soul, and spirit, must be reunited in body and spirit, and consequently the resurrection of the body, and the union of the whole man must be the subject of our future hope and joy on the renewed earth at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ as the Second Adam.

Erroneous Ideas.

The old Egyptians had their pyramids and their graves—the Patriarchs their Machpelahs—the Kings of Israel their sepulchres—and the prophets their last resting places. The idea of

*Plut. 2: 298, C. Luc. Musc. Enc. 7—also used by Josephus to express the restoration of one to his native country, after the exile to Babylon. It is also used of the renewal of the earth after the Deluge, and of the restoration of Job to his former prosperity. (Bretchneider's Lex.)

the Resurrection, and coming again to life, although only dim in the minds of ancient nations, was bright in the hearts of the true Israelites of old, and brighter still in the hearts of the first Christian believers. (Heb. 11: 35) "That they might obtain a better resurrection," or Paliggenesia.

With the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and the doctrine of purgatory, erroneous ideas about the state of the departed spirits or souls became prevalent. Mahomet and his Koran made new additions to the vulgar but unscriptural ideas and views of the condition and state of the departed ones (the intermediate state of the believers); the resurrection of the body was left in the background, or was virtually denied.

We do not desire to make a hasty statement yet taking a brief survey in regard to the common and prevalent ideas of the nations on this subject, we must come to the conclusion: That a multitudinous host of Christian professors have unscriptural ideas about the future state of the "departed ones," and that they confound the day of death with the coming of Christ, and also with the Judgment Day, both ideas unwarranted in the Word of the Most High. Others maintain the ideas advanced by Swedenborg, and yet others are in a complexed state of mind, maintaining that the souls of the departed are in an unconscious, sleeping state of being until the day of the Resurrection; or, that the soul dies with the body instantaneously, and shall be resurrected unto life at that day.

The Departed Ones.

The ever active condition and nature of the soul after death must be very delightful, or must be terrible, according to the final issue. Memory never dies; the past, and the past life, and how it was spent, must surely be brought to our recollection, and the faculties of the soul being bright and undisturbed, must give a keen edge to the souls of the departed ones. (Gal. 6: 7, 8.) "For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption, but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." The soul living in God (Luke 20: 38), being in a spiritual state and atmosphere, must be free from all materialism, and will enjoy a delight in God and Christ in the Triune God, which is above our present comprehension. It is called, "A rest from labors" (Rev. 14: 13); "A sleep in Jesus" (1 Thess. 4: 14); "An entering into peace" (Isa. 57: 2); and truly, that intermediate state, free from all trouble and misery, must be an ever delightful state of joy spiritual joy in full, of which the soul before death only has tasted a few drops, as the first fruits of the grapes of the heavenly valley of Eshcol. (Rom. 8: 17, 18.)

The Redeemed Body.

Yet, although the souls of the departed believers in Christ enjoy an incomprehensible state of light and glory, their spiritual state of happiness is not entirely perfect as a unit; only one part of their being is in an exalted condition, the other part called the body is not, it is sleeping in the dust, and yet that body "is bought with a price." (1 Cor. 6: 20.) In that body the Holy Spirit dwelt, and "is called a temple of the living God." (2 Cor. 6: 16.) It is consecrated, and rests in hope (Ps. 16: 9), for its exaltation, and for that day, that the whole man shall be redeemed (Rom. 8: 23), waiting for the "Paliggenesia," the renewed earth; and to prove this glorious doctrine, we adduce the following facts and arguments, drawn from the fountain—the word of God.

I. It is an undeniable fact that the interregnum of the three days, which happened, when our blessed Lord rested in His grave, and which are called, "Paradise" for the soul (Luke 23: 43), or "Sheol" (Hos. 13: 14), and "Hades" (1 Cor. 15: 55), "the unseen state" that they are belonging to the state of Christ's humiliation, and are expressed in the Creed in these words, "He descended into hell." Christ's exaltation commenced at the morning of His Resurrection, the foundation and centre of Christianity (1

Cor. 15: 14), is not death, but life; Jesus Christ our Lord was declared to be the Son of God by the resurrection from the dead (Rom. 1: 4), and therefore He declared Himself" (Rev. 1: 18, "the Living One, and I became dead, and behold I am living to the ages of the ages [Amen], and I have the keys of Hades and of death." [Greek.] "To see the living Christ as He is, and to be like Him" (1 John 3: 3), is the bright hope and the full enjoyment of the children of God; and, indeed, we cannot be like Him, in all parts, as long as our bodies remain in the grave. Christ did arise as the firstling, and as the first sheaf of the great harvest—the very emblem of the feast of the Passover, and of the New Year.

II. We have a glimpse of the condition of the redeemed and exalted state of the souls of the witnesses in heaven (Rev. 6: 9-11), who were under the altar, and who had close communion and a holy intercourse with their Lord and Master, and although so highly exalted as they were, yet they had holy longings, expectations, and prayers for a future event, in which they were so greatly interested that "they cried with a great voice, saying: How long, O Master, the holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? And there was given them to each one a white robe; and it was said unto them that they should rest yet for a little time, until their fellow-servants also, and their brethren, which should be killed, even as they were, should be fulfilled." [New Version.]

III. The Apostle Paul in 11 Tim. 4: 7, 8, declares also the same doctrine. He says: "I have fought a good fight. . . . there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing," (Epiphaneia,) personal presence. It is beyond cavil that the apostle does not mean the day of his death, because he combines all who should love Christ's manifestation in person. Let us pause at the wonderful combination, first, at that day, then, of his reward at that day, and last, that it be given to Paul, as a unit. The apostle had served Christ, not only in the spirit, but also in the body, and the crown belongs also in part to the consecrated body of the apostle.

Apostolic Judges.

IV. Studying the promise which our Lord gave to His disciples (Luke 22: 30) settles the question, "That they should sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel," and in Matt. 19: 28 our Lord declares emphatically, "Amen. I say unto you, that ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration, Paliggenesia, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and every one . . . shall receive a hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life." Here is again a glorious combination, the throne of Christ, the thrones of the Apostles—and the reward of all the true followers of Christ—not a word is said concerning the intermediate state. It is all a unit, a consummation of glory on the renewed earth—and, of course, Christ will be seen in His resurrected body, and "the saints with Him," (Jude, verse 14), not, the spirits with Him. The saints come as saints, and must receive their reward, and must rule in their resurrected and glorified bodies (Dan. 12: 2, 3; 1 Cor. 15: 23-28), on earth.

(To be Concluded Next Week.)

The Christian Herald Binder.—Numerous applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar. We have also a cheaper binder, with lace instead of steel fastenings, for 50 cents, postage paid. Subscribers in Canada ordering the binders are, we believe, required to pay customs-duty upon them.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Harrison's Inaugural Address has been received by the majority of the people, Democratic as well as Republican, as a creditable performance of a difficult duty. It is not an easy matter to outline the policy of an administration at its commencement without giving pledges that may prove embarrassing, and without making promises that it may be impossible or unadvisable to fulfil. Gen. Harrison is evidently aware that he has entered upon a very arduous and responsible work, in which he has to use such material as is at his disposal, and which may not be very pliable to his use. He therefore refrained from raising the hopes of the people, but modestly said: "The ideal, or even my own ideal, I shall probably not attain. Retrospect will be a safer basis of judgment than promises." The great question of Civil-Service Reform, to which those words more particularly applied, will evidently not advance under this administration, for the President said: "Honorable party service will certainly not be esteemed by me a disqualification for public office." Such words at the beginning of an administration are full of meaning, and every Democratic officeholder will hear in them the sound of the axe. The most marked feature of the address was the strong and unambiguous expression of adherence to the high tariff. President Harrison planted himself squarely on that issue, and will evidently favor no measures for its reduction. The surplus which it must continue to produce, does not appear to him so dangerous as it did to his predecessor. With liberal pensions, the construction of a new navy, and steamship subsidies, there need be no difficulty in disposing of a surplus, however large, and there is no doubt that, if these means fail, Congress may be safely trusted to find others. The President touched on the subject of electoral reform, with an obvious reference to the South. It is matter for regret that while dealing with that subject he did not also refer to the scandals in the North, especially to the shameless use of money in bribery, which is a growing evil, and which was never so extensive as in the late election. There is to be no change in the foreign policy. The President expressed the general opinion of the country in intimating that, while endeavoring to maintain friendly relations with foreign powers, and avoiding interference in their affairs, the Government will expect a like behavior from them, and would protect our own interests. Finally, in a manly, modest fashion, which commands the respect of all parties, the President said: "God has placed upon our head a diadem, and laid at our feet power and wealth beyond definition or calculation. But we must not forget that we take these gifts upon the condition that justice and mercy hold the reins of power, and that the upward avenues of hope shall be free to all the people."

The Selection of a Cabinet has Evidently proved a difficult task to the new President. The number of slates made up by prominent journals, the volume of advice presented, and the wide difference of opinion even among the leaders of the Republican party, proved, before the nominations were made, how hopeless would be any attempt to satisfy the party or the people. The President, of course, has not succeeded, but he has probably taken the most prudent course for the peace of his administration. He has chosen a Blaine Cabinet; that is, a Cabinet in which Mr. Blaine is the only statesman of the first class, and the only conspicuous member. To have omitted Mr. Blaine would have involved that gentleman's antagonism to the administration, and would have raised against it a host of enemies who are under Mr. Blaine's influence, and would have obeyed his orders. It is better to have him as an ally than as an enemy. With Mr. Blaine as Secretary of State, the other selections were made in accordance with that one. Mr. Windom as Secretary of the Treasury, has already proved his capacity for dealing with the finances of the nation, having held the office in President Garfield's Cabinet. Mr. Redfield Proctor, who is Secretary of War, is but little known in military circles, but has a good record as Governor of Vermont. General B. F. Tracy, who is Secretary of the Navy, appears to have been nominated as a compromise. It was necessary to recognize the Empire State, and the President found the two wings of his party there so bitterly opposed to each other that he judged it expedient to appoint a man not closely identified with either section. General John W. Noble, of Missouri, the Secretary of the Interior, is a personal friend of the President, as is Mr. W. H. H. Miller, the Attorney-General. Mr. John Wanamaker, the Postmaster-General, probably owes his appointment to his large contribution to the Republican campaign fund, but his phenomenal success in business indicates the possession of organizing and administrative ability, which is the most important desideratum in the Post Office. General Rusk, the Secretary of Agriculture, is the well-known ex-Governor of Wisconsin, whose tact and forbearance in the time of the threatened riots won for him general admiration. It is to be regretted that there is in the Cabinet no representative of the South. It would have been a graceful act, in the circumstances, to have selected one of many eminent Southerners, any one of whom would have given strength to the political family.

The British Government has Appointed a successor to Lord Sackville. He is Sir Julian Pauncefote, at present permanent Under Secretary of the Foreign Office. He is over sixty years of age, and has held various responsible positions under the Government. The appointment is said, by those who know Sir Julian, to be a wise one. High encomiums have been passed upon him by the press for learning and ability, and, what is of more consequence still, his discretion and tact. The Americans, says one writer, would possibly prefer another lord, but they ought to have taken more care of the one they had.

The Abdication of King Milan of Servia was announced on March 6. His incapacity as a ruler, and his despicable private character, render the step a welcome one to his subjects. Milan resigns in favor of his son Alexander, a lad under thirteen years of age. He appoints three regents to govern during his son's minority. Milan himself is thirty-five years old, having been born in 1854. He was proclaimed Prince in 1872, and was crowned King in 1882. It is stated that his reason for resignation is that he has been suffering for some months from a nervous malady, which has become worse since the death of the Crown Prince of Austria.

He looks outwardly well and strong, but he is subject to paroxysms of violent excitement, followed by complete mental prostration. He is haunted by dismal presentiments, and suffers much from insomnia. He declares that he cannot continue to govern except with danger to his reason, and perhaps to his life.

The New French Cabinet was Victorious in its first struggle in the Legislature. M. Tirard, the Premier, showed in the debate unexpected vigor and audacity. The ministry was arraigned for the suppression of the Patriotic League. M. Tirard, defending the act, said: "The League of Patriots is a hot-bed of discord for the nation. It made common cause with the avowed enemies of the Republic. Public welfare and national safety demand that it should be stamped out, and I assert here once for all that the Government will do energetically whatever it believes to be its duty, and it will not flinch from threats, nor will it be bullied by any one. . . . The League of Patriots bears in its very title a lie. It is not made up of patriots, but is an electoral machine, got up to put one man on the dictatorial throne of France." The Legislature expressed its confidence in the Government by a vote of 348 to 220.

A Conciliatory Speech by Mr. Parnell was made last week in the course of a debate in the House of Commons on the Irish question. Expressing confidence that Englishmen would soon recognize the possibility of home rule for Ireland, he said he only asked that they should deal with the question as an open one, and consider how far they could concede home rule with safety to their own greater interests. It was right that the smaller country should conciliate the larger, and agree to all safeguards necessary for the security of the latter's interest. Ireland was willing to do so, and he was convinced that Irishmen, knowing that the people of England and Scotland and Wales had for the first time turned the ear of reason to the solution of the question, would steadily resist any incitement to disorder, and hold fast to the true way pointed out to them in 1885 by Mr. Gladstone. The Cabinet minister who replied to Mr. Parnell reminded him that other Irishmen who had spoken during the debate had assumed a very different attitude. He appeared to imply that if all the Irish members, and those who might be expected to govern Ireland if home rule were granted, showed a spirit similar to that of Mr. Parnell, England would be more ready to make concessions than she now is.

Extensive Additions to the British Navy are under consideration. On March 7 a proposal was made in the House of Commons by the representative of the department to build eight first-class men-of-war of 14,000 tons each, and two of 9,000 tons, nine first-class cruisers, twenty-nine smaller cruisers, four of the Pandora type of cruisers, and eighteen of the Sharpshooter type of torpedo vessels. The total tonnage of all these vessels will be 318,000, and the total cost $107,500,000. The construction of the vessels would take four and a half years. Half the cost is to be taken from the consolidated fund, and the other half to be raised in additional taxes spread over seven years. One half of the work is to be done by the Government, and the other half in private shipyards. He did not think that the proposed naval increase would induce other nations to attempt to rival England in naval strength, because England had refrained from military rivalry. Further, he did not believe any other Power was capable of executing such an extensive programme in so short a time. A curious fact is that the opposition to the scheme comes from the conservative supporters of the Government led by Lord Randolph Churchill.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $7. They are: from Osage City, Kan., $1; Bassein, Burmah, $1; Des Moines, Iowa, $5. A minister in Monroe County, Tennessee, who received THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through this fund last year writes: "I pray you, if there is any money in your fund for colored ministers, to continue my name on your list another year. I am very poor, and have great need of the help your paper gives. Since I have received it I have gained so much knowledge of the Bible, and so many things, that were dark to me before, are light now, that I do not know how to express my gratitude. Mrs. Baxter's lessons have been a blessing to my own soul, and the ideas I have got from the sermons of Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage have helped me so much in teaching and explaining the Word, that my people have been blessed too. May the Lord bless the editors and the paper, is my earnest and sincere prayer."

A Second-Advent Conference was Held in London on March 5 and 6, to commemorate prospectively the great day of days, in 1896, when, as many of the most able and earnest students of prophecy believe, Christ will appear to summon those waiting Christians who are looking for Him, to meet Him in the air, and to raise those from the dead who have died in faith. The reasons for this belief, based on a careful calculation of prophetic dates, were fully explained in these columns in 1887 in a series of articles by Rev. M. Baxter, showing that April 11, 1901, will be the exact termination of the 2,345 years from the command to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem in Passover Week 444-5, and consequently in the literal day fulfillment, March 5, 1896, will be the termination of the sixty-nine weeks divided or cut off, and the date of the rapture of the waiting believers. (Dan. 9: 25, 26.)

We Rejoice to Learn that the Rev. W. F. Re Qua's efforts to help the orphans of Indians in the Indian Territory is to receive help from some of the King's Daughters in Brooklyn, N. Y. Miss Kate Viell informs us that an effort is being made among them to help Mr. and Mrs. Re Qua to take charge of at least a few of these poor bereaved waifs. The means proposed are to be explained at an entertainment which will be given on March 19, in the Marcy Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn, and it is hoped that the sympathy of other "tens" will be enlisted. It would be difficult to conceive of any case standing in more urgent need of friends who will "lend a hand."

Novel Coal Mining is Being Carried On by a farmer in Pennsylvania. His farm lies on the bank of a creek in Northumberland County. He recently made the discovery that the bed of the creek consisted of pure anthracite coal, the accumulation of many years' washings from the mines that border the stream almost its entire length. This immense bed of coal ranges in thickness from two to eight feet, and is washed thoroughly from the fine dirt. The farmer had a peculiar screen-dredge constructed, and put it in operation. He was rewarded by the extraction of six tons of bright, clear coal at the first point mined, and the bed of coal was not even then exhausted. There is reason to believe that the whole bed of the creek is equally rich, and dredges are being made to work it in other places. It appears that, for years past, coal has been found in small quantities on the edge of the creek at low water, but no one has attempted until now to mine for it under the water. It is so in spiritual matters. Unlimited riches of grace are within reach, but Christians are content with the little that is attainable without trouble. (Heb. 5: 12.)

A Complaint Against Sea-Captains was Made last week by the Chief of the Hydrographic Office. He said that a month ago he posted in the Maritime Exchange a notice requesting captains to report to the office any perils of the sea they might observe, so that they could be entered on the charts. Not a single response to the notice had been received, although it was known that there had been several narrow escapes. In one case the chief learned that a vessel had struck, near Staten Island, a submerged coal barge. Search was made for the barge, and it was found that the obstruction was in mid-channel; it was not a barge, but a reef of rocks, not previously known, and not in the charts. Arrangements were promptly made by the office for the removal of the rocks. Since the notice has been posted, no less than six captains who have seen derelicts have visited the Exchange, yet have not reported them. The chief justly observed that this failure on the part of seafaring men to assist the Hydrographic Office in reducing the perils of their calling is inexplicable. Their indifference to the danger of their brethren is paralleled by the indifference of many professing Christians, who, knowing that souls around them are in danger of eternal shipwreck, yet do not warn them. (Ezek. 33: 6.)

The Discovery of a Cure for Hydrophobia was reported from Peru, February 24. A press dispatch from Panama states that in Ayacucho, Peru, a man was bitten by a mad dog, and shortly after the disease developed. In his madness the man rushed from the house, and, falling among a lot of "peuca" plants, some of the juice of these plants entered his mouth, and he swallowed it. A moment of reason seems to have followed, during which he seized some of the leaves, broke them, and drank of the milky and glutinous sap with which they are saturated. When his friends found him he was senseless, with the "peuca" or "maguey" leaves clutched in his hands. He was carried to his home, and soon regained his health. Experience has long since taught the Indians that "peuca" sap invariably acts as a cure upon dogs suffering from hydrophobia. Now that a man has been cured of this terrible malady by peuca leaves we may expect that they will always be administered to persons similarly affected. Men do not act in dealing with physical diseases as they do with spiritual disease. Souls are perishing continually of the malady of sin, and the sovereign and effectual remedy of the gospel, which never fails, is not used. (Jer. 8: 22.)

A Lady's Adventure in a Cistern is Described by the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. It states that during the recent severe snow-storm, a lady taking a short cut for her home over a vacant lot, on the north side of the city, stepped over the opening of a cistern that was concealed by the snow, and she fell to the bottom, eighteen or twenty feet. There was about three feet of water in the cistern, yet the force of the fall bruised her severely. She screamed for help, but her voice could not be heard any distance outside the cistern. The water in the cistern was cold, and she was becoming so numb that her position assumed a horrible seriousness. Happily a long piece of valve of an old wooden pump had been left in the cistern. It was just long enough to reach the top of the cistern, and she managed to raise it there, but she found that she could not climb it while encumbered by her heavy clothing. As a last resort, she divested herself of her outer garments, and after the exertion of all her strength she finally pulled herself safely to the surface. There is no such means for self-deliverance in the pit in which the sinner finds himself when he realizes his lost condition. He can escape only by calling in faith upon Christ, who lifts him out, but he too must divest himself of the impeding garment—the garment of his own righteousness—before he can be saved. (Ps. 40: 2.)

The Recovery of a Lost Daughter Brought a double joy to a home in Chicago recently. Nearly a year ago a little girl about six years of age, the daughter of a blacksmith living on State Street, was lost. Inquiries were made about her, and it was learned that she had been seen in company with a strange woman near her home on the day of her disappearance. The police failed to trace her, and the father closed his business and gave all his time to the search. He too failed, and, though he was a strong, stalwart man at the time, his anxiety and distress, and his long travels in search of the child, brought him down to a mere skeleton. His mind began to fail; he grew morose and distrustful of his friends, and eventually became completely demented. Two week ago a lady visiting the Home for the Friendless, saw a child there whose appearance tallied with the description of the blacksmith's lost daughter. Inquires about her elicited the fact that she had been taken, a few days previously, from a woman who was ill-using her. Her identity was clearly established, and she was taken to see her father in the Lunatic Asylum at Kankakee. He recognized her immediately, and his joy resulted in the complete restoration of his reason. He was released, and there was a happy time in the home when the father and child were both restored to it. Such joy will there be in heaven when the lost sinner is received there, and, with Him who suffered and died on his account, sits down in the Kingdom of God. (Luke 15: 10.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. Jacob Freshman and his devoted wife have gone to Jerusalem for combined rest and labor. Mr. Freshman asks prayers for a blessing on his visit.

The Chinese Sunday-school, numbering one hundred men, which is connected with Dr. A. J. Gordon's Clarendon Street Baptist Church in Boston, has voted to support three native missionaries in China.

The Rev. A. H. Lackey, D. D., the Kansas evangelist, has been laboring in southern Oregon. In some cases the churches where he has been have received additions nearly doubling their former membership.

Washington C. H., Ohio, has been the scene of a wonderful revival since the week of prayer. A continued series of services for two months, with hundreds of anxious seekers, has been held, and the work is still going on.

Miss Maggie M. Jenkins, of Rushville, Ill., has been conducting revival services at King Street Church, Chambersburg, Pa. The interest has been remarkable, and considerable additions have resulted to the church.

Mr. Moody, after holding thirty days' services in San Francisco, commenced work in Oakland. He is assisted by Mr. Stebbins and Miss Pool. The Pavilion, which holds nearly 5,000 has been crowded at every meeting.

Out of the five hundred and fifty-five adult converts baptized by the English church missionaries at Amritsar, India, since the establishment of the mission in 1852, no less than two hundred and fifty-three have been converts from Islam.

The Twenty-eighth Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and of the Dominion of Canada will hold its sessions in Philadelphia, beginning Wednesday, May 8, and ending the Sunday evening following.

The Rev. E. Payson Hammond's two weeks' services in Big Rapids, Mich., have been followed by a second blessing. The persons, young and old, who were led to Christ at his services, have made themselves a mission band to bring their relatives and friends into the fold.

The Rev. R. G. Pearson closed a very successful series of union evangelistic meetings in Houston, Tex., on February 24. Bible readings in the morning and preaching in the evening for three weeks were held, and the result has been many conversions and the restoration of backsliders. Mr. Pearson is now at Columbia, S. C.

Two Bagdad Jews have bought the entire site of ancient Babylon. On this, Le Chrétien Belge well remarks: "Is it not a significant fact that two Israelites should today possess the soil and the ruins of the immense city where their ancestors were captives and slaves, and of which their prophets had announced the destruction?"

Widespread revival has taken place in Coleraine and Limerick, in connection with Major Whittle's meetings in Ireland. Hundreds of young men and women have professed their faith in a newly found Christ. Major Whittle will visit Tralee, Clonmel, and Waterford, giving one week to each, before commencing his mission in Edinburgh.

The Rev. E. E. Davidson has had a remarkably successful time at Dansville, N. Y. The Presbyterian, Baptist, Lutheran, and Methodist churches united in his meetings, and held preliminary meetings for prayer before he commenced his labors. Two services were held each day, and all the churches have received additions from God's blessing on his work.

Gipsy Smith closed his meetings at the Central M. E. Church, New York, on March 11. An unusually large attendance and a continually deepening interest characterized the work throughout. Mr. Smith commences meetings at Long Island City on March 17, to fill the place of Mr. Ira Sankey, who is sick. The converts in the work at the Nostrand Avenue Church, Brooklyn, number nearly 200.

FOUR STUPENDOUS THINGS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong; because He hath poured out His soul unto death; and He was numbered with the transgressors; and He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." Isa. 53: 12.

The Divine Covenant—The Glorious Reward—The Four Things for Which it is Conferred—I. He Bore the Death Penalty—A Deliberate Libation—Voluntary—Complete—II. Numbered with Sinners—By the Tongue of Slander—By a Court of Justice—By God's Treatment—III. The Sin-Bearer—Died not as an Example—Not Solely to Exhibit God's Love—Atonement the Only Rational Explanation—IV. The Intercession—By Authority—A Reward Due Him for His Work—Does not Shrink from Sinners—An Example.

We may regard this verse as a kind of covenant made between the everlasting God, the infinite Jehovah, on the one part, and our great Representative, Mediator, and Redeemer, the Lord Jesus Christ, on the other part. The incarnate God is to be bruised and wounded; He is to pour out His soul unto death, and by a travail of soul He is to bear the sin of many; and then His ultimate reward is to be, that God will divide Him a portion with the great, and He Himself shall divide the spoil with the strong. Note the double recompense, and joyfully distinguish between that which Jehovah makes for Him, and that which He makes Himself. Our champion, like another David, is to confront and conquer the great enemy of the Lord's people, and then He is to have His reward. Unlike David, He is to pour out His soul, and die in the conflict, and then He is to receive a glorious portion from the Father, and He is also Himself to seize upon the spoil of the vanquished foe.

At this moment, our Lord Jesus is enjoying the reward which His Father has allotted Him: "Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great." He is no more despised and rejected. Who dare do dishonor to a majesty so surpassing? See how the whole host of heaven adores Him! All the pomp of glory is displayed around Him. To Him the cherubim and seraphim continually do cry, in their ceaseless worship and adoration. He has His portion with the great; none are so great as He. He lives forever, King of kings and Lord of lords, and all hallelujahs come up before Him. Imagination cannot reach the height of His immeasurable majesty and felicity.

And why these honors? What has He done to merit these immeasurable glories? The answer is that He has done these four things: "He hath poured out His soul unto death; and He was numbered with the transgressors; and He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors."

I am going to speak about these four things very briefly. These four things that Jesus did the four reasons why He is crowned with such superlative honor, are connected with you, if you have but faith to perceive the connection—so connected that they will save you, will even make you partake in the glory which has come of them.

I. The first source of the Mediator's glory is, that He, out of His love to guilty men, has unto death. Remember that the penalty of sin is death. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Jesus Christ, our substitute, when He poured out His soul unto death, was bearing the penalty that is due to sin. God has so impressed this truth upon humanity that you can scarcely go into any nation, however benighted, but there is connected with their religion the idea of sacrifice, and therefore the idea of the offering of a life on account of a broken law. Now, the Lord Jesus came into such connection with men that He bore the death penalty which guilty men had incurred.

Remark the expression: "He hath poured out His soul unto death." It is deliberate. "He hath poured out His soul." It is a libation presented with thought and care; not the mere spilling of His blood, but the resolute, determinate pouring out of His whole life unto its last drop—the pouring it out unto death. He was always dying by living at such a rate that his zeal consumed him—"The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." Deliberately, and as it were drop by drop, He was letting His soul fall upon the ground, till at length, upon the tree of doom, He emptied it all out, and cried, "It is finished," and gave up the ghost. Then "He poured out His soul unto death."

As it was deliberate, so it was most real and true. I pray you, do not think of Christ as pouring out His soul, as though the outpouring was a kind of sentiment of self-abnegation; as though it made Him spend a sort of ecstatic life in dream-land, and suffer only in thought, intent, and sympathy. My Lord only more keenly; for He had never injured His body or soul by any act of excess, so as to take off the edge from His sensitiveness. His was the pouring out of a whole soul in all the phases of suffering into which perfect souls can pass. Certainly we shall never experience that pouring out of His soul unto death which was peculiar to Jesus, in which He went far beyond martyrs in their extremest griefs. There were points of anguish about His death which were for Himself, and for Himself alone.

And He did this, remember, voluntarily. If I were to die for any one of you, what would it amount to but that I paid the debt of nature a little sooner than I must ultimately have paid it? for we must all die, sooner or later. But the Christ needed not to die at all, so far as He Himself was personally concerned. There was no cause within Himself why He should go to the cross to lay down His life. He yielded Himself up, a willing sacrifice for our sins. Herein lies much of the preciousness of His propitiation to you and to me. Love, love immeasurable, led the immortal Lord to die for man. Let us think it over, and melt into Loving Gratitude.

"He hath poured out His soul unto death." I will say no more about it, except that you see how complete it was. Jesus gave poor sinners everything. His every faculty was laid out for them. To His last rag He was stripped upon the cross. No part of His body or of His soul was kept back from being made a sacrifice. The last drop, as I said before, was poured out till the cup was drained. He made no reserve; He kept not back even His innermost self: "He hath poured out His soul unto death." Put your trust in Him, then, without reserve. Pour out your souls in full trust, even as He poured out His soul unto death. Come, and rest in Him, and then see the reason why He is crowned with majesty. His death for your sins is the reason why He divides the spoils with the strong. He has His portion with the great because He "died, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God." This, which brought Him so much shame, has now brought Him all His glory. Come, and trust Him! Come, and trust Him wholly! Come, and trust Him now!

II. Secondly, and somewhat briefly. It appears in the text that our Lord did not only bear the penalty due to sinners, but He was Numbered With Sinners.

"He was numbered with the transgressors." There is a touch of nearness to the sinner about this which there is not in the first clause. He bears death for the sinner; but you could not suppose, if you had not read it, that He would be written in the sinners' register. He was not, and could not be, a sinner; but yet it is written, "He was numbered with the transgressors." Oh sinner, see how close Jesus comes to you! Is there a census taken of sinners? Then, in that census, the name of Jesus is written down. "He was numbered with the transgressors." He never was a transgressor; it was impossible that He could be. How, then, was He numbered with the transgressors? This makes it the more marvellous, because it is so hurtful to a man who is pure, to be numbered with the impure. What would any woman with a delicate purity of mind think, if she were numbered with the harlots? What would any honest man among us think if he were numbered with thieves? But that would be nothing compared with the holy Lord Jesus being numbered with the transgressors; and yet to this He submitted for our sakes. This was a stoop, indeed! This was coming down to where the sinner lay, and bowing over him to lift him up.

Our Lord Jesus was numbered with the transgressors, first, by the tongue of slander. They called Him a drunken man and a wine-bibber; they even called Him Beelzebub. That was sharp enough for Him to bear, whom all the angels salute as "Holy, holy, holy"! Accused of blasphemy, sedition, and so forth, He had enough to bear from evil lips. Nothing was too vile to be cast upon Him by those who said, "Let Him be crucified." Reproach never spared the spotless one, but spent its utmost venom on Him. Like the Psalmist, He was the song of the drunkard. The very thieves who were crucified with Him reviled Him.

He was numbered with the transgressors in the courts of justice. He stood at the bar

As a Common Felon,

though He was judge of all. Though they could not find witnesses whose testimony agreed, yet they condemned Him. Though Pilate had to say, "Why, what evil hath He done?" yet He was taken out with two malefactors, that He might die side by side with them; and then, we are told by the evangelist, the Scripture was fulfilled—"He was numbered with the transgressors." (Mark 15: 25.)

And look, my brethren! Oh that I may know how to speak properly on it! The Holy God treated Him as if He were one of us; "it pleased the Father to bruise Him; He hath put Him to grief." God not only turned His back on transgressors, but He turned His back upon His Son, who was numbered with them. God never can forsake the perfectly innocent, yet He who was perfectly innocent said, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken Me?" In the day of the Lord's anger, "He was numbered with the transgressors."

As this is the reason why He is now exalted, it seems to me that you and I ought to feel a mingling of grief and joy at this time to think that the Lord Jesus would condescend to put His name down with transgressors. This theme baffles me altogether. I wish that you would look into it yourselves. Never mind my words. Think of my Lord, and of these two things: "He hath poured out His soul unto death; and He was numbered with the transgressors."

III. That leads me to the third matter by which the Lord Jesus Christ has won His victories, and earned reward. It is this: "He Bare the Sin of Many."

Now, do not think that these words are mine, and, therefore, cavil at them. Deliberately observe that these are the words of the Holy Ghost. "He bare the sin;" "He bare the sin of many." They cavil at us for saying that He bare the chastisement of sin. We shall say it none the less plainly; but we shall go much further, and insist upon it that, literally, Jesus bare the sin of man. You tell me that by wicked hands He was crucified: it was so, and yet the Scripture assures us that this was by the determinate purpose and foreknowledge of God. How could this have been had our Lord had no connection with sin?

"He died," said one, "as an example." But, my dear friends, I do not see that. In His life He is an example to us through and through, and so He is in His death. If we must needs die, it is an example to us that we should die as bravely, as patiently, as believingly, as He did; but we are not bound to die at all, unless God requires it at our hands. Indeed, we are bound to shun death if it can virtuously be avoided. Self-preservation is a law of nature; and for any man to voluntarily give himself up to die with-out some grand purpose, would not be justifiable. It is only because there is a law that we must die that we may judge ourselves permitted to volunteer to die. The Saviour does not set us an example in a sphere into which we cannot enter. In that case He goes beyond us altogether, and treads the wine-press alone.

"Well," say you, "but Jesus Christ died as an exhibition of divine love." This is true in a certain sense; but from another point of view, of all the things I have ever heard, this does seem to me to be the most monstrous statement that could be made. That Jesus Christ, dying because of our sins, is a wonderful

Example of Divine Love,

I do know, admit, and glory in; but that Christ's dying was an instance of divine love, if He did not die because He bore our sins, I entirely deny. There is no exhibition of divine love in the death of Christ if it be not for our sins; but an exhibition of a very different sort. What! Does God put to death His only begotten Son, the perfectly pure and holy being? Is this the finale of a life of obedience? Well, then, I see no love in God at all. It seems to me to be the reverse of love that it should be so. Apart from sin-bearing, the statement that Jesus must needs die the death of the cross to show us that His Father is full of love, is sheer nonsense; but if He died in our room and stead, then the gift of Jesus Christ by the Father is undoubtedly a glorious instance of divine love.

If our Lord's bearing our sin for us is not the gospel, I have no gospel to preach. Brethren, I have befooled you these five-and-thirty years, if this is not the gospel; for I have no hope beneath the copes of heaven, neither in time nor in eternity, save only in this belief—that Jesus, in my stead, bore both my punishment and sin. If our Lord did so bear our sin, we have a firm and joyous confidence. God would not accept a substitute in our place, and then punish us. If Jesus suffered in my stead, I shall not suffer. If another has gone to prison and to death for me, I shall not go there. I do not know how you look upon this doctrine, but it seems to me to be worth telling everywhere.

IV. The last thing is this:

"He Made Intercession

for the transgressors." You see all along, Christ gets His glory by standing side by side with guilty men. A curious mine it is to get gold out of. If there had been no sinners, there could not have been a Saviour. If no sin, no pouring out of the soul unto death; and if no pouring out of the soul unto death, no dividing a portion with the great. If there had been no guilt, there had been no act of expiation. In the wondrous act of expiation by our great Substitute, the Godhead is more gloriously revealed than in all the creations and providences of the divine power and wisdom. But this is the finale of it. He makes intercession for the transgressors. Who among us will take up the part of the guilty? For the guilty we could not plead, so as to deny or extenuate evil. A just man would plead for innocent persons who might be falsely accused; but our Lord made intercession for transgressors. When He was here on earth, how tender He was with transgressors. Women that were sinners came around Him, and He Never Bade Them Be Gone.

She that was taken in adultery, oh, how He dealt with her! When Peter was about to deny Him, He said, "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." Those nights out there on the cold mountains were not spent for Himself, but for sinners. He bore on His heart the names of guilty men. He was always pleading their cause, and when He came to die He said, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." He took their part, you see. He would exculpate them if He could. I dare say that He has often prayed like that for you. When you have been despising religion, and saying vile things about your Lord, he has said,

"Ah, poor soul! It is like the ravings of a man in a fever, who does not know what he is talking about. He does not know what he is saying. Father, forgive him."

Our blessed Lord pleaded thus when He was here; and now He has gone up yonder

He is Pleading Still for the same persons. Though we cannot see through that veil which hides the invisible from us, yet the eye of faith, I hope, is strong enough to see that He is at the Father's side at this moment making intercession for transgressors. I do not picture Him up yonder as using entreaties or pleading to an agony. Oh, no! With authority He intercedes, for He has finished the work, and He claims the reward.

Jesus Christ does not shrink from sinners. What then? O, you sinners, do not shrink from Him! If Jesus does not shrink from sinners—(let me say it again)—ye sinners, do not shrink from Him. If we were to go to-day to some of those unhappy parts of the world (it makes one's blood curdle to think that there are such places), where poor decaying lepers are made to live alone, and if these poor creatures came our way, we should wish them every blessing, and should desire for them every comfort; but while we were expressing our kind wishes we should be gradually edging off, and between ourselves and their horrible pollution. That is not the way in which Jesus acts towards sinners: He draws near, and never sets a hedge between Himself and them. You need not undergo a quarantine before you may enter the port of salvation by Christ. Yonder is a filthy leprous sinner, as full of filth as an egg is full of meat, but Jesus comes right up to him, and lays His hand upon him, and says, "I will; be thou clean." Jesus never keeps at a distance.

But suppose this poor leper began to run away from Him. It would be natural that he should, but would also be very foolish. No, poor creature, stop thy running! Stay thou at Jesus' feet! look thou to Him! Trust Him! Touch His garment and be healed! O, my dear hearers, in this pulpit I seem to stand a long way off from you, and talk to you from afar, but my heart is with you. I wish I knew how to persuade you to come to Jesus. I would use some loving logic, that I have not yet hit upon. How heartily would I entreat you to trust the Son of God, made flesh, bleeding and dying for guilty men! If you will trust Him, He will not deceive you, but you shall be saved, at once and for ever.

And oh, you that love Him, and know Him, will you learn one lesson? and then I will send you home. As Jesus does not shrink from sinners, do not yourselves shrink from them. You are not so pure and holy as He was, and yet He came into the world to save sinners. Go you into the world to seek them.

Be in Earnest after Sinners.

You get so good, some of you, that there is no living with you. If a man sins, you do not speak to him, lest you should be disgraced by his society. What pride! A man is known to be a drunkard, and there are some even of you that are teetotalers, who would not talk with such, but leave them till they are improved, and then you would speak to them. You will do them good if they come to you for it, but you will not go to them: you cannot bring your souls to handle the wound while it bleeds, and touch the filthy while they are foul.

Some are too fine and finikin to look after roughs. But I venture to say to the rough, the ragged, the graceless, the godless, that they are more likely to get a blessing than the self-righteous. I believe that there is more likelihood of converting a downright out-and-out sinner than of reaching the consciences of your very nice, neat, hypocritical people. Do not, therefore, shrink from sinners, for Jesus did not; and as from them He won His brightest trophies, even so may you. Be not ashamed, even if, by talking with sinners, you should come to be taken for one of them, for your Lord Himself "was numbered with the transgressors; and He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." Let it be your vocation, as a man redeemed by blood, to be "the sinner's friend," henceforth and for ever. God help you so to do! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

CRUELTY IN A CONVENT.*

[THE following is an extract from the story of Maria Monk, who escaped from the Black Nunnery of Montreal, Canada, and found shelter in an almshouse in New York.] "One day I had incurred the anger of the Superior in a greater degree than usual; I was ordered to the cells. A scene of terrible violence commenced. After exhausting my strength by resisting as long as I could against several nuns, I had my hands drawn behind my back, a leathern band passed first around my thumbs, then around my hands, then around my waist, and fastened. This was drawn so tight that it cut through the flesh of my thumbs, making wounds the scars of which have never disappeared. A gag was forced into my mouth, after which I was taken by main force and carried down into the cellar and brought to a cell. The door was opened and I was thrown in with violence and left alone, the door being immediately closed and bolted on the outside.

"The bare ground was under me cold and hard, as if it had been beaten down even. I lay still in the position in which I had fallen, as it would have been difficult for me to move, confined as I was and exhausted by my exertions. The shock of my fall, and my wretched state of desperation and fear, disinclined me from any further attempt. I was in almost total darkness, the only light being a slight glimmer which came in through the window far above me.

"How long I remained in that condition I can only conjecture. It seemed to me a long time, and must have been two or three hours. I did not move, but lay in a state of distress, which I cannot describe, from the tight bandage about my hands and the gag holding my jaws apart at their greatest extension. I am confident I must have died before morning if, as I then expected, I had been left there all night. Bye and bye, however, the bolt was drawn, the door opened and Jane Ray spoke to me in a tone of kindness. She had taken an opportunity to slip into the cellar unnoticed on purpose to see me. She unbound the gag and took it out of my mouth. She then asked the Superior to come to me, who asked if I repented in the sight of God for what I had done, and if I would ask the pardon of the Virgin Mary and all the nuns. Replying in the affirmative, I was released, and kneeling before all the sisters in succession, begged the forgiveness and prayers of each.

Disgusting Penances.

The penances were in many cases the embodiment of cruelty. Kissing the floor was a very common penance. Kneeling and kissing the feet of the other nuns was another, as were kneeling on hard peas, and walking with them in the shoes. We had frequently to walk on our knees through the subterranean passage leading to the congregational nunnery, and sometimes to eat our meals with ropes around our necks. Sometimes we were fed only with those things which we most disliked. Garlic was given to me because I had a strong antipathy to it. Eels were frequently given to others because they felt an unconquerable repugnance to them, on account of the current reports of their feeding on the dead carcasses in the River St. Lawrence. It was no uncommon thing for us to be required to drink the water in which the lady Superior had washed her feet. Sometimes we were required to brand ourselves with a hot iron, so as to leave scars; at other times to whip our naked flesh with small rods before a private altar until the blood came.

"One of our penances was to stand for a length of time with our arms extended, in imitation of our Saviour on the cross. Sometimes we were obliged to sleep on the floor in the winter with nothing over us but a single sheet; and sometimes to chew a piece of window glass to powder, in the presence of the Superior. We had occasionally to wear leather belts studded with sharp metallic points round our waists and the upper part of our arms, bound on so tightly that they penetrated the flesh and drew blood. One of the worst punishments inflicted was one with a cap. Some of the old nuns were allowed to inflict it at their pleasure. I have repeatedly known them to go for a cap when one of our number had transgressed a rule, though it might be a very unimportant one. These caps were small, and made of reddish-looking brown leather, fitted closely to the head and fastened under the chin with a buckle. The nun was gagged and her hands tied behind her, before the cap was put on, to prevent noise and resistance. I never saw it worn by anyone without severe suffering. I have endured it more than once; yet I have no idea of the cause of the pain. I never examined one of the caps or saw the inside, for they were always brought and taken away quickly. The first sensation was that of coolness, but before it had been a minute on the head, a violent and indescribable sensation, something like the drawing of a blister, began, and continued increasing in agony until the cap was removed. It would produce pain so acute as to throw us into convulsions, and I think no human being could wear it for an hour. After the punishment we felt its effects for days.

Having once known what it was by experience, I held the cap in heartfelt dread, and whenever I was for any cause condemned to suffer the punishment again, felt ready to do or suffer anything to avoid it. But there was no escape; when I was tied and gagged, with the cap on my head again, I could only sink on the floor and roll about in anguish until it was taken off. And all this was done in the name of religion. Poor deluded creatures! They dream that this punishment is to add to their store of good deeds and will shorten their stay in Purgatory. It is claimed such punishments render them docile and make them fear to disobey the priests.

THE NYASSA AND ITS PEOPLE.

ONE of the districts of equatorial Africa desolated by the slaver is the district surrounding Lake Nyassa, and with the exception perhaps of the borders of Abyssinia none have suffered more from his rapacity and cruelty. Professor Drummond, who visited this region recently, travelled from Lake Shirwa to Lake Nyassa on the mission steamer Ilala, so named after the place where Livingstone died. He says: "One is apt to conclude, from the mere presence of such a thing as a steamer in Central Africa, that the country through which it is passing must be in some sense civilized; and the hourly reminders to the contrary which one receives on the spot are among the most startling experiences of the traveller. It is almost impossible for him to believe, as he watches the native life from the cabin of the Ilala, that these people are altogether uncivilized; just as it is impossible for him to believe that that lurch a moment ago was caused by the little craft bumping against a submerged hippopotamus. A steel ship steaming six knots an hour; and grass huts, nude natives, and a hippopotamus—the ideas refuse to assort themselves, and one lives in a perpetual state of bewilderment and interrogation." Professor Drummond gives a graphic description of the course of the African fever in this region, from which so many brave missionaries have died, and speaks in high terms of the devotion and faith of those who are still laboring on the borders of the great lake.

The three pictures on this page are taken from photographs of the chiefs of three tribes among whom the missionaries are laboring. No. 1 is Chief Katunga of the Makolo tribe; No. 2 is Chief Kafisi of the Angonis; and No. 3 is Chief Malunga of the Yao tribe. How terrible is the darkness and degradation from which the missionaries are trying to rescue these tribes, may be inferred from recently told stories of the Yaos feasting their friends on human flesh, and calling it roast "goat;" of a certain chief wishing for a traveller's skull as a drinking bowl; of whole villages burned and their inhabitants slaughtered by a petty potentate for some fancied slight; of men and women being buried alive at a chief's funeral; and of the ordeal of a poisoned cup for witchcraft.

JENNY'S LOVER.

At the dinner-table of a country parsonage, a number of guests were gathered to meet young Laverack, the son of the clergyman of the parish, who had just graduated from his college with high honors, and was about to enter on his work as a Christian minister. The conversation turned upon a work of fiction which was being widely read.

"You see," said one of the guests, "the book shows us what the new Christianity will be. It will evidently be an enlightened philanthropy based on the life and teaching of Jesus. As to His divinity and sacrificial death, both of course must be abandoned. He was a good man, a wise teacher, and He died a martyr's death; but He was nothing more."

"Yes," said the clergyman, "I know that is the new plan, and I am sorry that it is so. I do not believe it is true, and I do not believe that, if it were, it would be effectual."

"I met with a case in point while I was in college," said young Laverack. "There was a tall, well-made young fellow employed in one of the hotels to wheel the baggage and do odd jobs about the place. He seemed too smart and too well educated for such work, and I was curious to learn why he was not in a better position. I found that he was given to drink. Not a regular toper, but subject to outbreaks every month or six weeks. When the thirst came upon him he was almost a maniac. He felt that he must have liquor or die. Then he would drink for a week or more, and would not be sober till his money was gone. He could keep no regular employment."

"I managed to win his confidence, and found him utterly hopeless. He told me that some years ago, in one of his fits of drunkenness, he had nearly killed a man, and had served a term in prison for the offence. When he came out, the girl he loved refused to have any more to do with him, and his family and friends turned their backs upon him. That of course did not help him, and he went where no one knew him, and abandoned himself to his fate. He had made several efforts to reform, but had always failed, and he finally lost all hope. Nothing, he said, could redeem the past, and it was of no use making any more struggles,

"I tried my utmost to inspire him with hope, for he was a man worth saving, but it was futile. I was reluctant to abandon him, and I made his case the subject of prayer. Acting on an impulse which came to me, I ceased pleading with him about the drink, and preached the gospel to him. Not the new Christianity, but the old-fashioned gospel, that 'God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son.' I wish you could have seen the change in him when I got the doctrine into his poor rum-soaked brain. Maverick felt hope for the first time in seven years. The knowledge that Christ died for him, that pardon for the past and strength for the future might be had, made a new man of him. It is nearly two years ago, and the change holds. He has never tasted liquor since, and all that he needs to make him a thoroughly happy man is reconciliation with his family and with the girl he still loves.

"Now, I said to myself as I witnessed this change, is there any other power known to man that could have effected it? There is none; therefore, let the critics say what they will about the inspiration of the Bible, and the doctrine of vicarious atonement, I will preach, as long as I live, nothing but Christ crucified—to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; but to them that believe, the power of God and the wisdom of God."

A silence fell upon the party as the young man ended his story, and nothing further was said that evening about the "new Christianity."

The next morning young Laverack was helping his sister prepare some evergreens for the decoration of a little mission chapel for a social gathering, when she asked: "What did you say was the name of that young man of whom you were telling us last night?"

"Maverick," replied her brother; "curious name, is it not?"

"Yes, and so uncommon that I believe he must be the young man that our maid, Jenny, was engaged to. His name was Maverick, and she told me that she broke with him on account of some disgrace."

"Then I must speak to her," said her brother. "Please call her here at once."

Jenny, neatly attired, and bright and winsome-looking, quickly responded. A few questions from Miss Laverack drew from her the story, and fully established the identity of her discarded lover with the man whom young Laverack had been the means of reclaiming. But Jenny added a declaration that no power on earth would ever bring them together again. She was afraid of his violent, murderous temper when under the power of drink. "I have done with him forever," she said, firmly.

"But suppose," said Mr. Laverack, "that a power not of earth had transformed him once for all?"

Jenny said the news would be too good to be true.

"I believe you love him still, Jenny," said Miss Laverack.

Jenny was silent, but she blushed and looked down. Then Mr. Laverack told her what had occurred; and as she listened, tears came in her eyes, and her flushed face told how deeply she was moved. That night a letter was mailed, with Jenny's permission, to the reclaimed man, telling him that he might come and claim her for his own.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Crossing the Atlantic.

TOWARDS the end of the year 1855 it was determined that a company of Mormon emigrants, numbering several hundreds, should leave Liverpool en route for Salt Lake City; and for that purpose a vessel was chartered early in November. This was not the ordinary season for emigration, but there were then in England numbers of the Saints anxious to go to Zion, but too poor to pay their passage all the way. It was thought that when they arrived in New York they would have time to earn sufficient to carry them on, and it was then supposed that they could join those who came over by the ordinary spring emigration. My husband and myself were counselled to join those emigrants and proceed at once to New York.

The Mormons in London were very kind to us before we left, and did all they could to help us in preparing for our journey. My husband had been directed to take charge of the emigrants in the transit from London to Liverpool, and consequently I received no assistance from him. It seemed to me a very cruel arrangement for the Elders to take away from me and my helpless little ones the very person to whom we ought naturally to have turned for protection; but what were the feelings of a weak woman when they came in conflict with the "counsel" of men who claimed to be inspired Apostles?

We arrived at Liverpool the same evening, and there my husband was relieved of the charge of the company, and some of the brethren were appointed to see that the baggage was safely transferred from the railway to the ship. Early the next morning we went on board, and it was not long before we began to experience the pleasures (?) of an emigrant life.

In these days of rapid progress it is scarcely possible to conceive the great difference between a journey to Utah in the present day, and one in the days under review. Now, with our fast steam-vessels the journey from Liverpool to New York can be accomplished in from eight to ten days; then, with even the best sailing vessels a month was considered a quick passage. Now, the distance from New York to Salt Lake City is traversed in a few days by a pleasant journey on the great Pacific railway; then, it took as many months as it now takes days, travelling by wagons or on foot over regions without roads and almost unexplored, full of dangers from the Indians, from the severity of the climate, and from other causes.

The accommodation on board the Atlantic vessels also bears no comparison. Now, even for steerage passengers everything is regulated to conduce to the order, comfort, and health of the passengers; then, it was all confusion, each one looking after himself, with the result that the weaker ones were left in a most miserable condition. But even at this time, it must be said, to their credit, that the Mormons conducted themselves in a more orderly manner than other emigrants, and when the passengers were composed entirely or mainly of them, things went very smoothly, and the captain who had charge of the vessel with such passengers was considered very fortunate indeed.

Mr. Stenhouse describes such a passage as follows: "After they got over the effects of the first rolling of the vessel they were summoned morning and evening to prayers; they sung their hymns, and the Elders gave them instructions about their daily duties. On Sundays, if the weather was favorable, they had preaching between decks, and rejoiced together in the deliverance they had gained from 'Babylon,' and spoke of the bright future that lay before them. Even when several hundreds were on board, there was no rush or confusion to get first to the cooking galley (how different to our experience, owing to the Irish emigrants, will be seen presently). The whole ship was nominally partitioned off into wards, and a member of the priesthood placed over each. These presidents arranged the order and time for each ward to see to their cooking, and every day the order was changed. Thus they realized, there, if nowhere else, that the 'first shall be last, and the last first.'

"Everything on board ship was done to order; no smoking or drinking was allowed, and the sailors or other passengers were not permitted to make love to the young sisters. It is fair to add that on shipboard, as well as on terra firma, love would break through bolts and bars, and some of the sisters, who had less grace than others, 'forgot their covenants.' On several of the trips the returning missionaries were successful in converting passengers and sailors. On one occasion nearly the whole crew were baptized. A canvas raft was soon made and hoisted over into the sea, and there the Elder would stand, and with uplifted hand would announce his authority, and immerse his convert in the briny deep 'for the remission of his sins.' That sailor, or that passenger, could then associate with the 'Saints,' and rejoice in salvation; but even that pleasant reminiscence is tainted with the unwelcome reflection that, in some cases, the conversion did not last long, and more than one trusting maiden had to suffer the consequences of a hasty marriage.

"Now everything is changed. Instead of the nine months' journey by sea and land, it is the work of days. The agent at Liverpool sees the emigrants on board, and another of his agents meets the 'Saints' on arrival at New York. Everything is prepared, there is nothing to ask. The officer who has charge on board knows before he leaves Liverpool the exact amount of fare that every family has to pay for the remainder of the journey; He collects their gold and silver; and the agent at New York, without a moment's loss of time, knows where to make his exchange. The railroad tickets are already in his office, and if the steamer has arrived early in the day, the immigrants are whirled out of the city in the evening on a special train, and onward they travel over the Pennsylvania, and Pittsburg and Fort Wayne railroads to Chicago. A baker is telegraphed when the train will arrive in that city, and he is ready with the staff of life.

"A brief rest, and permission to get the extra cheese or sausage, and off they are again, the engine steaming and snorting over the Chicago and Northwestern line for Omaha. Another baker with supplies, a few hours' rest, or it may be half a day, to stretch their limbs, and then they make the final change of cars that carries them over that magnificent national highway, the Union Pacific Railroad, to the Zion of the latter days, the goal of their hopes, and the land of their inheritance."

Thus it is that those who now emigrate at their own expense can do it in a most economical way, and enjoy much more comfort, and much less anxiety and trouble than if they were to travel alone, or apart from the emigration agency. For the poorest classes, who could not afford to pay their own expenses, a provision was made in 1849, by the establishment of a fund, under the name of "the Perpetual Emigrating Fund, Company," to which the faithful in all countries were invited to subscribe. It procured for the poor the means of going to Salt Lake City; but whatever advances were made were only in the form of a loan, the amount advanced being repaid in money or kind, or days of labor for wages mutually agreed upon.

In 1854 Brigham Young and the leading elders being anxious to draw the converts to Salt Lake, called upon the faithful to subscribe liberally to this fund, and to set them a good example, Brigham offered to present a valuable city house and plot of ground, if any purchaser could be found wealthy enough to purchase it. A new English convert, named Tenant, purchased it at the price of $30,000, and set out for "Zion," expecting to take possession. However, he died on the journey, and when his wife and children arrived in the city and claimed the property, which both morally and legally was theirs, they were told that the transaction was not made with them, but with Mr. Tenant; and all their efforts to obtain it were utterly unavailing. This reduced the widow to a miserable state of poverty, from which she never recovered. This is but one sample of the prophet's "honesty."

Before we set out for Liverpool, I had been told that on board ship I should be able to obtain all the "help" that I might desire; and, anxious to provide for the comfort of the children, I engaged the services of two young girls to look after them and assist me generally. This was an imprudent step, as I afterwards found to my cost; but at the time I thought that I had made a very sensible arrangement.

Help being secured, my next thought was to get our berths fixed, so that all might be ready before the rolling of the ship began. My first inquiries were for our bedding; but it was nowhere to be found. Now this was very annoying, for we were all tired, and the children, poor things, were fidgetty; and anticipating a long and unpleasant voyage, I wanted to have everything in readiness. Besides which I had made special preparations in the shape of many additional comforts which I knew on board ship would be absolutely necessary, and had even sold my watch and jewelry for that purpose.

I inquired of the proper authorities, but could obtain no information, and nothing remained but for me to wait until the Apostle came on board to bid a final adieu to the emigrants. I felt this annoyance all the more, as I considered that we had no right to expect such mismanagement. We would naturally have preferred to make our own arrangements and to go alone, had we been permitted to do so; but we had, over and over again, been instructed not to go by any other vessel than that chartered by the Apostle Richards, so that we might escape the perils which were sure to overtake the Gentiles. Imagine our indignation when we found that as there were not enough of the Saints to occupy the whole ship, the lower deck was filled with Irish emigrants of a very low order, and that their luggage and ours had been thrown together indiscriminately into the hold. Most of the Mormon emigrants recovered their property when they arrived at New York; but as for our own, personally we never saw it again, and all the voyage through we were left utterly destitute.

Nothing remained but for me to put the best face I could upon matters. I took my wearing apparel and other articles out of the trunks, and put them into pillow-slips, and extemporized as well as I could a rough substitute for beds. These served for the children, and I covered them with my cloaks and shawls; and for our own berths and bed-covering I had only a few pieces of carpet, which I put aside for the cabin floor, together with a worn-out blanket which an old lady on board was good enough to lend me. This was the beginning of our going to Zion.

We had not been long at sea when the two young sisters whom I had engaged to help me fell ill, and some of the brethren were very anxious to nurse them. This appeared to be quite the established order of things, for I then found that it was very seldom that a Mormon emigrant ship crossed the ocean without one or more marriages on board. It was, no doubt, very interesting to them, but to me it was extremely inconvenient, especially considering that sickness kept my husband to his berth, which he did not leave during the remainder of the voyage, and myself and the children were not much better off.

Sick and ill as I was, I had to prepare our food and manage everything, for in those times emigrants either took out their own provisions or were allowed in raw material, and in either case had to do their own cooking. My chief difficulty was in getting what I had prepared to the fire-galley, for I could not leave the children, and I was afraid to venture myself upon deck. So I got any of the brethren who chanced to be passing to take it up, and of course they were willing to oblige me; but the galley was so crowded—every one having his or her own interest to attend to—that I very rarely, if ever, had my provisions decently cooked, and on more than one occasion I never saw them again. This was an inconvenience which emigrants do not suffer at the present day.

Unsuccessful with the young sisters, I thought

I would try if I could not get one of the brethren to help me, and circumstances at first appeared to favor me. There was on board a young man—Harry they called him—and he was so situated that I found it easy to open a negotiation with him. He had been a saddler's apprentice in a country town in England, and having listened to some itinerant Mormon preacher, had been converted, joined the Church, and began to think for himself. So, hearing that terrible judgments were quickly coming upon the Old World, he resolved to flee to the New, and in his hurry to get there he conveniently forgot to inform his master that he was about to leave. This accounted for his being so badly provided for.

Now, Harry had those two great blessings—a splendid appetite and unimpeachable powers of digestion. I will not say that he enjoyed these two blessings, for that he did not, on account of lacking a third blessing, namely, the wherewithal to make the first two blessings a pleasure, and not an inconvenience. The ship's allowance of provisions was altogether insufficient for him, and he therefore gladly engaged to do what few things I required upon condition that I should add a little to his own private commissariat. Harry was a very smart lad, and at first very useful, and he soon convinced me that he had told the truth when he said that he had not had enough to eat ever since he came on board—it seemed to me very questionable whether he ever had before. He had, however, nothing to complain of in that respect while in our employment; for although the children were able to eat whenever we had anything fit for them, my husband and myself could seldom touch our rations, and as everything that was not used fell to Harry's share, he fared pretty well.

Harry was not the lad to neglect his own interests, and as our interests appeared just then to be his also, matters worked very harmoniously. Our bread was never brought back to us half raw or burnt to a cinder. It must be properly cooked for our eating or it would not do for Harry's; and as for its being lost or delayed on its way to or from the galley, that was, of course, quite out of the question.

But the strangest thing of all connected with Harry was that immediately after his coming we were incessantly annoyed by "the rats." I had brought for the children's use a small supply of preserves and other little delicacies; but these mysteriously disappeared with alarming rapidity; and whenever I saved any trifle for the children to eat between meals, that also was gone when it was wanted, and in every instance Harry suggested that it was "the rats," though I never could find any traces of those interesting animals. I was sorry to part with Harry, for he used to tell funny stories to the children, and amused them a great deal; but "the rats" and Harry were so closely associated in my mind, that I thought if Harry left, the rats might perhaps also cease their visits. So Harry went and the rats went, and I was once more left alone to do the best I could.

The weather was very cold, and we felt its severity very much. The rigging of the ship was hung with icicles, and, without fire or warmth of any sort, it is no wonder that we all were soon hardly able to move from cold and sickness. In the midst of my trouble I was told of an ancient Scotch sister—a maiden lady, sharp and shrewd—who, like the miser in Sir Walter Scott's 'Fortunes of Nigel,' was willing to help us "for a consideration." It was agreed that she should give me her services for the remainder of the voyage; and the "consideration" was to be two pounds English ($10). Small as was our stock of money, and much as I knew we should need it upon our arrival, I felt that I could do no better than engage her. There was no saying upon whom she might chance to set her maiden fancy, but there was not the remotest chance of any of the brethren falling in love with her; so I considered her a safe investment, and, besides, I must have somebody—there was no alternative.

It was now Christmas-time, a season sacred to joyous memories and festivities; but to us exiles and wanderers, seeking a land of which we knew nothing, and which to us was a new and untried world, it was far from being a happy time. In the midst of the wild, dreary ocean there was nothing to recall the pleasant reminiscences of the past, or to inspire us with hope and courage as we thought of the future. The captain told us that we might prepare to eat our Christmas dinner in New York; but he was mistaken in his calculations. We did not eat our Christmas dinner in New York, as he had promised. A storm came on which compelled us to stand out to sea again, and then a dead calm followed, and it was not until New Year's Eve that we set foot at last upon the shore of the New World.

BLIND BARTIMEUS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for March 24: Mark 10: 46-52.

Golden Text, Mark 10: 48.

Christ's Teaching About Riches—Contrary to General Opinion—The Blind Beggar Outside Jericho—Discrepancies of the Three Evangelists—God's Children Need not be Beggars—Only When they are Blind to their Privileges—No Begging of Men when there is Faith in God—The Beggar did not Seek Alms of Jesus—An Opportunity Promptly Seized—Importunity not to be Suppressed—The Call for Him—Casting Aside Impeding Garments—A Momentous Question—Faith Rewarded.

UNTIL the time came when, after His resurrection, Jesus opened the understanding of His disciples, "that they might understand the Scriptures" (Luke 24: 45), and they were subsequently filled with the Holy Ghost, they learned the way of Christ very slowly. Jesus had said with regard to the young man who had great possessions, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." This astonished the disciples, and went counter to all their ideas. Rich men had such opportunities; they could give largely, while the poor needed all their earnings for present and pressing need. The rich could give what time they liked to religious observances, while the poor must labor hour after hour to get bread. The rich, they thought, had great advantages over the poor for the service of Christ, and so, in their wonder, they said, "Who, then, can be saved?" And Jesus, saith, "With men it is impossible, but not with God; for with God all things are possible." Why did He look upon them, poor fishermen as many of them were? He saw within just what Peter expressed immediately after: "Lo we have left all, and have followed Thee." We are all right, we shall enter into the kingdom of God. Oh how little Peter knew that the riches of self-gratulation were as great a hindrance to him as were the houses and lands of the rich young man to him. Peter took as much pride in his devotedness as the other did in his riches. Both thought to lay God under an obligation, and neither saw how utterly empty he must be that he might "receive the kingdom of God as a little child." It takes a long time for a human heart to learn that it is not the amount we give to God which is of value in His eyes, but it is our appreciation of Him, which leads us to receive of Him, and to place our will and all we have and are at His disposal. Our part is to receive, but we receive a kingdom and a King, and, therefore, we place ourselves in subjection, instead of being lordly donors.

Looking Upon Them,

Jesus answered Peter that all who would leave anything for His sake would receive an hundred-fold with persecutions, and in the age to come eternal life. "But," He added, "many that are first shall be last, and the last first," as though to say, "Peter, the time is coming when thou wilt have to take the last place." And again, a fourth time, He spoke of His coming sufferings. But so little were they ready to understand or enter into His thoughts, that James and John came to Him at this very time with the request, "Grant unto us that we may sit, one on Thy right hand and the other on Thy left hand in Thy glory."

Let Us Be Something Great!

This is the desire of our ambitious human hearts, whereas we live to show how great our God is—we are as the pedestal of the statue. Jesus answered, "Can ye drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? And they said unto Him, We can." Oh how little they knew themselves! How little do we know ourselves, when sometimes we make great promises to God! How much we need to know our utter nothingness!

A Christian worker who had been much used of God, and who had taught much of the way of dying with Christ, was, through ill-health and other circumstances, separated from the sphere of her activity. Then she who had taught others to die to their own wills found her own will was far from dead. She could not accept that she, who had been so useful, should be set aside as worthless, and she saw the oppression of man, rather than the hand of God in it. God was only giving her the opportunity to make her own teaching true in her experience. So long as we think ourselves necessary to the work of God in any measure, we cannot say in truth, "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." (Gal. 2: 20.) Jesus answered the two brothers, "Ye shall indeed drink of the cup that I drink of, and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized; but to sit on My right hand and on My left is not Mine to give; but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of My Father."

The ten were displeased with James and John; they could see in the two brothers the spirit which they could not discern in themselves. How should they be reconciled? Jesus called them to Him and showed them that the way of the world is to seek pre-eminence. "Their great ones exercise authority upon them, but so shall it not be among you; but whosoever will be great among you shall be your minister, and whosoever will be chief shall be servant of all."

God's Great One Serves,

"for even the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."

"And they came to Jericho; and as He went out of Jericho with His disciples and a great number of people, blind Bartimeus, the son of Timeus, sat by the high-wayside, begging." The gospel of Matthew states that there were two blind men; that of Luke, that it was as they entered the city. But what do these little discrepancies matter? We know well that if every blind man in Jericho had pleaded for sight, Jesus would have healed them all. The poor blind man sat and begged; it was all he could do, the sum total of his day's work; a thankless occupation, moving the sympathy of the few, the scorn and contempt of the many. Thank God, His children

Need Not be Beggars.

It is those who are blind as Bartimeus to the fact that God cares for them, who need to beg from man. To beg is saying plainly, "I do not know how to rely on God, I do not think it is quite safe to trust Him, and so I fall back on man." One can expect nothing else from an unsaved soul, but many of God's children are blind to His care for them, and so they continue to beg of man for means to carry on God's work, even after they know Him as the Saviour of their souls! Perhaps this arises from the fact that many earnest and zealous workers for God do not wait for Him to lead them, but go forward and make plans as may seem to them expedient; and as they have taken the responsibility of the plans, they feel the responsibility of carrying out those plans devolves upon them also. It is quite another thing with Mr. George Müller, and many who work on the same principle, who first settle everything with God, and then deal with Him and not with man about the money.

Bartimeus had heard something about Jesus: no doubt he had been told how He had opened the eyes of the blind, and now this Jesus was passing by. It was his first, perhaps his last, opportunity of having something to do with Jesus. He heard the crowd approaching; it was a good chance to get money, but no; his mind was set upon something else than money, he "cried out, and said, Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me." He knew no other way to accomplish his purpose than to cry at the top of his voice. He must attract the attention of Jesus; it was now or never with him. The people were annoyed at the interruption, and bade him hold his peace. Oh how selfish men are! Here was a blind man who once only in his lifetime had a chance of recovering his sight, and people round think only of their momentary inconvenience, and would leave him in his darkness! "Oh, it's only a beggar," they might have said; but he was a redeemed beggar, and from that hour a beggar no more.

The blind man was not to be stilled; there was in his heart a strong confidence that if Jesus could only know his case, he would be healed, so "he cried so much the more, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me." Would that every unsaved man and woman who is awake to his need, and knows Jesus is near, had the same perseverance, determined to get an answer from Jesus! There was a sudden halt, the footsteps ceased, and the blind beggar ceased his cry; only one voice was heard, it was Jesus commanding them to call the blind man; and the messengers say to him, "Be of good comfort, rise, He call-eth thee." Is there one reading these words who is without peace and without sin forgiven? Then, in the name of my Master I say, "Be of good comfort, rise, He called thee." Bartimeus, hearing, was quiet. He asked for no hand to guide him through the throng, he feared not the press; "casting aside his garment," his loose cloak, regardless whether he should ever find it again, "he rose, and came to Jesus."

"What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" were the words which greeted him, and the answer was prompt, "Lord, that I might receive my sight." Reader, Jesus asks this question of thee, "What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?" He means to do whatever you really need and fully trust Him to do. Oh, instead of begging from man, instead of making useless demands upon yourself, that you should bestow something worthy upon God, or make yourself something holy, honor Him by letting Him do His work upon you, letting Him save you, sanctify you, purify you, heal you, conform you to the image of Jesus! "And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole, and immediately he received his sight, and followed Jesus in the way." "Go thy way"—the only way for him now was the way which Jesus walked in; he "followed Jesus in the way." His opened eyes did not tire of looking at Jesus. If Jesus has saved us or healed us, it is that we may follow Him, live as He lived, and manifest a spirit and purpose in our lives which is in accordance with His own.

ABIDE IN HIM.

Cling to the Crucified!

His death is life to thee,—
Life for eternity.
His pains thy pardon seal;
His stripes thy bruises heal;
His cross proclaims thy peace,
Bids every sorrow cease.
His blood is all to thee,
It purges thee from sin;
It sets thy spirit free,
It keeps thy conscience clean:

Cling to the Crucified!

Cling to the Crucified!

His is a heart of love,
Full as the hearts above;
Its depths of sympathy
Are all awake to thee:
His countenance is light,
Even in the darkest night.
That love shall never change,
That light shall ne'er grow dim;
Change then thy faithless heart,
To find it's all in Him:

Cling to the Crucified!

President Harrison and Vice-President Morton—The Inauguration at the Capitol Last Monday.

PRESIDENT HARRISON.

By the time this number is in the hands of our readers, the impressive ceremony represented on the preceding page will have been performed, and the statesman chosen by the people last November will have entered upon the duties of his exalted position. Those among our readers who voted against him are, we are sure, sufficiently patriotic to desire for his administration a career beneficial to the country, and to wish that under his rule peace and prosperity, and the "righteousness which exalteth a nation," may be promoted. As a candidate, it was optional on the part of conscientious citizens to do all in their power to defeat him, if their political principles were antagonized by his candidacy; but as the President duly elected, he has a claim on the respect and consideration of the people, which Christians are bound to recognize by the principles laid down by the apostles. It is for them to set the example, in these times of growing lawlessness, of respect for authority and a legally constituted administration. Therefore, without political bias, we bespeak for President Harrison and his administration the deference, and especially the prayers, of all our readers, that by God's blessing the ensuing four years may be years of progress in righteousness, happiness, and prosperity.

Benjamin Harrison was born at North Bend, Ohio, in his grandfather's house, August 20, 1833. Physically and mentally vigorous, he early manifested a desire to begin an active and independent career. At sixteen he entered Miami University, at Oxford, Ohio, and two years later was graduated. He was with an aptitude for grasping easily the knot-tiest problems, and with a mind that adapted itself readily to discipline. He had an early inclination for the legal profession. On leaving college he began in Cincinnati, with the Hon. B. Storer as his preceptor, the study of law, and in 1854 he entered upon the practice of his profession in Indianapolis. He was twenty-one, square-shouldered, fair-haired, rather serious, reserved in manner, with no inheritance except his education and a good name, without acquaintance, but with a wife to provide for. A legislative investigation, in which he secured employment through the Democratic Governor, Joseph A. Wright, brought him into notice. The ability that he displayed won for him the highest praise of lawyers and laymen. From that time his abilities were fully occupied. He soon acquired the reputation of consummate skill in the preparation of cases, became an expert examiner of witnesses, discussed legal questions in written briefs or oral arguments with convincing logic, and became one of the leaders of his profession as an advocate.

It was inevitable that he should drift into politics. With many young men he and with superior oratorical ability he soon became known as one of the best and most fearless Republican speakers. It amazed the Democrats of the State to see him challenge Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks to "divide time"; but it was afterward declared by the chairman of the meeting that he had "never heard a man skin an opponent as quickly as Ben Harrison did Hendricks that day." In 1860 he was a candidate for Reporter of the Supreme Court, and in the Lincoln campaign of that year he was elected. He cared little for the office, except for the opportunity that it gave him to continue his profession at an increase of income.

The Outbreak of the War

soon dragged him from the life of the citizen to that of a soldier. Governor Morton, in July, 1862, asked him to assist in recruiting a regiment under the President's call for 300,000 three-year troops. He received the first commission for the Seventieth Regiment, and as Second Lieutenant inspired such enthusiasm wherever he went that he soon raised Company A, was made Captain, helped to fill up the other companies of the regiment, and in less than a month had completed it, and was at its head as Colonel, ready to go to the front. Governor Morton signified a willingness to accept his resignation if he chose to remain at home and hold his civil office. But Colonel Harrison preferred the military service. Once chosen, he devoted himself to that career with all his ability. He served through Kentucky and Tennessee up to January, 1864, when his regiment was assigned to the First Brigade of the Third Division of the Twentieth Army Corps.

His services had been highly honorable to him up to this time, but he had not yet reached his highest honors. He was ordered to lead the assault at Resaca on May 15, 1864. The duty was gallantly performed, his command rushing irresistibly over the enemy's terrible lines, and capturing both lines and guns. At Peach-tree Creek, while commanding his brigade, his soldierly qualities drew from his commanding officer, General, "Joe" Hooker, the most enthusiastic praise. On the battle-field he declared that he would make Colonel Harrison Brigadier-General for his part in the fight. He served through the war to its close. He took part in the siege and battle of Nashville, was at the surrender of Johnston, and with his command participated in the final review of the Union forces at Washington.

Politics.

While he was away from Indiana, the Supreme Court, Democratic in composition, declared vacant the office of Supreme Court Reporter, to which Harrison had been elected. Another reporter was elected. In the fall of 1864, after Atlanta had fallen, he took his first leave of absence. The State Convention had nominated him again for the place from which he had been ousted. Reaching home, he devoted himself so effectively to the work of the canvass for the thirty days accorded him, that he was elected for another term. He declined a re-election in 1868, and until 1876 devoted himself diligently to the practice of his profession. In 1876 he was made the candidate for Governor, after he had declined to run, and after another candidate had been nominated and had declined. He accepted the nomination as a public duty. After he had accepted it he devoted himself to the work of the campaign with great energy. But there was great activity in both the Republican and Democratic parties in Indiana in 1876. General Harrison was defeated, but he came out of the fight with extended acquaintance with the people of the State, and with increased national popularity. He was a prominent speaker in the campaign of 1880 in the East and the West. His friends in Indiana had little difficulty in electing him to the place in the Senate of the United States about to be vacated by Joseph E. McDonald, and he took his seat in that body on March 4, 1881.

Senator Harrison

took his seat in the Senate on the day upon which General Garfield was inaugurated. The session was an extra one for executive business only, and he simply attended, and voted when occasion arose. When the Senate reassembled in the following December, at the beginning of the Forty-seventh Congress, and opportunity offered, he assumed his share of the duties of the body. He did not force himself forward as a speaker. When he did speak he commanded attention. Upon Chinese immigration he argued for a faithful regard of treaty obligations in enforcing exclusion. Service on the Mississippi River Commission prepared him to discuss familiarly all propositions brought forward for the improvement of that stream.

After the inauguration of President Cleveland, and when the Republicans of the Senate took issue with the Executive about appointments, Senator Harrison was heard on several occasions in speeches of a critical character. He was heard very infrequently during the closing months of his term. In 1887 an effort was made by the Republicans of Indiana to control the Legislature in order that he might be chosen to succeed himself. The Republicans won in the State, but the Democrats carried the Legislature by a small majority, electing David Turpie as Senator. General Harrison again resumed the practice of his profession at Indianapolis.

Personal Traits.

Personally President Harrison is somewhat under the average height; but his straight, strong figure, soldierly bearing, and easy dignity of manner make him a noticeable person among men. His hair is very fair, and his face is clothed with a blond beard in which there are no streaks of gray. One term of service in the Senate did not encrust him with the veneering of Senatorial reserve. He was and is one of the most approachable of men, ready to talk upon all public subjects freely, and having something to say on most subjects that it is worth while to hear. As an orator he was one of the best of the Senate, speaking clearly, without fatigue, and with no merely perfunctory zeal, and with a voice of great penetration.

Ancestors.

Major-General Harrison, an English ancestor, bore arms with Oliver Cromwell, and rose with him to prominence in the Revolution. It fell to his lot to sign the death-warrant of Charles I., and after the Restoration he paid the penalty for this act, being hanged October 13, 1660. Benjamin Harrison, the first descendant of Cromwell's General who appears in American history, was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, later a delegate to the Colonial Congress, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, three times elected Governor of Virginia, and a member of the Convention that ratified the Constitution. His son was General William Henry Harrison, whose honorable career as a soldier and statesman culminated in his election to the Presidency in 1840, to be followed by his death in the White House one month after his inauguration.

His Pastor's Testimony.

The Rev. M. L. Haines, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis thus writes of the President: "When he came to Indianapolis as a young lawyer at the age of twenty-two he was already a professing Christian. He had united with the Presbyterian church of Oxford, Ohio, during his student life in Miami University. Mrs. Harrison and he brought their church letters with them and identified themselves immediately with the First Presbyterian Church of this city. During the thirty-four years since that time they have been among its most consistent, efficient, and honored members.

"The Rev. Drs. J. H. Nixon, of Wilmington, R. D. Harper, of Philadelphia, J. P. Kumler, of Pittsburg, and Myron Reed, of Denver, each of whom has been in succession the pastor of the First Church, could, I doubt not, give interesting reminiscences of the help they received from this elder and his wife. Mr. Harrison, when but twenty-four years of age, was elected to the office of deacon, and four years later, in January 1861, was made an elder.

For some time before the war he wasSuperintendent of the Sunday-school, and after his return from the army was for a number of years, up to his election as United States Senator, the teacher of the congregational Bible-class for men. So successful was he in this work that he drew to the class a large number of young men active in business and professional life.

"Amidst the press of professional engagements he somehow so managed as to be rarely absent, and during one of the political campaigns, when he was speaking six days in the week, insisted that his appointments should be so arranged that he could get back to Indianapolis Saturday evening, and thus be enabled to meet his class Sunday morning. The faithfulness to duty thus exhibited has ever been a marked characteristic of the man.

"This faithfulness shows itself, also, in the regularity of his attendance upon the Sunday and mid-week services of his church, and in the loyal and thorough way he meets the responsibilities that rest upon him as an officer. He takes hold of his duties with both hands earnestly. 'Our responsibility to God' is a phrase I have heard him use a number of times in his prayers, and in such a tone as to make it clear that it is one of the great truths that shape his thinking and conduct. He impresses one as being and clear convictions, who would give any truth thought before him a fair chance, but who would allow nothing to swerve him from the path of duty. With him a promise is sacred; with him yes means yes and no means no.

"One who was his law partner for several years said of him: 'He had as high a sense of honor as any one I ever knew, and the keenest sense of justice I think I ever saw in any one. This was especially striking in him. It came, I think, from the fact that he was something more than a man who sought to do justly. He was

A Spiritually Minded Man.'

"A certain reserve characterizes his manner, united with a natural dignity of bearing which gives some the impression that he is cold and unsympathetic. But those who are brought into more intimate relations with him find him to be the very opposite.

"In conversation he listens intently, shows a keen sense of humor, and tells a witty, clean, pat story in a manner that 'brings down the house.' Generous in his benevolences, he has always taken a hearty interest in the various charitable organizations of the city, and his popularity among the Roman Catholics, Hebrews, and Protestants alike attests to the breadth and genuineness of his sympathies.

"In religious and charitable activities he has had an earnest helper in Mrs. Harrison. For a number of years she was the teacher of the infant class in the Sunday-school. She takes a leading part in the missionary and social work of the ladies of the church, and is prominent in the management of the Indianapolis Orphan Asylum and other public benevolences.

"General Harrison is emphatically an Anti-Saloon Republican. In regard to the form in which the issue has joined here in Indiana his trumpet has given no uncertain sound. He has declared strongly for local option and increased restriction to the extent to which public sentiment can secure and maintain them.

"I will not presume to draw aside the veil that conceals the home-life of General Harrison and his family; yet I feel free to say that it is a Christian American home of the noblest type, where the affection that binds its members is purified and strengthened by faith in God, and where, from the family altar that was erected more than a third of a century ago, there goes up each day the utterance of thanksgiving and confession and prayer to the Heavenly Father."

VICE-PRESIDENT MORTON.

THE Vice-President is the well-known New York banker, of the firm of Morton, Bliss & Co. He is nearly sixty-five years of age, having been born at Shoreham, Vt., May 16, 1824. His father was Rev. Daniel O. Morton, a Congregational minister, and a lineal descendant of George Morton, one of the Puritan Fathers, who came to this country from England in 1623. The boy received only a common-school education, and early began business life as a dry-goods clerk, in Concord, N. H. He commenced business on his own account in that town in 1845, but four years later removed to Boston, and afterward to New York. In the last named city the firm became financially involved, and compromised with its creditors at fifty cents on the dollar. Some years afterward each of these creditors received from Mr. Morton an invitation to dinner, and each man found on his plate an envelope containing the amount he had lost, with interest. At that time Mr. Morton had commenced business as a banker, and was prospering. His partner in New York was Mr. George Bliss, and in London, Sir John Rose. The firm materially aided the United States Government in funding the Public Debt, and in resuming specie payments.

Mr. Morton did not enter political life until 1876, when he ran for Congress, but was defeated. Two years later he was again a candidate, and was elected. He took a prominent part in the discussion of financial questions, and rendered valuable service, independent of party, to the nation at large in that department. On the accession of President Garfield, Mr. Morton was made Minister to France, and while there hammered the first rivet in the Statue of Liberty presented by French citizens to the city of New York. On his retirement from Paris, he was highly complimented by the French Government and the American colony there. As is well known, Mr. Morton has made many munificent charitable gifts, one of the most conspicuous of which being a quarter of the cost of freighting the Constellation with corn for the starving poor of Ireland in 1880.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Last Testimony of Bishop Barker.—The Life of Bishop Barker, of Sydney, New South Wales, has just been published, and in it is the account of his last hours, which is deeply impressive, and shows how a Christian can die. It appears that in December, 1880, in the midst of his work, when paying visits to the town of Sydney in connection with his Diocesan Church Loan Fund, the Bishop was struck down by paralysis. For a time his life was in imminent danger. Still he rallied, proceeded to England for change, and appeared for a while likely to recover. But in March, 1882, he was again seized with paralysis, which in a few weeks proved fatal. The end, as we might anticipate after such a life, was eminently peaceful. He said: "I am perfectly composed." And again, he remarked to some sorrowing friends, "My love to all the friends. My peace is like a river. I die in the faith of the Lord Jesus." "Sleep of death? I have no fear of death—to be with my blessed Lord, through His most precious blood." These were some of his last utterances.

Choir-Leader, Wife, and Widow.—An Evangelist observes: "The first music conductress I had at my meetings was an ardent worker for Christ. By-and-bye, however, she formed an acquaintance with a fast young man with plenty of money and a very handsome face. From that time her attendance at the meetings became irregular. Her admirer did not like her to sing at the meetings, and soon we lost her services altogether. They got married, and God gave them two little ones to train for Him. Some years afterwards, I met the lady in the dress of a widow. Her first question as I shook hands with her, was, 'Where are you now having your meetings?' 'You think of returning to God, do you? Through all these years we have not ceased to pray for you, that God would not turn His back upon you, but bring you back to the fold,' I replied. She sadly responded, 'Yes, first God took my children, and now my husband is gone, but He has broken me down,' and bursting into tears, she again asked where my meetings were being held. I told her, and that night she was the first to arrive. Anew she consecrated herself to the Lord's service, and ever since she has continued a most zealous worker. The Lord brought back His wandering sheep, but through what trials and griefs had it to pass ere it was safe within the fold!"

Like the Prodigal for Twelve Years.—A devoted Christian worker says: "In a town in the north, to which I used to go at regular intervals, there was an aged woman who, as I met her year after year, greeted me with the same remark, 'Oh sir, I feel just like the prodigal we read of in St. Luke's Gospel.' When I had listened to this for eleven years I began to think that surely this good old woman was bearing a burden of which it was my duty to try and relieve her. So I resolved to speak to her. Next year, when she for the twelfth time repeated, 'Oh, sir, I feel just like that prodigal,' I said, 'I see the prodigal in two states. First, I see him far from his father, living in sin, and feeding swine. Then I see him received by his father, a ring on his finger, shoes on his feet, and covered with the best robe. Now, dear lady, in which of those two states is the prodigal when you represent him?' She saw that she represented him when far from his father, and living on the world's husks, and by God's grace I was enabled to show her that she should not let the resemblance stop there, but, like the prodigal, she should arise from her sin, and even in her rags seek the face of her heavenly Father, who would welcome her royally, and put the robe of Christ's holiness upon her. That night she, who for twelve years had been lingering at the door of conviction, passed gloriously through the open portals of conversion."

John, the Christian Widow's Son.—Mr. Richié said: "About ten years ago a band of young men, myself among the number, went to a little village to hold evangelistic meetings. While there we lodged with a godly old widow, who had an only son, and he was unconverted. It was her chief prayer that ere she left this world she might see her darling boy brought to Christ, and she asked us to speak to him quietly about the love of Christ. We did so, but there seemed to be no result. As we were about to leave, the young man somewhat satirically said, 'Well, mother, if there be any blessing going, we shall have it now, for I don't think you have had so many Christians under your roof before.' 'No, John,' she gravely answered, 'and perhaps this is your last chance of obtaining salvation. You have often said that religion was only suited for stupid old people like me, but here you have six bright intelligent young men, all Christians.' John was greatly struck with the thought that this might indeed be his last opportunity to close with Christ, and could get no rest. He went to bed, but was obliged to get up at midnight and tell his mother the miserable state his mind was in. She comforted him from the Scriptures, and showed him the way of salvation. Soon the silence of the night was broken by a sweet song of praise to God, who had welcomed the penitent and praying sinner, and now that young man is guiding others to the Saviour he then found."

A Mass-Book Pointing to Christ.—The Rev. J. H. Merle D'Aubigné, son of the late Dr. D'Aubigné, of Geneva, who is now carrying on an excellent evangelical work in Belgium, speaking at a Noon-day Prayer-meeting, said: "I called on a Belgian one day, whom I had known for a long time as utterly indifferent to the things of Christ, when he surprised me by declaring that he believed the New Testament, and had accepted Jesus Christ as his Saviour. 'Tell me,' I said, 'how you came to accept Christ. Did you hear a gospel address somewhere, or what was it?' 'I will tell you,' he answered, with a happy smile; and going to a cupboard he took therefrom an old black book, and handing it to me, said, 'There, sir, is the book which led me to abandon my ungodliness and to love Christ.' 'Why,' I exclaimed in astonishment, as I opened and turned over some of the leaves of the old black well-worn volume he had brought me, 'this is a Catholic mass-book! How could this have led you to Christ?' 'In this way,' he replied. 'You see that on nearly every page there is a little bit of the Gospel and a little bit of an Epistle. Well, I read all these extracts, and thought them very beautiful. I also read the prayers on the same pages, but they were so different, so inferior, that I did not enjoy them at all. Then I wanted to have the New Testament, from which the small portions of the Gospel and the Epistles were taken. I got it, and read it, and wept over it; and at last feeling and seeing myself to be a sinner, and believing that Christ came to save sinners, and was willing and able to save me, I asked Him to do so, and He did it, and I am saved.' This man is now one of our most intelligent and earnest fellow-workers in the locality of Verviers. What an evidence of the Divine inspiration and power of the Word of God!"

THE RESERVATION OF AMERICA.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday
Morning, March 3, 1889

"And hath made of one blood all nations," Acts 17:26.

II Races from a Common Stock—The Inhuman Cry, America for Americans!—Who it is that Raise It—I. Immigrants Themselves—Indians the Only Native Race—Desperadoes Not Wanted—Building a Wall to Keep out Honest Men—What God Will do With It—II. By People Afraid of Overcrowding—Not a Tenth of the Country Cultivated—Benefits of Inter-marriage—How Heaven Feels About It—Christianity a Cosmopolitan Religion—Baron Hirsch's Magnificent Gift—A Word to Foreigners—What Americans Should do for Them.

"AND hath made of one blood all nations." That is, if for some reason general phlebotomy were ordered, and standing in a row were an American, an Englishman, a Scotchman, and an Irishman, a Frenchman, a German, a Norwegian, an Iclander, a Spaniard, an Italian, a Russian, and representatives of all other nationalities bared their right arm, and a lancet were struck into it, the blood let out would have the same characteristics, for it would be red, complex, fibrine, globuline, chlorine, and containing sulphuric acid, potassium, phosphate of magnesia, and so on; and Harvey and Sir Astley Cooper and Richardson and Zimmerman and Brown Séquard, and all the scientific doctors, allopathic, homeopathic, hydro-pathic and eclectic, would agree with Paul, as, standing on Mars Hill, his pulpit a ridge of limestone rock fifty feet high, and among the proudest and most exclusive and undemocratic people of the earth he crashed into all their prejudices by declaring, in the words of my text, that God had made "of one blood all nations." The countenance of

of the human family may be different as a result of climate or education or habits, and the Malay will have the projecting upper jaw, and the Caucasian the oval face and small mouth, and the Ethiopian the retreating forehead and large lip, and the Mongolian the flat face of olive hue, and the American Indian the copper-colored complexion, but the blood is the same, and indicates that they all had one origin, and that Adam and Eve were their ancestor and ancestress.

I think God built this American continent and organized this United States republic to demonstrate the stupendous idea of the text. A man in Persia will always remain a Persian, a man in Switzerland will always remain a Swiss, a man in Austria will always remain an Austrian, but all foreign nationalities coming to America were intended to be Americans. This land is the chemical laboratory where foreign bloods are to be inextricably mixed up and race prejudices and and this sermon is an axe by which I hope to help kill them. It is not hard for me to preach such a sermon, because, although my ancestors came to this country about two hundred and fifty years ago, some of them came from Wales, and some from Scotland, and some from Holland, and some from other lands, and I am a mixture of so many nationalities that I feel at home with people from under every sky, and have a right to call them blood relations. There are madcaps and patriotic lunatics in this country who are ever and anon crying out, "America for Americans!" Down with the Germans! Down with the Irish! Down with the Jews! Down with the Chinese! are in some directions the popular cries, all of which vociferations I would drown out by the full organ of my text, while I pull out the stops and put my foot on the pedal that will open the loudest pipes, and run my fingers over all the four banks of ivory keys, playing the chant, "God hath made of one blood all nations."

There are not five men in this audience, nor five men in any audience to-day in America, except it be on an Indian reservation, who were not descended from foreigners if you go far enough back. The only native Americans are the Modocs, the Shawnees, the Chippewas, the Cherokees, the Chickasaws, the Seminoles and such like. If the principle, America only for Americans, be carried out, then you and I have no right to be here and we had better charter all the steamers and clippers and men-of-war and yachts and sloops and get out of this country as quick as possible. The Pilgrim Fathers were all immigrants,

The Huguenots all Immigrants.

The cradle of most every one of our families was rocked on the bank of the Clyde or the Rhine, or the Shannon or the Seine or the Tiber. Had the watchword "America for Americans!" been an early and successful cry, where now stand our cities would have stood Indian wigwams; and canoes instead of steamers would have tracked the Hudson and the Connecticut; and, instead of the Mississippi being the main artery of the continent, it would have been only a trough for deer and antelope and wild pigeons to drink out of. What makes the cry of "America for Americans!" the more absurd, and the more inhuman is that some in this country, who themselves arrived here in their boyhood, or arrived here only one or two generations back, are joining in the cry. Escaped from foreign despotisms themselves, they say, "Shut the door of escape for others." Getting themselves on our shores in saying, "Haul the boat on the beach, and let the rest of the passengers go to the bottom!" Men who have yet on them a Scotch or German or English or Irish brogue crying out, "America for Americans!" What if the native inhabitants of Heaven—I mean the angels, the cherubim, the seraphim, born there—should stand in the gate, and when they see us coming up should say, "Go back! Heaven for the Heavenians!"

Of course we do well not to allow foreign nations to make this country a convict colony. We would have a wall built as high as heaven and as deep as hell against foreign thieves, pick-pockets, and anarchists. We would not let them wipe their feet on the mat of the outside door of Castle Garden. If England or Russia or Germany or France send here their desperadoes to get clear of them, we would have these in chains to the places where they came from. We will not have America become the dumping-place for foreign vagabondism. But you build up a wall at the Narrows before New York Harbor, or at the Golden Gate before San Francisco, and forbid the coming of the industrious and hard working and honest populations of other lands who want to breathe the air of our free institutions, and get opportunity for better livelihood, and it is only a question of time when God will tumble that wall flat on our own heads with the red-hot thunderbolts of His omnipotent indignation.

You are a father, and you have five children. The parlor is the best room in your house. Your son Philip says to the other four children, "Now, John, you live in the small room in the end of the hall, and stay there; George, you live in the garret, and stay there; Mary, you live in the cellar, and stay there; Fannie, you live in the kitchen, and stay there. I, Philip, will take the parlor. It suits me exactly. I like the pictures on the wall. I like the lambrquins at the windows. I like the Axminster on the floor. Now, I, Philip, propose to occupy this parlor, and I command you to stay out. The parlor only for Philippians."

You, the father, hear of this arrangement, and what will you do? You will get red in the face and say, "John, come out of that small room at the end of the hall; George, come down out of the garret; Mary, come up from the cellar; Fannie, come out of the kitchen, and go into the parlor, or anywhere you choose; and, Philip, for your greediness and unbrotherly behavior, I put you for two hours in the dark closet under the stairs." God is the Father of the human race. He has at least five sons: a North American, a South American, a European, an Asiatic, and an African. The North American sniffs the breeze, and he says to his four brothers and sisters: "Let the South American stay in South America; let the European stay in Europe; let the Asiatic stay in Asia; let the African stay in Africa; but America is for me. I think it is the parlor of the whole earth. I like its carpets of grass, and its upholstery of the front window, namely, the American sunrise; and the upholstery of the back window, namely, the American sunset. Now, I want you all to stay out, and keep to your places." I am sure the Father of the whole human race would hear of it, and chastisement would come; and, whether by earthquake or flood or drought or heaven-darkening swarms of locust and grasshopper, or destroying angel of pestilence, as a nation, and say to the four winds of heaven: "This world is my house, and the North American is no more my child than is the South American and the European and the Asiatic and the African. And I built this world for all the children, and the parlor is theirs, and all is theirs." For, let me say, whether we will or not, the population of other lands will come here. There are harbors all the way from Baffin's Bay to Galveston, and if you shut fifty gates, there will be other gates unguarded. And if you forbid foreigners from coming on the steamers, they will take sailing vessels. And if you forbid them coming on sailing vessels, they will come in boats. And if you will not let them come in boats, they will come on rafts. And if you will not allow wharfage to the raft, they will leave it outside Sandy Hook and swim for free America. Stop them? You might as well pass a law forbidding a swarm of summer bees from lighting on the clover-top, or pass a law forbidding the tides of the Atlantic to rise when the moon put under its silver grappling-hooks, or a law that the noonday sun should not irradiate the atmosphere. They have come. They are coming now. They will come. And if I had a voice loud enough to be heard across the seas, I would put it to the utmost tension, and cry:

God would Rebuke our Selfishness

Let Them Come!

You stingy, selfish, shriveled up, blasted souls who sit before your silver dinner-plate piled up with breast of roast turkey incarnadined with cranberry, your fork full and your mouth full, and cramming down the superabundance till your digestive organs are terrorized, let the millions of your fellow-men have at least the wishing-bone!

But some of this cry, America for Americans! may arise from an honest fear lest this land be overcrowded. Such persons had better take the Northern Pacific, or Union Pacific, or Southern Pacific, or Atlantic and Charlotte air line, or Texas and Santa Fe, and go a long journey and find out that no more than a tenth part of this continent is fully cultivated. If a man with a hundred acres of farm land should put all his cultivation on one acre, he would be cultivating a larger ratio of his farm than our nation is

The National Farm.

Pour the whole human race, Europe, Asia, Africa, and all the islands of the sea, into America and there would be room to spare. All the Rocky Mountain barrennesses and all the other American deserts are to be fertilized; and as Salt Lake City and much of Utah once yielded not a blade of grass, now by artificial irrigation have become gardens, so a large part of this continent that now is too poor to grow even a mullein stalk or a Canada thistle, will through artificial irrigation like an Illinois prairie wave with wheat, or like a Wisconsin farm rustle with corn tassels. Besides that, after perhaps a century or two more, when this continent is quite well occupied, the tides of immigration will turn the other way. Politics and governmental affairs being corrected on the other side of the waters, Ireland, under different regulation turned into a garden, will invite back another generation of Irishmen, and the wide wastes of Russia brought from under despotism will with her own green fields invite back another generation of Russians. And there will be hundreds of thousands of Americans every year settling on the other continents. And after a number of centuries, all the earth full and crowded, what then? Well, at that time, some night, a panther meteor wandering through the heavens will put its paw on our world and stop it, and putting its panther tooth into the neck of its mountain range will shake it lifeless, as the rat-terrier a rat. So I have no more fear of America being overcrowded than that the porpoises in the Atlantic Ocean will become so numerous as to stop shipping.

It is through mighty addition of foreign population to our native population that I think God is going to fill this land with a race of people ninety-five per cent, superior to anything the world has ever seen. Intermarriage of families and is depressing and crippling. Marriage outside of one's own nationality and with another style of nationality is a mighty gain. What makes the Scotch-Irish second to no pedigree for brain and stamina of character, so that blood goes right up to supreme court bench, and to the front rank in jurisprudence and merchandise and art? Because nothing under heaven can be more unlike than a Scotchman and an Irishman, and the descendants of these two conjoined nationalities, unless rum flings them, go right to the tip-top in everything. All nationalities coming to this land, the opposites will all the while be affianced, and French and German will unite, and that will stop all the quarrel between them, and one child they will call Alsace, and the other Lorraine. And hot-blooded Spaniard will unite with cool-blooded Poleander, and romantic Italian with matter-of-fact Norwegian, and a hundred and fifty years from now the race occupying this land will be, in stature, in purity of complexion, in liquidity of eye, in gracefulness of poise, in domelike brow, in taste, in intelligence, and in morals, so far ahead of anything now known on either side the seas that this last quarter of the nineteenth century will seem to them like the Dark Ages. Oh, then how they will legislate and bargain and pray and preach and govern! This is the land where, by the mingling of races, the race prejudice is to get its death blow.

How Heaven Feels About It

we may conclude from the fact that Christ, the Jew, and descended from a Jewess, nevertheless provided a religion for all races, and that Paul, though a Jew, became the chief apostle of the Gentiles, and that recently God has allowed to burst in splendor upon the attention of the world Hirsch, the Jew, who after giving ten million dollars to Christian churches and hospitals, has called a committee of nations, and furnished them with forty million dollars for schools to elevate his race in France and Germany and Russia to higher intelligence, and abolish, as he says, the prejudices against their race; these fifty million dollars not given in a last will and testament, and at a time when a man must leave his money anyhow, but by donation at fifty-five years of age, and in good health, utterly eclipsing all benevolence since the world was created. I must confess there was a time when I entertained race prejudice, but, thanks to God that prejudice has gone; and if I sat in church, and on one side of me there was a black man, and on the other side of me was an Indian, and before me was a Chinaman, and behind me a Turk, I would be as happy as I am now standing in the presence of this brilliant audience; and I am as happy now as I can be and live. The sooner we get buried, the healthier will be our American atmosphere. Let each one fetch a spade, and let us dig its grave clear on down deeper and deeper till we get as far down as the centre of the earth and half-way to China, but no further lest it poison those living on the other side the earth. Then into this grave let down the accursed carcase of race prejudice, and throw on it all the mean things that have ever been said and written between Jew and Gentile, between Turk and Russian, between English and French, between Mongolian and anti-Mongolian, between black and white, and put up over that grave for tombstone some scorched and jagged chunk of scoræ spit out by some volcanic eruption, and chisel on it for epitaph: "Here lies the carcase of one who cursed the world. Aged near six thousand years. Departed this life for the perdition from whence it came. No peace to its ashes!"

A Word to Foreigners.

Now, in view of this subject, I have two point-blank words to utter, one suggesting what foreigners ought to do for us, and the other what we ought to do for foreigners. First, to foreigners: Lay aside all apologetic air, and realize you have as much right as any man who was not only himself born here, but his father and his grandfather and great-grandfather before him. Are you an Englishman? Though during the Revolutionary War your fathers treated our fathers roughly, England has more than atoned for that by giving to this country at least two denominations of Christians, the Church of England and the Methodist Church. Witness the magnificent liturgy of the one, and the Wesleyan hallelujahs of the other. And who shall ever pay England for what Shakespeare and John Milton and Wordsworth, and a thousand other authors, have done for America?

Are you a Scotchman? Thanks for John Knox's Presbyterianism; the balance-wheel of all other denominations. And how shall Americans ever pay your native land for what Thomas Chalmers and Macintosh and Robert Burns and Christopher North and Robert McCheyne and Candlish and Guthrie have done for Americans?

Are you a Frenchman? We cannot forget your Lafayette, who in the most desperate time of our American revolution, New York surrendered, and our armies flying in retreat, espoused our cause, and at Brandywine and Monmouth and Yorktown put all America under eternal obligation. And we cannot forget the coming to the rescue of our fathers of Rochambeau and his French fleet with six thousand armed men.

Are you a German? We have not forgotten the eleven wounds through which your Baron De Kalb poured out his life-blood at the head of the Maryland and Delaware troops in the disastrous battle at Camden, and after we have named our streets and our cities and counties after him we have not paid a tithe of what we owe Germany for his valor and self-sacrifice. And what about Martin Luther, who made way for religious liberty for all lands and ages?

Are you a Poleander? How can we forget your brilliant Count Pulaski, whose bones were laid in Savannah River after a mortal wound, gotten while in the stirrups of one of the fiercest cavalry charges of the American Revolution? But with no time to particularize I say, "All hail to the men and women of other lands who come here with honest purpose!"

Take the Oath of Allegiance.

Get out your naturalization papers. Don't talk against our institutions, for the fact that you came here, and stay, shows that you like ours better than any other. If you don't like them there are steamers going out of our ports almost every day, and the fare is cheap, and, lest you should be detained for parting civilities, I bid you good-bye now. But if you like it here, then I charge you, at the ballot-box, in legislative hall, in churches, and everywhere, be out-and-out Americans. Do not try to establish here the loose foreign Sabbaths, or transcendentalism spun into a religion of mush and moonshine, or foreign libertinism, or that condensation of all thievery, scoundrelism, lust, murder, and perdition, which in Russia is called Nihilism, and in France called Communism, and in America called Anarchism. Unite with us in making, by the grace of God, the fifteen million square miles of America, on both sides the Isthmus of Panama, the paradise of virtue and religion.

My other word suggests what Americans ought to do for foreigners. By all possible means explain to them our institutions. Coming here, the vast majority of them know about as much concerning republican or democratic form of government as you in the United States know about the politics of Denmark or France or Italy or Switzerland, namely, nothing. Explain to them that liberty in this country means liberty to do right, but

Not Liberty to Do Wrong.

Never in their presence say anything against their native land, for, no matter how much they may have been oppressed there, in that native land there are sacred places, cabins or mansions around whose doors they played and perhaps somewhere there is a grave into which they would like, when life's toils are over, to be let down, for it is mother's grave, and it would be like going again into the loving arms that first held them, and against the bosom that first pillowed them. My! my! how low down a man must have descended to have no regard for the place where his cradle was rocked. Don't mock their brogue or their stumbling attempts at the hardest of all languages to learn, namely, the English language. Treat them in America

As You Would Like To Be Treated,

if for the sake of your honest principles or a better livelihood for yourself or your family, you had moved under the shadow of Jungfrau, or the Rigi, or the Giant's Causeway, or the Bohemian Forest, or the Franconian Jura. If they get homesick, as some of them are, suggest to them that God is as near to help them here as He was near them before they crossed the Atlantic, and that the soul's final flight is less than a second, whether from the beach of the Caspian Sea or the banks of Lake Erie. Evangelize their adults through the churches and their children through the schools, and let home missions and tract societies, and the Bible translated in all the languages of these foreign people, have full swing.

Rejoice as Christian patriots that, instead of being an element of weakness, the foreign people, thoroughly evangelized, will be against all the world. The Congress of the United States recently ordered built new forts all up and down our American coasts, and a new navy is about to be projected. But let me say that three hundred million dollars expended in coast defence will not be so mighty as a vast foreign population living in America. With hundreds of thousands of Germans living in New York, Germany would as soon think of bombshelling Berlin as attacking us. With hundreds of thousands of Frenchmen in New York, France would as soon think of firing on Paris. With hundreds of thousands of Englishmen in New York, England would as soon think of destroying London. The mightiest defence against European nations is a wall of Europeans reaching all up and down the continent—a wall of heads and hearts consecrated to free government.

A Bulwark of Foreign Humanity

heaved up all along our shores, reinforced by the Atlantic Ocean, armed as it is with tempests and Caribbean whirlwinds and giant billows ready to fling mountains from their catapult, we need as a nation fear no one in the universe but God; and, if found in His service, we need not fear Him. As six hundred million people will yet sit down at our national table, let God preside. To Him be dedicated the metal of our mines, the sheaves of our harvest-fields, the fruits of our orchards, the fabrics of our manufactories, the telescopes of our observatories, the volumes of our libraries, the songs of our churches, the affections of our hearts, and all our lakes become baptismal fonts, and all our mountains altars of praise, and all our valleys amphitheatres of worship, and our country having become fifty nations consolidated in one, may its every heart-throb be a pulsation of gratitude to Him who made "of one blood all nations," and ransomed that blood by the payment of the last drop of His own,

A HEROINE AT A FIRE.

A MOTHER'S concern for her son was heroically displayed at a fire in New York on February 21. The fire was in a large tenement house, and was caused by the explosion of a lamp on the first floor. An alarm was sent over the wires and loud shouts warned the tenants on the upper floors to make their escape. All did so except a widow, who, with her son, occupied rooms on the top floor. The son, who is twenty-one years of age, was confined to his bed, being ill with consumption. The mother found it was hopeless to get him out of bed and down the stairs by herself, and presently the stairs took fire, cutting off her escape by that way effectually. She managed to drag the young man to the window, where he could get air, and she waited with him for help to come. Her position was described from the street, and some firemen made their way through the scuttle of a neighboring house to the roof of the one on fire. Lying down on the roof they lowered a rope to the window at which the widow was, and told her to tie it around her body and they would draw her up. Instead of doing so, she tied it around her invalid son, and waited patiently while the firemen drew him up and lowered the rope again for her. Both were saved, but while the son was being rescued, his mother was in imminent danger. What love must that have been that, in the face of death by burning, could prefer that another should be saved rather than herself! How infinitely greater must have been the love of Christ for a lost world, when He voluntarily laid down His life for its salvation. (John 10: 18.)

A CHINESE PROCLAMATION.

ONE of the University students who by the blessing of God on Mr. Moody's labors was led to devote himself to missionary work in China—Mr. Stanley P. Smith, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on April 9, 1885—has been made the subject of a proclamation in China. He is now settled at Lu-ngan Fu, Shansi. Some disturbance was made by the people of the place, and it was proposed to turn out the missionary, but the magistrate, of his own accord, has issued a proclamation, of which we give here a part. "Be it known that whereas the English teacher, Mr. Stanley P. Smith, and others, have come to Lu-ngan to propagate religion, they do so in accordance with treaty right: and further, these teachers come after it has been signified to us magistrates by official documents; the teachers all carry a passport, giving them the right of entry to every Fu, Chau, and Hien city. Having arrived here, we must, according to the treaty, assist them. The teacher, Mr. Stanley P. Smith, has come here to establish a preaching hall to cure people of opium-craving, and exhort men to be virtuous. Those are at liberty to hear who will. There are some who, having heard the doctrine, gave me (the Hien magistrate) to understand that certain senseless scoundrels had the impudence to stick up a placard on the main-street crossing, meaning by their unfounded stories to mislead all, and stir others up to hurt virtuous men. Over and above apprehending (these scoundrels), I issued this proclamation to inform others. By this I want to let the whole city know thoroughly—soldiers and people. After the issue of this proclamation you must all fulfil your duty, and not be incited by this unfounded talk."

THE CONGO FREE STATE.

THE extraordinary resources of the Congo Free State were described on February 13 to a reporter in New York by Gen. H. S. Sanford, formerly United States Minister to Belgium, who was very active in securing the recognition of the new State by the Washington Government, and in encouraging American projects for its development. Mr. Sanford does not endorse the reports issued depreciating the region. He said that it was capable of becoming the granary of the world. Vegetation of all kinds thrives most luxuriantly, as many as three crops a year of some kinds of vegetables coming to maturity. Coffee grows wild; the dense forests are rich in dyewoods, and fine qualities and species of furniture woods, and there are extensive copper and tin mines already discovered. At present there are about 300 Europeans at the various stations along the river, engaged in trade and in the administration of the Government. Liquor is rigidly kept by the King of the Belgians from the reach of the natives, in accordance with the powers of exclusion acknowledged by the Berlin conference. In the Free Zone there are 50,000,000 of inhabitants, and 1,500,000 square miles of land, equal in fertility and richness to the best lands of the Mississippi Valley, and of far greater extent. A railroad has been surveyed, telegraph lines in the interior and a cable to Europe will be in operation, and a large iron hotel is being forwarded for erection at Boma, the capital. Mr. Sanford expresses his conviction that the new State will become one of the most prosperous in the world.

AN INDIAN'S REPROOF.

A SAILOR, recently returned from Alaska, says that while there he was in a miner's cabin with a party of a dozen white men and one Indian, an intelligent man who spoke Russian and English. The conversation turned on Indian religion, and one of the miners said that one day while looking for work, he met three Indians who were taking their furs to the agency. The Indians were sociable, and one of them asked him, "Do you savy (know) Jesus Christ?" The miner, curious to find out how much they knew, pretended complete ignorance. Thereupon one Indian took a book out of his sack and showed it to him. It was one of the Gospels in Indian language. The Indian pointed to the book and then pointed upward, and repeated his question: "You savy Jesus Christ?" The miner shook his head. The Indian then spoke to his companions, and each of them produced his "Jesus book," and each said that the book was good. One of the men carried his book in a case suspended from his neck, and he said too, as he replaced it, with much emphasis, "That book good!"

As the miner finished describing the interview his companions laughed derisively, and one of them, turning to the Indian present, asked him if he too had a "Jesus book." The Indian, who had listened silently, and had not joined in the laugh, rose with dignity, and said, "Yes, me savy Jesus," and taking a New Testament from his bag said, "No like to talk with white men about Jesus; white men laugh; yes, this my book. Oh yes, me savy Jesus." The Indian's demeanor was so dignified and so courageous that there was no repetition of the laughter, and as he sat down the miners looked ashamed. They changed the conversation, but afterward, when the Indian was gone, one of the miners said bluntly, "That Indian had more courage than any of the lot. There was not one of us after that laughing who would have admitted that he had a Bible in his trunk." The Indian's courage and evident love of his "Jesus book" deeply impressed the sailor.

OMINOUS FIGURES.

AN instructive report on divorce statistics has been compiled by Mr. Carroll D. Wright, of the National Labor Bureau, and a synopsis was given last week to the press. Mr. Wright's figures cover the period from 1867 to 1886 inclusive, and they show a startling increase in the number of divorces granted during the twenty years. The increase of population in this country during that period is about 69 per cent. The total number of divorces granted is 328,716. Of these 9,937 were granted in 1867, and 25,525 in 1886, an increase of about 157 per cent., considerably more than twice as great as the increase in population. A significant feature of the report, indicating the necessity for a uniform divorce law for the whole country is that of the analysis of the statistics by States. It shows that in the States which have a lax divorce law there has been the most marked increase of divorces. While there have been 36,072 divorces in Illinois in twenty years, and the ratio of the number granted to the number of married couples in the State was 1 to 407 in 1870 and 1 to 271 in 1880, the corresponding ratios in New Hampshire were 1 to 248 in 1870 and 1 to 175 in 1880, and in Rhode Island 1 to 203 and 1 to 190, respectively. A still more surprising result is obtained by comparing the number of divorces with the number of marriages contracted in the same States during the same period. This shows one divorce to every twelve marriages. The inference is, not that there is more immorality in those States, but that unhappy couples go there from other States to obtain divorce, because they get it more easily there.

PREACHING BEFORE A KING.

IN a letter from Tataka, Africa, published in the African News, Miss Rose A. Bower describes her visit to Grabo, the capital town of the Taboo tribe, where the King attended the service in state. On the arrival of the missionaries they sat in the public square to await the coming of the king. His approach was heralded by a band consisting of two drums, two horns, and a bell. He came attended by a man who held an umbrella over his head, a man carrying a wooden chair, and two men carrying guns. He wore a cloth fastened around his waist reaching to his feet, and a heavy overcoat and a beaver hat purchased from some European traveller. Miss Bower goes on to say:

We sat on our side of the street with all our men and they opposite under the pavilion. The King asked us through another man who we were and where we were going. We said that we had come to see him, and told what for. The king found fault with the Tataka king and people because they had not consulted the head king, which, according to their laws they should have done, and had not long ago officially sent him word that the white missionaries had come to their town. Word had never been officially sent to the King, and he didn't recognize any other source.

They were very much vexed with our people and threatened to make them pay for their neglect and disregard of the King's rights. Our men were very much troubled, as it was a serious offence, but we took it to the Lord in prayer that evening. The next day was Sunday, and we went under the pavilion and began to sing. It wasn't long till we had a large audience of the principal men. Then I gave them a little talk and sang some more, and then left the meeting open for questions. Quite a number were asked and answered, and at the close they crowded around to shake hands and express their appreciation of our singing and talk.

So God was with us, and we took the people's hearts by storm. That afternoon the King sent for Blackwell, and asked to know why we had come to his country. Blackwell explained and the King was much interested and pleased, and said to Blackwell, "The 'palaver' is done." So that what seemed to forbode serious trouble melted away like snow on an April day. Sunday night we gathered, by singing, as many as the house we occupied could hold, and then had a little prayer-meeting. The King came at our request, and we sang and talked to him and to as many as the house would hold. Monday morning he had another public talk about school boys. They promise to come and help our people build a school-house at once, and gave us five boys to bring with us; two of them are about 15 years, the other three younger, and we have two boys from town. So now we have seven boys. They are to stay at least five years. Plenty more are ready to come as soon as we get a place for them. The men said they expected the boys would run away and come to us. After we were through, we expressed our desire to start home that day. The King objected, and it was only by promising we would come again when he sent for us, that he consented. We said, "We would." So he said in a month or two he would send ten men and carry us in hammocks. He said he had not received us as he wished to receive his white missionaries.

MOMENTOUS PROPHETIC DATES.

By Rev. A. B. Simpson.*

The Times of the Jews—Identity of the Desolating Oppressor—His Supremacy to be 2,300 Years—Dates to Measure From—A Remarkable Focus—The Year 1900 a Momentous Year—A Succession of Dates Marking Stages of Deliverance—A Second Measuring-Line—The Setting up of the Abomination—Another Measure—The Times of the Papacy.

In the eighth chapter of Daniel we have a second scale of measurement, having reference not to the times of the Gentiles, but to the duration of the oppressions of the Jews and the down-treading of the sanctuary. Until "the sanctuary should be cleansed" was to be 2,300 days. The first question concerning these days is, Where are they to begin? What is to be

Our Starting-Point?

There are five points from which we might date it. One, and the most natural, would be the date from which the seventy weeks preceding Messiah's coming are dated, the decree of Artaxerxes to rebuild Jerusalem under which Ezra returned, B. C. 457. The second, and next in probability, is the second decree of Artaxerxes, under which Nehemiah went back, 444 B. C. The first of these in solar, the second in lunar, measurement brings us to the cross of Jesus in seventy weeks, or 490 years. They would naturally be suggested to a candid mind as the Jewish times here intended.

The third date we might adopt would be the closing year of the Restoration period, which God said would last seven weeks, or forty-nine years (Dan. 9 : 25). Dating this from 457 would give us 406 B. C.; from 444, it would bring us to 395 B. C. Or, we might adopt a fifth date, viz., the close of the Old Testament, about 400, as the measuring-point from which the eye of prophecy looked forward to the beginning of millennial times.

There is still a sixth date which we might adopt, viz., the first decree of Cyrus and the end of the seventy years' captivity, the year 537. This was the commencement of the Persian monarchy. There might even yet be added one more initial date, viz., 332 B. C., the year of the downfall of Persia and the rise of Alexander's universal empire, when the power out of whom this little horn was to grow really began. Thus we have seven dates from which to measure the 2,300 years, viz., 537, 457, 444, 406, 400, 395, 333.

Five Significant Dates.

Measuring in lunar time, which is the Jewish and Mohammedan time, we reach the following dates: 1774, 1788, 1826, 1832, 1837, 1900. There is only one of these dates that is not of the greatest significance in connection with Jewish and Turkish history. The year 1695 was the time of the first defeat of the Turkish power, followed by the treaty of Carlowitz, which began Turkish dismemberment. The year 1774 was marked by Turkey's second disastrous war and peace, ending in that very year in the humiliating treaty of Karnadje, by which she ceded away both rights and territories of great value. The year 1826 was famous for the battle of Navarino, destroying the Turkish fleet and leading to the loss of several Asiatic fortresses. This was immediately followed by her third disastrous war with Russia in 1829, in which she lost Servia, Algeria, and other territory, and was more seriously dismembered. The year 1832 was marked by the rebellion of Mehemet Ali, lasting till after the next date, 1839, threatening the very existence of the empire, and leading to the loss of Egypt and the occupation of Syria by the European powers. The year 1900 is still future, and yet is marking, as we shall see, just 2300 lunar years from the close of the Old Testament. Turning next to solar years, we find that the 2,300 years from each of the seven dates already given bring us to 1763, 1844, 1856, 1894, 1900, 1905, 1968. The year 1763 was the time of Jewish emancipation in the principal European countries. It began in England in 1753, and ended in Russia and other countries in 1805. The year 1844 is the most important date in the whole series so far, marking the first decree of Turkish toleration, opening of the empire to Christianity, and the return of the Jew. The year 1856 was the close of the Crimean War, when Turkey practically fell into the hands of the European powers and ceased to be an independent empire, having ever since been carried by European statesmen as a sort of living corpse not quite ready for burial.

The year 1900 would seem to be the very time when the twenty-three centuries from Malachi would close and the new age begin. The later date of 1964 is in advance of any other prophetic measure; and, it will be remembered, is calculated from the rise of Alexander's empire, and, if a measure at all, can scarcely be used unless in the lunar scale, which brings it to 1900.

Taking all the three standards of measurement and dating them from the seven different periods mentioned, we get the following dates in their chronological order: 1695, 1763, 1774, 1788, 1808, 1821, 1826, 1832, 1837, 1844, 1856, 1860, 1866, 1870, 1894, 1900, 1905, 1934, 1968.

Every one of these dates is historically important in the story of Jewish elevation and Turkish judgments. And there is scarcely a single fact of importance in the dismemberment and dissolution of the oppressive Mohammedan power, and the liberation and elevation of God's ancient people, which is not touched by these dates: At each of these points the little horn has received another stroke of judgment, and the oppressed daughter of Zion another stroke upon her dissolving chain. If we leave out the latest initial date, there can only remain, at the very longest, the few lingering years of this century for the restoration of Zion and the momentous events it will usher in. And even if we measure from that latest date in lunar years, it brings us only to the very opening of the year 1900. Tell ye the daughter of Zion: "Behold, thy King cometh."

In the last chapter of Daniel, we have

of prophecy with special reference to Jerusalem and her oppressors. It is very evident that the things here described relate to the Jewish people, and not to the Christian Church. After the visions have closed, the question is asked: "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" And the answer given is: "A time, times, and an half, and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." This limit, then, applies to the period during which the power of the holy people was to be "scattered." This has been the condition of Israel for ages. And when they shall cease to be scattered, and shall again unite in their own land, the mystery of prophecy will be fulfilled.

What the power is that has scattered and still prevents the union of the Jewish people, we have already seen. What the abomination is that has made Jerusalem and Judea a desolation for centuries, none can deny. These three words, scattering, desolating and abominable, are peculiarly applicable to the Moslem and the Turk. Now, how long has this been so? When was this thing "set up"? There are two dates which apply to the origin of Mohammedanism and the spread of its oppressive power over the Holy Land so perfectly as to leave

No Question Possible.

The one is their own accepted era, the Hegira or flight of Mohammed, A. D. 622. The other is the capture of Jerusalem, and the erection of the mosque of Omar, 637.

From 622, the lunar, calendar, and solar measurements will lead us up to 1844, 1863, and 1882, and from 637 to 1860, 1878 and 1897; so that the six dates in order will be: 1844, 1860-63, 1878, 1882, 1897. Only one of these remains yet unfulfilled. The others are all exceedingly significant, as we have already seen, and all connected with Turkey and Palestine. The first brought the decree of Turkish toleration; the next, the enforcement of that decree by the European occupation of Syria, and the Israelitish colonization plans; the third, the treaty of St. Stefano, which dismembered Turkey and gave England the protectorate of Syria and Palestine, with the island of Cyprus; the next, the Egyptian war, the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, and the English occupation of Egypt. There matters stand. Ten years will bring the final date respecting this measure. Beyond it there may lie other unfulfilled prophecies. But this period closes with the century, 2,300 years after the close of the Old Testament age.

The Times of the Papacy.

There is another time, times, and a half to be examined. This is the duration of the little horn of Daniel 7, and the persecuting beast of Rev. 13. We have seen that these describe the Papal power. Let us look at a few of the remarkable fulfillments of predicted times in connection with this subject.

Shall we begin with the fall of imperial Rome to make way for Papal Rome, and count that the first step toward the rise of the Papacy? Well, 1,260 lunar years from that lead to 1698, when the peace of Ryswick settled the Protestant cause and struck one of the earliest fatal blows at Papal Rome. Or, shall we measure from the decree of Justinian, 533, making the Roman bishop the supreme head of all the churches of Christendom? Well, in that case, 1,260 lunar years bring us to the beginning of French infidelity in 1755; the same number of calendar years, to 1774, the accession of Louis XVI. and the beginning of the French Revolution; and the same period in solar years, to 1793, the very one of the Reign of Terror, the most terrific blow the Papal Church has ever received.

Or, shall we take the years 607 to 610—the decree of Phocas confirming the Pope in the ecclesiastical sovereignty of the world? Then we shall come by all our great lines of measurement to Points of Stupendous Importance.

The first is 1829, the second revolution in Paris, threatening the Papacy once more. The second is 1848, a year of revolutions as marked as 1792, in which the Pope was again unseated and threatened with the loss of the temporal power. The last is 1867-70, the most important of all, in which his boastful claim of infallibility, which the whole world was summoned to listen to, was publicly read amid a fearful thunder-storm in Rome. At that very hour the hand of judgment fell upon France and Rome, and ere a year had passed away the temporal throne of the Papacy was gone forever.

Thus have we seen, on all the great scales of prophecy, the lines converging to a final focus, and that focus lying within a very little distance in the future. Beginning with the seventeenth century, it reaches no point beyond the twentieth, or even far beyond the nineteenth. These calculations of lunar, calendar, and solar time, measured from all the great initial dates of the past, will enable the reader to gather up the cumulative and overwhelming evidence of these conclusions, and to see with what definiteness and solemnity the hands upon the clock of ages are pointing to the years just before us, and saying to us all: "WATCH!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Effort to Further Increase the Number of States was made in Congress on February 26. Mr. Springer introduced in the House a bill providing for the admission of the Territories of Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming as States. It provides that these Territories may become States as provided in the bill admitting the two Dakotas, Washington, and Montana, and that the provisions of that act shall be extended to these Territories the same as if they had been included in the act, with certain exceptions. The delegate of New Mexico introduced a similar bill with reference to New Mexico. The four States for the admission of which arrangements have already been made cover an area of 364,300 square miles, about three times the size of the British Isles, and their population has increased during the last eight years from 249,000 to 935,000.

A Valuable and Much Needed Act of Legislation is proposed in Canada. A bill now before the Canadian Parliament will, if it is passed, close the doors of the Dominion against criminals from the United States. It is a bill not only providing for the extradition of future criminals, but for the extradition of criminals now living securely in Canada. The list of crimes for which the perpetrators may be extradited under the bill comprises almost every offence except political. There is some uncertainty as to whether such legislation is constitutional, as it practically supersedes the extradition treaty made with England. That question, however, will be decided in the law courts, should the measure be enacted. That it would be a benefit to this country is indisputable. Trusted financial officers, clerks and others, who now feel secure in embezzling the funds committed to their care because they know that they can easily reach a place of safety in a few hours, will be less likely to yield to temptation if the grasp of the law can be laid upon them on the other side of the Canadian line.

The Civil-Service Reform Conference at Baltimore, on February 23, expressed unambiguously its opinion of the principles which should guide the President as to removals and appointments. It is safe to say that, should he adopt those principles, he will soon be at issue with his party, and have a very unquiet administration. The politicians and the party newspapers are already clamoring for wholesale removals, and their voice is more potent than that of the Association. In the document issued, the Association somewhat unkindly recalls the President's pledges in the platform of his party, and in his letter of acceptance; and the essentials of the policy embodied in those pledges are described substantially as follows: The enforcement of the law of 1883, in letter and spirit; the selection of competent men in sympathy with the reform as commissioners; no removals for political reasons within the rules; the statement of reasons for removals when made; and, without the rules, appointments and removals to be determined by fitness and not partisan services, or the lack of them. The Association appears to have forgotten that the platforms of political parties are framed for campaign purposes only, and not for use at a time when a party is entering on the fruition of a victory. To recite the pledges now is an anachronism inconvenient to the politicians and office-hunters, if not to the President and his administration.

An Important Convention of Business Men from all trade centres, which assembled at St. Louis on February 28, made a reasonable demand which should not be overlooked by the next Congress. It asked for a uniform bankruptcy law in place of the confusion and uncertainty of separate State legislation. "We want," said the chairman, in stating the object of the convention, "a national law that will provide for the honest collection and disbursement of the assets of an insolvent debtor. We want this law so framed that it will accomplish its work quickly and economically. It must be a stringent law, one that will punish the fraudulent debtor, so far at least as to make him liable for his debts until they are paid, while, at the same time, it will not crush the poor but honest debtor, and prevent him from again engaging in business. We believe that all creditors should share fairly and proportionately in the assets of the debtors. The preferred creditor should be wiped out or legislated out." If the next Congress is looking for more useful work than that of its predecessor, the suggestions of this convention deserve its attention.

The Manner in Which the Appropriation for pensions was passed by the House is significant in two points of view. Though passed in a few minutes, it appropriated the enormous sum of eighty-four million dollars; and though the sum was so large, there was no question raised as to the propriety of the payment, for which many voted who a quarter of a century ago were doing their best to increase the fatalities involving the pensions. Even this large appropriation will probably be insufficient to meet the coming year's needs. For the present financial year the sum of $79,173,000 was appropriated, and a few weeks ago $8,000,000 more was asked for to meet the payments until June 30, which makes about $87,000,000 in all. The last report of Commissioner Black showed that the amount paid for pensions from the year 1861 up to July 1, 1888, was $963,086,444. Since the greater part of the current appropriation has since been expended, it follows that at this time fully $1,000,000,000 has been laid out in pensions, and this sum will have reached $1,050,000,000 by July 1. When it is considered that this sum has not been expended in lavish payments to princes, or to a privileged class, but mainly to the rank and file, and their families, the saying as to the ingratitude of republics evidently cannot be applied to this nation.

The Collapse of the Charge Against Mr. Parnell, of writing the incriminating letters published by the London Times, is complete. The witness, Pigott, who supplied the letters to Houston, who retailed them to the Times, absconded last week before his cross-examination was completed. Before doing, so he made a written confession that he had forged the letters, and that the whole of the story about his manner of getting the letters, to which he had sworn before the Parnell commission, was false. His method of procedure was exceedingly cunning. He secured genuine letters from Parnell, Egan, and others, and in making up the forged letters he used as many words contained in the genuine letters as possible. These he traced on a window pane, and was thus able to get the exact formation of the letters, as well as characteristic forms of expression. When his confession was read in court, a warrant was immediately issued for his arrest, and the Irish party joined in the hunt for him by sending a man to Antwerp and another to Paris to intercept him. The Times was constrained to make a humiliating apology through its lawyer in court, and repeated it in its editorial columns, and added: "Mr. Parnell having in the witness-box stated that the letters attributed to him were forgeries, we accept in every respect the truth of that statement. In these circumstances we deem it right to express our regret most fully and sincerely, at having been induced to publish the letters in question as Mr. Parnell's, or to use them in evidence against him. This expression of regret, we need hardly say, includes also the letters falsely attributed to Mr. Egan, Mr. Davitt, and Mr. O'Kelly. We must add that we firmly believed the letters to be genuine until the disclosures made by Pigott in the course of his cross-examination." The Times is severely blamed by the English press for publishing the letters without inquiring into the antecedents of Pigott, which are known to be disgraceful. It is expected that Mr. Parnell will now institute a suit for libel. A report from Madrid states that a man answering the description of Pigott shot himself in that city on Friday to avoid arrest.

A Disquieting Speech was Made at Brighton, Eng., on February 27, by Mr. Stanhope, the British Secretary for War, whose former speech of a similar tenor was mentioned recently in these columns. His position in the Cabinet, which gives him access to information not generally accessible, lends additional weight to his utterances. These are all the more remarkable because members of the Cabinet are usually extremely cautious and reserved in their remarks, both in and out of Parliament. Mr. Stanhope, however, appeared to be laboring under a sense of serious responsibility. He said he was entitled to warn his countrymen that contingencies might arise which would require England to find herself not only prepared, but prepared for a most sudden emergency.

The Emperor of Germany at Last Proposed to visit his grandmother, Queen Victoria. English newspapers state that the visit will be signalized by a succession of fêtes at London and Windsor. Communications which are passing between Lord Salisbury and Count Herbert Bismarck in regard to a public reception to the Emperor, indicate that it is the intention to give to the event an aspect of high political importance. The Emperor and Empress will dine at the British Embassy after their return.

The New French Cabinet has Made a Statement of its policy to the Legislature. With the sagacity of experienced politicians, the Minister contented themselves with vague patriotic declarations, avoiding pledges of definite policy on specific questions. They say: "Our great tasks will be to secure the adoption of the budget of 1890, and to assure by a broad, tolerant, and wise policy the success of the Exhibition, which will show in industrious and pacific France the industry and work of all nations. We consider that the Government's principal duty is to prepare for all republicans, and all Frenchmen loving order and liberty, a ground for common, energetic, and decisive action with the view to defend and strengthen the rule of peace, justice, and progress, which France in founding the Republic desired to give itself." The Cabinet has, however, taken a decisive step, which implies that it has courage, and means to act with vigor. It has suppressed the organization known as "The Patriotic League," and this act is regarded as only the first of several contemplated strokes intended to crush Boulangerism.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

A Touching Scene at Jerry McAuley's Old Mission in Water Street, New York, was witnessed on February 28. A long line of men and women, many of them denizens of the slums, with faces bearing the marks of hard and sinful lives, filed past an open coffin in front of the platform. As they walked by, tears were in every eye, and many lovingly touched the forehead of the dead man lying there, and wept afresh. "We have lost a true friend," said one. "He is gone to his reward," said another; and every one had something to say of the goodness and kindness of the dead. Yet only a few years ago Thomas Winn, alias Captain Lloyd, who died on February 27, was a desperate and unscrupulous frequenter of the ward, noted for his drunken and violent ways. He was a sailor, born on board a British brig nearly seventy years ago. It is said that he had been a pirate in the South Seas, and a convicted murderer in Australia. During a visit to New York he was induced to go to the Mission, and he was converted. From that time the man's manner underwent a complete change. He gave up the sea, and devoted all his time to visiting the sick, helping the poor, and assisting in the work of the Mission. No one connected with the place did more kindness, or was better loved than he.

Liberal Offers to Immigrants are Being made by Chili and the Argentine Republic. The Government of Chili has authorized its agents abroad to give free passage to all who desire to emigrate to Chili, where, on their arrival, they will receive board and lodging for fifteen days. The Government has appropriated half a million dollars to this method of attracting emigration. Hundreds of such immigrants have arrived, and are now on their way from Panama. Meanwhile, the Argentine Republic has been beckoning emigrants from Chili, and their offers are so roseate that, within the last three years, over five thousand Chilians have crossed the Andes to settle there. A Chilean journal reports the disastrous result. It states that as soon as the immigrants have brought the land under cultivation and sown the crops, they are driven away by the officers of the Argentine Republic to settle elsewhere or starve. It mentions eighty Chilean families who have had this experience. It expresses surprise that, in spite of these facts, people still continue to go there, while the better promises that Chili makes are fulfilled to the letter. The surprise is very natural, as this is a worldly matter. In spiritual concerns the perversity is all too common. The way to destruction is crowded, while the way to eternal bliss has comparatively few travellers. (Matt. 7: 13, 14.)

A Mountain in Flames is Involving an Enormous loss of property in Tennessee. On February 16 a freight train on the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, ran into a tunnel near Sunburnt, Tenn. It was laden with oil in tanks, and was followed by another train carrying ordinary freight. There was some delay on the upward grade by which the middle of the tunnel is reached; when the first train reached the highest point and was about to descend, the rear train dashed into it with a terrific crash. The crews of both trains, realizing what must be the result of such a catastrophe, made their way out of the tunnel as rapidly as their bruised and shaken condition would permit. Before they were clear they saw the flames rise from the oil, and they lost no time in obtaining help. All efforts to extinguish the flames were, however, fruitless. All the cars, with their freight, were consumed, the two engines were melted into a shapeless mass, and then it was found that the timbers of the tunnel had caught fire. Worse still, the roof of the tunnel is a seam of coal twelve inches thick, and that was soon burning vigorously. Volumes of black smoke mingled with fire burst from the entrance, and even at distant points the smoke leaked through parts of the earth, indicating that the heart of the mountain was aflame. As the fire cannot be reached, it will have to burn itself out, and it is doubtful how long that will take. The scene presented by the mountain enveloped in the smoke that rises from many fissures is said to be a startling one. It may well remind those who look upon it of the final destruction which will overtake the whole earth. (II Peter 3: 7, 10.)

A Novel Wedding Ring was Examined by a reporter in New York last week. Having occasion to procure one for his own use he went to a jeweller, who introduced the novelty to him. The reporter, examining it closely, said that it had a scratch in the centre that went all round it. The jeweller explained the scratch by touching a spring in the inside of the ring, when it flew apart just where the line was that the reporter thought was a scratch. The ring thus became two tiny hoops connected by a thin broad flange attached to each hoop. The surface between the two hoops was intended to bear an inscription of the names of the parties, date of wedding, and any tender motto the bridegroom might like to have put there. It was devised because the inside of the ordinary ring is not large enough to contain all the words it is now customary for the wedding ring to bear. When closed and in wear, the inscription is hidden, and only those in the secret know just where the spring is that, on being pressed, opens the ring and reveals the inscription. This gift from a bridegroom to a bride reminds us of that gift which Christ promises to His church—a white stone bearing a new name, which no one knows save he that receives it. (Rev. 2: 17.)

An Appeal for Help at Sea Led to an Increase of misfortune recently. A schooner entered New York Harbor on February 26, needing assistance in medicines and men. She left Nicaragua on January 17, bound for Boston, with a crew of nine men and a cargo of mahogany. On the way seven of the men fell sick of Chagres fever, and one died. Only the captain and the steward were fit for work, and they despaired of reaching port safely. They hoisted signals of distress, and on February 10 a steamer bore down upon them. The captain of the schooner asked for some medicines, and a man or two to help him navigate the ship. The steamer's captain declined, but offered to tow the schooner into port for $5,000. This offer was not accepted. While the negotiation was going on, the steamer, through the blunder of her helmsman, collided with the schooner, breaking in her side and tearing her sails and rigging. Ultimately she sailed away, leaving the schooner in far worse plight than she had found her. How the captain succeeded in getting his ship as far as New York is a marvel: but he did so, and after getting repairs done and a new crew, he proceeded to his destination. There are some in distress in the voyage of life who have a similar experience, with not so happy a result. In their difficulties they seek deliverance, with Satan's help, by lying, cheating, forgery, or some other wicked scheme. The general consequence is immediate injury to themselves, and eventually eternal shipwreck. (Isa. 31: 3.)

Burglars' Tools were Required for a Wedding in Jersey City, N. J., on February 27. A young plumber who was locked up in one of the cells of the city prison, was the bridegroom. The bride was a young lady from Greenville, who, with her mother, was in attendance at the prison, and a Justice was also on hand to perform the ceremony. The police captain having been duly satisfied that his prisoner's release was strictly in accordance with law, sent a policeman to the cell to bring the bridegroom. In a short time the man returned alone, saying that he could not open the door of the cell. The lock was out of order in some way, and resisted all efforts to pick it. The wedding party growing impatient, it was decided to force the door open. That was a work of difficulty, as prison doors are usually constructed with a view to resisting precisely such operations. Recourse was had to a set of burglars' tools which had been taken some time before from a convicted bank burglar, and were kept as relics at police headquarters. With these the party went to work, the bride taking an active share in the labor. After half an hour's effort the door was forced, and the prisoner walked out to take his place before the Justice, who quickly performed the ceremony uniting the young couple. An analogous preliminary is necessary to the union between a sinner and his Saviour. Christ accepts the guilty one as he is, but releases him from the bonds of his sin before union with Himself. (Isa. 42: 7.)

An Amusing Interpretation of a Clergyman's sympathy was mentioned at a meeting in New York on February 28. The Rev. Howard Crosby, D. D., who is well known for his interest in social questions, especially in the temperance movement, said, in the course of a speech, that he was once on a Fourth Avenue car, when an intoxicated passenger was making himself a nuisance to the other occupants of the car. Several of them sternly reproved him, and threatened that if he did not cease his filthy and blasphemous observations they would turn him out of the car. The threat exasperated the drunken man, and he became more profane and boisterous than before. Dr. Crosby went over to him, and seating himself by the man's side talked to him gently and soothingly. The fellow quieted down, and chatted amicably with the doctor. Shortly afterward he rose to leave the car. As he did so he scowled savagely on the men who had reproved him, but turning to Dr. Crosby, and putting his hand on his shoulder, his face beaming amiably, he said: "Ah, old feller! you know how to talk to a man who has had a glass or two; you know how it is yourself." It was a ludicrous blunder, but the man evidently thought that sympathy so genuine could come only from a fellow-sufferer. He may learn, however, that infinite sympathy is to be had from One whose fellow-feeling comes from temptation, and not from sin. (Heb. 4: 15.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Amanda Smith is on her way to the United States, after seven years' absence in Africa.

Mr. Moody is arranging to conduct a Bible Institute in Chicago, to commence on April 1 and continue to the end of May.

Dr. Lewis, Bishop of Ontario, was married on February 20 in Paris, France, to Miss Ada Leigh, the founder of the famous orphanages and institutions for women.

The Y. M. C. A. International Convention, to be held in Philadelphia in May next, is expected to be the largest yet held. There are to be more than a thousand delegates present.

The sudden death of Rev. C. E. Ruddick, of West Bedford, O., is announced. During a recent series of services 112 persons were converted. His loss is deeply mourned by his church.

Evangelists Bliss and Towner are doing successful work at Madison, Wis. The Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist churches are uniting in the meetings. A large body of Christian workers are assisting in the meetings and joining in prayer for God's blessing on the work.

We are glad to learn that the Rev. George T. Dowling, whose invitation to Christians to the Lord's Table led to his leaving the Baptist Church, will not be lost to pulpit work. He has accepted a call from Albany, N. Y., to the pastorate of the Madison Avenue Reformed Church.

Major Geo. A. Hilton's arrangements for evangelistic temperance work in Oregon for March are: Dalles, March 5 to 10; La Grande, 13 to 17; Baker City, 20 to 24. On March 28 he begins work in Denver, Colo. A large addition of members resulted from his labors in Portland, Oregon.

The Rev. E. W. Oakes preached the first time on February 24 in the new church building erected for the congregation he has organized in Manchester, N. H. It is called the People's Church, and as all the seats are free its name is appropriate. It cost over $10,000 and seats 500 persons.

Rev. B. Fay Mills commenced his work in Jersey City, N. J., in the Bergen Baptist Church. The congregation filled the large edifice to overflowing. The evening service was in the Bergen Reformed Church, which was also crowded. Mr. Mills preached every evening last week in different churches.

Bishop H. C. Riley continues his delightful stereopticon lectures, and is awakening a deep interest in the Christian work in Mexico, which is his sole object. On February 19 he lectured in Christ Church, Brooklyn, on the 26th at Flushing, L. I., and on the 27th at Zion Chapel, Forty-first Street, New York.

MY PERSONAL HOLDFAST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"My God will hear me." Micah. 7:7.

Confidence in Prayer Essential to Prevailing—I. The Results of Confidence—A Resort in the Worst of Times—Not a Forlorn Hope—A Bulwark Against Despair—Patience Encouraged—The Punctuality of God—An Answer to Enemies—Rising Again Assured—Confidence that Light will Come—II. The Reason for the Confidence—The Faithful Promiser—Past Experience—Philosophy Tested by a Post—III. The Confidence in Exercise—Leads to Applying to God First—To Real Prayer—How to Pray.

OBSERVE that the prophet has no sort of doubt. He insinuates no "if" or "but" or "peradventure," but he says it straight out as a fact of which he is infallibly convinced—"My God will hear me." What a blessed thing it is that the child of God knows and feels that this is true; wherever he fails, He will succeed at the throne! If all other friendly ears are closed, his Friend of friends will hear him. Lose your confidence in the power of prayer, and I know not what remains to you. If you are obliged to say, "My God will not hear me"—if that is the language of your unbelieving spirit—the tendon-Achilles is cut, and you cannot stand with confidence, much less run with delight. With faith in prayer you have heaven's but if you ask waveringly, you find that warning true, "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. Let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord." It is a very wide question, that of God's hearing the prayer of men, and I should need a considerable time to describe particularly whose prayers the Lord will hear, and what prayers He will hear, and how it is true that He always hears, whatever His answer may be. But it will be a far better thing if, without debate, you can personally say for yourself, "Let others say what they will, and judge what they please in this matter, I am persuaded by the Spirit of all grace that my God will hear me." If, so far as you yourself are concerned, you have this assurance, your own feet are upon a rock, and you need not trouble about the sand and the mire. This assurance, "My God will hear me," is better than all the aid of mortal men, and a greater wealth than the mines of India could afford you.

I. I shall try to speak, in the first place, upon in prayer in believers. When they can truly say, "My God will hear me," the best consequences will come of it. Think of what will happen to them. To begin with, in the worst of times God is their resort. In reading the chapter we saw that the times were desperate. The nation had become rotten throughout; "the good man is perished out of the earth: and there is none upright among men." Justice was openly sold; bribes were unblushingly taken, and even openly demanded. In business all were dishonest; "the best of them is a briar: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge." In domestic life there was no trusting friend or husband or wife or son or daughter. The whole land had become corrupt; and as the prophet surveyed it with tears in his eyes, he could see nothing worth the looking upon, and he cried, "Therefore I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation: my God will hear me."

His conviction that God would hear his prayer was his last comfort, and it led him to close his eyes upon the spectacle of universal crime and look heavenward, and heavenward only. When you have faith in prayer you will, in the cloudy and dark day, find consolation in looking to God, who is the blessed sun from whom a brighter day will come. Instead of being overcome by doubt you will gather up your faith, which else might have been scattered among men, and you will place the whole of it upon God, who still remains true and faithful and holy. Men who have confidence in prayer have perpetual errands at the throne, for they have abundant trials in the wickedness of men, and they look for more abundant mercies from the Lord. If they are in straitened circumstances they run to their Father in heaven to ask that their daily bread may be given them; and if they enjoy plenty, with equal earnestness they pray that their abundance may be sanctified. In any case the believer has abundant reasons for Praying Without Ceasing.

Another blessing which we derive from the certainty that God hears our prayer is that our eyes are led to look to God with hope. Not only do we turn to the Lord because we have no other resort, but because we look to Him with joyful expectation. The prophet says, "Therefore will I look unto the Lord. I will wait for the God of my salvation." We view our God, not as a forlorn hope, but as the sure source of salvation to us. Many things are taken from us, but hope remains forever in the box, which is not that of Pandora, but of Jehovah. It is one of the best of our blessings that we "through patience and comfort of the Scriptures may have hope." It is no small thing to keep hope alive in the human bosom: it is the direst of calamities when it dies out. Whence the suicide—the plunge into the dark wave, or the crimson gash that lets out a soul? Are not those gates of grim death opened as hope flies away? Whence that listlessness, that lethargy, that want of energy, that letting things drift to ruin? It is because hope has quitted the helm, and the ship is drawn upon the rocks. Kill hope in a man, and you have killed the man's best self. The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but "a wounded spirit, who can bear?" Now, a firm conviction that God will hear prayer is a life-buoy to a sinking hope. He will not give all up who believes that his God will hear him.

Surely, these are two choice blessings—to be enabled to look always to God, and to look towards Him evermore with hope; but we go further. A full conviction of the certainty that God will hear our prayers helps us to wait with patience. "I will wait for the God of my salvation." He may not answer me to-day, but He will hear me. To-morrow may not bring me the expected deliverance, but it will come. Though the vision tarry, I will wait for it; for it shall come, and according to the reckoning of infinite wisdom it really will not tarry. Great is

The Punctuality of God.

He never is before His time, but He never is behind. He is not only present when we need Him, but we find Him "a very present help in trouble." We find it good to wait, because we have no fear of being disappointed. In all difficulties, and under all opposition, we shall be able to endure with patience the will of the Lord, if we remain firm in the assurance that prayer is heard of the Lord. I often repeat Ralph Erskine's ditty:

"I'm heard when answered, soon or late,
Yea, heard when I no answer get;
I'm kindly answered when refused,
And treated well when harshly used."

It is so. No good thing will the Lord withhold from them that walk uprightly; and, therefore, if an answer to prayer be withheld, it is because what we sought was not for our real good. A flat denial in form may be a full grant in essence, since all our prayers are comprehended in "Thy will be done;" and this is the standing corrective for all that we ask amiss. If, then, in prayer we do not have our will of God in one way, yet we shall have it in another; for we evermore, in the inmost depths of our soul, are praying, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." The Lord will either give us what we ask, or do some better thing for us.

If you now pass on to the verse that follows the text, you will get another series of thoughts, showing the result of an assured conviction that God hears prayer. Observe that it gives us an answer to our enemies. "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy! my God will hear me." The foe has seen me fall, and he has hastened to set his foot upon me; but I do not lie there in despair, surrendering myself to be destroyed by him, for "My God will hear me." How bravely can we deride derision, and pour scorn upon the scorners, even when they are in their glory, when we firmly believe that the Lord heareth prayer! They reckon that we are defeated, that we have no one to plead our cause, that we shall never be heard of again, and they have very ingenious ways of telling us these cruel persuasions of theirs. We answer them by declaring boldly that our heavenly Father has heard our cries, and that, before long, He will make this clear even to our foes. "Then mine enemy shall see it; and shame shall cover her which said unto me, Where is thy God?"

We Fight a Waiting Battle.

Fabius saved Rome by waiting, and we, also, are saved by the hope which waits upon the Lord, and bides the time of the faithful promise. The saint is no Cæsar, who boastfully writes, "veni, vidi, vici;" but his dispatches are written with the pen of patience, and here is one of them, "I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in His word do I hope." We are of the tribe of Gad, of whom it is written, "A troop shall overcome him: but he shall overcome at the last." As for me, my heart is quiet beneath the contumely which comes of defending the Lord's own truth, for He will justify me before long; and if He should not do so speedily, yet He will do it ultimately: yea, I am happy to wait even till after death, for I know that my justifier liveth, and that, though after my skin worms devour this body, yet shall my Lord vindicate me and all others who have been faithful.

Again, our confidence in a prayer-hearing God sustains us with the bright

when we are down. What saith the prophet? "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy! when I fall, I shall arise." What if I have slipped? What if, through pressure of pain and sorrow, my spirits have sunk within me? What if I am a broken and crushed man? Yet I can pray, and I do pray, and my God will hear me; therefore I shall arise again. Oh, blessed thought! The Christian may fall very low, but underneath him are the everlasting arms. Even though we fall into the grave, blessed be God we can fall no lower; and then comes the rising from among the dead, the rising to the throne. It makes my spirit leap within me to think how this conviction that God hears prayer begets in us the joyful certainty that we cannot be left in the dust, but we must arise, and shake ourselves, and put on our beautiful array.

A firm conviction that the Lord hears prayer gives the soul confidence that to it. The prophet says, "When I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me." This delightful expectation springs out of that little word, "My God will hear me." If I am plunged in darkness I shall still pray; and as the Lord will hear me, He will give me light. Prayer lights candles where there are none. My God: my light. It cannot be that a Christian should be in the dark and have his God with him: for if his God be with him it must be light round about him! Joy and comfort must spring up in the most barren misery if we know how to pray: the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose if the feet of supplication touch it. They said that where the Tartar's foot fell the grass was withered; but we may say that where the believer's knee touches, all is made fruitful. God keep us in this conviction; for I say again, if this goes, all goes: if there is no more power in prayer, religion is either a nullity, or a mere piece of fanaticism, or a juggle of priestcraft.

All those are the results of holding firmly to the doctrine of effectual prayer; and to us most excellent results they are.

II. And from this I pass on to notice

The Reason for the Confidence which believers exhibit in the matter of prayer. They speak not without reason when they say, "My God will hear me." Why do we thus believe? We believe it first, and mainly, because of the faithful Promiser. The character of the Lord God, who has promised to answer prayer, the truthfulness of the Lord Jesus, who has said, "If ye shall ask anything in my name I will do it," and the wisdom of the Holy Spirit who indites the prayer—in a word, the character of God Himself constrains us to rely upon His word without a doubt. It is declared, over and over, in the inspired Scriptures of truth, that "He that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." We have the command "Ask, and it shall be given you." I had rather have one little promise in the corner of the Bible to support my faith than I would have all the philosophies of scientific men to sustain my opinion.

The history of philosophy is, in brief, the history of fools. All the sets of philosophers that have yet lived have been more successful in contradicting those that came before them than in anything else. Within a few years the evolutionists will be cut in pieces by some new dreamers. The reigning philosophers of the present period have in them so much of the vitality of madness that they will be a perpetual subject of contempt; and I venture to prophesy that, before my head shall lie in the grave, there will hardly be a notable man left who will not have washed his hands of the present theory. That which is taught to-day for a certainty by savants will soon have been so disproved as to be trodden down as the mire in the streets. The Lord's truth liveth and reigneth, but man's inventions are but for an hour. I am no prophet, nor the son of a prophet; but as I have lived to see marvellous changes in the dogmas of philosophy, I expect to see still more.

See How They Have Shifted.

They used to tell us that the natural depravity of our race was a myth—they scouted the idea that we were born in sin, and declared, with mimic sentiment, that every dear babe was perfect. Now what do they tell us? Why, that if we do not inherit the original sin of Adam, or any other foregoing man; yet we have upon us the hereditary results of the transgressions of the primeval oysters, or other creatures, from which we have ascended or descended. We bear in our bodies, if not in our souls, the effects of all the tricks of the monkeys whose future was entailed upon us by evolution. This nonsense is to be received by learned societies with patience, and accepted by us with reverence, while the simple statements of Holy Writ are regarded as mythical or incredible. I only mention this folly for the sake of showing that the opponents of the Word of God constantly shift their positions, like quicksands at a river's mouth; but they are equally dangerous, whatever position they occupy. In the announcement of heredity philosophical thought has deprived itself of all power to object to the Biblical doctrine of original sin. This is of no consequence to us, who care nothing for their objections; but it ought to be some sort of hint to them.

I feel ashamed to add anything to the first overwhelming reason for faith, for that is enough and more than enough; yet, since faith is so often weak, we may place beneath it another prop. We believe in prayer because of

Our Past Experience.

Certain of us could not say less than "My God will hear me," for if we did we should be traitors to the witness of our lives. I shall not turn this into an experience-meeting, but, if I did, what testimonies we could produce to answered prayer! I will not even quote a selection from the many great and special answers which I have personally received; but all the saints of God are one in their testimony upon this point.

When the philosopher said that there was no such thing as matter, he who hurt his head against a post was convinced of the contrary; and when another great theorist said that there was no such thing as mind, he who had been heart-broken with sorrow could not be converted to the opinion. It is hard to argue against our experience and consciousness. We are case-hardened. The Creole proverb says, "When the mosquito tried to sting the alligator, he wasted his time;" and the case is much the same when infidels deal with us. It would be needful to convince us that facts are not facts, that deliverances from trouble were not deliverances, that supplies of necessities were not supplies. I am ready to disbelieve my eyes, for they have often deceived me; I am ready to discredit my ears, for they have misled me; but I cannot disbelieve my personal experience, especially when it does not consist of a few scattered incidents, but of a chain of facts. The Lord has listened to my voice when I have cried to Him, and this I know as certainly as I know that I have lived upon this earth; therefore I believe that "my God will hear me" in the present and in the future.

III. I close with a third head. Let us consider

The Exercise of this Confidence

In prayer. I have shown you the results of this confidence, and some few of the reasons for it; now let us see whither the exercise of this confidence leads us. What are we doing when we carry this assurance into action? Our confidence that the Lord hears prayer is seen in our looking to Him first and foremost at all times. For our eternal salvation we look to God alone, accepting that divine system in which, by water and by blood, we are saved from sin, through faith. Our confidence does not lie in our own resolves, or moral virtue, or spiritual attainments, but in Him to whom we cry in prayer, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe." We are glad of the aid of friends in smaller concerns; but even there our first resort is to our God in heaven, for we each one feel this to be his chief defence—"My God will hear me."

This also impels us really to pray. Since God will hear us, we will pray to Him, and we do. Alas! we have many Sins in Reference to Prayer.

Our slackness in prayer, and our unbelief as to prayer, are crimes for which we ought to cover our faces with shame; but when we walk with God aright, when we keep His commandments, and abide in His love, then He gives us life, joy, and power in prayer, and then we become conscious of success at the throne. That power being bestowed upon us, we come to pray as naturally as a child cries. We ought to have set times for private prayer; it is most healthful that we should; but I question whether our best prayers are not those which are quite irrespective of time and season. The Lord is always willing; therefore let us be always praying in one form or another. Let us pray, no matter what may be the trial, no matter what the joy, no matter what the company. Pray without ceasing, because it is always true—"My God will hear me." You know how it was said of a holy man as he walked the streets, "There goes the man that can have anything of God that he pleases to ask." This is the secret of a great life. Fail here, and you fail everywhere.

As for you, poor souls, who cannot say, "My God," shall I tell you that you may not pray? Far from it. If you have a desire to pray, encourage that desire. Let your heart go up to Him who says to you, "seek ye the Lord while He may be found." Instead of telling you not to pray, I would direct you

How to Pray.

You have need, first, to have a God to pray to, for till then you cannot say, "My God will hear me." God can only be yours in the saving sense by Christ's being yours. Jesus says, "No man cometh unto the Father but by Me." God becomes our God by faith which appropriates Him as He is revealed in His Son Jesus Christ. Look to Jesus, for He is the mercy-seat, and so the way to God in prayer. The gospel that we have preached to you is not "Pray," but "Believe": "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Then, being saved, you will be able to pray with assurance of prevailing. Come to God by the blood of Jesus, and so shall a sinner's prayer be heard. Here, on this spot I charge thee cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Let that request be silently offered, even though thou darest not lift thine eye to heaven. Come, brethren, let us all offer it, and then there shall come to each of us a justification far sweeter and larger than if we should stand aloof from sinners and say, "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men." O my Lord, hear Thou this my prayer, that those who hear or read this sermon may be able to say, even as Thine unworthy servant most boldly says, "My God will hear me." Grant it, I pray Thee, for Jesus' sake.

DINING WITH AN INDIAN CHIEF.*

ALTHOUGH for many years I had been much among the natives of the forest, my dinner with Flat Mouth was the first instance of a meal with Indian Royalty. Flat Mouth, the present ruler of the Pillagers, is a descendant of Aishki-bug-ekozh, the most famous of all the Chippewa chiefs. He is stalwart in appearance, and is endowed with talents which certainly entitle him to this distinction. Having accepted his invitation to dinner, I went to his residence at the appointed hour, accompanied by my brother. I found him living in a comfortable log-house of two rooms, well floored and roofed, with a couple of small glass windows. A plain board table stood in the centre of the front room, upon which the dinner was spread. Pine board benches were placed on each side of the table and at the ends. We followed the example of our host in sitting down. Five other persons, including his wife, were admitted to the meal. The others were White Cloud, chief of the Mississippi, and three Chippewa sub-chiefs. The wife of Flat Mouth sat on his left and waited upon him and those he had invited. Teacups and teaspoons of plain manufacture were carefully arranged, the number corresponding with that of the expected guests. A large dish of bass and whitefish, cut up and boiled in good taste, was placed in the centre of the table from which we were served. A birch-bark salt-cellar, in which pepper and salt were mixed in unequal proportions, allowed each the privilege of seasoning the fish with both, or dispensing with them altogether. Our tea was sweetened with maple sugar. A dish of blueberries, picked on the shore of the lake, completed the dinner.

Indian Courtship.

Referring to the form of courtship among the Chippewas, Kitchinodin [a Christian Indian] said that formerly when a young man had conceived an attachment for a female, and wished to make her his wife, he gave the first intimation of his design by throwing a deer into the lodge of the girl's parents. This he would repeat for several days, after which the father usually asked him what object he had in doing so, and whether it was to obtain his daughter. The young man having replied in the affirmative, the relatives of the girl would, if they approved of the connection, prepare a dress for the youth, which they would take to his wigwam, and there the damsel's father would invest him with it. He would then take him home with him, and introduce him to the bride; there the lover remained ten or twelve days, until his friends had prepared the presents they intended for his wife's family. It was usual for the young couple to dwell with the bride's parents for the term of a year, during which time the young husband was virtually a servant in the family, giving his father-in-law all the produce of his hunt. At the expiration of this term he was at liberty to remove his wife to his own wigwam.

Missionary Founders.

Like several other cities in this State [Minnesota] Red Wing has a history, and exemplifies how much an intelligent and industrious people can accomplish in a very short time. The standard of civilization was originally planted here by two Swiss missionaries, Denton and Garin, who arrived, accompanied by their wives, in 1838. The savage Dakotas at this date occupied the territory, and those brave and self-denying missionaries labored among them until the health of Denton failed in 1846, when the American Board of Missions appointed the Revs. J. W. Hancock and John Aiton, of Vermont, to succeed them. Two mission houses were built, one of which remains to this day. Two white families and about three hundred Indians were at that time the sole occupants of what is now the enterprising city of Red Wing.

A Helmet Dothed,

The son of a pious man enlisted in the army. His father accompanied him to his quarters, exhorting him to remember his daily prayers, and on parting from him spoke as follows: "My son, if our gracious God bring thy sins to thy remembrance when thou art among strangers, stand still and take off thy hat, for the Lord is about to speak with thee." The young man entered the barracks with the best intentions; at first he was much ridiculed by his comrades, on account of his habit of prayer; then he quite left it off and forgot all about it. The first time, however, that he mounted guard, and had to take off his helmet at evening prayer, his father's words returned to his mind; he prayed in very deed, and the Holy Spirit brought his sins to his remembrance. This was how the turning-point of his life came about, and the letter that he wrote on the subject to his father occasioned much joy and thankfulness in his old home.

MR. J. H. LISHNIEWSKY.

The Hebrew-Christian Student.

ONE of the most remarkable conversions, achieved through the blessing of God on the labors of the Rev. Jacob Freshman among the Jews of New York, has been that of Mr. J. H. Lishniewsky, whose portrait appears on this page. He is thirty-one years of age, having been born in January, 1858, at Simferopol, in the Crimea, southern Russia. His family is well known among the Jews of Russia, several of his name having taken high rank in scholarship. He was reared in strict conformity with the Hebrew faith, and so remarkable was his intelligence that at the age of six years he was able to recite nearly the whole book of Deuteronomy. He received a thorough general education at the public schools, and graduated with honor in his eighteenth year. He was then sent to Germany to pursue his studies, and remained there, partially supporting himself, until 1883. He was then twenty-five years old, and was highly esteemed for his talents and attainments.

What was to be his career? The question was a difficult one. Not in Germany, and still less in Russia, were there good openings for a man of learning hampered by Jewish birth and strong Jewish principles. He turned his gaze longingly toward this country, where, as he had been led to believe, his race and faith would be no bar to his advancement. He came to New York, and soon found employment in the office of one of his own race. Casually he heard of Mr. Freshman's meetings for Jews. He had come in contact, up to this time, with no form of Christianity but that of the Roman Catholic Church. He went to Mr. Freshman's meeting, and was much impressed by its simplicity and earnestness. But he was well versed in Jewish lore, and was pugnacious withal. His skill in argument, and his prejudice against the name of Jesus of Nazareth rendered his presence at the meetings a somewhat trying experience. But Mr. and Mrs. Freshman were patient, and he continued to come. He confessed that he came chiefly because he enjoyed discussion of religious subjects, and because he found the exercise aided him in his effort to acquire a mastery of the language.

For about a year and a half these discussions continued, until, driven from point to point, compelled to admit that in this and that particular Jesus fulfilled the Messianic predictions of his own Scriptures, he ceased to resist, and became an earnest inquirer after truth. He was not only convinced that Jesus is the Christ, but the Holy Spirit convinced him of his own personal need of a Saviour, and he accepted Christ for himself, and gave himself to Him. In every step of his progress he had the help and advice of Mr. and Mrs. Freshman who rejoiced with him in his conversion. He was baptized on November 1, 1885, in the Hebrew-Christian church in St. Mark's Place, and gave public testimony of his faith. Many Jews witnessed the ceremony, and they expressed their derision and hatred by groans and ejaculations. Persecution naturally followed; he was discharged from his situation, and was ostracised by the whole Jewish community in New York. The young man was not moved by these manifestations of hostility, but continued firm in the faith, and devoted himself assiduously to the study of the New Testament. As he entered more fully into the light of the gospel he longed to tell others of his joy, especially those of his own race. He spoke of his desire to Mr. Freshman, who of course rejoiced to hear that he wished to consecrate himself to the Lord's service; but there was at that time no means of sending him to acquire the special training necessary for the difficult sphere of missionary to the Jews. One day, however, Mr. Freshman, returning from a short tour, met his young friend with the glad news that the Lord had opened the way. He was sent to the seminary at Xenia, O., and subsequently he was transferred to the seminary at Allegheny, Pa. At both institutions he acquitted himself with credit, and will soon enter upon his arduous but glorious work.

This is only one of many young men who Mr. Freshman has had the pleasure of leading from the darkness of Judaism into the glorious light of the Gospel. His work in New York has been a difficult and laborious one, but few have had so many tokens of God's approval. It has been throughout a work of faith. Sometimes there have been crises when the funds have been almost exhausted, but God has always supplied his need, and has raised up friends who have contributed to keep the work in progress. With a little more money to purchase books and Christian literature for distribution he could widely extend his operations, but he leaves the provision in the hands of God, and keeps steadily on with the work, satisfied that in His own way and at His own time, the Master whom he serves will furnish all that is needed. Any of our readers willing to help in the work may send their contributions to Rev. Jacob Freshman, St. Mark's Place, New York.

A TIMELY VISIT

"I WAS tired out one winter afternoon, recently," says a Christian worker, "and turned my face homeward with a longing for rest and quiet. It had been a long and distressing day; for though on the avenues carriages and expensively attired pedestrians proved that there was abundant wealth in the city, the poverty I had seen in the tenements on the side streets had made my heart ache. It is the fashion, I know, to speak of poverty in America as the result of drink or laziness; but of all the cases of starvation I had seen that morning, not one could be traced to either cause.

"I thought of these things as I walked toward my home, when suddenly, without any cause that I could trace, the image of a woman rose vividly before my mind. I knew her well, but I had not intended to call upon her that day, as there was no pressing need for it that I knew of, and her home was several blocks from the district in which I had been visiting. I was curious to cover what could have suggested her to my mind; but I could gain no clue to the process of thought. Could it be that God was calling me to go to her? I have little faith, as a rule, in presentiments or unexplainable impulses; but this was so strong and vivid that I determined to obey it.

"A walk of about twenty minutes, and a journey up five flights of stairs, brought me to her door. 'Oh, I am so glad to see you!' she said, as she opened it. 'I have been praying ever since morning that you might come.' I listened in amazement to her story. She had a child so sick that to take her out into the frosty air would be certain death. But she was behind with her rent, and that morning had received notice that she must either pay or move out before night. Pay she could not, for her husband had no work, and she was kept a prisoner herself by the sickness of her child. She believed God would deliver her, and she went to Him; but as the shades of evening fell, her faith was giving way.

"I had no money at command then, for my slender pocketbook had collapsed early in the day; but I was well known in the district. I went to the agent and told him I would be responsible for the rent. 'You will have to pay it, then,' he said, gruffly; 'those people never will; but I'll take your word for it.' I went back and relieved the woman's mind by telling her what I had done, and a more grateful woman I never saw. 'God bless you, ma'am!' she said; 'you have been an angel to me.'

"The thought crossed my mind as I came away, 'Had I indeed been an angel to her? Yes, so it seemed. Poor, faulty, sinful as I am, God had used me as a messenger to answer a prayer, and that is angels' service. What an honor for a sinful mortal! Surely that is a grand reward. I was tired no longer, but went home with new life and energy in my step. I may say here that I did not have to pay the rent after all. The very next day the woman's husband obtained work, and was able to pay it himself.'

PLOUGHING IN NORTH INDIA.

(See Illustration.)

OUR acquaintance with elephants in this country is confined to visits to menageries, but in Northern India it is not uncommon to see them engaged in useful occupations and not as mere exhibitions. A missionary travelling in the outlying districts of India on the back of an elephant is not an unusual sight. For although the elephant is heavy and unwieldy, sometimes weighing six or seven thousand pounds, he is, nevertheless, as Bernier says, "surefooted, feeling his way when the road is difficult and dangerous, taking a firm hold by one foot before moving another."

A native rajah now and then comes into Calcutta upon some mission to the British authorities, riding in a magnificent howdah, with his elephant covered with brilliant trappings; but still more common it is to see this stately animal used for the conveyance of the manifold servants who wait upon the rich. Sometimes he is seen laden with tents and tent-poles, or with water-bottles, pots, saucepans, and other paraphernalia of the kitchen, slung about his body in all directions. His appearance then is somewhat more ludicrous than dignified.

As seen in the accompanying picture, the elephant is often trained to agricultural purposes. His great strength is of much value in ploughing, at which work he is able to accom-

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Ordered to Utah.

PERHAPS the reader may think that now I might have left the Church, and thus have avoided all those troubles which awaited me in Utah. But let him remember that, although my faith was shaken, it was not wholly destroyed. All that I clung to on earth—my husband, whom I truly loved, and my darling children—were part and parcel of Mormonism. I could not tear myself from them, and isolate my soul from all that made life worth having.

My unsettled state of mind, however, did not long remain a secret. It was spoken of among the Saints, and I became an object of interest. The pastor over the London and adjoining Conferences was the son of one of the chief apostles in Utah—a young man, whose good-nature was far better than his religion. He visited us very frequently, and used to bring with him the distinguished American Elders who might be visiting the metropolis. I have no doubt that they were sincere in their desire to do me good; but it was not kind attentions that I then needed, it was the removal of the cause of my sorrows.

They tried to persuade me that it was all "the work of the Lord;" but I could not see it in that light, and very often in reply to their consolations I said very hard things of the wicked doctrine, and the leaders of the Church, whose conduct I considered sinful. And in this I did not stand alone, for I soon found that the President of the Conference, Elder Marsden, had been in the same position for years, and his wife was "quite through" with Mormonism. In fact, so great had been the distrust occasioned, that in the report ending June 30, 1853, it was stated that from the whole British Church, which then numbered very nearly 31,000 souls, 11,776 had been excommunicated for apostasy!

Of those who remained faithful I cannot give a much more cheering account. The elders who visited President Marsden made as damaging reports of the condition of the Saints as their worst enemies could desire. All that my young friend, Mary Burton, had told me did not equal the truth of what I saw for myself. No one had any confidence now in what the Elders said; how could they be trusted after so many years of deception?

The elders who visited me, and reasoned with me about my want of faith, tried to persuade me to be baptized again. Among the Mormons it is the privilege of the faithful to be baptized over and over again, as often as may be needed, for the remission of their sins, which are thus washed away, and the penitent is enabled to start afresh. At that time of fearful excitement in Utah, called by the Mormons "The Reformation," when people were being exhorted under terrible penalties to confess their sins, many were so frightened that they acknowledged themselves guilty of crimes of which they had never dreamed, while at the same time many horrible and detestable sins were brought to light. Brigham Young and the leaders found that they were confessing too much—the sinners were far more numerous than the godly. Brigham, with his usual craft, soon found a way of escape; the people were told to be baptized again, so that, their sins being washed away, they could truly say they were not guilty of the crimes of which they might be accused.

I was not convinced, and did not see that I had anything to repent of, but I was quite willing to be re-baptized if it was thought proper. At the same time I stipulated that the President of the Conference, Elder Marsden, should be re-baptized with me. I felt that if I required re-baptizing, how much more necessary was it for Elder Marsden to have his sins washed away also. I partly believed in the fearful stories that I had heard from Zion, but it was he who had shown them to me. The pastor of the Conference gave no sign that he suspected my meaning in wishing Elder Marsden to be baptized at the same time as I was, though I believe he must have formed a pretty shrewd guess. And so we two went down into the water, but I am afraid that little of our sins was washed away. Not long after, President Marsden apostatized (as it was called) from Mormonism, and my heart remained as hard as ever. At least I was frequently told so.

Poor Elder Marsden! He was branded with the most opprobrious titles which Mormon ingenuity or malice could fling against him; and yet I know of many men—not one or two—associated most intimately with Brigham Young to-day, whose faith is not a whit stronger than that apostate's, who serve the Prophet because it is their interest to do so, but who in their hearts no more believe in his high pretensions than did James Marsden, the President of the London Conference.

Meanwhile, the season for emigration had again arrived, and we were directed to hold ourselves in readiness to start. Although by no means unexpected, this "counsel" to emigrate came very painfully to me, for every step we took towards Utah seemed to bring me nearer to the realization of my worst apprehensions. I had lost my affection for Mormonism, and my enthusiasm had now quite melted away. But to refuse to go was out of the question.

Two little ones had been added to our family in Geneva, and a fourth was born in London, the Christmas Day after our return from the Continent. The foggy atmosphere of the metropolis did not agree with them at all, accustomed, as they had been, to the pure and bracing air of Switzerland, and I soon had serious illness in my family. My second little girl, Minnie, was so ill that we almost despaired of her life, and the others required constant attention; while the little baby boy, only a few weeks old, was seldom out of my arms. Just then it was, when so very awkwardly situated, that the notification came for us to set our faces Zionward. They chided us for our want of faith, because we did not immediately take our poor little sick child from her bed at the risk of her life; but I thank God now that nature was stronger than our blind fanaticism, and that our little girl was spared to grow up a blessing, for which we shall ever be grateful.

One day, President Marsden came to me confidentially, and told me that the brethren were determined that I should leave England, and had counted upon my yielding in a moment of despair. My husband was to be "counselled" to go without me to Utah, if I persisted in my refusal. After he had left London, Elder Marsden was to give me notice to leave his house; and left destitute, and entirely among strangers, it was thought that I should be glad to follow.

I cannot tell how indignant I was; I could not find words sufficiently contemptuous to express what I felt; I reproached Elder Marsden with cowardice for agreeing to such an inhuman proposition, and I declared that I would not risk the life of my child for any measures of suffering which might be threatened me.

My husband was absent when this took place; but when he returned he approved of what I had done, and Elder Marsden was consequently "counselled" to send us away. The doctor warned us against the danger of exposing my little daughter to the cold in removing her; but we had no choice, for we were obliged to leave. Those were very painful times, constant watching and anxiety had undermined my own health, and I fell ill. Even then, had we been left alone, we might have escaped much trouble; but the incessant meddling of "counsel" was a perpetual irritation, and we were completely worn out with annoyance.

A pleasant apartment at the west end of the town was taken for me, by the advice of the medical man, and I was removed thither with my baby. I was not equal even to the task of taking care of that little thing, and had to procure the assistance of a nurse; the other children were cared for by my friends. All that I needed was rest and tranquillity of mind, and I soon began to recover strength, though far from well. But this state of quietude was soon to be disturbed. Again we were notified that the last emigrant ship of the season was about to leave, and we must sail in her: and again we were obliged to refuse. My husband telegraphed to the Apostle at Liverpool that I was not well enough to travel, and he was told to "bring me along, and I should get better." The Apostle (?) cared nothing for individual suffering, providing the ambitious plans of the priesthood in Salt Lake City were carried out. But my husband, anxious though he was to set out for Utah, and obedient as he ever was to "counsel," was not such a slave as they thought him, and he refused to go. For this he was blamed, and it was said that his own faith was wavering.

Since my arrival in London I had several times seen my young friend Mary Burton. She had, as she told me in her letters, very greatly changed, for she had now become quite a young woman. Still she retained most of her winning ways, though her childish prettiness had given place to the more mature beauty of womanhood; and when I saw her I was not surprised that she should be an object of attention, or that Elder Shrewsbury should have felt so deeply her rejection of him.

I also had a visit from another person, whom I little expected to see. This was no other than Elder Shrewsbury himself, who, I had been told, had left London some months before. This, he said, was quite true; he had left London, and gone to work as a missionary hundreds of miles away, trying to forget his disappointment, but to no purpose. His was one of those natures which, though kind and considerate to every one, are not ready to form hasty attachments, but which, when once they do meet with an object upon which to lavish their affections, become devoted in friendship and unchanging in love. Their affections flow more deeply than those of most people. Such was Elder Shrewsbury, and such I thought he would always be; but what disposition, however good, can be relied upon when influenced by religious fanaticism? He stood before me, then, manly and upright in his bearing, truthful and honest—a man who would have scorned evasion or deceit; and his every thought of Mary was replete with tenderness and love. And yet I lived to see that man again, in Utah—alas, how changed a man!

Before we first left England I was acquainted with Elder Shrewsbury, but not very intimately. We had one or two interesting conversations together, but I remembered him chiefly in connection with Mary Burton. It was about her that he now came to see me—he wanted me to talk to her, and intercede with her in his behalf. But I was no match-maker, and all my thoughts respecting love and marriage had recently been anything but pleasant. I told him that I thought Mary had done quite right in refusing to see him; and, in fact, declining to receive the attentions of any Mormon man. I did not doubt his love for her at present, I said; but no one could any longer rely upon a Mormon elder's word. Years to come, when they had a little family growing up around them, and when it would be too late for Mary to repent of trusting him, he might suddenly be convinced of the necessity of obeying Smith's alleged "revelation," and then what could she do? No! Even supposing that she loved him, which, I said, was very questionable, it was better that she should suffer a disappointment now, than have her heart wrung with cruelty and neglect in after years.

"What!" he cried, his eyes flashing with indignation, "do you take me for a dog, that I should treat her so?"

"No, no," I said, and tried to pacify him; "I do not think anything bad of you, but I look upon you as a man who is in love, and therefore blind. You think of nothing now but Mary, and are willing to sacrifice everything, and to promise anything, providing you can win her. But when she has become your wife, if she ever does, and you have time to cool down, you'll begin to see things in another light. You'll find that she is only an ordinary woman, made of flesh and blood, like all the other daughters of Eve, and with, I daresay, quite as many whims and fancies and perverse ways as any of them; and then, when she ceases to be 'an angel' in your eyes, and becomes merely a woman, you'll begin to assert your right to think and to judge for yourself, and very probably all your former devotion to your religion will return."

"Sister Stenhouse," he replied, "you do not seem to have a very high opinion of my constancy; but I can assure you that I have given this matter my most earnest, prayerful thought. My love for Mary I need not mention; my devotion to my religion you only partly know. While we were told that the miserable heresy of which we have now heard was not true, no one could be more steadfast in the faith than I was; and when the revelation came, I looked upon it as a blight and a curse to the Church of God. And how well-founded my fears were, you can see from this terrible apostasy which has come upon us. I almost myself left the Church. Then I went to the Apostle, and I told him how I was situated. I told him all about Mary, and my devotion to her; that I wished to win her for my wife, but that I knew she would not marry me if she thought there was the shadow of a chance that I should live up to the revelation. I told him that I myself should be perfectly wretched in harboring the notion of a plurality of wives, and that it was impossible that I should love more than one.

"The Apostle said that I was quite right in all this. We had no proof, he said, in the Bible, that Isaac had more than one wife, and he was accepted of God. He counselled me to do all I could to win Mary, and told me that I might truthfully promise her that I would never embrace the heresy. But Mary would not so much as listen to me; in fact, since then she would never see me alone."

"I am not sure," I answered, "whether I am doing right; but I don't mind saying to you that I think, from what I have seen of Mary, that she does not dislike you; but she is a sensible girl, and does not choose to risk the happiness of her whole life."

He was vexed with me for saying this. How could I suppose that he would wreck her happiness? Was he not willing to die if it would give her a moment's pleasure?

The afternoon following, Mary Burton herself came to see me, her face all flushed with excitement, and eager to tell me something. "Whom do you think I've been talking to, Sister Stenhouse?" she exclaimed. "You'd never guess."

"I don't think there's much need for guessing," I said, significantly. "Your face betrays the secret, Mary."

"Well," she replied, "perhaps it does, but you wouldn't wonder at it, if you knew how very anxious I have been. All this time I have kept my word, and I did not see him or speak to him once, except at meetings, and not much then, and I have been very unhappy. This afternoon I came around about an hour ago to see you, and there on the door-step was Elder Shrewsbury. He said he was here yesterday, and was just going to call on you again, and then he asked me to go a little way with him, as he had something very important to say to me.

"At first I refused to go, but he wouldn't listen to it for a moment. So I went with him, and we have been talking ever since; or rather he has been talking, and I have been listening to him. I can't tell you, Sister Stenhouse, all he said—you can guess better than I can tell you. But I'm afraid I shall not be able to keep my resolution much longer, for when we came back to the door again he said he wouldn't come in to see you now, and when he begged me to let him call at Mrs. Elsworth's to-morrow night, I did not feel it in my heart to refuse him; was it very wrong of me to do so?"

I said, "I'm afraid, Mary, my opinion would not matter much either way; Elder Shrewsbury's eloquence is the music which you like best to listen to."

She blushed, and came and sat down beside me, and we talked confidentially together until the sun went down and my little room was quite dark. I told her of my troubles in Switzerland, and of the miserable effects of introducing the new Mormon doctrine there; and she in return told me all her love affairs with Elder Shrewsbury, and of her resolution not to listen to him unless he solemnly promised never to have anything to do with the heresy of the plurality of wives. Her faith in Mormonism itself had, as I expected, been very severely shaken; and I think that, had it not been for my efforts to reassure her, she would have left the Church at that time. Oh that she had; how much misery she would have been spared!

After tea, she asked, "Have you a copy of Joseph Smith's pretended 'revelation' here, Sister Stenhouse? I want to show you some strong points in it which I think will astonish you. I learned all about it from Elder Shrewsbury that night when he came to see me, and it was that that disgusted me with the whole affair."

We searched through my trunk, but could not find the document, and I told her that I had no patience to read it quite through when it was given to me, and that since then I was not sure that I had even seen it.

"Never mind," she said; "I'll bring it with me when I come again."

How often have I thought since how much depended upon that trifling circumstance. Had we then together read over the heretical revelation and noticed the "strong points" of which she spoke, I believe my eyes would have been opened, and I never should have submitted to the misery which I endured in Utah.

CHRIST'S LOVE TO THE YOUNG.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for March 17, Mark 10: 13-22; Golden Text Mark 10: 14.

The Pharisees Putting Captious Questions—Jesus Refers them to Moses—The Mosaic Only Second Best—Selfishness the Cause of Separation—The Great School of Mutual Forbearance—An Appropriate Moment for Mothers—The Example of the Disciples Followed Now—The Children Not to be Forced—Hindrances to be Removed—Promises for the Children of Believers—A Child's Prayer for His Sick Mother.

THE Pharisees, whose occupation with regard to Jesus was to put questions to Him, not with a view to obtain direction for themselves, but to place Him in a difficult position, proposed to Him a question concerning divorce: "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife?" They intended to perplex the Son of God, but an overruling hand made use of every question which they put to Him, to draw forth from Jesus some precious truth. We need never be afraid of puzzling and difficult questions, so long as we remain empty, and make no attempt to find an answer in the poor resources of our human wisdom. The Christ in us is the Power of God and the Wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1: 24), and He has the clue to every problem, the solution of every question. All which may seem, in our eyes, to work against the Kingdom of God, can easily be turned by His all might to work together for good. Let us never take our eyes off Him.

The questions of those who hated Jesus brought out precious, never-to-be-forgotten truths. He answered, "What did Moses command you? And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away." Then Jesus showed how this was but it was the next best thing, because of the hardness of their hearts. But God's first thought was another: "From the beginning of the creation God made them male and female;" made the one to supplement the other; as Paul says, "Neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord." (1 Cor. 11: 11.) "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh." This was God's first thought when man was yet sinless. The opportunities for mutual service, mutual renouncement, mutual advice, sympathy, etc.—these were part of God's thought about marriage before man fell. And yet there are those who profess to be children of God, who yet teach that separation of man and wife tends to more holiness of life. Let the Lord speak for Himself, "What, therefore, God hath joined together, let not man put sunder." It is always selfishness, even when it is not sin, which leads to separation. The school of mutual forbearance may be a very difficult school, and a secret one, where God alone is present to superintend the instruction, but it is a precious school of God, in which the lessons are learned by heart. And then He said, "that many who live a life of self are unwilling to hear, that the marriage of a divorced person, whether a man or woman, is the sin of adultery. It was only natural that at such a moment in His teaching, believing mothers should bring their children, the fruit of the marriage union, to Him "that He should touch them."

The Mothers were Wise;

they knew there was a power in contact with Jesus. A word might do to awaken the dead

Lazarus, but the little ones needed a touch to make Jesus real to them. What we need is that our little ones should be conscious that they have something to do with Jesus, and Jesus has something to do with them. It is not enough to tell them something about Jesus, as though He were some historical person, as though He were even David or Samuel, who have lived, and are now dead. They need a Saviour who can touch them, whose presence they can feel and be aware of. When children see that Jesus is a real, recognized Person with whom their parents have to do, they naturally speak to Him, and they know, as well as other people, when He speaks back to their hearts. The disciples were like many disciples nowadays, who do not believe that conversion among children is a real thing. They "rebuked those that brought them." But, thank God, it was

A Rebuke Without Authority.

"When Jesus saw it, He was much displeased, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not; for of such is the Kingdom of God." "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." (Matt. 18: 3.) Men and women must be children in order to enter into the kingdom of heaven; children are children already, and are small enough in themselves to enter in. It is easy for a child to receive, for he has nothing to bestow, and the kingdom of heaven comes by receiving. We have to come down from our high position of trying to bestow something on God, and come to the children's level, that we may take of God by grace. But it is, "Suffer the little children," not, "Force the little children," "to come unto Me." There are some who never expect the conversion of their children; there are others who are always urging them to come to Christ, as though they had power to bring it about. In neither case are the little children suffered to come to Him. It is as though He would say, "Stand aside, count on Me to do the work, only take care that you are no hindrance." To how many parents must He say "Fear not; believe only."

Great anxiety regarding the conversion of our children is no real help to them; they see that we are not sure that God is on our side, or we should not be so unhappy about them, and this is no encouragement to them to trust in God.

God Wills

that our children should be converted, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thine house." "Come thou, and all thy house, into the ark," said God to Noah (Gen. 7: 1). "Choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live (Deut. 30: 19). "I will save thy children," He says to Jerusalem (Isa. 49: 25); and again, "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children" (Isaiah 54: 13); and yet again, to "them that turn from transgression in Jacob." "As for Me, this is My covenant with them, saith the Lord; My Spirit that is upon thee, and My words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and forever." (Isa. 59: 21.) As "the Israel of God" (Gal. 6: 16), we have a right to these blessed promises, made originally for, and yet to be fulfilled to, the Jews. God's heart is large enough to take in the whole family of such as are converted to Him. When Cornelius was saved in Cesarea, every one who was gathered under his roof was saved also. When the nobleman of Capernaum believed, his whole house believed with him; and so it was with the household of Lydia, and that of the Philippian jailer. "The promise is to you and your children." (Acts 2: 39.) If there were more truly believing parents there would be more truly converted children. It is undoubtedly the will of God that our children should be saved. How, then, can we bring it about? Only do not hinder Jesus. The way between Him and the little ones is easily closed by our unbelief and our inconsistencies. If a child sees a parent anxious after he has committed anything to the Lord, that child will naturally think that it is an uncertain thing to put anything in the Lord's hands.

A Lady Lay Very Ill

and suffering, after undergoing an operation in a New York hospital. Her little boy of four years old said to her, "Mamma, I don't understand you: you say that God answers prayer, and yet you are not cured; why don't you ask Him to make you well?" She answered, "I am not sure whether God wills to make me well." "Well, I shall pray for you," he answered, and immediately knelt down and prayed, "Please, Jesus, hurry up and make mamma well." And then he asked her, "Mamma, are you well?" "No, but I shall be," she said. It was not faith, at the moment, but only the fear that her boy should grow up unbelieving; but she felt she had committed herself, and that she must believe, or she would drive her intelligent, questioning child into unbelief. She studied her Bible, and united her will with the will of God for healing, and is now a precious witness for God. Jesus took the children in His very arms and blessed them. They had to go out of the mothers' arms to be placed in His. This parents must learn. They cannot be put into His arms and remain, unless He loves them more than we do.

After He had blessed the children, and was again upon His way, there came one running, and kneeled to Him, and asked Him, "Good Master, what shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life?" Oh, how many are ready to do anything, to be anything! but to do nothing, and to be nothing is the hardest thing in the world. "Thou knowest the commandments." "All these I have observed from my youth." Was he expecting commendation in a pleasant consciousness of his own goodness? Oh, how many come with questions which tend to justify them, and make them contented with their state! "I believe so and so; am I right?" And all the time they are hoping they will be confirmed in their self-satisfaction. "Jesus, beholding him, loved him," and because He loved him, He told him the truth. "One thing thou lackest;" but that lack touched everything which he possessed. "Go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor"—enrich those who have nothing—"and come, take up the cross, and follow Me." Whatsoever thou hast, earthly riches or spiritual riches, hold nothing, give all; let God be Proprietor. He had not calculated on such a demand. He was willing to give a part, so long as he retained a hold on his property, but God must have all. And even so, in presenting our bodies a living sacrifice, God must have all or none. We are children, and children have no rights, and can hold no property.

"JUST AS I AM."

Just as I am—without one plea
But that Thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bid'st me come to Thee,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—and waiting not,
To rid my soul of one dark blot,
To Thee, whose blood can cleanse each spot,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—though tossed about
With many a conflict, many a doubt,
Fightings within, and fears without,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—poor, wretched, blind,
Sight, riches, healing of the mind,
Yea, all I need, in Thee to find,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—Thou wilt receive,
Wilt welcome, pardon, cleanse, relieve!
Because Thy promise I believe,
O Lamb of God, I come!

Just as I am—Thy love I own
Has broken every barrier down;
Now to be Thine, and Thine alone,
O Lamb of God, I come!

GEN. ERNEST BOULANGER—Bird's-eye View of Paris and the Eiffel Tower in the French Exhibition.

GENERAL ERNEST BOULANGER, The Coming Dictator of France.

His Astonishing Popularity—Its Menace to the Republic—His Adherents—Birth in 1837—His Parentage—Straits in the Home—Privations in the Military College—Service and Promotion—His Escape from Metz—Office Under Government—Growing Fear of His Influence—Exile, and Increasing Popularity—Dismissal from the Army—Elected to the Chamber of Deputies—Election Last Month by Paris—The Foremost Man in France—Prophetic Significance of his Career.

AMONG the astonishing and apparently inexplicable episodes for which French political life is noted, there has been none of late years so remarkable as the election on January 27 of Gen. Boulanger by the city of Paris as one of its representatives in the Chamber of Deputies. On the very day of the poll it was thought, by men supposed to be well-informed, that his opponent would poll more votes than he; others, less sanguine, thought that Boulanger would have a plurality, but not an absolute majority, which the French Constitution requires, and there would, therefore, have to be a new election. To the amazement of all, and the consternation of not a few, however, Boulanger's plurality was 81,500, and he had an absolute majority of all the votes cast of 54,432. Looking at each other anxiously, public men asked,

"What Does It Mean?"

Appearances are nowhere more misleading than in France; but with all allowance for the unexpected, such a sweeping majority can mean nothing less than a threat of the overthrow of the Republic. The career of the two Napoleons shows what can be done in France by an unscrupulous man who succeeds in winning a popularity so extensive and enthusiastic. No one has accused Boulanger of having scruples or principles, save the principle of looking after his own interest, and the scruple of doing anything that might injure his popularity. The only reassuring fact in the aspect of the affair is, that Boulanger needs a particularly cool and clever brain to do anything with the heterogeneous following which elected him, and such a brain he has clearly proved that he does not possess.

He is supported by malcontents, who have no principle in common but opposition to the present Government and Republican institutions. The Monarchists and Imperialists, who hope to use him as a cat's-paw, or in any event to profit by the demonstration of the weakness of the Government, and the sentiment in favor of change; the Socialists and Radicals, who will not consent to the Floquet programme for a revision of the Constitution by a Congress of the present Senate and Chamber of Deputies; the Catholics, whom the Republic has antagonized; Panama Canal stockholders; dissatisfied Republicans; tradesmen impatient at a bungling financial policy; "Revenge" enthusiasts, who think to find in the former War Minister an organizer and soldier.

To Beat the Germans—

these found in Boulanger, the instrument to express their hopes or disappointments. But they could not form a government. What they might do is to create a tidal wave that would carry the General into supreme power, which he might either exercise himself, or hand over to any one of the claimants to the French throne. It is an interesting situation, the outcome of which will be watched with deep concern in France and the world over.

Ernest Boulanger was born at Rennes, Brittany, in France, on April 29, 1837, and is therefore now 52 years of age. His mother was a Miss Griffith, born in England, but whose family had been domiciled in France for several years before she married M. Boulanger the elder, then a well-known solicitor at Rennes. It would appear that shortly after the boy's birth the family removed to Nantes, where the father, who had sold his legal practice, became an inspector for an insurance company. The appointment was probably not very lucrative, as the General has alluded in public more than once to the straitened circumstances of his parents. He has said that there was more bread than butter for the asking at home; and when, by dint of great sacrifices, he had been sent in 1855 to the Military College of St. Cyr, the supply of pocket-money was so limited that on Sundays and holidays, when the cadets have permission to go out, young Boulanger was obliged to choose between his appetite and his appearance. One day it was a case of prunose kid gloves versus luncheon, and the youth resolutely chose the former, and lunched off an applepie.

Military Service.

In 1857, just before he was twenty years old, he passed his examinations for a sub-lieutenancy. Immediately afterwards he was sent to Algeria, and served under the celebrated Marshal Randon in the Kabyle campaign. In the Franco-Italian War of 1859 he took part in the battle of Turbigo, where he was wounded in the chest, and decorated on the field for his valor. He obtained his full lieutenancy in 1860, at the termination of the war. Two years later he was promoted to a captaincy, having in the meantime served in Cochinchina, where he was wounded in the leg by a spear-thrust. He returned as captain-instructor to his old college. Though Boulanger was then, as he is now, a strict disciplinarian, he was no martinet. His pupils were much attached to him, and gladly repaired to his small villa on Sundays whenever they were favored with an invitation, which was pretty often. For Captain Boulanger had by this time married the daughter of a French Consul at Bristol, who is said to have so disliked England and the English that during the five years of her residence with her father in England she refused to learn English.

In 1870, just before the declaration of

he became major. He was with Marshal Bazaine at Metz, but, by some means, escaped the fate of Bazaine's army, and, with a shot in his shoulder, managed to return to Paris just a few days before its investment by the successful Prussian troops. He was promoted to a lieutenant-colonelcy by the Government of National Defence in October, 1870. While leading his troops against the insurrectionary and sanguinary Communists, he was wounded in the elbow by a musket-ball. In 1880 he became brigadier-general, as is alleged, through the influence of the Duc d'Aumale, whose name General Boulanger, when Minister of War in the French Government, 1886, had to strike from the Army List, because it was decreed that the representatives of fallen dynasties which still aspired to govern France, must be deprived of their rank in the French army, and banished from France. Having been appointed in 1884 to the command of the army of occupation of Tunis, he had a disagreement with M. Camleon, the Resident-General, and was recalled. He then held the important War Office appointment of the Director of the Infantry Division, and on January 7, 1886, became the foremost man in France.

The Government was defeated shortly afterwards on a question of expenditure, and Boulanger had to resign. His relations during his residence in Paris with the enemies of the Government, and his rapidly with the masses, had already excited alarm, and in order to remove him as far as possible from Paris, the new Minister of War ordered General Boulanger to take the command of an army corps at Clermont Ferrand, in the South. This sorely wounded the susceptibilities of one who a few weeks before was all-powerful, and the General therefore haughtily declined an invitation to dine with his chief previous to his departure. His appointment to the distant station was clearly understood by his friends, and many thousand people crowded the railway station and swarmed all over the line when the train was to start, and at length he had to steal away on an engine. The same scenes were witnessed on his arrival at his destination, one admirer going so far as to shout "Vive l'Empereur!" putting into words the thoughts of many.

should have been revealed to them by this reception, and they should have ceased the persecution which was endearing him to the people. It did, however, nothing of the kind. The Government took advantage of a technical lapse of military obedience to dismiss him from his command, and his popularity made a rapid stride. He was elected to the Chamber of Deputies by the Department of the North by a majority of nearly 100,000 votes, and when a vacancy occurred in the representation of Paris he resigned his seat, and ran for that constituency, which elected him on January 27, as described above, by an overwhelming majority.

General Boulanger is short, stoutly built, ruddy-faced, brown-bearded, and altogether a very handsome-looking man. Except for the slight point to his beard, he might be taken for an Englishman. His words ring out like the click of a trigger, and he knows what he wants. "His ideas appear clear," says a French journalist. "His eyes are limpid, so limpid as to lead one to believe that the General is under the influence of the mesmeric touch, and that his thoughts are far away in some dreamland, gone thither at the bidding of an occult power. It is the kind of look one frequently noticed about Napoleon III., a fact that may be accounted for by both being haunted by the demon of insatiable ambition;" nor does the end here. He aims at the Presidency; so did Louis Napoleon. He avowedly despises the Parliament and the diverse political parties; so did Louis Napoleon. He speaks of his mission to France; Napoleon couched his later manifestoes, "Au nom du peuple Français." Napoleon kept away from the Chamber as much as possible; so has Boulanger hitherto done. Boulanger is silent, and affects the man of mystery; so did Napoleon. Here for the present the parallel ends; but the near future seems to be pregnant with further developments of a startling character. His singular and rapid progress in popularity suggests the thought whether it may not be that the apparently conceited and shallow creature is destined, in the dementia of French political fervor, to play the part which Monk played in English history, and be the means of restoring the Napoleons to the throne. There is some ground for the suggestion in the fact that there is a well-established belief in Paris that it was from the treasury of that the General has drawn most of the funds needed for his political campaigns. Jerome is not the man to advance money without some guarantee that he will profit by the result of its expenditure. The Rev. M. Baxter, who has made the prophetic aspect of the Napoleonic dynasty his special study, has called public attention to this feature of Boulanger's career. On July 16, 1888, three days after the General fought a duel with M. Floquet, in which he was severely wounded in the neck, but, contrary to general expectation, quickly recovered, Mr. Baxter inserted an advertisement on the second column of the front page of the Standard newspaper, stating that Boulanger was, according to prophecy, sure to recover and become the foremost man in France, which has already come to pass, for it is admitted on all sides that Boulanger's election on January 27, 1889, shows that he will become

The Foremost Man in France.

Mr. Baxter also called attention in this journal on February 3, 1887, to the significant fact that the letters of General Boulanger's name written in Greek, amount, as the sum total of their numerical values to 666, indicating Boulanger to be a man of prophecy, and said: "It is not unreasonable to expect that active participants in the political revolutionary movements of the Final Crisis, out of which the Great Antichrist's ten kingdoms are to be developed and confederated, may themselves, or at least some of them, have the prophetic number 666 contained more or less exactly in their own name, inasmuch as the Great Antichrist's name is emphatically to contain it in Greek (Rev. 13:18). Thus, while Napoleonti, the dative inscription form of the future Antichrist's name, Napoleon, will be the principal fulfilment of 666, it is nevertheless singular that a subordinate and collateral fulfilment seems to exist in the Greek letters of General Ernest Boulanger's name, if E, the initial of his Christian name, Ernest, be prefixed to his own name as follows:

E5 B2 070 u400 l30 at n50 g3 e5 r100=666.

There may be a hidden intimation and secret suggestion intended to be conveyed to us in this fact, that General Boulanger, who was in 1886 Minister of War in France, is a man of destiny, fated to be a great factor in the conflicts and revolutionary changes in the map of Europe, which are to issue in the formation of the ten prophetic kingdoms prefigured by the ten toes of Daniel's symbolic image, and the ten horns of the Apocalyptic wild beast, which are eventually to 'give their power and strength to the Napoleonic Antichrist during the final three and a half years' from 1897 to 1901. It is superfluous to remark that as the Greek and Hebrew are two of the languages in which all the letters of their alphabet have a numerical value, and especially as Greek is the language of the Apocalypse, in which the prophecy of the number 666 is given, therefore the letters of the name must be changed into Greek letters."

THE EIFFEL TOWER, PARIS.

ONE of the most striking features of the forthcoming exhibition in Paris, which it is expected will be opened on May 5 next, to celebrate the centenary of the great French Revolution, will be the Eiffel Tower, now being erected in the Champs de Mars. It will be the loftiest iron tower ever built. The height is to be a thousand feet, and it will cost at least $1,000,000. The engineer of the tower, Mr. Eiffel, to whom the original idea is due, proposes to utilize the structure for scientific as well as for popular purposes, and claims that the summit will be an important post of observation for astronomers and meteorologists.

The Immense Height of the Tower

will be the more easily understood by comparing it with the altitude of other lofty buildings with which we are familiar. The tower of Cologne Cathedral is 522 feet in height; that of Strasburg Cathedral, 465 feet; St. Peter's, Rome, 429 feet; St. Paul's, London, 360 feet; the Monument, London, 200 feet; and the Tower of Notre Dame, Paris, 216 feet. When finished, the Eiffel Tower will be painted a light orange color, which, it is said, will give it a dazzling golden appearance when the sun is shining upon it. It is probable, too, that an electric light will gleam from its summit at night. Happily for the ambitious visitor, there will be elevators, which will bear them to the top gallery in six or seven minutes; and there we can, at pleasure, look down upon Paris, which will lie low at his feet.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Imp Under the Scale.—"I Remember standing in front of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, in Paris, admiring its beautiful statuary. As I did so, a Parisian approached me and said, 'Do you not see something amusing up there!' 'No!' I said, 'it seems to be all religious.' Inwardly I was asking myself, 'Is this an Atheist, or is he making a fool of me?' 'Do you see those figures?' he inquired, pointing to a group representing a soul being weighed to see if it should be found wanting. 'You observe that there is an angel standing on the one side and Satan on the other. Satan seems as if he were just watching to see that there was fair play.' 'Yes,' I answered, 'but I fail to see anything amusing in that.' 'Just look under the scales!' he replied. I looked, and there underneath was a little imp holding up the scale. That is the way Satan gives fair play. A man says, 'I will reform. I'll mend my life. I'll give up drink.' 'All right,' says Satan, and he seems to stand aside and give you fair play. Do not trust him. He has some unseen imp against you. If it be not strong drink, it will be some other sin. The only way to get clear of all these is to get Christ beside you; His power and grace will outweigh all the evil influences of Satan."

A Wine Merchant's Cruel Folly.—Dr. M. Cameron relates: "I know a man in the wine trade who forbade his boys to have anything to do with the Temperance cause. But the lads' companions went regularly to a Band of Hope meeting, and they wished very much to accompany them. One of them was constantly teasing his mother to let him go. At length, wearied by his importunities, she said, 'You may go; but be sure you do not let your father know anything about it.' The lad went, and for some weeks was a regular attender, taking a great interest in the meetings. One evening he happened to remark to his mother, 'We are going to have a magic-lantern next Friday.' 'Where is the magic-lantern?' demanded the father, looking up from his book. Then tremblingly the little fellow confessed he had been to the Band of Hope meetings. 'Have you a card?' asked the angry father. 'Yes,' said the boy. He was at once commanded to give it up. With tears it was handed to his father, who tore it in pieces, and threw them into the fire, sternly forbidding his son ever again to go near that place of meeting. That boy is now scarcely twenty years of age, but the father bitterly regrets that he did not allow him to belong to the Band of Hope. Often has that boy come to his father's door helplessly intoxicated. The father is reaping as he has sown in this world, and in all probability he will have to face the fact that he has ruined his son's soul."

A Satanic Attack Overcome.—The Rev. Mr. Johnston observes: "Some years ago, there was a great revival in the country, and I along with many others, was moved by it, and with an open ear and eager heart went to hear about Christ, feeling that I must come to Him at once. At a meeting which I attended when my mind was full of this determination, the words of the speaker made a deep impression on me, and when a worker spoke to me, I so realized my lost condition, and God's overwhelming love, that tears streamed down my cheeks; but somehow I could not yield myself to Christ. I left that meeting absolutely miserable, with a terrible knowledge of the load of sin that burdened my soul, and threatened at any moment to pull me down to hell. For two weeks I dragged out a miserable existence, longing to come to God, yet hesitating to step over the line. One day a voice—it was none other than the Holy Spirit—seemed to whisper to me, 'Go and pray. Go and give yourself to God.' I hurried to a lonely place, where I knew I could be alone and undisturbed, to unbosom myself to God. There I knelt, but all I could pray was, 'God be merciful to me a sinner!' The prayer was short and stammering, but God heard it, and there and then caused me to know that He had accepted me. I rose to my feet a new man—new in Christ Jesus. But Satan at once attacked me with the thoughts of awful blasphemy. But in God's strength I turned to the Evil One, and said, 'Kneeling on that spot I have cast myself on Christ, and I know that He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him.' Satan was vanquished, and I felt the presence of my Lord."

Why the Ball was Given Up. The Rev. J. G. Gregson said: "A young girl came to me once after a meeting I had conducted, and said, 'I want to follow Christ.' 'Well,' I replied, 'we always follow whom we love. Do you love Christ?' 'Yes, I think I do,' was the answer, 'but I love the world too.' 'But,' I said, 'you cannot love both.' 'There is a ball next week,' she continued; 'do you think it right to dance?' 'Well, if you love dancing, go to the ball.' 'What!' she exclaimed, 'go to dancing!' 'Yes, if you love it. Why, if I told you not to go, and you stayed away, you would be dancing in your bedroom; but mark my words, if you love Christ you will not go.' It was a testing moment for her. She did not go to the ball. Instead of that, she made a bold confession of Christ before her companions. What we follow we love, and is the god whom we worship. If it be not the one living and true God, let us turn away from it and give our hearts wholly to Him."

Fatal Slip by a Railroad Conductor.—"As a friend of mine was hastening homewards one night, and was passing a suburban railway station, he met a melancholy procession issuing from one of the doors. In the midst was the helpless body of a man, who but a few minutes before had been stricken down in the full vigor of his manhood. His train had entered the station, and was about to leave. All was right. The last door had been shut, and slowly the train began to glide from the station. The guard caught his van, and lightly essayed to swing himself on as usual. He had done so, safely, hundreds of times before; but this time his foot slipped; he fell and was dragged along by the train some distance before it could be brought to a standstill. When he was rescued, poor fellow, it was plain he had not long to live. His spine was broken and a large hole was drilled in his back, from which the blood freely poured. An ambulance was quickly procured, and the dying man placed upon it and driven off to the hospital, but did not live to arrive there. Happily, he was a true Christian. How uncertain the tenure by which we hold our life! How necessary that we provide for the future by accepting Christ!"

A Love Gift of Flowers for Jesus.—"I Was called in to see a boy, only eight years of age, who lay dying of a very painful disease. But he had given his heart to Christ, and bore up bravely. Whenever he opened his eyes, the dear little fellow would shout to his mother, 'Mamma, mamma, Jesus has not come yet. But He will keep His promise; He'll not be long.' So much was the child tortured with pain, that even the mother was praying that her boy might soon have peace in death. It was spring, and a lady brought him a bunch of flowers. He looked at the beautiful things, took them, and began to spread them out on the counterpane; but he was too weak for even that slight exertion. His mother came to his assistance, and asked him what he wanted done. With panting breath he asked her to pick out a few of the finest and tie a thread about them. 'What are you going to do with them, my darling?' inquired the mother. 'When I am dead,' the child replied, 'I want you, mamma, to put these beautiful flowers in my hand, for I am going to give them to my Jesus when I meet Him.' How many Christians, even after long years of walking with Him in spirit, can look forward to the meeting with their Saviour with the same eager and yet calm joy with which that child did? So sure was he of Christ's love that he wanted to take his flowers as a love-gift to Him whom he had loved on earth."

DARK SAYINGS ON A HARP.

THE world is full of the inexplicable, the impassable, the unfathomable, the insurmountable. We cannot go three steps in any direction without coming up against a hard wall of mystery, riddles, paradoxes, profundities, labyrinths, problems that we cannot solve, hieroglyphics that we cannot decipher, anagrams we cannot spell out, sphinxes that will not speak. For that reason, David in my text proposed to take up some of these and try to set them to sweet music. "I will open my dark sayings on a harp." So I look off upon society and find people in unhappy conjunction of circumstances, and they do not know what it means, and they have a right to ask, Why is this? Why is that? and I think I will be doing a good work by trying to explain some of these strange things and make you more content with your lot, and I shall only be answering questions that have often been asked me, or that we have all asked ourselves, while I try to set these mysteries to music and open my dark sayings on a harp.

Interrogation the first: Why does God take out of this world those who are useful and whom we cannot spare, and leave alive and in good health so many who are only a nuisance to the world? I thought I would begin with of all the seeming inscrutables. Many of the most useful men and women die at thirty or forty years of age, while you often find useless people alive at sixty and seventy and eighty. John Careless wrote to Bradford, who was soon to be put to death, saying: "Why doth God suffer me, and such other caterpillars to live, that can do nothing but consume the alms of the church, and take away so many worthy workmen in the Lord's vineyard?" Similar questions are often asked. Here are two men. The one is a noble character and a Christian man; he chooses for a lifetime companion one who has been tenderly reared, and she is worthy of him and he is worthy of her; as merchant, or farmer, or professional man, or mechanic, or artist, he toils to educate and rear his children; he is succeeding, but he has not yet established for his family a full competency;

He Seems Indispensable

to that household; but one day, before he has paid off the mortgage on his house, he is coming home through a strong northeast wind, and a chill strikes through him, and four days of pneumonia end his earthly career, and the wife and children go into a struggle for shelter and food. His next-door neighbor is a man who, though strong and well, lets his wife support him; he is round at the grocery store, or some general loafing-place in the evenings, while his wife sews; his boys are imitating his example, and lounge and swagger and swear; all the use that man is in that house is to rave because the coffee is cold when he comes to a late breakfast, or to say cutting things about his wife's looks, when he furnishes nothing for her wardrobe. The best thing that could happen to that family would be that man's funeral; but he declines to die; he lives on and on and on. So we have all noticed that many of the useful are early cut off, while the parasites have great vital tenacity.

I take up this dark saying on my harp, and give three or four thrums on the string in the way of surmising and hopeful guess. Perhaps the useful man was taken out of the world because he and his family were so constructed that they could not have endured some great prosperity that might have been just ahead, and they all together might have gone down in the vortex of worldliness which every year swallows up ten thousand households. And so he went while he was humble and consecrated, and they were by the severities of life kept close to Christ, and fitted for usefulness here and high seats in heaven, and when they meet at last before the throne, they will acknowledge that, though the furnace was hot, and prepared them for an eternal career of glory and reward for which no other kind of life could have fitted them. On the other hand, the useless man lived on to fifty, or sixty, or seventy years, because all the ease he ever can have he must have in this world, and you ought not, therefore, begrudge him his earthly longevity. In all the ages there has not a single loafer ever entered heaven. There is no place for him there to hang around. Not even in the temples, for they are full of vigorous, alert, and rapturous worship. If the good and useful go early, rejoice for them that they have so soon got through with human life, which at best is a struggle. And if the useless and the bad stay, rejoice that they may be out in the world's fresh air a good many years before their final incarceration.

It Purified Them,

Interrogation the second;

Why Do Good People Have so Much Trouble; sickness, bankruptcy, persecution, the three black vultures sometimes putting their fierce beaks into one set of jangled nerves? I think now of a good friend I once had. He was a consecrated Christian man, an elder in the church, and as polished a Christian gentleman as ever walked Broadway. First his general health gave out and he hobbled around on a cane, an old man at forty. After a while paralysis struck him. Having by poor health been compelled suddenly to quit business, he lost what property he had. Then his beautiful daughter died; then a son became hopelessly demented. Another son, splendid of mind and commanding of presence, resolved that he would take care of his father's household; but, under the swoop of yellow fever at Fernandina, Fla., he suddenly expired. So you know good men and women who have had enough troubles, you think, to crush fifty people. No worldly philosophy could take such a trouble and set it to music, or play it on violin or flute, but I dare to open that dark saying on a gospel harp.

You wonder that very consecrated people have trouble? Did you ever know any very consecrated man or woman who had not had great trouble? Never! It was through their

that they were made very good. If you find anywhere in this city a man who has now, and always has had, perfect health, and never lost a child, and has always been popular, and never had business struggle or misfortune, who is distinguished for goodness, pull your wire for a telegraph messenger-boy, and send me word, and I will drop everything and go right away to look at him. There never has been a man like that, and never will be. Who are those arrogant, self-conceited creatures who move about without sympathy for others, and who think more of a St. Bernard dog, or an Alderney cow, or a Southdown sheep, or a Berkshire pig than of a man? They never had any trouble, or the trouble was never sanctified. Who are those men who listen with moist eye as you tell them of suffering, and who have a pathos in their voice, and a kindness in their manner, and an excuse or an alleviation for those gone astray? They are the men who have graduated at the Royal Academy of Trouble, and they have the diploma written in wrinkles on their own countenances. My! my! What heartaches they had! What tears they have wept! What injustice they have suffered! The mightiest influence for purification and salvation is trouble. No diamond fit for a crown until it is cut. No wheat fit for bread till it is ground. There are only three things that can break off a chain—and trouble is all three of them. The greatest writers, orators, and reformers get much of the force from trouble. What gave to Washington Irving that exquisite tenderness and pathos which will make his books favorites while the English language continues to be written and spoken? An early heartbreak, that he never once mentioned; and when, thirty years after the death of Matilda Hoffman, who was to have been his bride, her father picked up a piece of embroidery and said, "That is a piece of poor Matilda's workmanship," Washington Irving sank from hilarity into silence and walked away. Out of that lifetime grief the great author dipped his pen's mightiest reinforcement. "Calvin's Institutes of Religion," that which a more wonderful book was never written by human hand, was begun by the author twenty-five years of age, because of the persecution by Francis, King of France. Faraday toiled for all time on a salary of eighty pounds a year and candles. As every brick of the wall of Babylon was stamped with the letter N, standing for Nebuchadnezzar, so every part of the temple of Christian achievement is stamped with the letter T, standing for trouble.

When in England a man is honored with knighthood, he is struck with the flat of the sword. But those who have come to

were first struck, not with the flat of the sword but with the keen edge of the cimeter. To build his magnificence of character, Paul could not have spared one lash, one prison, one stoning, one anathema, one poisonous viper from the hand, one shipwreck. What is true of individuals is true of nations. The horrors of the American Revolution gave this country this side of the Mississippi River to independence, the conflict between England and France gave the most of this country west of the Mississippi to the United States. France owned it, but Napoleon, fearing that England would take practically made a present to the United States—for he received only $15,000,000 for Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, and the Indian Territory. Out of the fire of the American Revolution came the country east of the Mississippi, out of the European war came that west of the Mississippi river. The British Empire rose to its present overtowering grandeur through gunpowder plot and Guy Fawkes' conspiracy, and Northampton insurrection, and Walter Raleigh's beheading, and Bacon's bribery, and Cromwell's dissolution of parliament, and the battles of Edge Hill, and

The Vicissitudes of Centuries.

So the earth itself, before it could become an appropriate and beautiful residence for the human family, had, according to geology, to be washed by universal deluge, and scorched and made candescent by universal fires, and pounded by sledge-hammer of icebergs, and wrenched by earthquakes that split continents, and shaken by volcanoes that tossed mountains, and passed through the catastrophes of thousands of years before Paradise became possible, and the ground could shake out their green banners, and the first garden pour its carnage of color between the Gihon and the Hiddekel. Trouble a good thing for the rocks, a good thing for nations as well as a good thing for individuals. So when you push against me with a sharp interrogatory point, Why do the good suffer? I open the dark saying on a harp, and, though I can neither play an organ, or cornet, or hautboy, or bugle, or clarionet, I have taken some

and if you would like to hear me I will play these: "All things work together for good to those who love God." "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but gr us; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which exercised thereby." "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." What a sweet thing is a harp, and I wonder not that in Wales, the country of my ancestors, the harp has become the national instrument, and that they have festivals where great prizes are offered in the competition between harp and harp; or that weird Sebastian Erard was much of his time bent over this chorded and vibrating triangle, and was not satisfied until he had given it a compass of six octaves, from E to E with all the semi-tones; or that when King Saul was dejected, the son of Jesse came before him, and putting his fingers among the charmed strings of the harp, played the devil out of the crazed monarch; or that in heaven there shall be harps harping with their harps. So you will not blame me for opening the dark saying on the gospel harp—

Your harps, ye trembling saints,
Down from the willows take;
Loud to the praise of love divine
Bid every string awake!

Why Sin Came.

Interrogation third: Why did the good God let sin or trouble come into the world when He might have kept them out? My reply is, He had a good reason. He had reasons that He has never given us. He had reasons which He could no more make us understand in our finite state than the father, starting out on some great and elaborate enterprise could make the two-year-old child in its armed chair comprehend it. One was to demonstrate what grandeur of character may be achieved on earth by conquering evil. Had there been no evil to conquer and no trouble to console, then this universe would never have known an Abraham or a Moses or a Joshua or an Ezekiel or a Paul or a Christ or a Washington or a John Milton or a John Howard, and a million victories which have been gained by the consecrated spirits of all ages would never have been gained. Had there been no battle, there would have been no victory. Nine-tenths of the anthems of heaven would never have been sung. Heaven could never have been a thousandth part of the heaven that it is. I will not say that I am glad that sin and sorrow did enter, but I do say that I am glad that after God has given all His reasons to an assembled universe, He will be more honored than if sin and sorrow had never entered, and that the unfallen

Celestials Will Be Outdone, and will put down their trumpets to listen, and it will be in heaven when those who have conquered sin and sorrow shall enter, as it would be in a small singing school on earth, if Thalberg and Gottschalk and Wagner and Beethoven and Rheinberger and Schumann should all at once enter. The immortals that have been chanting ten thousand years before the throne will say, as they close their librettos: "Oh, if we could only sing like that!" But God will say to those who have never fallen, and consequently have not been redeemed, "You must be silent now; you have not the qualification for this anthem," so they sit with closed lips and folded hands, and sinners saved by grace take up the harmony, for the Bible says "no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth."

A great prima donna, who can now do anything with her voice, told me that when she first started in music her teacher in Berlin told her she could be a good singer, but a certain note she could never reach. "And then," she said, "I went to work and studied and practiced for years until I did reach it." But the song of the sinner redeemed, the Bible says, the exalted harmonists who have never sinned, could not reach and never will reach. Would you like to hear me in a very poor way play a snatch of that tune? I can give you only one bar of the music on this gospel harp: "Unto Him that hath loved us and washed us from our sins in

His own blood and hath made us kings and priests unto God and the Lamb, to Him be glory and dominion forever and ever, Amen." But before leaving this interrogatory, Why God let sin come into the world? let me say that great battles seem to be nothing but suffering and outrage at the time of their occurrence, yet after they have been a long while past we can see that it was better for them to have been fought, namely, Salamis, Inkerman, Toulouse, Arbella, Agincourt, Trafalgar, Blenheim, Lexington, Sedan. So now that the great battles against sin and suffering are going on we can see mostly that which is deplorable. But twenty thousand years from now, standing in glory, we shall appreciate that heaven is better off than if the battle of this world's sin and suffering had never been projected.

But now I come nearer home and put a dark saying on the gospel harp, a style of question that is asked a million times every year. Interrogation the fourth:

Why do I Have it so Hard, while others have it so easy? or, Why do I have so much difficulty in getting a livelihood while others go around with a full portemonnaie? or, Why must I wear these plain clothes, while others have to push hard to get their wardrobes closed, so crowded are they with brilliant attire? or, Why should I have to work so hard while others have three hundred and sixty-five holidays every year? They are all practically one question. I answer them by saying, it is because the Lord has His favorites, and He puts extra discipline upon you, and extra trial, because He has for you extra glory, extra enthronement, and extra felicities. That is no guess of mine, but a divine say-so: "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." "Well," says some one, "I would rather have a little less in heaven and a little more here. Discount my heavenly robe 10 per cent. and let me now put it on a fur-lined overcoat; put me in a less gorgeous room of the house of many mansions and let me have a house here in a better neighborhood." No, no; God is not going to rob heaven, which is to be your residence for nine hundred quadrillion of years, to fix up your earthly abode, which you will occupy at most for less than a century, and where you may perhaps stay only ten years longer, or only one year, or perhaps a month more. Now you had better cheerfully for, you see, He has been taking care of folks for near six thousand years, and knows how to do it, and can see what is best for you, better than you can yourself. Don't think you are too insignificant to be divinely cared for. It was said that Diana, the goddess, could not be present to keep her temple at Ephesus from burning because she was attending upon the birth of him who was to be Alexander the Great. But I tell you that your God and my God is so great in small things as well as large things, that He could attend the cradle of a babe, and at the same time the burning of a world.

Let God Have His Way,

And God will make it all right with you, and there is one song that you will sing every hour your first ten years in heaven, and the refrain of that song will be: "I am so glad God did not let me have it my own way!" Your case will be all fixed up in heaven, and there will be such a reversal of conditions that we can hardly find each other for some time. Some of us who have lived in first-rate houses here, and in first-rate neighborhoods, will be found, because of our lukewarmness of earthly service, living on one of the back streets of the celestial city, and clear down at the end of it at No. 808, or 909, or 1505, while some who had unattractive earthly abodes, and a cramped one at that, will, in the heavenly city, be in a house fronting the Royal plaza, right by the imperial fountain, or on the heights overlooking the River of Life, the chariots of salvation halting at your door, while those visit you who are more than conquerors, and those who are kings and queens unto God forever. You, my brother, and you, my sister, who have it so hard here, will have it so fine and grand there that you will hardly know yourself, and will feel disposed to dispute your own identity, and the first time I see you there I will cry out: "Didn't I tell you so when you sat down there in the Brooklyn Tabernacle, and looked incredulous because you thought it too good to be true?" And you will answer: "You were right, the half was not told me!" So of despondency and complaint on my gospel harp, and give you just one bar of music, for I do not pretend to be much of a player. "The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." But, I must confess, I am a little perplexed how some of you good Christians are going to get through the gate, because there will be so many there to greet you, and they will all want to shake hands at once, and will all want the first kiss. They will have heard that you are coming, and they will all press around to welcome you, and will want you to say whether you know them after being so long parted.

Amid the tussle and romp of reunion I tell you whose hand of welcome you had better first clasp, and whose cheek is entitled to the first kiss. It is the hand and the cheek of Him without whom you would never have got there at all, the Lord Jesus, as He cries out, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love, and the fires could not burn it, and the floods could not drown it." Then you, my dear people, having no more use for my poor harp, on which I used to open your dark sayings, and whose chords sometimes snapped, despoiling the symphony, you will take down your own harps from the willows that grow by the eternal water courses, and play together those celestial airs, some of the names of which are entitled, "The King in His Beauty," "The Land That Was Far Off," And as the last dark curtain of mystery is forever lifted, it will be as though all the oratorios that were ever heard had been rolled into one, and "Israel in Egypt," and "Jephthah's Daughter," and Beethoven's "Overture in C," and Ritter's first "Sonata in D minor," and the "Creation," and the "Messiah" had been blown from the lips of one trumpet, or been invoked by the sweep of one bow, or had dropped from the vibrating chords of one harp.

But here I must slow up lest, in trying to solve mysteries, I add to the mystery that we have already wondered at; namely, Why preachers should keep on after all the hearers are tired. So I gather up into one great armful all the whys and hows and wherefores of your life and mine, which we have not had time or the ability to answer, and write on them the words,

"Adjourned to Eternity."

I rejoice that we do not understand all things now, for if we did, what would we learn in heaven? If we knew it all down here in the freshman and sophomore class, what would be the use of our going up to stand amid the juniors and the seniors? If we could put down one leg of the compass, and with the other sweep a circle clear around all the inscrutables, if we could lift our little steelyards, and weigh the throne of the Omnipotent, if we could with our seven-day clock measure eternity, what would be left for heavenly revelation? So I move that we cheerfully adjourn what is now beyond our comprehension; and as, according to Rollin, the historian, Alexander the Great, having obtained the gold casket in which Darius had kept his rare perfume, used that aromatic casket thereafter to keep his favorite copy of Homer in, and called the book, therefore, the "edition of the casket," and at night put the casket and his sword under his pillow; so I put, this day, into the perfumed casket of your richest affections and hopes this promise, worth more than anything Homer ever wrote, or sword ever conquered: "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter," and that I call the "edition celestial."

A CHILD'S PRAYER AMONG RATS.

At one of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meetings in New York, a Presbyterian minister related an incident, the truth of which he personally vouched for. A number of friends arrived unexpectedly at a certain house, and the family scarcely knew how to accommodate them for the night. One little girl offered to give up her room to a guest, and went to sleep in the attic. It was long since the attic had been used, but it was believed to be dry and comfortable, so a bed was made up for her on the floor. In the night she was awakened by a whole troop of rats scampering around, and they ran across her bed, and even over her face. She screamed with terror, but it did not disturb the rats, and in the moonlight she saw them on the bed, staring savagely at her. She was so far away from the family that they did not hear her outcries. She was like to go mad with fright, when she thought that she was like Daniel in the lions' den crossed her mind. She wondered if God would hear her as He heard the prophet. Her recollection of her Sunday-school lessons encouraged her, and she put up an earnest prayer for deliverance. She had scarcely ceased praying when something brushed against the door of the room. It might be only the rats, but the child listened, and soon she heard a note that no rat makes, but which he dreads to hear. The child jumped out of bed, and regardless of the rats rushing across her bare feet, opened wide the door. In bounded a large cat, who immediately attacked the vermin. It was a desperate fight that the child watched from her bed, but the cat won. Some of the rats escaped slaughter by flight, but they did not appear again that night, and the carcasses of the slain attested the truth of the little girl's story when she told it in the morning. The story was told so simply that there could be no doubt, as there was none in the child's mind, that the cat was sent in answer to her prayer.

A QUAIN TESTIMONIAL TABLET.

The Medical Mission in Pekin, China, of which Dr. B. C. Atterbury is the head, now bears a tablet presented with great form and ceremony by the sons of one of the patients who has been cured there. The tablet is a board three feet long and two and a half broad, on which Chinese characters are cut. It was brought to the hospital on a sedan-chair hung with red trimmings and carried by eight men in festive costume. The relatives of the patient, dressed in holiday attire, accompanied it in the procession, which was headed by a band of music. The Church gives the following translation of the inscription on the tablet:

"Respectfully to proclaim that Teacher Atterbury has come from America to the Flowery Kingdom, several thousand leagues and more, has encountered the perils of the rolling sea, has borne the discomforts of another clime, to make this Kingdom his abode. His sole purpose to relieve men, the very sentiment, 'All men are my brothers.'

"Moreover, cherishing the Saviour's word, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself,' he has employed his private means for the advancement of the Church. Thus, far and wide does he instruct the world; he dispenses medicines to the sick; erects church edifices; publishing afar the doctrine of grace, that those whose health has been restored may also attain to the saving of the Soul. Day by day, in giving away medicine and prescribing for the sick, he is busy and hurried, with scarce a moment for rest, nor shrinking from the monotony of it; he truly must enjoy the sovereign notice and approval of the Lord on high.

"Teacher George Taylor aids in medical practice, freely expending diligence and devotion, only desirous of glorifying the name of the Lord. Is he not also a Christian eminent indeed?

"We, whose mother fractured her right leg in a most dangerous manner, invited these two physicians to unite in healing her, and, because within one hundred days she was wholly recovered, We are truly and deeply grateful, and inscribe this tablet, though utterly insufficient to requite their pains, to publish abroad their beauteous virtue, and feebly to express my sincere respect.

"Spoken in the year wu tze, month of the peach, the latter tenth of the month. The ignorant brothers Ts'un Lin and Ts'un Ch'i respectfully present."

A PRAYER IN A GRAVE.

In a testimony given a few days ago in a sailor's mission in New York, an English seaman told a remarkable story of his conversion. He said that he had godly parents, and received Christian training; but he was wild and careless, and, though he knew all about the gospel, it had never touched his heart. He grew restive at home, and ran away to sea, and for some years was one of the most godless men afloat, doing all the more harm because of his Christian knowledge, which he made use of to ridicule religion. While his ship was at Buenos Ayres he deserted and joined the Argentine navy, and, eighteen months later, quitted that for the army. He was sent out to look after prisoners on the Grand Chaco—an immense tract of land occupied by roving Indians. His hardships were terrible; being unable to eat the only food available, and being continually on duty, with little rest or sleep. He managed to evade the watchfulness of his officers, and made his way to the coast, where he found an English ship, and got on board. Soon he was warned that the officers were coming to search for him. The ship was in ballast, and the crew, sympathizing with him, dug a hole like a grave in the sand with which the ship was ballasted, and put him in. They put planks over the hole and covered it with sand again. He lay there, trembling, in fear of detection, for several hours, and heard the soldiers who were searching for him walking above him. He also suffered much pain from lack of air. He knew that if the soldiers did not quit their search soon, he would die of suffocation; and, in his terror, he prayed as he had never prayed before. His early training came to mind, and he prayed that, if it were possible to forgive such wickedness as his, it might be forgiven, for Christ's sake. Expecting that he might die soon, he prayed all the more earnestly, and vowed that, if he was saved, he would quit his wicked life. Soon a sweet peace and consciousness of forgiveness came to him, and he felt that if he died he was safe through Christ. After what seemed to him many hours, the sailors came and removed the planks, with the glad news that the search was over. He remained with the ship, visited his parents after eight years of absence and silence, and then resumed a seafaring life. But not, as before, a scoffer at religion, but an earnest Christian, seeking, wherever he went, to win souls.

THE FAMINE IN CHINA.

MR. B. BROOMHALL, Secretary of the China Inland Mission, writes: "The state of things in Northern China is painful to contemplate. Parts of the Provinces of Ho-nan, Shan-tung, and Chih-li are the scene of a widespread and disastrous famine, the suffering from which will be greatly aggravated by the calamities which have befallen Northern China during the last eighteen months. The Yellow River disaster and the terrible inundations in Manchuria were followed by a great drought in the early summer, causing the failure of the rice crops; and subsequently, to the dismay of the people, who were encouraged by the prospect of a good autumn harvest, there came in the month of August a deluge of rain, which has caused the present calamity. Dr. Nevius, a well-known and highly esteemed missionary, having heard of the great distress prevailing in Shan-tung, left Chefoo to make an investigation. The result is thus given:

"Writing from a place called Chang-lo, he says that he found the distress more extended and greater than the reports had led him to expect. The district he visited has an area of about 6,000 square miles, and a population of 1,500,000. The houses of the people in many cases are gone as well as the food, for the floods, rising to the slight elevation on which the villages and towns were constructed, entered the houses and softened and dissolved the mud bricks which formed the foundations, so that they fell to the ground.

"Dr. Nevius describes as an instance one particular town, where the destruction and misery are no worse than elsewhere, and not so bad as in some other places. The town is Han-chiao, on the Miho River, with a population of 2,000. It is surrounded by an earth wall of twenty feet in height. The river-banks gave way just above the town, and an opening was gradually made for a distance of about a mile. The water burst out towards the town, tearing away the surface earth from hundreds of acres of cultivated land and covering it with sand. It soon broke down part of the mud wall and poured through the streets, filling the whole space within the walls, and breaking out again on another side. Nineteenth of the houses were carried away; household goods, furniture, farming implements, and timbers of buildings floated away towards the sea. The people saved themselves by climbing trees or the higher parts of the wall, where many of them remained standing in the water for hours. For two days they could obtain no food. The town, when seen by Dr. Nevius, was a scene of complete desolation. Large pools of water stood where there were recently busy streets and comfortable dwellings.

"In conclusion Dr. Nevius observes that any words can convey but a very imperfect idea of the misery, and it is sure to be worse in the spring, before which the limited supply of provisions will be exhausted. Those who have remained at home will be reduced to extremities; those fugitives who return from abroad will not have the means or strength to plant the spring crops. He estimates that a cent a day, or thirty cents a month, would, in addition to what the people can do themselves, support a life. The magistrates have remitted taxes, but have done nothing further to meet the awful situation.

"The region described by Dr. Nevius is but a small part of one province. A Shanghai correspondent says that 'six provinces, all thickly populated, are suffering at one time the effects of flood or drought, and the widely extended famine caused thereby.'"

AN ATTEMPTED SUICIDE IN CHINA.

In a letter from Peking, China, from Mr. Chapin to the Missionary Herald he thus describes a significant incident which had just occurred: "Yesterday after service there was sent in the card of our first military official, with the urgent request that I should hasten to see his son, who had taken about half an ounce of opium. I found a badly narcotized boy of eighteen. The usual remedies were used, and to-day he is out of danger. The cause of this attempt at suicide shows at once how quickly the Chinese fall into the power of their passions, and their stolid indifference regarding the future life. This young man had bought a two-barreled pistol and then discovered that only one barrel would shoot. He felt that he had been cheated, and also remembered that his father was opposed to his spending his money for fire-arms, and all the more because he had some time before shot a small boy in the neck. He therefore tried to exchange his weapon for his money, but the Chinese do not generally sell on that basis, and he failed to effect the exchange. What remained for him but to flee this evil world? This he, the same day, resolved to do. His young wife, not to be left to an inglorious widowhood, resolved to follow her lord, but her courage was hardly equal to her resolve, and she drank only a small dose of face-powder, which in large doses does for the ladies what opium so often accomplishes for the men. It is a constant wonder to us how people who are so thoroughly stoical in many ways so often become practically insane with passion, of which we see instances almost daily.

"We receive daily pressing invitations for medical help. As yet we have no suitable place for a dispensary, and only a partial supply of medicines. We expect, however, soon to rent a suitable place, and to engage in regular dispensary work. Certain of the cases applying are such that we cannot refuse help, and it is as gladly received as it is given."

THE PRINCIPLES OF PROPHETIC CHRONOLOGY.

By Rev. A. B. Simpson.*

Instances of the Year for a Day Rule—The Seven Times of the Gentiles—Interlace Events—Three Scales of Measurement—The Lunar Scale Applied—The Beginning of the End—A Remarkable Epoch in its Centre—The Solar Scale Equally Significant—The Era of Israel's Captivity—The Latest Prophetic Limit.

THE principle on which prophetic dates are to be calculated is a day for a year. This is rendered evident by the time measure of prophecy relating to the first coming of the Messiah in the ninth chapter of Daniel. There it is definitely stated that seventy weeks should elapse to "Messiah the Prince." Now seventy weeks is four hundred and ninety days. We know, however, that the interval to the death of Christ, dating from the decree of Artaxerxes to restore and rebuild Jerusalem, was just four hundred and ninety years. Here, then, in the first great application of God's chronological measuring line, we have a day for a year. And, therefore, without special reasons to the contrary, we are bound to apply it in the same way to the other events referred to.

In the twenty-sixth chapter of Leviticus, God declares through Moses that if His people shall not repent and obey Him, He will bring upon them repeated judgments and chastenings, and at last "seven times" of tribulation. In Daniel's vision of Nebuchadnezzar's degradation, we have seen that seven times were to pass over him ere he arose from his madness and acknowledged Jehovah as the Lord of earth and Heaven. In this, of course, Nebuchadnezzar was the type of the world powers and nations who have been ruling the earth in bestial madness and ferocity through these ages of cruelty, shame, and sorrow.

Thus we see Israel was to have seven times of subjection and humiliation, and the Gentile nations seven times of brutal madness. The two periods correspond and synchronize. When the Jewish sovereignty, which was really the Divine Theocracy, passed away, the time of Gentile rule supervened and has continued for more than twenty-five centuries, and will until the end, when the kingdom of Christ shall succeed these wild-beast powers, and the Jews shall again become ascendant.

It is, therefore, an exceedingly interesting inquiry: When the times of the Gentiles and the subjugation of the Jews really began? Like all God's great providential movements, it was not sudden and sharply defined, but covered a considerable space of time, and included a series of Interlaced and Connected Events.

Indeed, it spread over a century and a half of time, and we may therefore expect that its close will likewise be gradual and similarly extended. The period of its measurement, therefore, will be like a wide ribbon cut on the bias at each end, in parallel directions, so that a measurement of its length at any point would give the same length, and yet the starting and terminal points would be extended in both directions beyond that measure.

The earliest date of Gentile supremacy is the famous era of Nabonassar—the rise of the Babylonian empire, 747 B. C., and the latest is the fall of Jerusalem under the Babylonians, B. C. 587. This whole period of one hundred and sixty years properly measures the beginning of the times of the Gentiles, and a corresponding period may be expected to close it.

Before, however, we proceed to show the fulfilment of these prophetic measures, it is necessary to premise that there are

by which they can be calculated, known respectively as solar, calendar, and lunar years. A solar year contains 365 days, a calendar year 360, and a lunar year 354. Hence, the whole period of seven times, according to solar time, would be 2,520, 2,484 calendar, and 2,445 lunar years. Thus the difference in the whole seven times, between lunar and solar time, is seventy-five years.

Now, we find that these standards of time are used in the prophecy or the Messiah's first coming. There were two decrees of Artaxerxes for the restoring and rebuilding of Jerusalem—one in 457, sending Ezra back; the other in 444, commissioning Nehemiah. Measuring from one in solar years, and from the other in lunar years, the seventy weeks bring us to the cross of Jesus Christ. We may then expect that in the longer cycles the profound wisdom of inspired prophecy will use both, as it starts from different stages of the beginning and reaches forward to the various steps of the close. Shall we first apply the shorter or lunar scale?

The earliest date from which we can reasonably measure the times of the Gentiles is, we have seen, the era of Nabonassar, B. C. 747. In this year began the great Babylonian empire, which, Daniel tells us, is the head of the Gentile powers. Measuring seven times, or 2,445 years, from this brings us down to 1698 A. D., the very year when the downfall of the nations which had oppressed God's people began in the close of the twenty years' war, in which, for the first time, the terrible Moslem power was smitten, and, by the disastrous peace of Carlowitz, Turkey was weakened and humbled, and robbed of some of her fairest possessions. This was only as 747 B. C. was only the beginning of the beginning; but from that hour Turkey has been going steadily down, until now she is ready to crumble at once into dissolution. Still more marked is the fact that right in the centre of this measurement, as its exact bi-section, comes the most important historical event of the past eighteen centuries, the fall of Rome in the year 476, thus literally closing the career of the world's four empires in the first twelve hundred years after the rise of Babylon. Thus the whole seven times divides itself into two sections of three and a half times each, this being also a prophetic measure—the first measuring the dominancy of the ancient empires, the second the ten horns, or modern kingdoms, which sprang out of them.

But this is only one application of our measure, bringing it down to the earliest beginning of God's judgments on the eastern and western nations.

Now, if we take the same point of departure, and measure from it the seven times in solar years, it brings us to in the downfall of the Gentile nations. It brings us to the year 1773. This, we find by reference to chronology, is the very date of the disastrous close of the second great Turkish war, when, by the peace of Karnardje, that empire lost large sections of territory, and that process of dismemberment fully began which has at last reduced it to a single European province of less than five million subjects.

The next initial period in this calculation is the captivity of Israel, or the Ten Tribes. This began with the invasion of Pul, and the first deportations of captives in 738, and culminated in the fall of Samaria in 721, a total period of seventeen years. Measuring seven times in solar years from this, brings us to 1782-1799. This is the entire period of the French revolution, commencing with the National Assembly, in 1780, and closing with the advent of Napoleon Bonaparte, in 1798, and the capture of Rome and the convulsion of all the Catholic powers of Europe. These years undoubtedly witnessed the severest shock which the Gentile and Catholic nations have ever felt since the fall of Rome in 476. Surely this might be called the second stage in the closing of the times of the Gentiles.

The final stage of Israel's captivity was in the year 676 B. C., when Essarheddon carried off the last of the northern tribes, and fulfilled Isaiah's great prediction, given in 741, that within sixty-five years Samaria should be no more a people. The kingdom ceased in 721. The people were finally scattered in 676.

Seven Times From This in Solar Years

bring us to 1844, when there culminated in the eastern world and Turkish empire a series of convulsions, revolutions, and negotiations which finally issued in the great decree of Turkish toleration, by which the Christian religion was allowed to be propagated in the empire, and the long down-treading of Jerusalem for ages began to cease. The whole period, from 738 to 676, may be called the era of Israel's captivity. Just 2,520 years after this comes the period, from 1782 to 1844, which is just as literally the time of the first breaking down of the supreme, intolerant, and persecuting power of Rome and Islam and the great nations that support them.

The most striking figure in this age of Assyrian oppression is Sennacherib. He stands as the boastful front of human pride and power, and is smitten by the hand of God and driven back in ignominy. There is no figure in modern history that so perfectly corresponds to him as Napoleon Bonaparte, making equal claims and meeting equal doom. But it has been shown, with great force, that the career of Napoleon comes exactly 2,525 years after Sennacherib. B. C. 713 was the year of Sennacherib's invasion, and 1807 to 1815 was the date of Napoleon's great campaigns, ending at last in his miserable retreat and exile, like his Assyrian prototype.

But the chief interest in the opening and the full inauguration of the times of the Gentiles attaches to another illustrious figure, Nebuchadnezzar, and the fall of the kingdom and throne, not of the Ten Tribes, the apostate Israel, but Judah, and the house of David. "Thou art this head of gold," is God's own authority for regarding him as the chief figure in the inauguration of the times of the Gentiles. It was he that finally crushed the power of Judah beneath his heel and stamped out for ages the throne of the theocracy.

His career in relation to Judah covered nineteen years. There were three successive captivities. The first was in 606, subduing Jehoia-chin, and taking captive Daniel himself. The second transported Jehoia-chin to Babylon and Ezekiel to Chebar. It was in 598. The last was in 587, and completed the awful work by the burning of the temple, the destruction of the city, and the deportation of the remaining captives. Seven times from this period, according to solar measurement, would bring us to the period 1915-1934, including the intermediate date 1923. And this would indeed seem to be of the times of the Gentiles, the sufferings of Israel and the waiting of God's kingdom. These three periods, 1915, 1923, and 1934, would seem to mark the last three stages in the final setting up of Israel's broken kingdom and Messiah's throne, and the dissolution of all the wild-beast powers of earth forever. Of course, the coming of Christ for His saints may occur long prior to these dates; and they fall within the tribulation times which shall supervene. We are speaking now, not of intermediate, but final dates. The earliest date of the rise of Gentile times is 747, and the latest 587. The earliest date of the beginning of their end is 1698, and the culminating point, if the parallel be true, would seem undoubtedly to be 1934.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Admission of Four New States Was finally agreed to by Congress on February 20. They are North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington. An effort is being made to induce the citizens of Washington Territory to call the new State Tacoma, but at present the suggestion does not meet with favor. The Democrats in the Senate expressed much dissatisfaction with the Conference report, believing that New Mexico ought to have been admitted. The conferees, however, declared that had they insisted on the admission of New Mexico the whole bill would have been lost. Some disappointment was also expressed that the clause granting woman suffrage in Washington Territory had been omitted, but the conferees said that that clause also had to be sacrificed to meet the wishes of the House. It is thought that if the President signs the bill, and the citizens are prompt in taking advantage of it, they may have Senators and Representatives sitting in the first regular session of the Fifty-first Congress. South Dakota will have two Representatives, and the other States one each.

The Nicaragua Canal Project is at Last Safely through its legislative ordeal. On February 20 the President returned to the Senate with his approval the bill incorporating the Maritime Canal Company. The work of organizing is to be commenced immediately, so that there may be no delay in beginning the construction of the canal. Commander Robley D. Evans, the Naval Secretary to the Lighthouse Board, has been granted a year's leave of absence by Secretary Whitney, and will go to Nicaragua as Superintendent of Construction for the company. In the interval that has elapsed since the bill was sent to the President, persistent efforts have been made to induce him to veto it. All objectors were referred to the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General, who, after giving them an attentive hearing, reported in favor of the Nicaragua scheme, and then the President signed the bill. The only pledge given by the Government, is one for the protection of the neutrality of any waterway across the isthmus.

An Invitation to Canada in the Interest of peace and harmony is suggested in a joint resolution introduced in the House by Mr. Butterworth. He proposes that the President invite the members of the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada and the Cabinets of the several provinces to visit the United States as the guests of the Nation about May 1. The preamble to his resolution recites that the enlightened civilization of the age demands that international differences be adjusted by peaceful methods of arbitration; that the establishment and encouragement of healthful trade and commerce between the United States and other nations, especially with our neighbors and kinsmen of Canada, is one of the obvious duties of Congress; and that social and business intercourse can accomplish more than diplomacy to remove causes of difference. The resolution provides an appropriation of $150,000 to pay expenses, and proposes that a committee of seventy-five Senators and Representatives have charge.

The Scandal at Albany, N. Y., in Connection with the ceiling of the Assembly Chamber grows darker as the inquiry proceeds. About $105,000 appears to have been expended beyond just payments. The board of experts called in to assist the committee in their investigation say that whereas the contract was $270,150 for constructing the ceiling and rebuilding the staircase, the total work, including a liberal estimate for risk, contingencies, and profit, should not have exceeded $165,000. Besides this, the Superintendent certified to monthly statements some of which were for double the work done, and altogether being $18,000 in excess. The experts also report that for the change made in the substitution of papier maché for carved oak, $10,000 ought to have been deducted from the contract price. They recommend that the contractor should now be required to substitute carved oak for papier maché in several parts of the work, and that the cost of doing so would be $10,000. The progress of investigation by the committee is by no means satisfactory, and it is evident that there is a disposition to shield some wrong-doers.

The Terrible Disaster to a Hotel at Hartford, Conn., which occurred on February 18, has caused a feeling of horror throughout the country. Early in the morning of that day while the Park Central Hotel, the largest and most popular in the city, was full of guests, the floors suddenly collapsed, and the whole building became a mass of ruins. Simultaneously the boiler of the engine that ran the dynamo exploded, and a fire broke out among the débris that completed the work of destruction. The police quickly had a gang of men working to extinguish the fire, but it is known that several of the guests who escaped being crushed were held fast in the ruins and burned to death before the flames could be subdued. Twenty-three dead bodies were taken out of the ruins as soon as it was possible to extricate them. Some of the injured who fell at the edge of the wreck were removed before the fire reached them and sent to the hospital. Among the dead was the Rev. Lavallette Perrin, D. D., a well-known Congregational minister and editor. His wife perished with him. Whether the explosion of the boiler caused the collapse of the building, or was a consequence of it, is not known; but the engineers have been arrested, to await the result of the inquest.

The Secret of the Parnell Letters Published by the London Times to prove that Mr. Parnell was in alliance with known criminals was disclosed last week before the Commission. Houston, the man who sold the letters to the Times, was on the witness stand, and Pigott, the man suspected of forging them, was also produced. Pigott's behavior under cross-examination confirmed the bad impression formed of his character. His admissions showed that he had tried to make money from both sides. A letter was produced which he had written to Archbishop Walsh, in which he stated that facts tending to incriminate Mr. Parnell were about to be disclosed, and declaring his ability to disprove the charges. Another suspicious fact was that Pigott being asked to write certain words which were wrongly spelled in the letters under dispute, spelled them in the same way as they were spelled in the alleged Parnell letters. Unless the Times has strong evidence to support Pigott, the belief that he forged the letters will be general. A correspondent of the New York Herald, who interviewed the witness Le Caron, reports him as uttering stronger accusations against Mr. Parnell than those he made on the witness-stand. He stated explicitly that Parnell's "most intimate advisers were cognizant of and parties to" the Phoenix Park murders, and that Mr. Parnell could have averted the crime.

The English Parliament Reassembled on Thursday last. The Queen's speech at the opening ceremony indicated that the warnings uttered about the weakness of the navy are not to be ignored. She said: "The unceasing expenditure upon warlike preparations incurred by other European nations has rendered necessary an increase in the precautions hitherto taken for the safety of our shore and commerce. The counsels by which other Powers are guided, and which dispose of their vast forces, are at present uniformly friendly to England, but I have no right to assume that this condition is necessarily secure from the possibility of change." On the subject of Ireland she used words implying approval of the coercion policy, which will probably lead to a long and acrimonious debate. She said: "The statutes recently passed for the restoration of order and confidence in Ireland have already been attended with salutary results." The Queen also announced the approaching conference on the Samoan question, which she said would be a continuation of that held in Washington.

The New French Cabinet was Announced on February 22. Its premier is M. Tirard, who has held the office before, and among his colleagues are M. De Freycinet and M. Rouvier, who have both been premiers. Most of the members belong to the party organized by Gambetta, to which the name "Opportunist" was given. Their character leads to the belief that their policy will be more Conservative than that of M. Floquet's Cabinet. They are known chiefly as able administrators, but not one of them has a reputation for genius. The strong bond between them is their decided opposition to General Boulanger. President Carnot had considerable difficulty in organizing a Cabinet at all, so disorganized is the condition of French politics. The premiership was offered in succession to several statesmen, who either declined it, or found it impossible to form a Cabinet that would command confidence.

The Extent to which European Nations have carried their preparations for the next war, is forcibly described in a despatch which Harold Frederick cabled last week to the New York Times. He says "that since 1872, when the last elaborate computation of the armies of Europe was made, the taxpayers of the Continent have expended $7,500,000,000 on preparations for war, or nearly twice what we expended on our four years of civil war. In those seventeen years Germany and France have both more than doubled the actual war strength of their armies, and the total war strength of the seven Continental Powers has risen from 6,142,000 to 10,480,000. If we add to this host of trained fighters on a war-footing the classes of partially trained men in the second and final reserves, we get an imposing total of 28,000,000 soldiers, all liable to be drawn in the next European war, and now more or less withdrawn from peaceful vocations, at a total annual public cost of $600,000,000. This vast war taxation," says Mr. Frederick, "wrung from people who do not hate each other, who do not want to fight, who ask only for opportunities for peaceful industry and mutual traffic, is a terrible burden. The blood-money must be borne, however, for no better reason than that it is still in the power of a few families—the Hohenzollerns, Hapsburgs, Romanoffs, Bourbons, and Coburgs—to embroil the whole Continent with their dynastic intrigues and ambitions."

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Per-son canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

A Wonderful Blessing on the Sunday-School established in the Penitentiary at Raleigh, N. C., is reported. Since the school has been organized the teachers from the city have found the work a delight, and the encouragement afforded them has been so great that it has been rare for one of them to be absent. Over and over again convicts have sought them out after leaving the prison, and declared their resolution, by the help of God, to lead honest lives. One of them recently, after his discharge, was on his way to his home, when he turned back, walked the whole distance to the city to thank his teacher, before going to his family. The work has now been extended to the hospital, and regular services are held there every Sunday. The success of our friends at Raleigh will, it may be hoped, encourage Christians in other cities to follow their example.

An Indignant Party of Immigrants Wreaked vengeance on two Mormon missionaries at Cheyenne, Wyoming Territory, on February 16. There were sixty Danes and Scandinavians on the Union Pacific train when it arrived there. They were being taken by two Mormon elders named Marvin and Greely to Salt Lake City. At Cheyenne the elders went into the car after breakfast, and were subjected to a sharp examination. The immigrants had been told nothing about polygamy, but had been promised free farms in Utah, and their passage had been paid. One of the immigrants had two pretty sisters with him, and he discovered after the train left Sidney that Elder Marvin was to marry them both when they reached Utah. He told his companions, and their indignation was aroused. The elders on being questioned failed to satisfy the immigrants, and the storm increased. Finally the immigrants set upon their deceivers and beat them mercilessly. They tried to hang Marvin with the bell-rope, and Greely was severely injured. The conductors and brakemen, who were well armed, rescued the two men with difficulty, and had them conveyed to a hospital. The immigrants abandoned their journey to Utah, and took the train to Denver, intending to settle in Colorado.

An Unexpected Fortune has Been Bequeathed to an official in Iowa. Some years ago a contractor undertook the construction of a large section of road on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad. He failed to comply with the conditions of his contract, and the managers of the road directed their general counsel to prosecute him on his bond. If this had been done the contractor would have been ruined, but the counsel, after thoroughly examining the case, and satisfying himself that the failure was not due to the contractor's negligence, earnestly recommended the managers to grant him an extension of time to finish the job. His request was granted, and the contract was satisfactorily completed, the contractor netting a considerable profit. This sum was enormously increased afterward by judicious investments and other contracts. The man grew wealthy, and being a bachelor, looked around for an heir to his fortune. He is now dead, and has left his entire fortune to the counsel, who at a critical period of his career befriended him, and saved him from ruin. It is not often that an act of kindness is so munificently rewarded, but such acts are enjoined on the followers of Christ, and are a duty whether reward may be expected in this life or not. (1 Peter 3: 8, 9.)

A Diamond Among Marbles Was Found in Cleveland, Ohio, recently. Nearly ten months ago a lady living on Euclid Avenue lost one of a pair of magnificent diamonds, which cost a thousand dollars. She kept each diamond, when not wearing them, in a little gold ball, which closed with a spring, and the diamond was in its ball when she lost it. Advertisements offering a reward for the lost gem were issued, and every effort that could be thought of was made to trace it, but without success. Early this month a visitor in a workman's home was watching his children playing with marbles, and noticed their using one of yellow metal. She picked it up, and examining it closely, observed the mark around it, which showed that it might be opened. She worked at it until she found the spring, and as the ball opened the glittering jewel was seen. It appeared that the workman had found the ball in the gutter, and thinking it worthless, had given it to his children to play with. An advertisement soon found the rightful owner, who gladly paid the reward. If the man had known how precious a jewel the ball contained, he would have been more careful about its safety. It is so with immortal jewels. In the lowest and meanest man whom society treats with contempt is a gem so precious that God gave His Son to redeem it. (Mal. 3: 17.)

One of Napoleon's Soldiers Died in New York on February 14. He was born at Scotten, Darmstadt, Germany, on April 3, 1787, and at the time of his death was, therefore, nearly one hundred and two years old. He came of a family noted for longevity, and he is survived by a sister now living in Baltimore who is over ninety, and a brother in Germany who is eighty-one. Another brother who is dead attained the age of ninety-eight. He came to this country in 1856, and though then nearly seventy worked up a good business as a wholesale butcher, from which he did not retire until he was ninety years old. In his young days in Germany he was pressed into the French military service and served under Napoleon I. in his last campaigns. The old man was an ardent admirer of republican form of government, and spoke regretfully of having fought for a tyrant. That is the case with the Christian, who having served Satan in his youth, comes in his later days into the light and liberty of the gospel. Unhappily that service, unlike that of Napoleon's soldier, was not compulsory, and therefore there is the more cause for sorrow and self-reproach. (Rom. 6: 16.)

A Marriage in an Infirmary has had Unexpected results at Louisville, Ky. Two years ago a young lady from Martin, Tenn., went to Louisville to attend a seminary. She became acquainted with a family living near the city, among the members of which was a young man who fell in love with her. The love affair had the approval of the parents on both sides, and the young people were engaged to be married. Before the day fixed for the ceremony, however, the young lady had a fall from her horse and sustained serious injuries. She was taken to the St. Joseph Infirmary, where she had the benefit of the best surgical skill. The doctors did all they could for her, but in spite of their efforts she gradually sank, until on February 16 they had to tell her that she could not recover. Her death was expected in a few hours, and she and her lover, who was by her side, were prostrated with grief. She had but one desire, and that was to be married before she died. A minister was sent for and the marriage ceremony was performed. From that moment a strange change was observed in the apparently dying girl. She grew more cheerful, the worst symptoms abated, and at last reports the physicians had strong hopes of her complete recovery. An analogous change is often seen when a soul enters into union with Christ. That union not only secures happiness beyond the grave, but imparts new strength for a useful life in this world. (1 Tim. 4: 8.)

Gas Leaking for Forty Years Produced an explosion in New York on February 11. The veteran editor of the New York Journal of Commerce in chronicling the explosion gives a curious history of his efforts to have stopped the leak of gas which caused it. He says that in 1849, while going to and from his office he noticed every time he turned the corner of Pearl and Wall streets an offensive odor of gas. He called the attention of the owner of the premises on the corner to it, but received the reply that so long as the leak was outside his gas-meter it was no concern of his. About a year later, happening to be in company with the Quaker President of the Gaslight Company, the editor told him of the leak. "And why does this interest thee?" was the answer. Some years later the editorial rooms were moved, and the editor did not pass the place so often, but whenever he did, he noticed that the leak continued. He grew interested in it, mentioned it to some gas men who were digging near it; also made a formal complaint to the police, but nothing was done. Last year, when a subway for electric wires was being laid, the editor made a special mission to the spot, and finding the old leak still working, pointed it out to the foreman, and asked him if there would not be danger if it were not stopped. The foreman said he had nothing to do with the gas-pipes. On Monday of last week the heavy iron covering of the nearest manhole, and the stones of the Belgian pavement for six or eight feet on three sides of it, went up into the air, and the shock was felt throughout the neighborhood. No one happened to be passing, and no one was killed. The gas had evidently leaked into the vacant space, and the electric wires had ignited it. The explosion had been preparing for forty years, while all concerned were deaf to warnings; but it came at last. So will it be with the final convulsion that will end this dispensation. The world hears the warnings of coming tribulation, and goes heedless on its way. (11 Peter 3: 4-8.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Henry Y. Satterlee has declined the Bishopric of Michigan, to which he was recently elected.

Mr. William Noble is slowly recovering from his sickness. He is staying at Malvern, a famous health resort.

Mrs. S. M. I. Henry has just held a successful evangelistic institute in Detroit, Mich. She returns for further work in March.

Bishop Holland N. M'Tyeire, Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, died on February 16, at Nashville Tenn.

Plans for the proposed Protestant Episcopal Cathedral in New York have been sent in by sixty-two architects, for examination by the trustees.

Evangelistic meetings in Batavia, N. Y., have been conducted by Rev. E. E. Davidson, and have resulted in considerable additions to the churches of the town.

Mr. P. A. Burdick of New York, has gone to Iowa on behalf of the W. C. T. U. for a Temperance campaign. He will hold meetings in Burlington, Cedar Rapids, &c.

It is stated that Father Chiniquy, on account of his advanced age, intends to give up his travels, and will probably settle down in Montreal for the remainder of his days. He is in his eightieth year.

Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D. D. has been preaching at the Old Market in the lower part of Richmond, Va. His labors have been so successful that a regular pastor has been appointed to carry on the work.

Mr. Thomas Needham has been holding revival services in Sunbury, Penn. His special meetings for young men have been very successful. He is now laboring at Danville, Penn., with promise of great blessing.

A subscription in aid of the starving sufferers in China was opened in New York last week. The tea merchants of the city sent in a little over $1,000 the first day. Mr. A. W. Townsend, 50 Wall Street, is treasurer of the fund.

The Young Women's Christian Associations of New York State, at their convention held last week at Newburgh, N. Y. elected as President, Miss Duarloo, of Schenectady, and as Secretary, Miss Sanford, of Syracuse.

Mrs. B. B. Borden, Superintendent of Railroad Work of the W. C. T. U. in New Mexico, would be glad of religious and temperance journals to use in her work, if our readers have any back numbers to spare. Her address is Las Vegas, N. M.

The Rev. John Dooley, the well-known missionary of the Fourth Ward of New York, where he has labored for over sixteen years, has resigned. He has accepted the office of superintendent of the Albany City Tract and Mission Society. Mr. Dooley will be missed in this city.

The Margaret Strachan Mission to Fallen Women at 103 West Twenty-seventh Street, New York, has not diminished its usefulness since the death of its foundress. It is doing a good work. Subscriptions toward its support may be sent to Mrs. Stebbins, 958 Madison Avenue.

The church building, recently vacated by Dr. Meredith's congregation, in McDonough Street, Brooklyn, is to be occupied by a Protestant Episcopal congregation. The Rev. Dr. Stevens, Archdeacon of Brooklyn, and several well-known clergymen, will aid in organizing it.

Gipsy Smith commenced services at the Central M. E. Church, New York, last Sunday. His meetings at the Nostrand Avenue Church, Brooklyn, have resulted in the addition of over a hundred members to the church. On February 18 he delivered by request his lecture on "From Gipsy Tent to the Platform," at the preachers' meeting in the Methodist Book Room.

THE MAN FOR THE DAY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon

Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile." John 1:47.

The Man of Guileless Heart—Appreciated by Jesus—I. A Happy Sign in a Seeker—Deceitful Men Never Converted—Hope of a Man Honest in his Difficulties—A Candid Seeker—Ready for the Spirit's Work—II. The Sincere Man After Conversion—Desires to be Soundly Converted—True to his Convictions—Simple in his Aims—Clear in Pursuing Them—A Dying Woman's Sound Reasoning—Specks not to be Painted Over.

I SHALL not go into the full meaning of what "an Israelite indeed" is, but I shall dwell, principally, upon the fact that Nathanael was a man with no guile in him. The Lord Jesus Christ made that discovery; and who so fit to spy out a man in whom was no guile, as the Christ in whom there is no guile? Two guileless men were that day together, for in our Lord Jesus there is neither guilt nor guile. In us there is guilt, but we trust that, by divine grace, guile has been cast out of us. It will be so if the Lord does not impute iniquity to us, according to the words of David, "Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile." The Lord is sure to put all guile out of us, when He removes all guilt away from us.

Men generally see what they are; and because Christ is guileless, therefore He spies out and at once commends him and welcomes him, and says, "Behold," as if delighted and charmed to see him. The Lord Jesus appreciates at a high rate the sincerity which He perceives in Nathanael. I am afraid that a man without guile is not much esteemed by the ordinary run of mankind. He will be wise, however, not to trouble himself about that matter. The approbation of Jesus is better than the approbation of the whole world. They say of a man nowadays who has no guile, "Well, he is a very simple-minded kind of fellow. Exceedingly good, but rather blunt. Quite unsuspecting, and therefore you may readily take him in." Mark you, there is no reason why a man without guile should be taken in; for while we are harmless as doves we can also be wise as serpents if we are rightly taught; but in the ordinary way, a man that is not crafty and cunning—a man that speaks his mind and practices no policy, and is not acquainted with tricks and shifts—is thought to be a poor creature by the wise and deceitful men of this day. But if Jesus Christ takes delight in a guileless man, the guileless man may be perfectly satisfied with this high measure of acceptance. God grant to each one here present, that we all may be free from guile!

I. Here, first, we clearly see

he is a man in whom is no guile. We were talking, some time ago—a few of us ministers of Christ, who have been familiar with the souls of men for years—and I made a remark that seemed to startle my brethren. The remark was this: although I had spoken with thousands of men and women who had been converted, and I had seen persons brought to Christ of every age and of every character, yet I scarcely remembered the conversion of a man who was double-minded, crafty, false, deceitful. I could not even now qualify this solemn statement, for my memory does not correct it. It is in the honest heart that sowing truth takes root. I have known the drunkard saved. Blessed be God for that! I have seen the swearer have his mouth washed, so that he has spoken sweet and goodly words for the rest of his life. I have known the fornicator, and adulterer, and the harlot delivered from the Stygian ditch of abominable lust. I have known men, guilty of almost every sin, delivered from the power of evil; and concerning all these the living evidence of holy conduct has proved their sincerity beyond all question. But I still say that my memory does not bring before me a single person habitually guilty of the double-shuffle, habitually a liar, habitually a cheat, converted to God at all. The insincere, the canting, the hypocritical, the habitually deceptive—I know not of converts from these classes. There may have been such, and I should not wonder if there have been; but I do not happen to have met with them.

It seems to me, that often in the man who is filled with guile, there is a want of something for the grace of God to work upon. When the creature repents it is only his heart is never wounded. When he believes anything, you do not know that he does believe it. He begins at once putting another meaning on what he professes to believe: you cannot hold such an eel. If anything comes home to his feelings, he has such a very minute conscience left that there is no room for conviction to light upon, when it does pay him a visit. He has got into such a habitual condition of cheating that he cheats himself as well as others. He cannot be true and thorough: it is not in him. There is scarcely anything under heaven so damnable as guile, deceit, and craft.

The man of whom we have great hope is one in whose spirit there is no guile. Now I will show you the sort of man he is. He is one who, when he is spoken to about Christ, has difficulties, but in his difficulties he is honest. Nathanael is told by his friend Philip that he has found the Messiah. Nathanael inquires, "Where did you find Him?" Why, He comes from Nazareth! "Well," says he, "but can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Now, when a man will plainly state his objection, his friend can do his best to meet it, with some such word as "Come and see."

Around us are a number of persons who object to our Lord; but the objections which they mention are not their real objections. Their pretended difficulties are a red-herring, to turn the scent from their real

Reasons for Opposition.

Many cavil at Christ because they do not want to give up their sin. They pick up some technical question, some difficulty raised by geology or evolution, or something or other, and they make a fuss and a dust over it, while the real impediment is that they are living an unclean life, and do not want to give up their evil ways. The difficulty is that they are making gain in a wrong way, and to be Christians would not suit their pockets, for they would have to quit a bad trade, or conduct their business with lessened profits. He is the sincere seeker who does not play at sham difficulties, but who speaks out at once and tells his friend what the point is that hinders him.

Of the man in whose spirit there is no guile, we may also say that, as a seeker, he is also candid. He is Willing to Examine.

Consequently, like Nathanael when Philip said "Come and see," he does come and see for himself, and he examines on his own account to see if it be so. Alas! men do not find Jesus, for there is guile in their spirit, and they do not desire to find Him. They do not want to know, and so they remain ignorant. They do not want to discover, and so do not discover. In the last great day, when that curtain shall be drawn back which hides from our eyes all souls that are lost—if we are permitted to look into that dreadful place—we shall not find there a soul that ever sincerely cried to God for mercy through Jesus Christ; nor do I think that we shall find one who searched the Scriptures and heard the gospel with the desire to find Christ therein.

Now, dear friends, a man who is really free from guile in his heart—a downright, upright, straightforward man—is open and ready for the work of God's Holy spirit. For instance, such a man is open to conviction. When he reads the Bible or hears a sermon, he says, "I desire to know all about it." Tell me the truth, however unpleasant it may be. The man who is crafty and double-minded will not do that:

indeed, it is the last thing he cares to do. He begins excusing himself in some fashion or other. He is no worse than other people; he was misled by others; he could not help it, for everybody else did so; he only followed his natural passions, and he could not help his constitutional inclinations. It was his fate to do it. He had intended to do better, but was overcome. These are a few of the forms of the shuffling of guile. If the man were an honest man he would say, "Yes, it is so." I broke the law and did wrong. I am not going to dispute the question, I am forced to plead guilty; and if thou condemn me, O my God, thou wilt do no more than is just." That is the kind of man who, before long, will find salvation.

Further than this, I believe that a sincere heart, a true heart, is a great guard to a man against pretended plans of salvation. "Come here," says one, "I will prove to you salvation by works." The honest man replies, "That will not suit me; for salvation by works would require that my works should have been perfect throughout life, and mine have not been so. Mine have been imperfect, are still imperfect, and will be imperfect till I die. I cannot stand on the footing of merit for an hour." "Come," says another, "here is Salvation by Sincerity.

Sincere obedience is the patent article by which men are saved. Do your best and be sincere, and the matter is squared." But the man who is upright in heart answers, "I do not see that, neither can I rest therein." Indeed he ought not to do so; for such a hope is based on a lie. If a man were to take poison sincerely, thinking it to be medicine, it would not cure him, but kill him. If a man most sincerely stands in the way of an express steam-engine and thinks he can stop it, it will "stop him" and his life altogether. The candid, thoughtful mind cannot believe that invention of self. You see, the man whose heart is quite honest wants something real and solid, and has no desire to arrive at peace by deceitful means.

To be free from guile also helps us to see our need of the Spirit of God; for the right-minded man, who will examine himself carefully, will perceive that what is required of him is more than he can ever give,

Unaided and Unassisted.

He will discover that there is that about a Christian's life to which he cannot attain, unless he is born again. He will feel that there is a something about the child of God which he does not possess and cannot imitate, and can only gain by a work of the Spirit of God in the heart. Brethren, a man whose heart has been made to be true, even though as yet he may not have found Christ, is one of those men who are pretty sure to find Him.

Now, if any man or woman here be resolved to come to Jesus, let him carry out the resolve. Come along with you! The true Saviour shuts out no true man. If you mean to pray, pray. If your heart means the prayer, God will hear it. Oh, my hearer! if thou wilt turn from thy sin in real earnest, God will help thee, and enable thee to overcome thy sin. If thou wilt give thyself up to Jesus Christ at once, not in words, but from thy very soul, He will receive thee and save thee. Let there be no trifling, no mocking God; no stopping to talk with a Christian friend to chat away thy feelings with pious words; but come as thou art; only come really and truly, and Jesus will meet thee and welcome thee, and say, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile!"

II. But now, secondly, I am going to give a picture of a sincere man

After He Becomes a Christian.

It is the sine qua non for a Christian that he should be thoroughly sincere. Of every man who is really a child of God it must be said—or we shall question whether he be a child of God at all—"an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" Just let me briefly state how the true Christian's portrait is here painted in the words "in whom there is no guile."

First, the real believer in Christ desires to be what he thinks he is; that is to say, if he judges himself to be converted, he desires to be soundly converted. If he judges himself to be a believer, his desire is that he may not be anything else than a true believer. He prays, "Search me, O God." Because searching by his own conscience may not be enough, he asks God Himself to search and test him whether he be true or not. It would be an awful thing if you or I should form the comforting conclusion, "I am all right, for I am in the light!" and it should turn out that we are abiding in death and darkness. It would be an awful thing to find out that terrible truth just when we are in the valley of death-shade, and wading through the dread river. Let us find it out at once, if we must find it out at all! Startling as the discovery would be to some of us, yet we would rather know it now than go an inch further; for every inch we go we are further away from the right road, if we are on the wrong track. I heard of one who got into the backwoods, and went travelling on all day long, and at nightfall he discovered that, after the most weary plodding, he had arrived at the exact place from which he started in the morning. He had been wandering in a circle, and spending his strength for nothing. It is a fearful business, when one is starving, to be, at the same time, losing one's way. We do pray that it may not be so with us. We all want to carry out to the full any profession that we may have made; we desire to go beyond it rather than fall short of it.

The man in whom there is no guile is True to His Convictions.

This is an age in which convictions are sadly rare, and where they do exist they are singularly sleepy and torpid. I take it, as a Christian man and minister, that I have no right to occupy the pulpit of a congregation if I do not believe those doctrines which I professed to believe when I became the pastor of the church, I have no right to undermine the basis upon which the church was formed. As a private member of a church, I have no right to be a member of a church whose doctrines I do not accept; indeed, I ought not to regard it as a possibility that I could remain to profess what I do not agree with. Trifling with conscience, though common enough, is one of the most deadly sins against a man's self of which he can be guilty. If you are following a trade, and you know that it is evil, quit it. Quit it at once. Quit it before you get comfortable in it; for, after a while, by continuance in it, you will become soddened with dishonesty, and you will not be able to see the dishonor of it. I do not doubt that many persons in London, who get their living by the most infamous vices, entered into those infamous ways by degrees. They began with some little and then turned decidedly into wickedness. It was a very little fault at first, and yet it troubled them; but they soon grew used to it, and they said, "Oh, well, everybody does it." Then they went on a little farther, and a little farther, till they were out of sight of the right road, and had lost all desire to return to it. Sad is that man's case who has lost all power to hear the fog-horn, and yet is nearing a rock.

I do not myself like the doing of things for which I have to make an apology. I do not refer to apologies to my fellow-men; for what matters what people think about us? We need not mind the judgments of erring mortals. But I refer to apologizing to myself and to my God. Every man who respects himself feels that the first thing he has to do is to deserve his own good opinion; and numbers of men and women have not won that good opinion yet. If they were to talk to themselves, they would say to themselves, "Why, you know you are not acting straight. You know you are not doing right. You are mean, and cowardly, and afraid to do right." But they will not give themselves an opportunity of talking to themselves, lest they should be uneasy. He that never likes to be alone, probably knows that when he is alone he is in bad company; and this fact ought to startle him. Would he be so mightily afraid to commune with his own heart in solitude if he did not suspect something to be rotten within? Never violate your convictions. If you do, you are not one in whom there is no guile.

Again, a genuine Christian man is Simple in His Aims.

He is aiming at God's glory; he is aiming at the good of his fellow-men; he is aiming to lead a holy life. That is what he says; and if he be, indeed, a child of God, he is really aiming at these things, and he is not basely taking up with godliness for the sake of gain and reputation. Are not many looking one way, and rowing another, like a boatman? Do you not know Mr. Facing-both-ways, who looks this way and the other way too? He runs with the hounds when there is anything good to be hunted; but he is off with the hare when a little fear surprises him. Trimming is a despicable business. Policy is a diabolical guide, and those who follow it are the worst of men. Such men are common as blackberries, and base as dirt. Oh, be not so! Let your life be laid like a gun that is sighted for the centre of the target, and then let it be fired at once, that the bullet may go straight to its place, driven on by all the powder of your energy.

The Christian man is clear in his aims, and, if he is a true Christian, he is also very clear in his modes of pursuing his aims. Brethren, in your trade, in your business, in all that you do, be straight as a line. Policy may be a guide for the world, but it should never be the rule of life of church members. O my brother, be true in all things! Do that which will bear the burning heat of the last fire, and the fierce light of the last day, and then thou doest that which thou canst sleep upon on thy death-bed, canst recollect in the day of judgment, and remember without fear before thy God.

Live unto God.

Live as in the sight of God. Live under the command of God. Court His approbation, and care for nothing else. Set thy helm towards the right course, and then fasten it there, and turn not thou aside a half-a-point all thy days.

I remember seeing a good but very timorous woman, whose gracious life was drawing to a close. I was sitting by her bedside, and she seemed to be very low, and filled with fear as to her future state; but at last she was comforted by a word I spoke. Then she said to me, very tremblingly, "I do not think that God will send me amongst the wicked, who did not love Him, and did not trust His dear Son, for I never sought their company here. I have always loved the people of God, and I have loved His house, and I have loved His Word, and I have loved holiness, and therefore I think that He will let me go amongst my own people." This was sound reasoning. The true shall go with the true at the last. The man whom God has made to be upright and truthful shall not be driven down to the place where all liars go. He shall keep his own way, and go to his own company.

Remember that there is an absolute necessity that a Christian should possess thoroughbred sincerity. The child of God may have spots on his countenance, but he Must Not Paint His Face.

It is the hypocrite that paints. There may be a speck here and a speck there upon the countenance of the true believer, but he is sorry that it should be so, and he tries to wash off all such stains; but he never uses the color-box. In this he is the reverse of the world's religious professors. Oh, the multitude of hypocrites that rouge themselves up to their eyes! They are such beauties as Jezebel made herself. You would suppose that they possessed the beauty of holiness; but see them when the paint is off; catch them at home; watch them in their own families; trace them into their secret places, and you will say, "Can these be the same men?"

O sirs, if any of us are lost, let us at least know that we are so. If we hope that we are saved, God grant that it may be a true hope, and a vital experience. The Word of the Lord saith, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved"—saved from hypocrisy, saved from falsehood, saved from guile and guilt—for "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." May God set His seal upon this admonition, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A BUSINESS MAN'S EXPERIENCE.*

SYSTEMATIC giving I believe to be the duty of every child of God, and none can do it so well as those who have a system. I have followed it now for over nine years, and although my contributions have been possibly a little liberal, yet I have not missed the money. I began business nine years ago as a general merchant, and in doing so I got a small box and labelled it "The Lord's Treasury." Every night I count the cash taken in, and enter it in a book kept for that purpose. On Saturday night I add up the cash sales for the week and deduct three per cent. for the Lord's Treasury. This is my fund for the church and benevolent purposes. . . . I always have funds on hand,

A Hindoo's Testimony.

"Some twenty-five years ago," says a missionary, "it was my privilege to introduce the Bible system of finance—a proportionate part of the income regularly and systematically devoted to God—into a feeble mission in India. Not a few of the native brethren received the teaching eagerly and obeyed it promptly. Among these was one of my native preachers—Bhelsari Naih. This man, prior to his tithing his income, was always in difficulty, ever complaining of the smallness of his income ($4.80 a month). He began to tithe himself. After about three months he and I met in connection with our work among the heathen, and the following conversation occurred: 'Well Bhelsari, how does the tithing system work?' 'Capitally, sir.' 'Ah, how is that? You were always complaining of being hard up, and even in debt, when you used your whole income for yourself; now you are giving one-tenth to God, you make no complaints.' 'Ah, sir, I find the nine-tenths with God's blessing goes farther than the tenths used to do without it.'"

A Trying Year.

A minister of the gospel says: "The last year has been the year of my life so far, for outgo; that is, never since I entered the ministry have I had so many obligations to meet in one year, so that this year has not been a favorable one by which to test this question from a financial point of view. Yet during the year I held rigorously to the tithe principle. You may ask, 'Did it interfere or cripple you in your finances?' I have only one answer to give, and that is, the nine-tenths of my income met all my personal expenditure and all my household expenses, and did it easier than ever my whole income did before. This may seem strange to some; yet it is true, though I cannot explain it. It is like some other things that God does. I cannot explain them, I only know them to be facts. My experience teaches me that if a man pays his tenth to God the other nine dollars will supply his needs better than the ten dollars will if he robs God."

An Obligation Met.

A Methodist minister says: "Somewhat over ten years ago, when my savings amounted to $600,

I was deeply impressed that I should contribute one half of the sum toward the cause of Christ; and although it had been my intention to devote my small capital to an entirely different purpose, I resolved to obey what I firmly believed to be a Divine intimation, and accordingly the sum of $300 was presented as a thank-offering to God. The joy that filled my soul in connection with this act of consecration was more than a compensation for the loss of half my worldly substance. Within three days of my subscribing the money, it was all returned to me again, and my little fortune again stood at $600. Shortly after this I contributed $50 toward the erection of a church, on my charge, and when the same church was dedicated I was led to pledge myself for $1,500, which at that time was $900 more than I possessed. Under ordinary circumstances, I admit, such an act would have been one of great imprudence, and even of fanaticism; but when God calls, the measure of our ability is never the measure of our duty. Some sympathizing friends, knowing my circumstances, and believing it impossible that I should fulfil my obligations raised a subscription for my aid of $600. This help I never used, but turned every dollar of it into the building fund. It was the Lord's will that I should pay the entire amount of my subscription unaided by the kindness of my friends. By a succession of providences I was enabled to pay every dollar, and part in advance, finding myself considerably better off in earthly substance, to say nothing of spiritual enrichment, than when the promise was made. Within six weeks after the church to which I had given the money was dedicated, sixty souls were converted to God, making me feel, I can assure you, that my investment for Christ was already bearing enormous interest. This is my testimony: that the promises of God, in reference to temporal blessings, are just as reliable as those pertaining to spiritual blessings, providing the conditions of consecration are observed."

MALIETOA AND TAMASESE, Rival Kings of Samoa.

THE portraits on this page of the two men who are involving the United States in a diplomatic conflict with Germany will be of interest to our readers. The difficulty has arisen out of the greedy policy of the European powers. England's possession of Australia, New Zealand, and the Fiji Islands aroused the jealousy of France, who seized Tahiti and the New Hebrides. Germany, not to be outdone, seized New Guinea, and made arrangements with England for dividing land in the Pacific yet unclaimed between themselves. Samoa naturally trembled for her autonomy, and in 1873 besought the protection of the United States. To grant her request was contrary to our policy, but promises were made to her, the exact terms of which have not been disclosed. A further recognition of her independence was made by the United States in 1878.

Still, the Government of Samoa was not a strong or stable one. There were frequent risings of rival chiefs, and King Malietoa, though the recognized occupant of the throne, had considerable difficulty in maintaining his supremacy, and could not maintain order. Commercial interests were growing, and they were in the hands chiefly of the United States, England, and Germany—the last being the greatest. An arrangement was therefore made between the three powers for the protection of their citizens who might be trading with Samoa; and Apia, the chief town, was placed under a strong government, guaranteed by England and Germany, the United States consenting.

The disturbances of the rival chiefs continued, and an effort was made by the three governments in 1887 to secure a better government of the islands, by the election of a chief to the throne. The effort failed, and then Germany, separating herself from the other two powers, took upon herself to proclaim Tamasese King of Samoa. In spite of the protests of the American and English consuls, German soldiers took action against Malietoa, in support of his rival, made him a prisoner, and carried him on board a German ship into exile. Indignant protests were made at Berlin by instructions of Mr. Bayard, and in response, Bismarck has proposed a conference, which is shortly to be held. It may be hoped that, though it is little likely that the United States will take up arms to protect Samoan independence, Bismarck will learn that his arrogant conduct is an offence to our Government which he will do well to remove.

THE MEMORIAL CHAPEL IN VIENNA.

THE building a picture of which appears on this page has been erected by the Emperor of Austria, in his capital, on the site of the Ring Theatre, which was burned on December 9, 1881. The principal part of the edifice consists of a chapel, in which once a year, on the anniversary of the catastrophe, a Requiem Mass is to be celebrated. On each side of the chapel are suites of rooms, which are to be rented, and the proceeds devoted to the relief of distress. The building cost $320,000, the whole of which was paid by the Emperor. The disaster which it is designed to commemorate was one of the most appalling on record. A large audience had filled every part of the theatre, and the people were intent on the performance, when a swinging lamp fell from the flies upon the stage. Flames rose immediately, and there was a mad rush to get out of the house. As always happens, some fell in the struggle to reach the doors, and others fell over them. The theatre burned rapidly, and though heroic struggles were made to rescue life, no less than 805 persons perished.

ETHEL TRACY'S ORDEAL

I HAVE not seen Miss Ethel yet; is she away from home?" The question was asked by a young man who was one of a party gathered in the hospitable home of Mrs. Tracy, a widowed lady of some social prominence. The "Miss Ethel" spoken of was her second daughter, whose engagement to a wealthy young man had made her the envy of her circle of friends.

"She has a headache, and was obliged to lie down early in the evening," said Mrs. Tracy.

"I suppose we shall be losing her soon," continued her friend. "When will the wedding be?"

"The day has not been fixed; Mr. Langton is in Washington just now, but he will be back in a few weeks; and then, I suppose, arrangements will be made. Nothing has been settled yet." Mrs. Tracy excused herself and went to her daughter's room, while the young man joined a friend who just then entered the room.

"What a shame it is," he said, "that so lovely and good a girl as that should be sacrificed to such a rake as Langton! I wish some one would tell her mother what a scamp he is. I felt like doing it myself just now while I was talking to her, but it is a difficult thing to explain to a lady, and one's motives might be misunderstood."

"Yes, you had better not meddle in it. Langton would be a dangerous enemy to you, and you would get no thanks from any one. What business is it of yours?"

Mrs. Tracy went to her own room, not finding Ethel in hers, and there Ethel sat before a cheerful open fire reading. The mother seated herself in her own chair, and drew her daughter's head caressingly against her knee. Ethel put her hand in her mother's and clasped it lovingly.

"What is it, daughter? Why are you so pensive? Any trouble, dear?"

"Nothing new, mother, dear," said Ethel, her eyes fixed abstractedly on the fire. "I am wondering if we have not been a little hasty. Stephen has dropped several remarks since we have been engaged that lead me to doubt whether he is so good a man as we believed him to be. His letter this morning pained me deeply. He speaks so flippantly of religion, as if he had no faith at all. He treats my reverence for holy things as if it were a womanly weakness, that he tolerates, though he despises. Before we were engaged he used to speak very differently. I wonder if he was only playing a part."

"I suppose you love him very dearly?" asked the mother.

"Love him! Oh, passionately; it would kill me to give him up. And he is so gentle and kind and tender. That is the difficulty. Mother, do you think, if he is really a scoffer, I could draw him to Jesus after we are married?"

"It might be; but it is unlikely. Besides, you could not expect a blessing. The command not to marry an unbeliever is very explicit. If you disobey, how could you ask God's help? and you could do nothing without that."

"No, I have thought of that. Oh, I wish I had found out for certain how he stood before we were engaged. He spoke so nicely about that sermon of Dr. Clark's that Sunday that we went to church together, that I took it for granted. But look here, mother, read what he says." Ethel drew a letter from her pocket and showed her mother a passage on one of its pages.

Mrs. Tracy's face clouded as she read, and she sighed deeply. "Pray about it," she said. "Light may come. We must not act hastily now. If he is really a scoffer, you cannot marry him, though it has gone so far. Better that you should bear the heart-break now, my darling, than be all your life in misery. Young Stanton was speaking to me about the engagement just before I came up. I will go down and see him again, if he is still here. He is very honorable, and I think I can learn something from him. He knows Mr. Langton, I believe. Meanwhile, daughter, pray for guidance. God will direct you, if you ask Him."

It was a very earnest prayer that Ethel offered during her mother's absence. Never had that young heart had such a struggle before. How dear her lover was to her she fully realized in this crisis. She did not know, until then, how firmly he had established himself in her affections. The possibility of having to give him up revealed the fact to her. She saw herself leading a lonely life, saw him married to another, endured in anticipation the agony of wrenching his image from her heart, and she shuddered. Was she strong enough to bear all that? She feared not, but if it were a duty could she not rely on strength not her own? Tears fell, and she prayed more earnestly. At length peace came. Casting herself wholly into her Saviour's arms, she had strength to say, as He said on that awful night in the Garden, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt."

It seemed a long time before Mrs. Tracy returned, but at last she opened the door, and laid her hand lovingly on her daughter's head. "My love," she said, "it is grievous. You must suffer. May your loving Saviour support and comfort you." Then she told her what she had heard. Stanton, who had not been satisfied by his friend's advice, could not resist Mrs. Tracy's direct questions. He did not tell her all he knew, but he told her so much as to convince her that her daughter's happiness would not be safe in her lover's hands.

The engagement was broken off. The Tracys were silent as to their reasons, but not a few guessed them. What it cost Ethel none ever knew. It was like the cutting off the right hand of which Jesus spoke. But it was done, and the promise to those who lose their lives for His sake (Mark 8:35) was fulfilled in her experience.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.
A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.
Mormon Iniquities.

It was fortunate for the Swiss mission that the new converts in general could not read any language but their own, and thus were ignorant of the deceptions which the American elders had practiced upon the people. Monsieur Petitpierre, the Protestant minister who thought that the "revelation" ought to be "prayerfully considered," was the only one who understood English, and his knowledge was very limited. His wife did not at all coincide with him about the prayerful consideration of the heresy; she disposed of the subject without any prayer at all, as being an evil thing; and it is to be regretted that in this respect the whole body of the Mormon women did not follow her example.

What arguments she used I do not know; but that they were very much to the point no one can doubt, for they banished forever all thoughts of the heresy from her husband's mind. It was said among the Saints that she was very energetic in her private discussions with her husband. But however this might be, it is certain that Monsieur Petitpierre resisted as long as he could, for the "revelation" quite fascinated the childless old man; and it is possible that he might have held fast to the faith, but just then certain documents and publications of the apostles, and a very large amount of evidence respecting them and their doings, attracted his attention. He was in the main a good and truthful man, although of small mental calibre, and the deceptions and contradictions which he discovered quite disgusted him. His wife's strong personal arguments gave the finishing blow to his faith, and the horrible spell was broken. He "apostatized," according to the phraseology of the Mormons, i. e., left them, and Mr. Stenhouse consequently lost the services of a very useful translator.

It may here be remarked that the gift of tongues which some of the "Saints" profess to be endowed with is of no use for the missionary, since it does not consist of speaking in foreign languages, but in the utterance of sounds unintelligible to all except to those who are endowed with the gift of "the interpretation of tongues." Thus any enthusiast may believe, or any impostor may assert, that he has either of these gifts, without anyone being able to disprove it, as would be the case if they professed to speak in any known language.

When I heard that Monsieur Petitpierre had left the Church, how I wished that I could have followed in his footsteps! But apostasy from Mormonism is only possible to two classes—the young disciple, who has embraced the faith more from enthusiasm than from conviction, whose experience is limited; and the old disciple, who has entirely outgrown it, and has become disgusted with it all. I was neither of these. My faith was too firmly grounded to admit of my giving it up. I only pitied myself and my sex for the burden which I imagined Providence had seen fit to place upon us. I never for a moment supposed that Joe Smith would have been so wicked as to fabricate a "revelation," and to palm it off in the name of the Lord.

I was compelled, however, by the Elders, to teach the new and unpalatable doctrine, although repugnant to me. The Elders could not understand that my feeling of opposition was anything else than selfishness; they did not comprehend the feelings of a woman's heart—its craving for some object upon which to devote its whole wealth of love. They were taught that theirs was a nobler position than that of the sisters, and that women might consider themselves sufficiently honored in being allowed to become the mothers of their children, and to help in building up their "kingdom."

Of my missionary work in Switzerland subsequently I will say but little, except that it was too successful. The same sorrow and indignation which Madame Balif had so forcibly expressed, were shown by almost every new convert, and I had to bear the heavy blame of teaching such an unwelcome doctrine. The sisters became unhappy, and wished that they had died in ignorance of Mormonism; and I felt humbled to the dust to think that I should be the innocent and helpless cause of so much misery to others. I looked anxiously for a change; but the only change which seemed probable was that we might be permitted to emigrate to Utah—and there was no comfort for me in that prospect.

We remained in Switzerland until the close of the year 1854, and through the unremitting efforts of my husband Mormonism was introduced into six cantons of the Confederation. Monsieur Balif became an indefatigable missionary, as was also Governor Stoudeman, and to their liberality and zeal Mr. Stenhouse was greatly indebted.

With the aid of Monsieur Balif, Mr. Stenhouse established in Geneva a periodical in the French language, for the edification of the Saints, besides publishing a book in reply to the attacks of the clergy, and many minor effusions.

In that year, 1854, there was great excitement among the Saints in Utah. Brigham Young and his apostles were denouncing the Gentiles in the most unmeasured language, and predicted desolating judgment to be about to fall upon Europe, and in fact every part of the earth except the Territory of Utah at the Salt Lake, which would be the only haven of refuge. Mormon Saints in Europe were alarmed, and became anxious to emigrate to Utah, where they were told they would be safe. A seven years' famine was said to be at their door, when a sack of wheat should be sold for a sack of gold, and Gentile kings and princes were to come and crouch to the Saints in Utah for a morsel of bread. The women in Utah were counselled to sell the ribbons from their bonnets, to buy flour with the proceeds, and to store it up, after the example of Joseph in Egypt, against the seven years of famine.

The brethren and sisters in Switzerland who could dispose of their property hastened to "flee to Zion." Some did so at a ruinous sacrifice. One gentleman, a Monsieur Robella, I knew, who was part proprietor of a newspaper and printing establishment. In a very short time it would have been entirely in his own hands; but he sold out at a great loss, dreading that the storm might overtake him before he reached the "chambers of the Lord in the mountains," as the Elders called Salt Lake City.

The journey from Europe to Utah at that time occupied six or eight months; it was a very tedious pilgrimage. My Swiss friends had first to travel to Liverpool; thence by sailing vessel to New Orleans; by steamer up the Mississippi as far as St. Louis; up the Missouri to the frontiers; and then across the plains by ox-teams. Much of this distance had to be travelled during the worst part of the year. They left their homes while the Jura Mountains were still draped in snow; and those who escaped the ravages of cholera and the perils of the way reached their destination just as the frosts of winter were beginning to whiten the hoary heads of the hills which stand about Zion. All the Swiss pilgrims traveled together until they arrived at St. Louis; there they separated, one party going up the river, and the other making the journey overland. The cholera attacked the latter party and cut off the greater number of them, and their bones now whiten the prairie.

The news of their death soon arrived in Switzerland, and the people at Lausanne were exasperated against the Mormon missionaries; and when my husband visited that place he found it prudent not to remain long. At the same time, those of the Saints whose relations had perished in the emigration were pained to hear that it was because they "had not obeyed counsel," and gone up the river with the other party, that they fell by the way. And, as if in mockery of this statement, the next news that we received was that a Missouri steamer, on board of which were many Mormon missionaries—all most obedient to counsel—had been blown to atoms. Many of the Saints began to consider these things, and their love waxed cold. Through all this our position was anything but pleasant, and my husband applied for permission to be released from the presidency of the Swiss and Italian missions, in order that he might "gather to Zion." His request was granted; and in the autumn of 1854 we bade a final adieu to Switzerland.

We might now be said to have begun our journey to Zion, although we tarried long by the way, and several years elapsed before we reached our destination. When we arrived in London we obtained apartments in the house of the President of the London Conference, and there I had opportunities of observing the effects of the system upon the English Saints. Elder Marsden, the president, was a thorough Mormon, and a man who was very highly thought of. He had been acquainted with all the apostles and high priests who had resided in Liverpool—the great rendezvous of the Saints in England; had been President of the Conference there, and now occupied the highest position of the European mission. He was a pleasant, intelligent man, who in his day had done much to build up the Church; but, like his two predecessors, John Banks and Thomas Margetts, he also apostatized from the Mormonism of later years. At the time, however, of which I speak, he was considered to be of good standing among the Saints.

Up to this time I had never seriously doubted my religion, and I probably never should have done so had it not been for the introduction of the heretical doctrine. But what I saw in London at that time sadly shook my faith, and the stories which I heard from Utah quite frightened me. Nothing, of course, was openly said, and at first I disbelieved every evil report, until at last it was impossible for me altogether to reject what was told me. The testimony of an apostate or of a Gentile would have been dismissed with contempt; but when we saw letters from mothers to their children, and husbands to their wives—all people of unquestioned faith—setting forth the troubled state of men's minds in Utah, expressing fears for their own safety, and hinting at "cutting off" the transgressor, and the doings of "Avenging Angels," we could not cast them aside with contempt. My views of the glories of Zion were certainly changing; henceforth I was never firm in the faith; I felt that there was something wrong.

Although we shall speak more fully on these subjects further on, it will not be out of place to make a few remarks here on the "cuttings off" by the "Avenging Angels."

General Clark, in a letter to Governor Boggs, dated Nov. 10, 1838, said of the Mormons: "There is no crime, from treason down to petty larceny, but these people, or a majority of them, have been guilty of—all, too, under the counsel of Joseph Smith, junior, the prophet. They have committed treason, murder, incendiarism, robbery, larceny, and perjury. They have societies formed, under the most binding covenants in form, and the most horrible oaths, to circumvent the laws and put them at defiance; and to plunder and burn and murder, and divide the spoils for the use of the Church."

Governor Boggs had proof of the truth of this statement a few years later, for, according to Mr. Caswell: "Joe Smith had publicly prophesied in 1841, in the presence of thousands, that his old enemy Boggs, the ex-Governor of Missouri, would die by violent hands within a year. He now offered a reward of $500 to several of the Danites (that is, the Army of Zion), if they would assassinate the gentleman in question. One of the terrible band accordingly proceeded more than 200 miles, to Independence, where the ex-governor resided. Smith being asked by Bennett, the Mormon major, to inform him where this Danite had gone, promptly replied, with a significant nod, that 'he was gone to fulfil prophecy.' In the course of two months the Danite returned to Nauvoo; and on the day following his arrival, the news reached that place that the governor had been assassinated. The Danite, who had previously been miserably poor, now appeared in possession of an elegant carriage and horses, and with his pockets full of gold. Boggs, however, was not killed, but only severely wounded. He recovered, and lived some years after, so that in this, as in many other things, Smith proved a false prophet."

In the year 1856 the house and store of Mr. H. J. Jarvis were entered by some men in disguise, and after being cruelly treated, his house was set on fire, and his wives and children escaped with difficulty, but not without their arms and hands being burnt. They went to the house of an Elder for protection and shelter, but this was refused because the Elder said he had spoken evil of the authorities, and had had Gentiles to supper in his house.

In the spring of 1866 a Gentile—O. N. Brassfield—was assassinated. Mr. Brassfield was married by Judge McCurdy to the second wife of one of the brethren who was then in Europe on a mission, and just a fortnight afterwards he was shot by an unknown person as he was entering his boarding-house. No effort was made to arrest the perpetrator of the crime, but every consistent Mormon in his faith justified the deed, saying the sentiment of the Church made it obligatory upon the "nearest of kin" to avenge the absent husband. Had Brassfield been a Mormon instead of a Gentile, it is doubtful if he would have been punished with death.

In October of the same year Dr. J. King Robinson was barbarously murdered. This man was a "Gentile," an intimate friend of Norman McLeod, and one who devoted much time to the Gentile Sunday-school. He married the daughter of a Mormon widow, who had seceded from the Church. He afterwards entered into an action against the city for the possession of a piece of ground, which was decided in his favor, but three days afterwards he was assassinated. As General Sherman had only a short time before this intimated that if the lives of the citizens continued to be imperilled he might have to pay them a visit with some soldiers, it was thought prudent by Brigham Young to head a list, on which a large reward was offered for the apprehension of the murderers, with $500, but when, several years afterwards, some Mormons were arrested for that murder, he withdrew his portion of the offered reward.

About the same year, 1866, three "apostates" from Mormonism had been arrested upon the charge of stealing a cow, and were placed under a Mormon armed guard. The first that was heard of them afterwards was the story that "they had attempted to escape," and that the guard had been forced to fire on them. Two were shot, one of whom also had his throat cut, but the other, after being slightly wounded, contrived to escape. On his affidavit Judge Titus (a Gentile) caused the arrest of the parties whom he accused of the murders, but they soon afterwards succeeded in escaping from the company of the Mormon marshal, to the judge's annoyance. The wounded man shortly after disappeared, and was never again seen. As a writer remarks, "The Salt Lake police then earned the reputation of affording every desperate prisoner the opportunity of escape, and, if embraced, the officer's ready revolver brought the fugitive to a 'halt,' and saved the country the expense of a trial."

Another writer has remarked: "Others have disappeared in a mysterious way, or have been found shot to death by bullets, or beaten to death by clubs. Mormons have been pointed out to whose charge these murders have been publicly laid, but no one has ever been brought to justice, nor is it believed that the culprits ever receive the punishment they deserve, so long as crimes committed at the instigation of Mormon leaders are regarded as highly meritorious." We shall have to refer to other instances in the course of this narrative.

THE CHILD-LIKE SPIRIT.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for March 10, Mark 9: 33-50; Golden Text, Mark 10: 15.

The Spirit of Jesus Child-like—The Failure of the Disciples—Their Private Question—Child-like Faith Lacking—The Ambition of Men Present—Greatness in Child-likeness—Self-Seeking the Prevalent Sin—John's Significant Question—A Spirit Ruinous to a Church—Rewards for Small Services—Right-Hand Rivals of Christ.

JESUS was essentially a Child—"Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given." (Isa. 9: 6.) Men called Him Master, or Teacher, but He always spoke of Himself as a Son, "the Son of Man." Like a true child, He never acted independently. He said of His Father, "I do always those things which please Him." (John 8: 29.) He always waited for direction, and therefore often said, "Mine hour is not yet come." His whole teaching was but His Father's message; He was the Word, the Message, and the Messenger. "The words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself, but the Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." (John 14: 10.) Again, "The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He seeth the Father do: for what things soever He doeth, these doeth also the Son likewise. I can of Mine own self do nothing; as I hear, I judge, and My judgment is just, because I seek not Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me." (John 5: 19, 30.) In this, as in all else, He says to us, "Follow Me." "Whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."

Jesus had been transfigured on the mountain in the presence of Peter, James, and John; and as He descended from the mountain, He found the remaining nine disciples in the midst of a throng of people, who were gathered round a poor, possessed epileptic, and his father, who had brought his son in vain to the disciples, and they could not cast out the dumb spirit which possessed him. "Bring him unto Me," was the answer of Jesus; not to the disciples, but to Me.

"Why Could Not We cast him out?" said the disciples to Him privately, and He answered them, "This kind cometh not out but by prayer and fasting." (R. V., "by prayer.") Did not the disciples pray? Yes, truly; but they lacked the child-like simplicity which could accept the answer quite irrespective of what and who they were. He came to Capernaum: and being in the house where there was no one to overhear, He put a very personal question to them, "What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?" "They held their peace;" it was the silence of conviction, "for by the way they had disputed among themselves who should be the greatest." No wonder they had been unable to cast out the dumb spirit! Oh how little can poor human nature bear to be exalted! Was it the few words of encouragement which Jesus spoke to Peter, that the devil made use of to rouse in them the desire to be pre-eminent? In any case, it was better, if this spirit was in their hearts, that it should come to the surface, that so it might be dealt with. But oh how small is human nature! Here were saved sinners who deserved nothing but "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord," quarrelling as to which of them should be the greatest! In the presence of Him before whom even Isaiah discovered that he was a man of unclean lips (Isa. 6: 5), before whom the "man greatly beloved" found his comeliness turned to corruption (Dan. 10: 8), and the beloved disciple fell as dead (Rev. 1: 17), how inconceivably small, how microscopic, must be any difference which exists between saved sinners!

The disciples could not answer: they were tongue-tied in the presence of Him who had emptied Himself for their sakes. Oh how loathsome must this self-seeking have been to Him! But Jesus did not despise or treat them with contempt, but quietly sat down, and called them to Him. There are many children of God, who, when they discover anything wrong in themselves, get sulky over it, and give up praying, because they are disappointed with themselves. This is not the child-like spirit. The more we need, the more quickly should we come to Him who alone can supply all our need. It is only pride which leads to hours and hours of bewailing sin. Humility leads us directly into the presence of the Lord, that He may show us the sinfulness of sin, and cleanse and conquer it for us. Jesus taught them, "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all."

The Most Child-like Are The Greatest, because they leave God more room to act. To be something was the temptation into which Eve fell. "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." (Gen. 3: 5.) All the errors of the day have sprung from the desire of earnest Christians to be something, or to do something, more than others; to be more holy, more useful, more self-denying, something out of the common, distinguished for zeal, or holiness, or usefulness. But the more God Himself dawns upon our souls, the more all this kind of thing shrinks back ashamed before Him, and we learn to cry, "Thou only art holy, Thou only art the Lord;" "do with me what Thou wilt, but show how great, how holy, Thou art."

"And He took a child, and set him in the midst of them; and when He had taken him in His arms, He said unto them, Whosoever shall receive one of such children in My name, receiveth Me; and whosoever shall receive Me, receiveth Him that sent Me." As though He would say, It is not your greatness, but My name which commends you; the holiest, the most useful, the most devoted, are only so by grace, and they must be covered by My name; if you have a name for holiness or greatness or usefulness, it can do nothing for you; it is My name which is God's passport—His guarantee. Satan can never fear before your name, but only before Mine; devils will never flee before your holiness, but only before My name. But whoever appreciates the authority of My name, and receives a child or any other in My name, I will own that name of Mine—he receiveth Me. A child does not trouble himself much about the substance of a message which he carries, but the important point is, "Father says this," he comes in his father's name. This is our true position.

One of the disciples (it was John) was convicted that he had not been acting in this spirit, but had rather followed his own ideas. "Master," he said, "we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and

and we forbade him, because he followeth not us." "We are the chosen ones, and he followeth not us; forbid him"—such is the spirit of the Romish Church, such is the spirit of all sectarianism, and wherever, in a church or a mission, such a spirit prevails, there the child-like spirit of Jesus is absent. The child asks, "What does my Father say?" Jesus replied, "Forbid him not, for there is no man that can do a miracle in My name, that can lightly speak evil of Me. For he that is not against us is on our part." "He followeth not us;" what matters this, provided that he does miracles in Christ's name, and not in his own? Oh, what will Jesus say in the day of judgment to those who have forbidden men and women full of the Holy Spirit to preach, and to win souls in the name of Christ? But our Lord goes farther still, and says, "For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in My name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward." That which is truly done in the name of Christ is done with His signature; it carries a divine stamp, and whether it is only the giving of a cup of water, or whether something of greater weight, God will reward it. It is a seed sown, which must bring its harvest. The casting out of devils may or may not be rewarded; perhaps it carries its reward with it, but the doing of the smallest, most ordinary things in the name of Christ shall not lose its reward. The child has not made a name for himself, he is simply one of his father's family; if the child does wrong, it is the parents who are ashamed; if he does well, it is the parents who get the credit. God would have us thus bound up with Him.

"And whosoever shall offend [or scandalize] one of these little ones that believe in Me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea."

Sin Against Children.

Oh how awful it is! The fiendish attempts to undermine their faith in God, to destroy their purity, by forcing upon them impure literature, etc., to instil into their hearts worldly ambition—oh how awful is this sin against believing children! And yet it is continually being perpetrated. "Also in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents," may be said of many a bookseller and news-vender—of many a photographer. And what shall be said of those who make a practice of destroying the purity of boys and girls? God says that the best thing which could happen to them, is that a millstone should be hanged about their neck, and they drowned in the midst of the sea! Yet it is always going on, and unpunished!

"And if thy hand offend thee (or cause thee to offend), cut it off." Lose anything, lose all, rather than sin against God. There are times when things which are harmless in themselves become a snare to us; tastes, such as music, painting, etc. If for a moment they come between us and God, cut them off; they are worthless, except so far as they serve His purpose. It may be a friendship which comes between us and God; if so, cut it off, let anything go, but not Jesus. It may be some work for God which has come between, and the work has become Christ's rival in our hearts; it takes more time, more thought, more of our heart, than Jesus; do not spare it, cut it off, let some one else conduct it. It is better for thee to enter into life maimed, without a hand, or minus some talent, or without the renown of a single work for God, than that that work or talent or power should exalt thy name instead of the Saviour's. Why are so many earnest Christians laid aside? Perhaps it is because there has been too much of their own name, their own right hand, their own talent, in the work, and perhaps no one thinks much better of Jesus through that work. It matters not whether we enter into life maimed, since we are become members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones; the entirety of self has to be destroyed any way. Let us not fear loss, let us not fear anything which makes us less in ourselves; it only makes more room for Him in whom we have a life where neither right hand nor right eye can be severed for ever and ever.

KNOCKING.

Knocking, knocking, who is there?
Waiting, waiting, oh, how fair!
'Tis a pilgrim, strange and kingly,
Never such was seen before,
Ah! my soul, for such a wonder,
Wilt thou not undo the door.

Knocking, knocking, still He's there,
Waiting, waiting, wondrous fair,
But the door is hard to open,
For the weeds and ivy-vine,
With their dark and clinging tendrils,
Ever round the hinges twine.

Knocking, knocking—what, still there?
Waiting, waiting, grand and fair;
Yes, the pierced hand still knocketh,
And beneath the crowned hair
Beam the patient eyes so tender,
Of thy Saviour, waiting there.

MR. A. M. MACKAY, C.E., OF THE UGANDA MISSION.

Reception of Mr. H. M. Stanley by Mtesa, Late King of Uganda, Central Africa.

THE UGANDA MISSION.

LAST week in our news columns a report appeared of another revolution in Uganda. It would appear that the Arab slave-traders, who set up Kiwiwa in succession to his brother Mwanga, found him not so pliant a tool as they expected, and have found it necessary to replace him by a younger brother. Uganda is the chief of two great states on the west and northwest coast of the Victoria Nyanza. Speke discovered it in 1858. In 1875 Mr. H. M. Stanley visited Mtesa, the king. He was received with great honor (as shown in the picture on the preceding page). "The king," says Stanley, "arrived at the lake with unusual state. About 300 of his body-guards were drawn in three rows, flanking a road leading to the Prime-Minister, in whose rear were the great chiefs and warriors of state. On either side, near the lake, crowding in great numbers, were the robed warriors waiting to see the owner of the saucy exploring boat, Lady Alice, and his crew." (A portion of the camp inhabited by the camp-followers may also be seen in the picture.) It was at Mtesa's command that such a stately reception was given to the owner of a small boat, whose only claim to his respect at this time was that he was of European blood, and came to pay him honor. In the interval Mtesa had become a Mohammedan. Stanley persuaded him to become in some sense a Christian, and, on November 15, 1875, his famous letter appeared in the Daily Telegraph, which fired the enthusiasm of the Church Missionary Society. The result was the dispatch in 1876 of a party of eight brave young Christians, equipped for a great experiment in Christian evangelism and civilization.

Mtesa Welcomed the Mission.

but eventually relapsed into his original heathenism. At his death, two years ago, Mwanga, his son, succeeded him. He was only twenty-two years old, and proved a frivolous, weak, cowardly boy, easily led by his favorites, extremely passionate, and capable, under the influence of fear or anger, of almost unheard of cruelty. He signalized his accession to power by the atrocious murder of Bishop Hannington, and it was his hope to destroy in a week all the converts the missionaries had made in successful years of labor.

The heroism and fortitude with which scores of native Christians, many of them mere children, met death at the stake, is hardly surpassed in the annals of martyrdom. Not one of them recanted, even when told that their lives would be spared if they abjured the Christian's faith. "Can you read?" was the question the King usually asked the converts when they were brought before him. "Yes," replied all who had been taught in the native schools. "I'll have no readers in Uganda!" the King would shout, as he hurried them off to be chained to trees and burned. In a single day seventy men thus met their fate, and the head executioner told the King he had never seen men die so bravely. The bloodthirsty King merely laughed, and remarked that God did not seem able to rescue the Christians from his power.

Mwanga's cruelties eventually caused a panic among his own guards, who deposed him and, at the suggestion of the Arabs, made Kiwiwa his successor. Kiwiwa did not reign long enough to show his spirit, and nothing has yet been reported of his successor. It is to be feared, however, that as the Arabs support him he will be an enemy to Christian missions.

THE REV. DR. KRAPF.

Pioneer Explorer in Central Africa.

JOHN LUDWIG KRAPF, who has the honor of being the pioneer missionary of Mombasa, and its vicinity, was a German. He was born at Derendingen, near Tübingen, Germany, on January 11, 1810, and died in Kornthal, Wurtemberg, on November 26, 1881, at the age of seventy-one. His father was a farmer, and young Krapf might never have moved from the common round of rural life had not a lady who accidentally made his sister's acquaintance, advised that he should be sent to the grammar-school at Tübingen, with a view to study for the Church. Poring over an atlas, he wondered why so few places were marked in the Adal and Somali countries of Eastern Africa, and said to himself, "Is there, then, so great a desert yonder, still untrodden by the foot of any European?"

An Ambition for Exploration

seized upon him, and he determined that by some means he would make his way into that unknown land. He was then in his thirteenth year, and in the discussions that ensued at home respecting his future calling, he raised objections both to the clerical and to the legal and medical professions, which were suggested to him, and expressed a wish to go to sea, and so perhaps gain opportunities of exploring foreign lands. Meanwhile he continued his studies assiduously, and became a good Latin and Greek scholar, besides learning French and Italian. It was in his fifteenth year that the call came which he afterwards so nobly obeyed. The rector of the school read an essay to his pupils on Missions to the Heathen, of which Krapf now heard for the first time. Instantly the question sprang up in his mind,

"Why Not Become a Missionary, and go and convert the heathen?" At that time he regarded mission work as only a means to an end. He had no idea that anything beyond an intellectual knowledge of the rudiments of theology was necessary to fit him for a missionary's work. But he persevered in his desire, and in the Easter holidays of 1825 he made his way to Basle, to consult the veteran Director Blumhardt, then at the head of the well-known Missionary Seminary. "The Director," says Krapf, "kindly recognized my zeal, but pointed out to me the first requisite for the calling of an evangelist, the renewal of the heart, as still wanting." However, he remained a week at the Institution, "and here it was," he says, "that for the first time in my life I became acquainted with true Christians, who upon their knees prayed beside me." Though no marked epoch of conversion could be pointed to, the time quickly came when the keen insight of Director Blumhardt was fully satisfied that "the first requisite for the calling of an evangelist" was no longer wanting, and in the year 1827 Krapf

Entered the Missionary Seminary

as a student. Here he remained two years, and on November 1, 1836, he was accepted as a missionary, and appointed to Syria. Just then, however, news arrived of the death of a young missionary, Mr. Knoth, also from Basle, who had lately been sent out to the Abyssinia Mission. This was the sphere to which Krapf desired to go, and on making his wish to succeed Knoth known, his destination was changed, at Blumhardt's suggestion, to Abyssinia, and on February 6, 1837, the ardent young missionary left Basle for Marseilles, whence he sailed for Malta. There he had to take another ship for Alexandria. Thence he travelled to Cairo, where he remained five months with the Church Missionary Society's missionaries, Kruse and Lieder, studying colloquial Arabic. He then proceeded to Suez, where he took passage in an Arab vessel for Jeddah, which place he reached in twenty-two days. In another Arab craft he crossed over to Massowah, then, as now, the chief seaport of Abyssinia, which he reached in December, 1837. After some experience of the usual difficulties of African travel, Krapf succeeded in joining the missionaries, C. W. Isenberg and C. H. Blumhardt, at Adowa, the capital of Tigre; but after a stay of only a month or two, he and his brethren were summarily expelled at the instance of two Roman Catholic priests, who persuaded the prince Ubie that they were more in accord with Abyssinian customs than the Protestant missionaries. Krapf

Resolved to Go to Shoa,

a kingdom lying south of Abyssinia; but severe illness compelled him to return to Cairo, and it was not till the early spring of 1839 that he and Isenberg reached Tajurra, the landing-place for Shoa, nearly opposite Aden. A month's journey through the desert of Adal brought them to the highlands of Shoa, and on June 3 they arrived at Ankober, the capital, where they had a friendly reception from the king, Sahela Selassie; but, like another African potentate of more recent times, he informed them that he did not want spiritual teachers, but masons, smiths, and especially gun-makers. Shortly afterward the Church Missionary Society, after mature deliberation, judged it to be advisable to bring their Abyssinian Mission to a close.

Krapf waited at Aden for further instructions from the Missionary Committee, and urged them to allow him to go southward, with a view to reach the Gallas. On November 11, 1843, he and his wife (for he had married Rosine Dietrich, a lady of Basle, formerly betrothed to another German missionary, who had died) set sail for Zanzibar. Three days afterward a furious storm was encountered; the frail Arab craft sprang leak: as the only chance of saving their lives, the captain determined to put back toward Aden. When actually in sight of harbor the wind changed, and drove the now water-logged vessel out to sea; but, providentially just before she capsized. Then they embarked on another vessel, the captain of which was a Suahili from Mombasa, who was going to take his ship from port to port along the East African coast to that place. Krapf always regarded the disaster to the first ship as no less providential than his escape. Had it not occurred, he would probably have gone straight to Zanzibar, and might never have visited Mombasa at all—which would entirely have altered the whole history of African geographical and missionary enterprise. He

on January 3, 1844, and there, after a visit to Zanzibar, he settled in the following May, armed with a letter from Seyyid Said, the Sultan, which commended him to governors and people as "a good man who wishes to convert the world to God." Within two months of his settlement at Mombasa, Krapf buried on the opposite mainland his wife and infant child. He could not foresee that close to the very spot where he laid their precious dust would rise, thirty years afterwards, the station of Frere Town. Yet his faith did see in their grave a pledge of future triumphs, the first dead which every successful mission appears to demand for its foundation. He wrote home a message which has become as familiar as a household word in missionary circles: "Tell our friends that there is, on the East African coast, a lonely grave of a member of the Mission cause connected with your Society. That is a sign that you have commenced the struggle with this part of the world; and as the victories of the Church are gained by stepping over the graves, and death of many of her members, you may be the more convinced that the hour is at hand when you are summoned to the conversion of Africa from its eastern shore."

In 1846 Krapf was joined by John Rebmann, and together they established the mission station of Kisutini, in the Rabai district, fifteen miles inland; and then began the remarkable series of prolonged and perilous journeys with which opens the history of East and Central African Exploration.

Influenced by Krapf's enthusiasm, the Church Missionary Society now formed large plans for the invasion of Central Africa in the name of the Lord; and in 1851 the initial attempt was made. But the men sent out soon died or returned home ill; and Krapf, who ultimately started alone, and reached far into Ukamba, was deserted by his native followers, found himself a starving fugitive in a hostile country, and only regained the coast after extraordinary adventures and much suffering. In 1855 he and though he twice went again to Africa on temporary missions, the great work of his later years was the preparation of a work on the language of the country from the information he had gained, so that future missionaries might be prepared before going out to speak to the people in their own tongue. It was done in his quiet home at Kornthal, in Wurtemberg, where he died, like Livingstone, on his knees.

Returned to Europe,

MR. A. M. MACKAY.

The Uganda Heroic Missionary.

FEW names of missionaries have been so familiar of late to newspaper readers as that of the hero whose portrait appears on the preceding page. His graphic and earnest letters respecting the death of Bishop Hannington, and the events which have followed it, have been quoted freely by the secular press, and have given us the only clear light we have had of the doings of Mwanga, King of Uganda, the murderer of the Bishop and of his own Christian subjects. He held Mr. Mackay for many months as a hostage, openly avowing his intention of killing him off-hand if the English Government attempted to revenge Hannington's death. Mr. Alexander M. Mackay is of eight missionaries who in 1876 went to Uganda and its vicinity, to preach the gospel. He is the only one of the eight now left, the others having either been murdered, died of disease, or returned home with health hopelessly ruined by the climate. The heroic survivor is now at Usamiro, waiting with unabated courage opportunity to return to his post. He is one of the devoted men who, though trained for a learned profession—that of civil engineer—sacrificed his prospects of wealth and honor to go out to Africa to spread the knowledge of Christ among the heathen. How he managed to propitiate the savage young king and keep his head on his shoulders, it is difficult to understand; but it could only have been done through the power of God directly interposing for his protection.

Mr. Mackay's Tact.

in conciliating the King, whose hatred and jealousy of foreigners are stimulated by the Arabs, is remarkable. One description of an interview with the King may serve as an illustration. The Arabs had tried to represent Mackay as introducing a foreign language, and teaching the people to read it; whereupon the King summoned Mackay before him, to meet the Arabs, the King questioning them as to who could read best. "I interposed (writes Mr. Mackay), that, seeing we were all Baganda here, and not subjects of either Zanzibar or Muscat, it were best that we should read Luganda instead of Arabic. 'I read Luganda,' I said, 'because it is the language of the king, and here I am his subject; while, if I were in Muscat, I would learn to speak and read Arabic.' Ali bin Sultan asked if he was not one of Mwanga's people; I replied that when he got all his ivory he would be out of Baganda as soon as he could. This caused some merriment, but the Arab would not be outdone. 'I am more a Muganda than you,' said he, 'my wives are all Baganda.' 'But you do not teach them to read Arabic,' I replied; 'women in your eyes have no souls, and are only chattels, while we teach women as well as men.'" as well as the heroic Christian spirit in which they were met, may be inferred from the following extract from a letter which he wrote to his father in 1887, while still in Uganda: "I have not the least doubt that, to a very great extent, we owe our preservation to the believing prayers of Christian friends who take an interest in the progress of the Gospel in East Africa. I can give you more than one striking proof of this assertion. Very recently the King gave out that he meant to have another grand massacre of the Christians. But the prayers of God's people restrained him from his purpose, and that, too, by a marvellous intervention. His mother heard of his fell purpose, and sent to advise him not to kill his best friends in the country. I believe also that the two biggest chiefs ventured to remonstrate with him, and recommended him to let alone the Christians, who had been guilty of no crime. Thus, for the present, we are delivered from another spell of dread and horror. Still, one lad has been secretly murdered, and several others had to flee for their lives, executioners having been sent for their arrest.

The Perils Around Him.

"The converts are now more on the alert, and are ready to flee on the first suspicion. One can only wish they had any quarter to flee to, for this miserable country has made enemies of all its neighbors, and therefore the persecuted Christians have little hope of finding shelter anywhere. On the south is the impassable barrier of Lake Nyanza; east is the Nile, issuing out of the lake, with cruel enemies beyond; north is a country constantly at war with Buganda; west is the river Katonga, seldom fordable, and such fords as there are are perpetually guarded. Notwithstanding all this, a few have risked their lives and have finally left the country, while the greater part of those in hiding manage to secrete themselves in remote parts of the kingdom. There is no little risk, however, in that, as the natives are continually travelling about in all directions within the limits of the country, and refugees may thus be detected and caught any day. One lad, sitting by me now, was thus detected recently. He at once fled, and his enemy went after him. He had nearly escaped, but, seeing this, his pursuer speared him in the back of the leg and took him prisoner. Being sure of being condemned to death when brought to the capital, he contrived to break his bonds, and escape."

Mackay finally was ordered to quit Uganda, and realizing that no further hope remained of doing good there, he promptly obeyed, being well aware that, if he remained, his own life would be sacrificed to no useful purpose. He evidently, however, has not abandoned hope of winning Uganda for Christ, and his position at Usamiro has been avowedly taken up in the hope of returning when circumstances are propitious. A man so brave and so appreciative of the prayers of Christians, deserves that every child of God should continue to pray for his preservation and success.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Lord's Vassal.—Mr. Hamilton Relates: "In the days of King John of England the dignity of the English Crown was brought to its lowest. King John submitting to the Pope as a vassal, and before the Pope's legate, taking off his crown he handed it over to the legate, who took it, put it down for a moment to show his possession of it, then handed it back to John to be held by him as a vassal of Rome. But this incident illustrates how we Christians can die to ourselves, yet be living for Christ. We take our life in our hands, and hand it over to God. But see, He lifts it again and holds it out toward us, saying, 'Take this life and use it for Me, as My vassal, My servant.'"

A Bonfire in the Kitchen.—Mr. Hutchieson says: "In a town where I was holding a mission, I noticed, on the opening night, a young servant girl, who seemed much impressed. I found that she was very greatly concerned because she seemed to have lost all taste for the Bible. She had no appetite for the Bread of Life, but she had a most voracious appetite for light reading—novels, novelettes, and weekly periodicals of the most trashy kind, reading them night and day. 'How,' I said, 'can you expect to enjoy reading the Bible if you are constantly reading that trash? It is just as if, after eating all manner of unwholesome sweetmeats and confections, you are surprised to find you have no appetite for good food. Would you blame the food? No. It is your own fault. Stop eating the nauseous trash, and soon you will be able to enjoy plain, wholesome meat.' About a week afterwards, when I was in another town, I got a letter from her saying she had a fine bonfire in the kitchen, having burned a whole box-full of that pernicious literature, and her old love for God's Word had returned to her. How much evil has frivolous literature to answer for, from the errand boy to the pale, sentimental young lady who lounges on the sofa with the latest love-story from the circulating library!"

"National Judgments."—"I Have Read, in a sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, some reminiscences which are instructive. The Pastor says: 'National Judgments are frequently a ministry of grace. The first year in which I came to London, I was greatly struck with the access one had, at all hours of day and night, to people's houses, into which no ministers of Christ had ever been welcomed before. I remember, at 2 o'clock one Monday morning, I was in a house, now pulled down, close to London Bridge, to see a man who had spent the Sunday at Brighton, and had come home to die with the cholera. Yes, they sent for me at dead of night often and often then; and rich and poor—it mattered not, if they found some one willing to come and visit them—were eager for you to read and pray with them; for death was all around us, making havoc in these streets. They are not so eager for a visit now. So far, cholera did arouse our neighbors, and they flocked to hear the Word out of very fear. So much of benefit there may be in the plagues which are shot from the quiver of Providence.'"

How Sandy was Converted.—Mr. D. Mc-Lauchlan observes: "Dr. Metts was once preaching at Inverness. The congregation was already gathered, and he was about to enter the pulpit, when word was brought to him that an aged Highlander, who had been converted at sixty and was now eighty, lay dying. The doctor had often wished to hear the story of this man's conversion from his own lips, and now was his last opportunity. The man lived close at hand, but here were over one thousand people waiting to hear the Word of God. There were still two or three minutes to spare, and Dr. Metts determined to visit the aged pilgrim. Going in to the Highlander's house, he said, as he pulled out his watch, 'I have just four minutes; do you think you could tell me in that time how you were converted?' 'Oh,' was the cheerful response, 'I can tell you in two. I became anxious about my soul when I was sixty years of age, and the Lord Jesus Christ came along, and said to me, 'Sandy, I'll exchange you.' 'Exchange, Sandy! and what did you give Him?' he asked. And Sandy replied, 'I gave Him all the years of my sin, and my sinful heart, and He gave me in return His righteousness.'"

A Revival in the Forecastle.—"A Vessel bound for Lisbon had a crew of eight men, two of whom were professors of religion. One of these two was active and earnest in his efforts to promote the spiritual good of his shipmates. The other, till near the end of the voyage, was not known as a Christian, and lived apparently as careless as any on board. At length it pleased God to bless the labors of the former by awakening the attention of three or four of the men to the concerns of eternity. Prayer-meetings were held morning and evening in the fore-castle, which all the crew who could be spared were invited to attend. The conscience of the backslider was smitten, and, having declared that he was a member of the Church, he offered to assist his more faithful brother in the devotional services. To this, objection was at once made by a young sailor, who said, 'I cannot hear him pray for me. His life does not pray. Let him first repent of his unfaithfulness, and confess to God and his shipmates, and then we will hear him.' The rebuke was felt, and for a time it produced anger rather than humiliation; but eventually he returned to God as a true penitent, and realized it to be the joy of his life to exalt the Saviour by telling out the story of His love."

THE LITERATURE OF THE DUST.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 17, 1889.

"Jesus stooped down and . . . wrote on the ground." John 8: 6.

The Magnificent Scene of the Trouble—The Culprit Presented Before Jesus—Christ Writing in the Dust—The Only Recorded Instance of His Writing—Had to Stoop Down—The Attitude of His Life—Descent From the Third Heaven—Still Stooping Down—His Writing in the Seasons—In Nature—The Mirrored Fresco—What Christ Wrote in the Dust—Two Words Probable—The Opposite of the World's Principle—A Legend of a Dead Dog—Foreign Vice Welcomed in American Society—The Most Tremendous of all Literature—The Volumes of Human Dust to be Rebound—A Widow's Candle.

A MOHAMMEDAN mosque stands now where once stood Herod's temple, the scene of my text. Solomon's temple had stood there, but Nebuchadnezzar thundered it down. Zerubbabel's temple had stood there, but that had been prostrated. Now we take our places in a temple that Herod built, because he was fond of great architecture, and he wanted the preceding temples to seem insignificant. Put eight or ten modern cathedrals together and they would not equal that structure. It covered nineteen acres. There were marble pillars supporting roofs of cedar, and silver tables on which stood golden cups, and there were carvings exquisite and inscriptions resplendent, glittering balustrades and ornamented gateways. The building of this temple kept ten thousand workmen busy forty-six years. In that stupendous pile of pomp and magnificence sat Christ, and a listening throng stood about Him, when took place. A group of men are pulling and pushing along a woman who had committed the worst crime against society. When they have brought her in front of Christ, they ask that He sentence her to death by stoning. They are a critical, merciless, disingenuous crowd. They want to get Christ into controversy and public reprehension. If He say "Let her die," they will charge Him with cruelty. If He let her go, they will charge Him with being in complicity with wickedness. Whichever way He does, they would howl at Him. Then occurs a scene which has not been sufficiently regarded. He leaves the lounge or bench on which He was sitting and goes down on one knee, or both knees, and with the forefinger of His right hand He begins of the floor, word after word. But they were not to be diverted or hindered. They kept on demanding that He settle this case of transgression, until He looked up and told them that they might themselves begin the woman's assassination, if the complainant who had never done anything wrong himself would open the fire. "Go ahead, but be sure that the man who flings the first missile is immaculate." Then He resumed writing with his finger in the dust of the floor, word after word. Instead of looking over his shoulder to see what He had written the scoundrels skulked away. Finally, the whole place is clear of pursuers, antagonists and plaintiffs, and when Christ has finished this strange chirography in the dust, He looks up and finds the woman all alone. The prisoner is the only one of the court room left, the judges, the police, the prosecuting attorneys having cleared out. Christ is victor, and He says to the woman: "Where are the prosecutors in this case? Are they all gone? Then I discharge you; go, and sin no more." I have wondered on the ground. For do you realize that is the only time that He ever wrote at all? I know that Eusebius says that Christ once wrote a letter to Abgarus, the king of Edessa, but there is no good evidence of such a correspondence. The wisest being the world ever saw, and the one who had more to say than any one who ever lived, never writing a book or a chapter or a page or a paragraph or a word on parchment. Nothing but the literature of the dust, and one sweep of a brush or one breath of a wind obliterated that forever. Among all the rolls of the volumes of the first library founded at Thebes there was not one scroll of Christ. Among the seven hundred thousand books of the Alexandrian library, which by the infamous decree of Caliph Omar were used as fuel to heat the four thousand baths of the city, not one sentence had Christ penned. Among all the infinitude of volumes now standing in the libraries of Edinburgh, the British Museum, or Berlin or Vienna, or the learned repositories of all nations, not one word written directly by the finger of Christ. All that He ever wrote He wrote in dust, uncertain, shifting dust.

To Write in the Dust

My text says He stooped down and wrote on the ground. Standing straight up a man might write on the ground with a staff, but if with his fingers he would write in the dust, he must bend clear over. Aye, he must get at least on one knee or he cannot write on the ground. Be not surprised that

He Stooped Down

His whole life was a stooping down. Stooping down from castle to barn. Stooping down from celestial homage to mobocratic jeer. From residence above the stars to where a star had to fall to designate his landing-place. From heaven's front door to the world's back gate. From writing in round and silvered letters of constellation and galaxy on the blue scroll of heaven, to writing on the ground in the dust, which the feet of the crowd had left in Herod's temple. If in January you have ever stepped out of a prince's conservatory that had Mexican cactus and magnolias in full bloom, into the outside air ten degrees below zero, you may get some idea of Christ's change of atmosphere from celestial to terrestrial. How many heavens there are I know not, but there are at least three, for Paul was "caught up into the third heaven." Christ came to the second heaven, and down from second heaven to first heaven, down swifter than meteors ever fell, down amidst stellar splendors that himself eclipsed, down through clouds, through atmospheres, through appalling space, down to where there was no lower depth. From being waited on at the banquet of the skies, to the broiling of fish for his own breakfast, on the banks of the lake. From emblazoned chariots of eternity to the saddle of a mule's back. The homage cherubic, seraphic, archangelic, to the paying of sixty-two and a half cents of tax to Cæsar. From the deathless country to a tomb built to hide human dissolution. The uplifted wave of Galilee was high, but he had to come down before, with His feet, he could touch it, and the whirlwind that rose above the billow was higher yet, but He had to come down before with His lip he could kiss it into quiet. Bethlehem a stooping down. Nazareth a stooping down. Death between two burglars a stooping down. Yes, it was in consonance with humiliations that had gone before, and with self abnegations that came after, when on that memorable day in Herod's temple He stooped down and wrote on the ground.

Whether the words He was writing were in Greek or Latin or Hebrew, I cannot say, for He knew all those languages. But

and with His finger writing on the ground; in the winter in letters of crystals, in the spring in letters of flowers, in summer in golden letters of harvest, in autumn in letters of fire on fallen leaves. How it would sweeten up and enrich and emblazon this world, could we see Christ's caligraphy all over it. This world was not flung out into space thousands of years ago, and then left to look out for itself. It is still under the divine care. Christ never for a half second takes His hand off of it, or it would soon be a shipwrecked world, a defunct world, an obsolete world, an abandoned world, a dead world. "Let there be light," was said at the beginning. And Christ stands under the wintry skies and says, Let there be snowflakes to enrich the earth; and under the clouds of spring and says, Come ye blossoms and make redolent the orchards; and in September, dips the branches in the vat of beautiful colors, and swings them into the hazy air. No whim of mine is this. "Without Him was not anything made that was made." Christ writing on the ground!

If we could see His hand in all the passing seasons, how it would illumine the world! All verdure and foliage would be "allegoric," and again we would hear Him say as of old, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow;" and we would not hear the whistle of a quail or the cawing of a raven or the roundelay of a brown-thresher, without saying, "Behold the fowls of the air, they gather not into barns, yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them;" and a Dominic hen of the barnyard could not cluck for her brood, yet we would hear Christ saying as of old, "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathered her chickens under her wings;" and through the redolent hedges we would hear Christ saying, "I am the rose of Sharon;" we could not dip the seasoning from the salt-cellar without thinking of the divine suggestion, "Ye are the salt of the earth, but if the salt have lost its savor, it is fit for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men."

Let us wake up from our stupidity and take

The Whole World as a Parable.

Then, if with gun and pack of hounds we start off before dawn, and see the morning coming down off the hills to meet us, we would cry out with the evangelist, "The day-spring from on high hath visited us;" or, caught in a snow-storm, while struggling home, eyebrows and beard and apparel all covered with the whirling flakes, we would cry out with David, "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." In a picture-gallery of Europe there is on the ceiling an exquisite fresco, but people having to look straight up, it wearied and dizzied them, and bent their necks almost beyond endurance; so a great looking-glass was put near the floor, and now visitors only need to look easily down into this mirror, and they see the fresco at their feet. And so, much of all the heaven of God's truth is reflected in this world as in a mirror, and the things that are above are copied by things around us.

What right have we to throw away one of God's Bibles, aye, the first Bible He ever gave the race? We talk about the Old Testament and the New Testament, but the oldest Testament contains the lessons of the natural world. Some people like the New Testament so well they discard the Old Testament. Shall we like the New Testament and the Old Testament so well as to depreciate the oldest; namely, that which was written before Moses was put afloat on the boat of leaves which was calked with asphaltum; or reject the Genesis and the Revelation that were written centuries before Adam lost a rib and gained a wife? No, no; when Deity stoops down and writes on the ground, let us read it. I would have no less appreciation of the Bible on paper that comes out of the paper-mill, but I would urge appreciation of the Bible in the sand hill, the Bible in the geranium, the Bible in the asphodel, the Bible in the dust. Some one asked an ancient king whether he had seen the eclipse of the sun. "No," said he, "I have so much to do on earth, I have no time to look at heaven." And if our faculties were all awake in the study of God, we would not have time to go much further than the first grass blade. I have no fear that natural religion will ever contradict what we call revealed religion. I have no sympathy with the followers of Aristotle, who, after the telescope was invented, would not look through it, lest it contradict some of the theories of their great master. I shall be glad to put against one lid of the Bible the microscope, and against the other lid of the Bible the telescope.

But when Christ stooped down and wrote on the ground, what did He write? The Pharisees did not stop to examine. The cowards, whipped of their own consciences, fled pell-mell. Nothing will flay a man like an aroused conscience. Dr. Stevens, in his "History of Methodism," says that when Rev. Benjamin Abbott of olden times was preaching, he exclaimed: "For aught I know there may be a murderer in this house," and a man rose in the assemblage and started for the door, and bawled aloud, confessing to a murder he had committed fifteen years before. And no wonder these Pharisees, reminded of their sins, took to their heels. But what did Christ write on the ground? The Bible does not state. Yet, as Christ never wrote anything except that once, you cannot blame us for wanting to know what He really did write. But I am certain He wrote nothing trivial, or nothing unimportant. And will you allow me to say that I think on the ground? I judge from the circumstances. He might have written other things, but kneeling there in the temple, surrounded by a pack of hypocrites, who were a self-appointed constabulary, and having in His presence a persecuted woman, who evidently was very penitent for her sins, I am sure He wrote two words, both of them graphic and tremendous and reverberating. And the one word was Hypocrisy, and the other word was Forgiveness.

From the way these Pharisees and scribes vacated the premises and got out into the fresh air, as Christ, with just one ironical sentence, unmasked them, I know they were first-class hypocrites. It was then as it is now. The more faults and inconsistencies people have of their own, the more severe and censorious are they about the faults of others. Here they are—twenty stout men arresting and arraigning one weak woman! Magnificent business to be engaged in! They wanted the fun of seeing her faint away under a heavy judicial sentence from Christ, and then, after she had been taken outside the city and fastened at the foot of a precipice, the Scribes and Pharisees wanted the satisfaction of each coming and dropping a big stone on her head, for that was the style of capital punishment that they asked for. Some people have taken the responsibility of saying that Christ never laughed. But I think as he saw those men drop everything, chagrined, mortified, exposed, and go out quicker than they came in,

He Must Have Laughed.

At any rate, it makes me laugh to read of it. All of these libertines, dramatizing indignation against impurity! Blind bats lecturing on optics! A flock of crows on their way up from a carcass, denouncing carrion! Yes, I think that one word written on the ground that day by the finger of Christ was the awful word Hypocrisy. But I am sure there was another word in that dust. From her entire manner I am sure that arraigned woman was repentant. She made no apology, and Christ in no wise belittled her sin. But her supplicatory behavior and her tears moved Him, and when He stooped down to write on the ground, He wrote that mighty, that imperial word Forgiveness.

When on Sinai God wrote the law, He wrote it with finger of lightning on tables of stone, each word cut as by a chisel into the hard granite surface. But when He writes the offence of this woman He writes it in dust so that it can be easily rubbed out; and when she repents of it, oh, He was a merciful Christ! I was reading of that is told in the far east about Him. He was walking through the streets of a city and He saw a crowd around a dead dog. And one man said: "What a loathsome object is that dog!" "Yes," said another, "his ears are mauled and bleeding." "Yes," said another, "even his hide would not be of any use to the tanner." "Yes," said another, "the odor of his carcass is dreadful." Then Christ, standing there, said: "But pearls cannot equal the whiteness of his teeth." Then the people, moved by the idea that any one could find anything pleasant concerning a dead dog, said: "Why, this must be Jesus of Nazareth!" Reproved and convicted, they went away. Surely this legend of Christ is good enough to be true. Kindness in all His words and ways and habits. Forgiveness! Word of eleven letters, and some of them thrones, and some of them palm branches. Better have Christ write close to our names that one word, though He write it in dust, than to have our name cut into monumental granite with the letters that the storms of a thousand years cannot obliterate. Bishop Babington had a book of only three leaves. The first leaf was black, the second leaf red, the third leaf white. The black leaf suggested sin; the red leaf atonement; the white leaf purification. That is the whole story. God will abundantly pardon.

Sympathy With the Penitent.

I must not forget to say that as Christ, stooping down, with His finger wrote on the ground, it is evident that His sympathies are with this penitent woman, and that He has no sympathy with her hypocritical pursuers. Just opposite to that is the world's habit. Why didn't these unclean Pharisees bring one of their own number to Christ for excoriation and capital punishment? No, no; they overlook that in a man which they damnate in a woman. And so the world has had for offending women scourges and objugation, and for just one offence she becomes an outcast, while for men whose lives have been sodomic for twenty years, the world swings open its doors of brilliant welcome; and they may sit in legislatures and senates and parliaments, or on thrones. Unlike the Christ of my text, the world writes a man's misdemeanor in dust, but chisels a woman's offence with great capitals upon ineffaceable marble.

For foreign lords and princes, whose names cannot even be mentioned in respectable circles abroad because they are walking lazaretos of abomination, our American princesses of fortune wait, and at the first beck sail out with them into the blackness of darkness forever. And in what are called higher circles of society there is now not only the imitation of foreign dress and foreign manners, but an imitation of foreign dissoluteness. I like an Englishman, and I like an American, but the sickest creature on earth is an American playing the Englishman. Society needs to be reconstructed on this subject. Treat them alike, masculine crime and feminine crime. If you cut the one in granite, cut them both in granite. If you write the one in dust, write the other in dust. No, no, says the world; let woman go down, and let man go up. What is that I hear plashing into the East River at midnight? and then there is a gurgle as of strangulation, and all is still. Never mind. It is only a woman too discouraged to live. Let the mills of the cruel world grind right on.

But while I speak of Christ of the text, His stooping down writing in the dust, do not think I underrate the literature of the dust. It is the Most Tremendous of all Literature.

It is the greatest of all libraries. When Layard exhumed Nineveh he was only opening the door of its mighty dust. The excavations of Pompeii have only been the unclasping of the lids of a volume of a nation's dust. When Admiral Farragut and his friends, a few years ago, visited that resurrected city, the house of Balbo, who had been one of its chief citizens in its prosperous days, was opened, and a table was spread in that house which eighteen hundred and ten years has been buried by volcanic eruption, and Farragut and his guests walked over the exquisite mosaics and under the beautiful fresco, and it almost seemed like being entertained by those who eighteen centuries ago had turned to dust. Oh this mighty literature of the dust! Where are the remains of Sennacherib and Attila and Epaminondas and Tamerlane and Trojan and Philip of Macedon and Julius Cæsar? Dust! Where are the heroes who fought on both sides at Chæronea, at Hastings, at Marathon, at Cressy, of the 110,000 men who fought at Agincourt, of the 250,000 men who faced death at Jena, of the 400,000 whose armor glittered in the sun at Wagram, of the 1,000,000 men under Darius at Arbella, of the 2,641,000 men under Xerxes at Thermopylæ? Dust!

Where are the guests who danced the floors of the Alhambra or the Persian palaces of Ahasuerus? Dust! Where are the musicians who played, and the orators who spoke, and the sculptors who chiseled, and the architects who built, in all the centuries except our own? Dust! The greatest library of the world, that which has the widest shelves and the longest aisles and the most multitudinous volumes and the vastest wealth, is

The Underground Library.

It is the royal library, the continental library, the hemispheric library, the planetary library, the library of the dust. And all these library cases will be opened, and all these scrolls unrolled, and all these volumes unclasped; and as easily as in your library or mine we take up a book, blow the dust off of it, and turn over its pages, so easily will the Lord of the Resurrection pick up out of this library of dust every volume of human life, and open it and read it and display it. And the volume will be rebound, to be set in the royal library of the King's palace, or in the prison library of the self-degraded. Oh this mighty literature of the dust! It is not so wonderful, after all, that Christ chose, instead of an inkstand, the impressionable sand on the floor of an ancient temple, and, instead of a hard pen, put forth his forefinger, with the same kind of nerve and muscle and bone and flesh as that which makes up our own forefinger, and wrote the awful doom of hypocrisy, and full and complete forgiveness for repentant sinners, even the worst.

And now I can believe that which I read, how that a mother kept burning

every night for ten years, and one night, very late, a poor waif of the street entered. The aged woman said to her, "Sit down by the fire," and the stranger said, "Why do you keep that light in the window?" The aged woman said: "That is to light my wayward daughter when she returns. Since she went away, ten years ago, my hair has turned white. Folks blame me for worrying about her, but you see I am her mother, and sometimes, half a dozen times a night, I open the door and look out into the darkness and cry, 'Lizzie!' 'Lizzie!' But I must not tell you any more about my trouble, for I guess, from the way you cry, you have trouble enough of your own. Why, how cold and sick you seem! Oh, my! can it be? Yes, you are Lizzie, my own lost child! Thank God that you are home again!" And what a time of rejoicing there was in that house that night! And Christ again stooped down, and in the ashes of that hearth, now lighted up, not more by the great blazing logs than by the joy of a reunited household, wrote the same liberating words that He had written more than eighteen hundred years ago in the dust of the Jerusalem temple. Forgiveness! A word broad enough and high enough to let pass through it all the armies of heaven, a million abreast, on white horses, nostril to nostril, flank to flank.

AN INVITATION IN A SHOE.

A MEMBER of the N. W. Branch of the Y. M. C. A., of Philadelphia, kindly sends us a deeply interesting letter recently received from a sailor on board the schooner Edward Stewart, off Matanzas, Cuba. It appears that the sailor, when in Philadelphia a few months ago, bought a pair of shoes. When he opened his parcel, he found that the Christian young clerk who had waited on him had put in one of the shoes an invitation to the Young Men's Christian Association. The sailor accepted the invitation, and continued to come while staying in port. At one of the meetings he was converted. He went on a voyage to Cuba in December last, and, while waiting at Matanzas, wrote to his friend: "I have been very near the Valley of the Shadow of Death since I saw you; but the Master comforted me, and I felt that all was well. As the days pass I find that His word is being revealed to me in a wonderful manner. . . . I have lived so long in my own strength, feeling that an upright life was good enough for me, and that I was safe, that, now that I have a new view of my condition, and am trying to serve God, I feel I am only just beginning to live—all my former years are waste and loss. To be without assurance of the love of Jesus now, would be to lose all peace and happiness.

"There are no gospel helps at sea, no social meetings to strengthen me, but God is keeping me safe. Nothing but His love could do it in my position. God has opened a way for me to hold a little meeting daily on board. It was interrupted by my illness, but I hope to resume it now that I am better. It is only among the crew, and we have it every night at 8 o'clock. I have been much blessed in it. Do not forget to pray for me; I feel that the power of your prayers reaches me. I feel daily that some of you are praying for me, and it cheers me to feel this. Pray for this service, too, dear brother. I am the only one on the ship to do any work for the Lord."

A JEWISH LADY'S STORY.

THE following is an extract from a communication which Dr. Cullis, of Boston, publishes in his Times of Refreshing. It comes from a Jewish lady who has been led by sorrow to find in Jesus of Nazareth her Saviour:

I landed in Australia upon a Sunday evening, and when I arrived at my destination I found a party assembled, and joined with all my heart in the mirth around me. For twelve months I went into every kind of gaiety Melbourne afforded—dress, balls, the opera; in fact, pleasure of every kind seemed my one thought. About this time I met a gentleman to whom I became deeply attached; and although our affection was mutual, the thought of marriage I could not entertain, as, he being a Christian, and I heart and soul a Jewess, it seemed out of the question. However, time wore on, and I at last consented to marry him, though I knew it would involve the leaving all who were dear to me, and that it would bring a stigma upon my family. Before we were married I exacted a promise from my husband that he would never use any arguments to make me believe, as I was determined to live and die a Jewess. I will not dwell upon my married life; my husband was all in all to me—I wanted nothing more. God blessed us with two dear little children, and He who gave them me only knows the agony of mind I endured in the thought, "How shall I teach these little ones what I do not believe myself?" for I had made up my mind, simply out of love to my husband, that they should be brought up in their father's faith.

And now there came a time of trial that I must pass over as quickly as possible. By a sudden stroke my beloved husband was taken from me in a few days. So terribly sudden was the blow that I could hardly realize that he had gone forever; and oh, what a gulf separated us!—it seemed to me impassable. I knew he had died in the faith of Jesus, and I—I was as far off being a Christian as the first day I met him. I was very bitter and hard in my grief, and felt that God had dealt cruelly in crushing me so, taking all the youth and brightness out of my life. It seemed impossible to live, and I felt nothing but the desire to be with my loved one again. Many a day have I laid on his grave in the damp, and prayed that God would take me; but God, "while I was yet a long way off," took compassion, and raised up dear friends, who showed me that only in one way could I ever hope to see my husband again.

The desire to be a Christian now became so intense as to become part of my life. No half-heartedness about it now. I began to seek the Lord with all my might. "When ye seek Me with your whole heart, ye shall find Me," is a promise I have proved. One day I was reading the old story, when something whispered to my soul, "He suffered all this for you," and the truth seemed to burst upon me like a flash of lightning. I had found the Saviour, my Saviour, and such a flood of love as came into my heart for Him I cannot describe. I went into my room, and on my knees I sobbed aloud, not for sorrow but for joy.

A SCARED OFFICER'S VOW.

LAST August a Nova Scotian officer of a schooner lying in Fernandina, Florida, was daily exposed to the yellow fever. One night, after fumigating the vessel, he felt ill, and thinking the dreaded epidemic had attacked him, went to his room, knelt down, and prayed God to keep him from the fever, forgive his sins, and he would serve Him.

From that time he lived in fear of punishment continually, for he had not given up his sins, but made resolves to do so. Gradually, he began to take God's name in vain, and his life was the same as before. This state of things continued until, one evening last week, he came to the Mariners' Reading-room in New York, and there God met him and opened his eyes.

He says: "I was sorry over my broken promises, and at night would pray for forgiveness, and the next morning would commence another day of sin and wickedness. This would have continued all my life if God had not shown me how weak I was, and how little I could do with my own will. But one night, through the grace and goodness of God, a lady in the Seamen's Church showed me how impossible it was for me to do anything with my own strength, and so I just gave myself to God, and prayed for the gift of His Holy Spirit to guide and direct me in everything. 'Lord, I give myself to Thee; 'tis all that I can do,' was my prayer. I know God answered. I am saved, and happy in the knowledge that He will never forsake me."

A GERMAN SCEPTIC SAVED.

A WORKER at a seaman's mission in New York in the course of her work among the sailors met with a steward with whom she had several conversations, and ultimately, finding him receptive, she gave him a New Testament. He told her that he had studied in Germany for one of the learned professions, but had failed in his examinations. He became a pronounced sceptic, and conceived a disgust for religion and home life. Finally he quarrelled with his parents, and ran away to sea. For many years he never communicated with his father, and led a wild life afloat and ashore. A few weeks ago she received a letter from him, dated Shanghai, China, in which he says: "I write to thank you from the depths of a grateful heart. I have read and re-read the Testament which you gave me, and I have turned up my Greek Testament and worked on that. Your advice was good, and I have taken it about what I do not understand: I do as you said, trust Jesus for it. I have come to the conclusion that a religion without a mystery would be like a temple without a God. The known is only the little page out of the unknown. There is not a flower by the wayside nor a mineral on the earth, there is not a drop of water nor an atom of light, not a flash of lightning nor a peal of thunder, that is not shrouded in mystery. So I think, what a fool

I have been, and not trusted our Lord Jesus Christ, and prayed that He would enlighten me in what I could not solve. May the Lord have pity on me! is my daily prayer. I followed your advice, and wrote to my father, and made peace with him after eleven years."

A SWISS ATHEIST CONVINCED.

IN an address delivered at Bethshan recently and published in Thy Healer,* Miss Blundell, from Switzerland, described several cases of Divine healing which had occurred there—among them of a little girl whose lower limbs were diseased. She said: The little girl was carried in a cart from one village to another to our dear Swiss pastor, whom the Lord much blessed. She believed that Christ would heal her, and prayer was made for her; and the answer came, so that she walked back to her village, pushing her little cart. An atheist, who knew her, and knew she was not able to put her foot on the ground, said that if she came back healed he would believe; and when he saw her walk back painless, and pushing her cart, he said: "That child walks! I believe in God!"

Then there was a woman—a German, from Berne, and mother of a large family—who was healed. She was fifty-eight years of age, and she had faith in God, but had not thought of asking Him about healing. After she had been told about the Lord's healing, she immediately came to the cottage-meeting on the mountain. She was carried there in a cart. She asked if the young pastor, who was present, would pray for her. She was in great pain, and would scream all night, while the doctor could do nothing, and said she must do as well as she could for herself. The prayer of faith, however, went up to God and the healing came down, and she was able to walk. Three days after, she was able to walk down the mountain to the Lake of Geneva, and then up again, which is four hours' walk. Next day she came to see us, two hours' distance. The Lord has healed her, and there are only the scars left.

CHINESE SUMMER FASHIONS.

IN a letter from Dr. Mary Gale, a medical missionary in China, to the Missionary Link, she thus describes the style of dress prevailing among the people by whom she is surrounded: The summer costume of the Chinese is certainly admirable, cool, and graceful. My teacher, for instance, wears two garments; a pair of wide pants, made of white cotton cloth, tied around the ankle, as well as a short coat, coming to the knees, with flowing sleeves.

The women, beside these two garments, wear a skirt. The school matron comes in as I write, and her sleeves only come to her elbows. The shoes are always worn low, and even in winter are only made of cloth, with paper soles.

The material of which summer clothes are made is varied and beautiful, cotton, linen, or grass cloth, often soft silk and crape. They are always made in the same fashion for a particular locality. The women wear the trousers flowing as do the Canton men, and the women from the latter city, also, wear no shirt. Can you, wearing all our traditional underclothing, imagine anything more delightful of a summer day, than to go about your business in a pair of long full pants and a dressing sack? The only fault with the fashion of dress is the string which ties the pants tightly around the waist, and the poor broken feet. The fashion of dressing the hair is ruled by sex and age; the queues of the men is an evidence of bondage having been imposed on them by foreign rulers. They braid in with them certain colors—it must be white for a dead parent. Both men and women take care of their hair, and the pomatum they put on keeps it very tidy. I often wonder if they suspect us, with our more or less frowsty heads, of never combing our hair.

Everyone knows that the Chinese eat with chop-sticks, but one needs to go to a feast to realize how unmannerly their way of eating is. With the slender sticks the food is deftly pushed into the mouth from the bowl, which is held close to it, and the contents disappear in a most unhygienic manner. Such varied and remarkable stews they have, and each one dips his own china spoon or chop-stick into the bowls. Some members of our mission enjoy the food, but the very sight of it is enough for me, although it is a fact that if I did belong to the China Inland Mission I would have to eat it or starve.

THE MARRIAGE SCENE.

Past, Present, and Future.

BY MRS. H. V. REED.*

AWAY in the world's bright morning, before earth's skies had been darkened with storm-clouds, or her soil had been cursed with sin, the marriage covenant was instituted by God Himself. It was God who brought the bride to Adam, and gave her to him as his wife. It was the voice of God that pronounced the benediction upon their union, and gave them, as a marriage portion, the joint dominion over all the earth, and every living thing upon its face. The bridegroom was taught of God, his only teacher, and his response to the divine ceremony was, "This is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh."

The angels of God were the witnesses of the ceremony, and the morning stars sang together over the first nuptials of man. Purity and love crowned the union which had been blessed by the Father. Heart to heart, and hand to hand, they lived in their Eden home, the ideal life of a perfect marriage, which was born of God, and belonged to Him. But the Serpent came, and brought the curse of disobedience, and, as a natural result, alienation came also. The husband, who had hitherto been all truth and tenderness, taunted his wife with her folly, and laid the reproach upon "the woman thou gavest me."

Man had fallen, and the dark record of the sin-power was found in the blood-stained pages of wrong and fraud, of treachery and polygamy.

The Present.

Fraud and deception are now multiplied and replenished by the so-called marriages of half the world; hence the dockets of divorce courts are crowded, and the very name of marriage is sneered at by those who are too low in the moral scale to appreciate its grand design. It is a strange fact in the world's history that the crime record of a people keeps a weird tally with the number of their divorces. The city or State whose records show the greatest number of divorces will also show the highest statistics of crime.

Eighty thousand divorces in Paris in a single year preceded the most terrible revolution that the world ever saw. Infidelity to God and infidelity to man walked hand in hand, and virtue was slain upon the altar of polluted hearthstones. With desecrated homes, the standard of public morality was lowered until it reached the stagnant pool of corruption, from whence arose the blood-stained agents of anarchy and revolution.

Divorce courts are again filled with applicants. In some of our own States there is now a divorce for every ten marriages, and in others it is claimed there is one for every six. The spirit of anarchy keeps step everywhere with infidelity, and unless the home-life of the lower masses can be elevated, the destroying angel will shadow the land with his wings.

The Future.

But far beyond the dark record of broken vows and wretched lives we find in the world's future another marriage scene. Beyond the judgment of the evil woman there arises the face of the loyal wife. Beyond the wreck of broken homes gleams a view of the "city that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God."

In earth's bright morning of innocence and truth the first man and the first woman were joined in holy marriage by God himself. Again at Cana of Galilee, at the opening of the new dispensation, there is a tangible divine presence to hallow the marriage feast. And when the flood-tide of sin has been swept away, and purity and truth again reign upon the earth, it is a scene which shall gladden the eyes of angels and men. "For the marriage of the Lamb has come and his wife hath made herself ready." The chosen bride shall wear the white robes of righteousness, and blessed are they who are called to this marriage supper.

"The festal lamps are lighting now
In the great marriage hall;
By angel hands the board is spread,
By angel hands the sacred bread
Is on the golden table laid,
The King His own doth call."

RESURRECTION.

By Rev. James H. Brookes, D. D., of St. Louis.*

It is one of the numerous indications of coming apostasy that so many in evangelical churches deny the resurrection. If any one doubts this, let him set on foot an inquiry in any congregation he may select, and he will soon be convinced of the truth of the statement. He will find that unbelief as to the rising of the body from the grave is widespread, and that the doctrine and the fact are discarded and rejected, sneered at and scouted, as impossible on scientific grounds. It will be in vain to bring to bear upon these unbelievers the authority of Scripture, for such persons, some of them in high official position in the Church, will set aside the testimony of the Bible with the cool contempt of arrogant infidelity.

This form of infidelity is as old as the days of the apostles, and more than eighteen hundred years ago the Holy Ghost met it by showing the tremendous consequences of denying the truth.

First, if the dead rise not, then is Christ not risen, for in the nature of the case

The Two Resurrections

stand or fall together. Second, preaching is vain, for there can be no preaching of the gospel that does not involve the resurrection of the dead. Third, faith is vain, for if there is no resurrection, there is nothing upon which faith can rest. Fourth, the apostles are found false witnesses, for the resurrection was the centre and circumference, the sum and substance, of their testimony. Fifth, we are yet in our sins, for the resurrection is the only proof we have that the great sacrifice for sin has been accepted. Sixth, our beloved ones who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished, and "Everlasting despair" may be inscribed on the tomb. Seventh, we are of all men most miserable, for we have lost this world, and all hope of the future is torn from our grasp, as we drift upon a dark and stormy sea without one star in the sky.

"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept," triumphantly writes the spirit of God. (1 Cor. 15: 12-20.) The man who denies the resurrection is therefore a madman. It has already taken place. If we were to see the head come forth from the grave, we should know that and as Christ, the head, has surely risen, the Church, His body, shall surely rise with Him. Away, then, with your scientific objections and nonsense! Bring God upon the scene, and your difficulties vanish into offensive smoke. "Some man will say, How are the dead raised up?" The only answer the Holy Ghost deigns is, "Thou fool."

Mark it well: the same body that dies, that decomposes, that is burned, that crumbles into dust, that is taken up into vegetable matter, as the scientists tell us, that is sunk to the depth of the ocean, that mingles with the dust of ten thousand other mouldered bodies, that is scattered upon the winds, arises. "Many bodies of the saints which slept, arose, and came out of the graves, after His resurrection, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many." (Matt. 27: 52, 53.) "The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth." (John 5: 28.) "Jesus saith unto her, Thy brother shall rise again," not some other body, but, "Thy brother." "Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." (John 11: 23, 25.) "If the spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His spirit that dwelleth in you." (Rom. 8: 11.) "Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself." (Phil. 3: 21.)

A Martial Resurrection.

"Every man in his own order [band, cohort, company, brigade, division], Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's, at His coming." "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout . . . the dead in Christ shall rise first;" then the living, changed in a moment, shall be caught up in clouds together with them; but it will be in military array. Some regiments will be in advance of others. Some will be placed over ten cities, and others over five. Some will receive a reward, and others will be saved, yet so as by fire. The place assigned us in the magnificent procession that will sweep before the gaze of myriads of admiring angels, will be according to our fidelity; and may God help us to remember it every day. It is

A Glorious Resurrection.

"There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one star differeth from another star in glory. So is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power." It is needless to say that there can be no resurrection until Jesus comes, and it is this that makes some of us long for His coming with exceeding desire, for not until then shall we see in the body the precious ones who have been torn from our arms by the ruffian hand of death. But He is coming; "and when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory." "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." (Matt. 13: 43.) It is

A Triumphant Resurrection.

"Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." (1 Cor. 15: 54.) Christ came that "He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." (Heb. 2: 14.) The whole creation, smitten with the curse, is groaning and travailling in pain, and "even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body." (Rom. 8: 23.) If there is no resurrection, Christ is defeated for ever and ever; and it is amazing that any Christian can so become the dupe of the devil as to doubt that he will rise from the dead.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The New Member of the Cabinet was Nominated by the President on February 11. It appears that Mr. Cleveland needed considerable pressure to appoint a Cabinet officer for three weeks. The change, however, is not an important one, for his choice was Mr. Norman J. Colman, who held the office of Commissioner of Agriculture. He simply now becomes Secretary of Agriculture, and has a seat in the Cabinet. He will therefore continue to conduct the business of the Department under a new name. It is forty years since there was a change in the number of Cabinet officers. Washington's Cabinet consisted of only five men: the heads of the Departments of State, Treasury, War, Post Office, and the Attorney General's office. In 1796 the Navy Department was represented, and in 1849 the Interior was made a separate office. The eighth member of the Cabinet is now added, and future Cabinets will doubtless consist of that number. Ex-Senator Warner Miller, of New York, has been suggested to General Harrison as a suitable man for the position.

The Warm Tribute of Praise From a Republican to a Democratic administration should not be unnoticed by the public. On February 12 Senator Plumb, of Kansas, surprised his colleagues in the Senate by expressing unqualified approval of the administration of the Navy Department under Mr. Whitney. He was unsparing in criticisms upon the old system of spending millions upon millions in repairs to old vessels, and in praise of the new method of spending money for new ships. He commended Mr. Whitney's course in earnest words, and pointed out that during the last four years a solid foundation had been made for "the best navy in the world," while at the same time American enterprise has been stimulated until now we could furnish in our own country everything going into the construction of first-class modern ships of war. It gave him pleasure, Mr. Plumb added, to speak thus in the closing hours of an administration which had done much which he had felt obliged to criticise.

A Measure to Prepare for the Apprehended disturbances on the Isthmus of Panama has been passed by the Senate. On February 11 that body voted in secret session to appropriate $250,000 to enable the President to protect American citizens in the event of there being wholesale discharge of the laborers on the canal. It is understood that no special notice of trouble has reached the Senate, but the appropriation is intended to meet the crisis incident to the discharge, in a body, of laborers whose means of gaining their livelihood are thereby cut off, and who in their desperation and distress may resort to violence and bloodshed. The authorities of Great Britain and other nations having large numbers of their citizens employed on the Panama Canal, have also decided to arrange for bringing them home in case of discharge, and not to suffer them to remain on the Isthmus in destitution.

An Estimate of the Effect of the Rival Tariff bills has been made in the Treasury Department by officials familiar with the present figures. The opinion of these experts is that the Senate Bill would reduce the revenue by $47,882,667, while the House Bill would reduce it by $67,960,479. By the former the reduction in customs would be fourteen millions, and in internal revenue thirty-three millions, while by the latter it would be fifty millions in customs and seventeen millions in internal revenue. These figures, however, would not be realized in either case, because the Treasury makes no allowance for increased consumption of articles the duty on which would be abolished or lowered, which would probably take place, though it would be impossible to estimate its extent.

New Light on the Scandal in the New York Legislature was given last week. A member of the Committee on appropriations, which has charge of the investigation of the ceiling question, stated that he had been approached by a lobbyist, who asked him if he would favor a report "whitewashing" all concerned in the matter, blaming no one for the substitution of bagging and plaster for carved oak. The lobbyist intimated that several members of the Committee were already in favor of such a report, and hinted that if he would concur, it would be much to his advantage. Current rumor had it that $5,000 was the advantage named, but the member declined to state what was the sum offered. This disclosure increases the interest with which the report of the Committee is awaited.

An Important Convention is to Assemble at Baltimore, Md., on Saturday next. It is called by the Civil Service Reform Association of that city, and delegates are expected from all the associations of the country. It is popularly understood to be called for the practical purpose of impressing General Harrison and his Cabinet with the value of reform methods. One of the prominent conveners said that the chief address would be on "What May be Hoped and Expected From the Incoming Administration?" and added, "Our object with reference to the Administration of Mr. Harrison is to have retained as many efficient office holders as possible. We think that all Post Office, Custom House, and departmental employees, especially in the subordinate grades, should be given a new life, if they deserve it, by reason of faithful observance of their duties."

Another Cabinet Crisis has Occurred in France. Premier Floquet was defeated on Thursday in the Chamber of Deputies, by an adverse majority of eighty-nine, and thereupon announced his resignation and that of his colleagues. The question upon which the vote was taken was the revision of the constitution which the Floquet Cabinet advocated. Count de Donville Mailleu proposed that the debate be indefinitely adjourned, on the ground that in the coming election the people would indicate the kind of revision they desired. M. Floquet opposed the proposal, and reminded the Chamber that the Government was pledged to revision. His resignation, when Mailleu's proposal was carried, surprised the chamber. The object of the revision desired by M. Floquet was to devise checks against the ambition of General Boulanger and dictatorship in any form, and to strengthen the safeguards of the Republic. Though defeated in this project, he was successful in a more important scheme earlier in the week. On February 11 he succeeded in inducing the Chamber to pass a bill changing the mode of election from scrutin de liste, which now prevails, to scrutin d'arrondissement. Under the former system all the deputies apportioned to a Department are voted for on one ticket, every voter in the Department having a voice in the election of the whole number, as in our election of presidential electors. Under scrutin d'arrondissement each district elects its deputy as in our election of members of Congress. The change will embarrass General Boulanger in his effort to attain supreme power, though, as was proved in the case of Gambetta in France, and Parnell in Ireland, it is not an insurmountable obstacle. Boulanger will still be able to ask endorsement from the districts, by running his adherents as candidates pledged to his support.

A Constitutional Government for Japan has been granted without the struggles which usually precede such a concession in European countries. The Mikado on February 11 formally announced it from the throne. The constitution establishes a House of Peers, the members of which are to be partly hereditary, partly elective, and partly nominated by the Mikado, and a House of Commons of 300 members. The right of suffrage is given to all men of the age of twenty-five years and over, who pay taxes to the amount of $25 yearly. Liberty of religion, freedom of speech, and the right of public meeting are established. Parliament is to possess legislative functions and the control of the finance under limitations. Judges cannot be removed except by special legislation.

Bismarck's Defence of the Samoan Outrages was published on February 15. It contains the correspondence between the Berlin Foreign Office and the German consul at Samoa. It accuses Americans and Englishmen with endeavoring to provoke conflicts. A dispatch dated September, 1888, describes what it calls the revolt of Mataafa, and states that support was given to him by Capt. Leary, United States Navy. After an account of the attack upon the Germans on December 18, comes a telegram from Count Herbert Bismarck, dated January 1, 1889, to the German Ministers at Washington and London, directing them to inform Secretary Bayard and Lord Salisbury respecting the attack. The Ministers were also further instructed to declare that Germany adhered to her treaties, and would respect the rights founded thereon, and they were to appeal to both Governments to co-operate actively with Germany and re-establish tranquillity. On January 8 Count Herbert Bismarck telegraphed to the German consul at Apia that on account of an agreement with the United States and Great Britain, the annexation of Samoa by Germany was "out of the question." It may be hoped that in the approaching conference at Berlin, America and England will take care that it shall always remain "out of the question."

The Parnell Commission Listened to Further startling disclosures last week. The witness Beach, or Le Caron, was again on the stand, and cross-examination failed to shake his evidence in chief. He testified as to his method of ingratiating himself with the Irish party in America. Among other significant statements was one that he went to the financial rescue of General O'Neill head of the Fenian army raised to invade Canada, and by lending him $375 saved O'Neill from being declared a defaulter. This gave him a hold on O'Neill, and access to important secrets, which he regularly imparted to the authorities in London. The most serious statement made by the witness, so far as Mr. Parnell is concerned, was that in a conversation with him in the House of Commons, Parnell said to Le Caron that he did not see why an insurrection should be unsuccessful. Le Caron admitted that the British Government had paid him $10,000 in two years, and he was still receiving a salary from them. On Thursday the famous Parnell letters were produced in court. The manager of the Times said that he had paid Houston, who procured the letters, $8,900 for them. The friends of Mr. Parnell aver that those, and others signed by Egan, are forgeries, and were written by a man named Pigott. The lawyer of the Times said that Pigott had been offered $5,000 if he would confess on the witness-stand that he had forged the letters.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $13.88. They are from: Aberdeen, Dak., $1.50; Lakeville, Cal., $3.50; Philadelphia, Pa., $5; Shelton, Neb., $2; New Haven, Conn., 50c.; Jackson, Ont., 50c.; West Bridgewater, Pa., 50c.; New Market, N. J., 38c. A colored minister at Mineral Springs, S. C., who has been receiving the paper through this fund, writes: "I cannot tell you how much help THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been to me in my ministerial work. It is now nearly a year since I began to receive it, and I am afraid it will stop. I hoped to have been able to send you a subscription for it, but my congregation cannot afford to pay me more than a bare living, and I am consequently unable to subscribe. I do hope you will continue this precious help another year. I am sure God will reward you in doing this to help to advance His cause among my race." Our friends will be glad to learn that we are now enabled, through their kindness, to add this minister's name, with others, to our list.

An Interesting Deputation Waited on President-elect Harrison on February 9. It was composed of over a hundred venerable men, many of whom voted for the General's grandfather when he was elected President forty-nine years ago. The Rev. Henry Day, D. D., who was the spokesman of the party, presented General Harrison with a magnificent Bible, and expressed earnest wishes for his happiness and the success of his administration. In the course of his reply, General Harrison said: "I cannot hope to escape just criticism in the discharge of the onerous and complicated duties which are soon to devolve upon me, but I do hope that I shall escape fatal error, and that it will appear, when my inadequate and brief work is done, that I have set before me, as the pole star of my public life, a patriotic purpose to promote the true glory of our country and the highest good of our people. God bless you every one! May the consolations of this Holy Book fill your lives with peace and make the last the best day of all your honorable lives."

A Valuable Invention for the Headlights of locomotives has been patented recently. It is an adjustment which allows the engineer to conveniently direct the light, as he may desire, to various points off the line. The lantern is supported on a frame or platform, which has a movement to right or left about a vertical axis, the operating mechanism leading back to the cab, so as to be within ready reach of the engineer. He is enabled, by this arrangement, to examine dangerous or doubtful parts of the road, and in stormy weather to turn the light upon threatening trees or masses of earth or rock upon either side, and at points which would be entirely out of reach of the light in its usual fixed position. It may be hoped that railroad directors will make full use of this invention, for it will greatly conduce to the safety of passengers to have the engineer able to examine dangerous parts of the road ahead of his train. It is a source of comfort to the Christian that in the dangerous parts of the road he has to travel to reach his heavenly mansion, he will be under the guidance of One in whom light dwells and who promises to bring him safely through. (Luke 1: 79.)

The Murder of a Party of Prospectors in a gold-mine is reported in a press dispatch from Cheyenne, Wyoming. Last fall a Mexican, named Miguel Martinez, with a party of his countrymen, stayed a few days in Cheyenne, on his way to the northern part of the Territory. Martinez said they were going to search for an old gold-mine which he believed to be rich in metal. He carried a chart with red tracing, which he said was blood. It was very old, and had, Martinez said, been made by an ancestor of his, who found the mine, but had been fatally wounded in a desperate fight among his companions about the ownership of the treasure. They were all killed; but before Martinez the elder died he had gathered his remaining strength sufficiently to trace the chart with his blood, begging any one who found it to take it to Mexico to his family. The chart had been lost, but on its discovery last summer, Martinez, the descendant, with a few assistants, was going to locate the mine. The Cheyenne people heard no more of Martinez and his party until February 9, when some hunters reported that they had found the whole party dead at the mouth of the old San Salvador mine. They had evidently died fighting, for all the bodies were gashed and had bullet wounds. Whether they fought among themselves, or were attacked and killed by others, could not be discovered. It is evident, however, that the effort to obtain the gold from the mine cost Martinez his life, as it did his ancestor, and his companions died with him. Not so romantic, but still more disastrous, does the struggle for gold prove to some business men, for it involves them in the loss of their souls. (1 Tim. 6: 9.)

An Elegantly Framed Five-Cent Coin Set in a rich background of plush is hung up in a restaurant in Utica, N. Y. Its significance is perfectly understood by the citizens, especially by one man, of whose political ambition it is the gravestone. That man was a candidate last year for a county office, and visited the restaurant, where the Board of Registry at that time held its meetings. A box was placed there, into which public-spirited citizens dropped voluntary contributions, to pay for the dinner and supper of the Board, and the candidate's attention was called to it. He drew a handful of coins from his pocket, selected a nickel, and dropped that into the box as his contribution. That nickel, when it reached the restaurant keeper, who heard whence it came, was prized as a curiosity, and he had it set in plush, beautifully framed, and suspended in his place as a sign of the disposition of the candidate. He is always ready to tell its history to inquirers, and all who hear it realize that the man who gave the coin has no chance of ever being elected to office in that neighborhood. It is well for some penurious Christians that their hopes of eternal felicity cannot be so crushed. Yet they may be sure that God does not look with approval on small gifts to His cause from men able to give large ones, and whom He has redeemed at so stupendous a cost. (11 Cor. 9: 7.)

The Heroic Conduct of a Miner was Described at an inquest at Pottsville, Pa., on February 11. Two men were working in the Hammond Colliery, a few days previously, when one of them went up into the chamber to fire a fuse. The hole where the charge was placed was at the top of an eighteen-foot plank, elevated at an angle of seventy-five degrees. The man had placed in the stick of dualin, tamped the hole, and lighted the fuse. In coming down he started a great mass of coal, and was caught and crushed by an immense boulder against the wall of the breast. His companion, whose name is Dougherty, heard his scream, and looking up into the dark chamber, saw the sputtering fuse. Not knowing what had befallen his comrade, but knowing that if the shot went off he would surely be killed, at the great peril of his own life he climbed the steep plank, and pulled out the fuse within an inch of the powder. He descended safely, but his comrade was dead. The coal that fell on him before Dougherty pulled out the fuse had crushed the life out of him. His comrade's heroism did not benefit him. It will be so with many who will not benefit by the death of Christ, but, unlike the poor miner, their destruction will be their fault, not their misfortune. (John 5: 40.)

A Novel Roof to a Hothouse has been Made for a gentleman at Danbury, Conn. Finding that a large number of the panes of glass in the roof of a hothouse in his garden were broken, the structure not having been used for some time, he removed the entire roof, and had a new one constructed. Instead of using ordinary glass for the purpose, he went around to the photographers, and bought from them sufficient old negatives to fill the entire roof. He arranged them in groups. One represents the old gray-beards, who have long since gone to their rest. Next come men of middle age, who are now old and bent. The women follow, and then young men and young women, who are to-day grandfathers and grandmothers. The children represented by the negatives are married and have their children. In one corner, over the heliotrope bed, he has placed the lovers—those who, in the days before they were married, had their pictures taken holding each other by the hand. As the heliotrope is the floral emblem of love, he thought it would be appropriate for it to grow in the light that will shine through pictures of persons inflamed with the tender passion. It is but a pretty fancy; the plants will not grow any better because of the light reaching them through the pictures. But there are human lives growing up all around us from childhood to maturity that would grow much better if they lived in the light of Heaven, which should reach them through parents and friends who profess to have that light in them. (Matt. 5: 16.)

BRIEF NOTES.

"A Ten" of the King's Daughters has been organized in Berlin.

The Hon. Roswell P. Flower, with his brother, Anson R. Flower, are about to erect a Protestant Episcopal Church at Watertown, N. Y. They propose spending $55,000 upon it.

John Powers, a boy of eleven years of age, living at Middletown, N. Y., has become a raving maniac, and the physicians say his affliction results from excessive cigarette smoking.

The Memorial Church to Adoniram Judson will be located on Thompson Street and Washington Square, New York. It will cost $250,000, of which $150,000 is already subscribed.

Rev. R. G. Pearson's meetings in Greenville, S. C., have been the means of adding over two hundred names to the membership of the churches of that city, beside those added to churches in outlying districts. Mr. Pearson's sermons are remarkably simple and powerful.

Colonel Hadley, formerly at the Jerry McAuley Mission in Water Street, New York, will have charge of the new mission opened at 158 East Forty-second Street, in connection with St. Bartholomew's Church; meetings will be held every night.

Gipsy Smith's services in the Nostrand Avenue M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., were continued last week with increasing interest. On February 12, at a special service in the afternoon a large number of the senior scholars of the Sunday-school went to the altar for prayer. Letters for Gipsy Smith addressed to this office will be forwarded to him.

Rev. Francis E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, asks us to remind our readers that Friday, February 22, is the National Christian Endeavor Day. Two methods of observance are suggested: Prayer for sister societies, and a thank offering to some Mission Board connected with the denomination to which the societies respectively belong.

Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea's friends at Guelph, Ontario, Canada, have presented him with a purse of $100 as a token of their appreciation of the good work he has been enabled to carry on there. At his closing meeting on February 8, over 1,800 persons were present. During his stay in Guelph 550 persons have made a profession of faith, and have been proposed for church membership. Mr. Schiverea is now holding meetings in Toronto.

Fifty ladies of Prosser, Neb., attacked a saloon and gambling den on February 4, while it was crowded. They advanced upon it with aprons filled with lumps of coal, which they threw with precision. The windows, bottles, and everything breakable was broken, and the crowd, among which were husbands of some of the women, beat a precipitate retreat. The place had no license.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings at La Crosse, Wis., are being much blessed. The Republican of that city says that on February 10 fully two hundred persons were converted. The new theatre, and the streets leading to it, were thronged long before the hour of opening the meeting by crowds anxious to obtain admission. During last week there was each day a Bible reading in the First Presbyterian Church in the afternoon, and an evangelistic service in the Congregational Church each evening.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

STAGES OF THE SHEPHERD'S WORK.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Until he find it, . . . and when he hath found it, . . . and when he cometh home." Luke 15:4, 5, 6.

The Love of the Shepherd Very Practical—An Example for Under-Shepherds—I. The Search—An Anxious One—Earnest—Persevering—Not Abandoned Till Successful—In Spite of Discouragements—II. The Finding—Takes Fast Hold—The Gracious Lift—Distance Vanishing—Turning a Penny into Stone—Gratis Patients Kindly Treated—III. The Return—The Shepherd's Home—The Loss Known and Deplored There—Those Who Rejoice with the Shepherd—A Glorified Mother's Joy.

THE love of Jesus, the Great Shepherd, is very practical and active. There is a sheep lost, and the Lord regrets it; but His love does not spend itself in regrets; He arises, and goes forth to seek and to save that which was lost. The love of Jesus Christ is love not in word only, but in deed and in truth. The love of Jesus is prevenient. He does not wait until the sheep is willing to return, or until it makes some attempt to come back; but no sooner is its lost estate known to the Shepherd than He starts off, that He may find that which was lost. The love of Jesus to the lost sheep is pre-eminent. He leaves the ninety-and-nine in their pasture; and, for a while, forgets them, that all His heart, His eye, His strength may be given to the one that has gone astray. Oh, sweet love of Christ, so practical, so pre-eminent, so prevenient! Let us ask for grace, that we may imitate it—especially those of us who are called to be shepherds of men. Among God's people most of the saints have

A Charge to Watch Over.

However little the flock may be, even if it be restricted to our own family, or to the little class that gathers about us on the Sabbath, yet we are all our brother's keeper in some measure. Let us learn the love of Christ, that we may be wise in shepherdry. Let us not talk about our friends, and say we love them; but let us show it by earnest, personal, speedy endeavors to do them good. Let us not wait until we see some goodness—until they seek instruction. But

"Oh, come let us go and find them,
In the paths of death they roam."

And long before they have a thought of coming home, let us be on their track, eager to grasp them, if by any means we may save some. Oh to have in our hearts such love of souls that it engrosses us so that we forget earthly needs, and only remember this yet higher necessity!

In my text there are three periods to which I call your attention.

I. The Good Shepherd seeks the lost sheep

"Until He find it."

Just put a mark under those words. That is our first head—"Until He find it." It is a long reach "Until He find it." I like the expression. The Lord Jesus did not come down to earth to make an attempt to find men, but He came to do it, and He did it. He tarried here seeking the lost sheep till He found it; He never gave over till His work was done. At this hour, in His work of grace amongst His chosen, He does not make an attempt at their salvation, and suffer defeat; but He keeps at soul-seeking work until He find it.

Look at the seeking shepherd: he is looking for the sheep. Notice his anxious countenance "until he find it." We read that after he found it he rejoiced; but there is no rejoicing until he find it. He is all excitement, quick of ear to catch the faintest sound, for it may be the bleating of his lost sheep. I was about to say that he looks with ears and eyes together. He puts his whole soul into the organs of watchfulness, if peradventure he may discern the sheep. Is there a smile on his face? Ah, no! not until "he find it." His whole soul is in his eyes and ears until he find it.

This is a faint yet true picture of that Great Shepherd who came here to seek His flock. So the evangelists have drawn Him in their pen-and-ink sketches of Him—always watchful; spending night and day in prayers and tears and entreaties; never more to have a joy until He find the lost one; then, when He did find a single sheep, finding His meat and His drink in it, and becoming refreshed from the fact that He has so far accomplished His beloved work. The Great Shepherd is all energy, care, and concentration of thought concerning His sheep, "until He find it." There is

No Hesitating With Jesus.

The sheep is lost, and the news is brought to the Shepherd; He girds His loose robe about Him, and is on the way. He knows within a little which way that stray sheep will go, and He is on his track at once, though He knows that He must mark that track with His blood. See the blessed Shepherd pressing on: there is no pausing nor resting "until He find it." He has made up His mind that no sheep of His shall be lost, and He hies over hill and dale after the wanderer until He find it.

If you look into that shepherd's face, there is no trace of anger there. He does not say, "Oh, that I should be worried with this silly sheep thus going astray!" No thought is there but that of anxious love. It is all love, and nothing else but love, before He finds and until He finds it; and you may be sure that careful tenderness will be in full action after He has found it. He is looking with anxious eye of love. "As I live," saith the Lord, "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, but that he should turn unto Me and live." "Until he find it" there will be no thought of anxiety, but a fullness of pitying care for the lost sheep.

And, mark, there is no giving up. That sheep has wandered now for many hours. The sun has risen, and the sun has set, or, at least, it is just going down; but as long as the shepherd can see, and the sheep is still alive, he will pursue it "until he find it." He has been disappointed a great many times; and when he thought that he should have found it, he has missed it; but still, he will never give it up. He is impelled onward by irresistible love, and he must continue his weary search until he find it. It was precisely so with our Lord Jesus Christ. When He came after you and after me, we ran from Him, but He pursued us: we hid from Him, but He discovered us; He had almost grasped us, but so long as we eluded Him He still pursued with love unwearied until He found us. Oh,

If He Had Given Up

after the first ten years—if he had ceased to care for some of us after fifty different occasions in which we had choked conscience and quenched the Spirit, then we should have been lost. But He would not be turned away. If He determines to save, He continues to pursue the rambling sheep until He find it. He cannot, He must not, He will not, cease from the work of seeking and of finding till He find it. I wish to-night that the time were come with some here that it should be said, "The Saviour did pursue such and such a one until He found him—found him in the Tabernacle, and ended all his wanderings there—found him standing in yonder gallery, and ended all his wanderings at the 'foot of the cross.'" God grant that it may be so! but whether it be so with you or not, be ye sure of this—that the Lord Jesus has in hundreds and thousands of cases pursued sinners with unflagging mercy, leaping to them over hills of sin, and following them till He has found them. We are now His for ever and ever, for He who has found us will never lose us. Blessed be His name!

Learn this lesson before I pass on. If ever you are seeking the conversion of any man, until you find him. Do not be discouraged. Put up with a great many rebuffs and rebukes: you will have him yet. He is surest to succeed who cannot be put off from his aim. From some it will be necessary to receive a great deal that is most discouraging. Receive it, and say nothing about it; only whisper to yourself, "I might well have put the Great Shepherd off from caring for me; and yet He was not so turned aside. If He persevered with me even to the death, I may well persevere as long as I live in seeking and finding a soul. I have heard of wives who have pleaded with God for their husbands twenty years, and yet have seen them converted after all. There are instances in this place in which indefatigable love has followed up ungodly relatives until they have at last been saved by sovereign grace. Persevere with loving entreaties! Till you bury your unsaved ones, do not consider them dead; and do not bury them spiritually till they are dead really.

Follow Him Up

"Until he find it." Now nail your colors to the mast. "Until he find it." Go out, ye under-shepherds, for Christ. Wear this motto on your right hand. "Until I find it." Live or die, or work or suffer, whether the time be short or long, or the way be smooth or rough, let each one of you be bound to seek a soul "until he find it." You will find it then, even as Christ found you. There I leave that first point.

II. And now we come to the second—"And when he hath found it."

When He Has Found It,

what does he do then? Well, first, he takes fast hold. "He layeth it on his shoulders rejoicing." So when he has found it, the first thing is to get a tight grip of it. See him: he has got close up to the sheep. The poor thing is spent, and yet may have strength enough to get away, therefore the shepherd takes good care that he shall not. He grasps his legs and holds him tight. That is what the Lord Jesus does when at last He gets a man broken down under a sense of sin, spent and worn out as to further resistance of divine mercy. Our Lord gets such a grip of the rebel that he will never get away any more. I remember when He laid hold of me. He has never lost His grasp even to this day. But, oh, it was a grasp! Nothing ever gripped my fickle mind like the hand of Christ. When the divine hand, which fixed the foundations of the earth, had fixed itself on me, my wanderings were ended once for all.

The next thing after the fast hold was the gracious lift. He lifted this poor sheep up and put it on his shoulders, and there it was with all its weight, carried by powerful shoulders. That is what the Saviour does for poor weary sinners. He carries the weight of their sin, nay, the weight of themselves. He takes us just as we are, and instead of driving us back by His law, He carries us home by His love. Instead of urging us to go home, He becomes the great burden-bearer of His redeemed, and bears them on His shoulders. And now you have one of that ever imagination can sketch—that great crowned Shepherd of the sheep. King of kings, and Lord of lords, bearing on His shoulders, as a burden He delights to carry, the sheep that had gone astray. Oh, I pray God that you may lie on those broad shoulders if you never have been so favored! The shoulders of omnipotence bearing up our weakness—the mighty Saviour bearing us and all our sin, and all our care, and our whole being upon the shoulders of His strength—this is a sight for angels.

And as He thus carries the weight, observe that the distance is removed. We read in the next verse, "When he cometh home," but there is nothing said about the road; for somehow our Master has the knack of being at home at once. The sinner may weary himself by twenty years of sin, but in five minutes that may all be gone. It may have taken you fifty years to make yourself such a hell-deserving sinner as you are, but it will not take Jesus fifty ticks of the clock to wash you, and make you whiter than snow, and to get you back into the great Father's house. Truth to tell, the Shepherd's redeeming work is done already. There is no weary journey back for Shepherd or sheep. He grasps the sheep; He puts it on His shoulders, and they are both back at the fold.

But the particular point I want you to notice is when the great Shepherd gets this burden on his back. We read, "When he hath found it, he layeth it upon His shoulders"—with great anxiety? Look to see whether it is so. Nothing of the sort. But is it not, "He layeth it on his shoulders with great weariness"? No. See! See! "He layeth it on his shoulders rejoicing—rejoicing." He does not remember all the weariness that he has had to suffer. He does not think of the folly of his sheep in having lost good pasture, in having involved itself in so much danger, and in costing him so much labor. Not a word is mentioned of it. "He layeth it on his shoulders rejoicing." He says to himself, "I am Glad to Carry This Burden: happy to carry my lost sheep home." And oh! I do love to picture to myself at this moment the joy in the heart of the blessed Christ. "For the joy that was set before Him He endured the cross, despising the shame." And now, whenever He gets a lost sheep to carry back—He rejoices. His heart leaps within Him. All anxiety is gone. Fullness of delight is upon Him. "He layeth it upon His shoulders rejoicing."

I wonder whether the sheep could see that the shepherd rejoiced. I do not suppose that it could; but it could feel it. There are two ways, you know, of handling a sheep, and the sheep very soon knows which expresses pleasure on its owner's part; at any rate, I am sure that a dog knows well enough what your movements mean. If you speak angrily to a sheep, and throw it upon your shoulder with indignation, that is one thing; but if you have not a word to say, except it be, "Poor thing, I am glad I have found you," and you cast it on your shoulders rejoicing, why, sheep as it is, it knows the difference. At any rate, I know that Christ has a way of saving us: oh, so gently, so lovingly, so gleefully, that He makes us happy in being saved. There is a way of or into gold according to the way in which you give it to a poor man. You can fling it at him as if he were a dog, and he will be about as grateful to you as a dog, or not so much. But there is a way in which you can say, "I am sorry for your needs. This is all I can afford you now. Take it, and do what you can with it." Given with a brotherly look, it will be gratefully received, and made the most of. There is much in the manner, as well as in the matter of a gift. The mannerism of Christ is grandly gracious: He saves us rejoicingly. It is a matter of thanksgiving to Him when He gets hold of His lost sheep, and gets it on His shoulders.

We are not saved by a grudging Christ, who seems as if He were weary of us, and must save us out of hand, to get rid of us. He does not act with us as some rude surgeon might do who says, "I will attend to you directly, but I have plenty else to do, and you gratis patients are a trouble." Nor does He roughly set the bone. No; Jesus comes, and, as with a lady's dainty hand, He moulds the dislocated joint; and when He sets it, there is bliss even about the method of the setting. We look into His face, and we see that He puts His tenderest sympathy into each movement.

You know the different ways which workmen have. Some kind of work a man is soon sick of. The principle of division of labor is a very admirable one for the production of results upon a large scale; but it is for the workman to have to do the same thing over and over again, all day long, as if he were an automaton. Get a man at work at a statue—an artist whose whole soul is in his chisel, who knows that there is a bright spirit within that block of marble, and who means to chip off all that hides the lovely image from his sight. See how he works! No man does a thing well who does it sorrowfully. The best work that can be is done by the happy, joyful workman; and so it is with Christ. He does not save souls as of necessity—as though He would rather do something else if He might; but His very heart is in it, He rejoices to do it, and therefore He does it thoroughly, and He communicates His joy to us in the doing of it. Now, learn a lesson before I go away to the third point. "When he hath found it." Suppose that any of you should very soon meet with a poor troubled sinner, anxious to come to Christ. When you have found him, let me recommend you to imitate the Master's example: get a tight grip of him. Do not let him slip. Get a hold of him; and then, if he is in trouble, take all that trouble upon yourself. Try whether you cannot get him upon your shoulders. Imitate your Master in that way. Try to bear all his burden for him, as Christ bore yours. Conduct him to the Christ who is the true burden-bearer; and all the while be very happy about it. I do not think we ought to go and talk to young converts in a dreadfully solemn tone, as though it would be something horrible to find a Saviour. They will never come again, you may depend upon it. They will give you a wide berth. But just go, and in a joyful spirit say, "I am so glad to find you caring about your soul!" The best thing that can happen to a soul-seeker is to meet with a troubled conscience; show that you think so.

III. "When He Cometh Home."

"When he cometh home, he calleth together his friends, and neighbors, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost." Some hurried observations. First, heaven is a home. "When he cometh home;" and the next verse says that it is heaven. Heaven is a home. Do you not like to think of it under that aspect? It is the home of Jesus; and if it is the home of Jesus can any other be equal to it? "When he cometh home."

Note, next, that lost ones are known in heaven. I give you that thought more from the Greek than from the English here. "When he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbors, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep—the lost one." That is how it should run. It is as if the friends knew that one had been lost, and the loss had been deplored; and the shepherd says, "I have found my sheep: you know which one—the lost one." Up there they know which are Christ's sheep, and which are lost. Heaven is nearer earth than some of us dream. And there are more communications between earth and heaven than some folk dream; for here it is clear that when the shepherd came home he said to them, "I have found the sheep," the lost one. So they knew all about it.

It is evident, again, that they all knew there that he had gone after the sheep, for he says, "I have found my sheep which was lost."

They All Knew

that he had gone on search, and therefore they could all understand his joy when he came back with the sheep. I believe that they know in heaven when Christ is seeking after any one. It must be a great satisfaction to some up there who die with an unconverted son, or an unconverted girl, to know, after a little while, son or daughter is converted to Christ. I am persuaded they know it. They cannot help knowing it, because they are Christ's friends and neighbors, and, according to the parable, He tells them, and He says to them, "Rejoice with Me," and if He says "Rejoice with Me," why, of course, He tells them why. If I had been converted after my mother's death, I can fancy that when Jesus said to all of them, "Rejoice with Me; for I have found My sheep, the lost one," my mother would say, "My Lord, I can rejoice more than any of them, for that was my boy, and he is saved at last." Your mother in glory will be twice glorified to-night, John, if you give your heart to Christ; and I pray that you may. Your father, now before the throne, will think that paradise has grown more paradisiac than ever if he hears it whispered down the golden streets that the wanderer has come home.

Notice, next, very briefly, that Jesus Christ loves other people to rejoice with Him, so that when He finds a sinner, He has so much love in His heart that His joy runs over, and He cries to others, "Come, friends, come neighbors, come and help Me to be glad, for I have saved another soul." Let us catch the blessed infection. If you have just heard of somebody being saved, be glad about it. Though you do not know the person, yet be glad about it, because Jesus is glad.

Sing away, angels! There is something to sing about now; and we will join with you in blessing and praising the unchanging God for ever and for ever. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS. THE PLEBEIAN EMPRESS.*

ABOUT the close of the seventeenth century a female child was born in a condition of great poverty, in a little village in one of the remote provinces of Russia. The name given to her at birth was Martha, though this was subsequently changed. To add to the misery of her condition, she was born without the bonds of wedlock, an illegitimate child. Both the child and the mother were thrown for their support on the cold charity of an unfeeling world. When this poor child was but three years old her mother died. Like a frail leaf thrown out to the buffetings of a wintry torrent, she was cast forth alone upon life's troubled stream, to be the sport of its resistless tossings.

We will not follow her through all the strange vicissitudes of her early years. We pass at a bound over the fourteen years which elapsed after her mother's death. She is now a blooming, beautiful girl of seventeen. She is filling the position of waiting-maid in the house of a Russian officer. One day the officer has the honor to entertain at dinner Peter the Great, the Emperor of all the Russias. The orphan girl is on attendance at the table. The Emperor is interested in her appearance and smitten with her beauty. He has her removed to his own palace, makes provision for her education, and finally changing her name on embracing the religion of the Greek Church, that poor peasant orphan is raised to the throne, and figures on the page of history as Catherine, Empress of Russia.

An event like this is of rare occurrence in the annals of our race. The surprising change of which the Empress Catherine was the subject may be quoted as an illustration of the romance of history, but our text (Ps. 113: 7, 8) may be adduced as an illustration of the romance of revelation. It does not refer to a solitary case. It describes, not what God does in rare instances, as once in a century, but what He is doing all the time in the display of His grace to the children of men. "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill; that He may set him with the princes, even with the princes of the people."

How Far is Heaven?

We have no direct information in Scripture as to the locality of heaven or its natural distance from our world. And yet we have some light given us on this point, both in the way of inference, and in the way of direct statement. Look at it inferentially. In the ninth chapter of Daniel we have an account of a visit which the angel Gabriel made to him. The prophet, it seems, had been spending a day in fasting, humiliation, and prayer in behalf of his captive countrymen, and their ruined city and temple. He was still earnestly pressing his supplications before the mercy-seat, when the angel stood by and touched him, about the time of the evening sacrifice, that is, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Gabriel told Daniel that he had received the command to come upon this mission, at the beginning of his supplication, and that being caused to fly swiftly, he had been able to accomplish his journey by the time stated. And if we knew exactly at what hour of the day Daniel began his devotions, and the rate of speed at which the angel urged his flight, we should be in possession of the elements that would enable us to solve satisfactorily the problem now before us. We could reduce to figures the number of miles that measure the distance of that far-off heavenly world from ours.

Well, then, as Daniel's devotions were ended at the time of the evening sacrifice, or at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, let us suppose they were begun at the time of the morning sacrifice, or at 9 o'clock A. M., then we have six hours for the time of the angel's flight. We know not what standard of speed was in Gabriel's mind when he spoke of the swiftness of his flight. But we happen to know the rate of speed at which another of God's servants actually flies. Light is one of God's servants. We know that it flies, say in round numbers, at the rate of 200,000 miles a second. Now let us think of Gabriel, another of God's servants, as flying at the same rate for six hours, and then we see how well we may speak of the place from which he came as a "far country." (Isa. 33: 17.)

GIPSY SMITH.

The English Evangelist.

THE young evangelist who is now commencing his mission in this country, and whose portrait appears on this page, is a remarkable illustration of what God's grace can accomplish without the aid of education and culture. He is a genuine gipsy, belonging to a well-known tribe, and in his boyhood he had a thorough experience of gipsy life. He was born on March 31, 1860, and is therefore not quite twenty-nine years old. At the age of seven he was bereaved of his mother. She died, as she had lived, in the family van, which at that time was halted in a quiet English lane. The poor woman had strayed sometime before into a Sunday-school, and it was a hymn she had heard there that filled her mind in her last hours. She was impressed with the solemnity of the approaching change, and made a last appeal to her husband to quit his drunken, profane ways and seek Christ. A slight improvement in his habits followed her death, but it was neither deep nor permanent. One profitable source of income was to play the violin in saloons and he taught his young son to dance to its strains, so that the father and son were not in congenial surroundings for a godly life. The father, however, attended an evangelistic meeting, was converted, and abandoned his evil ways. Shortly afterward the son also was brought to Christ, and was so much in earnest that he entered the Salvation Army.

From that day to this, Gipsy Smith has been engaged in evangelistic work. Since he left the Salvation Army the chief sphere of his labors has been the town of Hanley, in Staffordshire, England, where, among a population notorious for godlessness, and brutality he has been used of God to accomplish a marvellous change. A large mission hall has been crowded nightly for several years, and many of the most depraved people in the town have been saved. His success there attracted the attention of the churches of other towns, and he has been invited to conduct mission services in various parts of the country. Letters which he holds from many eminent ministers of different denominations, notably Rev. C. Garrett, ex-president of the Methodist Conference, and the Rev. Charles Berry, whom Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, unanimously invited to succeed Mr. Beecher, testify to the remarkable awakenings which have followed Gipsy Smith's labors. We sincerely hope that the blessing of God may follow him in like manner in his work on this side the Atlantic.

A CALL FOR THE LIFEBOAT.

(See Illustration.)

No more courage and daring is displayed in any labor than in that of the men who man the lifeboats of the United States Life-Saving Service, and of the various kindred services established by the sea-girt States. The scene depicted in the illustration may be witnessed frequently by the visitor at the towns on the coasts. Especially on the dangerous shores of Massachusetts there is frequent occasion through the winter months for this desperate and perilous work. It is marvellous how promptly and unhesitatingly the men who man the boats answer a call to duty, and risk their lives to save those of persons whom they have never seen. One heroic crew at Hull, three months ago, ventured out one night in what seemed to be certain destruction, and went back and forth to a wrecked ship all night long, bringing safe to land twenty-six persons.

While it is impossible to praise too highly the devotion of these brave men, or to give too great honor to their occupation, the value of their work is surpassed by that of the Christian Church in the world. Souls around us are in danger of perishing eternally, and there is no hope of salvation for them but in the message the Church takes to them, that through Christ, whosoever will may be saved.

FROM the parsonage window the prospect looked as cheerless as could be imagined. The rain was falling with a steadiness that promised a long spell of it, and the dense black clouds above and all around confirmed the promise. Dr. Randall shivered as he looked out, and turned to the cosy open fire in his study with a feeling of comfort. But he was a conscientious man, and taking up a manuscript book from the table ran his eye carefully over its pages.

"No," he said, "there is no one whom I ought to visit this morning; the only three cases of sickness in the congregation I saw yesterday. I may spare this morning for those new books."

He glanced with a scholar's affection at several volumes on his study table, and drew his chair up for a morning's quiet reading. It was his greatest luxury, all the more enjoyable from the fact of its rarity. As a young man he had been a diligent student, and his university record proved that, had he continued his labors, his name would have been known in his own country and in Europe as that of a man of brilliant attainments. But Dr. Randall chose the humbler path of Christian usefulness, and, when he settled down among the people of his charge, he devoted his time to visiting the poor and the sick, and to devising means for improving the spiritual and material condition of the poverty-stricken people around him. His love of scholarship was not dead; but it was subdued by the higher and nobler activities of practical Christianity. His mission chapels at night, his schools in the day, and the abodes of poverty and sickness at all hours, were gladdened by his presence; and the hours spent in his library were few. It was, therefore, with rare pleasure that he sat down to a morning's reading.

His pleasure, however, was speedily interrupted. A little flaxen head appeared at the door opened just wide enough to admit it, and a child's voice said, "Papa, dear, there is a man in the hall wants to see you so badly, and Mary won't let him in because he is all wet, and his shoes are muddy."

"Tell Mary I will see him," said Dr. Randall, with a sigh. The interruption was not welcome, but if it was his Master's business that called him, that was the first consideration; and the clergyman turned his chair around to receive his visitor.

It was a man of rough exterior, and there were traces on his clothing, in white smears, of his occupation. His shoes were muddy, as the child had said, and a stream of water dripped from the umbrella he still held in his hand. Dr. Randall motioned courteously to a seat, but the stranger shook his head.

"I am only going to stay a minute, sir," he said. "I'm not one of your people, and I don't know as you'll do what I want, but if you will I'll be grateful. It's only fair to tell you I don't believe in churches nor preachers, and I've said some pretty hard things against them in my time. I never expected to ask a favor of a clergyman, but we don't know what we'll do when love drives."

"What do you want me to do?" Dr. Randall asked, kindly. "I'm not prejudiced; if I can oblige you, I will."

"Why, you see, sir, I have a little daughter, only twelve years old. She's all the world to me. I'm a poor man, but Mamie's worth more to me than the best treasure in the world. She's sick, sir, and the doctor says she'll die. Will you come and see her some time to-day? It's a rough day, but to-morrow it may be too late." The man brushed a tear away as he spoke. "I would not ask you, sir, for she's so pure and innocent that she does not need any preacher, but she goes to your Sunday-school, and she's set her heart on seeing you. I couldn't refuse her, though it goes against the grain."

"Certainly I will see her," said the clergyman; "wait a minute, and I will come with you now."

The man glanced at his working-clothes, as if to deprecate the clergyman's walking through the streets in his company. "I ain't dressed," he said, "just fit for you to walk with, but it's very kind of you."

"Oh, never mind that. In my work we think more of the man and the soul within him than of his clothes. Come along."

The man was evidently pleased by the clergyman's promptitude, and as they walked together through the streets he told his companion all about Mamie, her gentle, loving ways, and her goodness and intelligence. "I did not like her coming to your school, I admit," he said, "but it never hurt her. She didn't have airs or put on at all, but was just as good as ever."

The child's wan face brightened as the clergyman entered her room, and in a weak voice she thanked him for coming. Dr. Randall stooped, and kissed her, and asked her if she felt very sick.

"It is not that, sir," she said; "I am not in much pain. It is father, sir, I want to ask you about. I suppose I shall die—the doctor says so—and I want to ask you to try to get father to be a Christian. He says things against religion, but he's a good man. He's very kind and good, and I love him so I'm sure he'd be a Christian if he only knew. Please tell father that Jesus loves him. He thinks I don't know. If you talked to him like you talk to us at school, he'd believe it, and then he'd love Jesus."

The child's tone was so earnest, her concern for her father so sincere, and her faith in the power of Jesus' love to draw him so strong, that the clergyman's eyes moistened as he looked at her. "I will do as you wish, Mamie," he said; "God helping me, I will try to bring him to the Saviour." Turning to where the man stood behind him, he drew him gently to Mamie's side, and said, "You will let me be your friend for Mamie's sake, will you not?"

The man was too much overcome to speak, but he grasped Dr. Randall's hand, and the child's face broke into a smile of satisfaction as she saw the clasped hands. "Dear father," she said, "I'm sure you will love Jesus when you know about Him, and then when you die I will come to meet you."

The man flung himself on his knees by the bed, and his strong frame shook with his sobs. Dr. Randall, with his hand resting on the father's shoulder, knelt beside him, and prayed earnestly that light might come into his soul, and that Jesus would reveal Himself to him as a loving Saviour. The prayer was answered. The soul that would have been proof against argument was melted and touched by the love of Christ.

To the surprise of all, Mamie did not die, but lived to see her father a sincere, humble Christian.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Heart-Broken Wives and Mothers.

MADAME BALIF listened eagerly as I told my story; and when at length she began to understand what was meant by it, she thought that I must be playing some unseasonable joke upon her, and showed as much in her countenance. But when she saw that I really was in earnest, she sprang up, and cried out, "Oh, heaven! what a beastly religion! How dared your husband and you come to us Swiss with such a filthy religion as that? My eyes sank before her as she turned on me with mingled rage and disgust, as if she would wither me with her contemptuous looks. I felt as humbled as if I myself had been the author of the Revelation. "And does my Serge believe this?" she cried.

I assured her that he did believe it, and she paced the room, to and fro, as if she would go crazy; my heart ached for her. She gave way to a perfect storm of indignation, and then sobbed and cried like a child who had lost its mother. I was silent, for I knew how she must feel, and I felt that she would be relieved by tears. I had gone through the trial all alone, without one word from a woman's heart that could reach my own. And I tried to comfort her. I remembered how I had felt myself, and I believed that thus it was now with her.

How little did we either of us imagine the story she would afterwards tell me in Utah!

I tried to soothe her, and she threw her arms passionately round me, and pressed me to her throbbing heart, and wept again. She thought of her husband and her little girls. But with all her fears she dreamed not how miserable was the life that she was destined subsequently to live at the Salt Lake in poverty and polygamy.

Madame Balif was herself handsome in form and fair in feature, and in the full enjoyment of all that could be desired in her sphere of life, and was as happy as a youthful wife could be. She pictured to herself a time—not now; her Serge loved her too truly now—when her husband might cast his eyes upon some blooming damsel, younger than she was then, and might begin to take a nearer interest in polygamy. She pictured him bestowing on the youthful beauty the love and tenderness which he had always bestowed on her; how his affections would die out towards her; how her heart would be desolate and alone!

I took her hand in mine and spoke very gently to her; and when she was calmer I talked to her more freely. We found now, as we tried to look our common enemy in the face, how strong a hold Mormonism had taken of us; and it is in this that persons unacquainted with the Saints have so greatly misjudged the women of Utah; they know how small a hold such a religion—now they look upon Mormonism and polygamy as identical—would have upon themselves; and they forget how all-absorbing was our faith in Mormonism without it. We confided not wisely, but too well.

In the early history of the Mormons it is almost universally one and the same story: "Persons were found discontented with the established forms of religion; they were longing for something that had more soul vitality, something that warmed the instinctive heroism of the heart, something that could make them 'rejoice in tribulation' and be willing to forsake all for the Gospel's sake." The world is not overcrowded with persons of this condition of mind, but to a certain extent they are to be met with everywhere.

These were the feelings that produced such a rich harvest of converts in the early days of Mormonism. That which was unscriptural and degrading was hidden from view; the wolf was carefully concealed in sheep's clothing. The announcement of the Mormon missionaries, that angels were again visiting the earth, and that elders were once more being sent forth, "without purse or scrip," to gather the lost sheep of the house of Israel, was the very tidings that some persons had longed to hear. It is a pleasant thing to believe one's self miraculously visited.

The faith of such a missionary inspired faith in the hearers. They saw that he practiced what he professed, and his very poverty, joined with his earnestness, stamped him with honesty of purpose, attained for him a hearing, and awoke the sympathy of his hearers. He was invited home, and there, amidst the family circle, he related his experience, both temporal and spiritual, and delivered to them the tidings of a New Dispensation, in which all are brethren, and where equality and fraternity are practiced as well as preached, and where all are invited to partake of greater gifts.

What wonder, then, that many were deceived, and gladly accepted what appeared to them an advanced state of Christianity? Alas! had they but followed the apostle's injunction, where he says, "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world," they would not have been so easily deceived. But neglecting this, and taking it for granted that Smith was a true prophet, they were led away by a lying spirit. But as it was, the religious teachings which we had implicitly received, both before and after we embraced Mormonism, alike combined to blind us to the truth.

In this state of mind we knelt, and prayed for the Lord to increase our faith in that very doctrine which in our hearts we cursed and hated; and on our knees we wept again; and natural feelings of repugnance mingled with an earnest struggle to submit to the will of God. Madame Balif had not so much faith in Mormonism as I had, and she had consequently less to trouble her in that respect; but she loved her husband, and she knew that he was determined to go to Zion as soon as he could; and then, not only would all the luxuries of a happy home be sacrificed, but all her anticipations of the future were overshadowed by a terrible apprehension. Thus we were equally troubled, though I had to endure most, as the task of teaching the heresy fell upon me. I did at last manage to persuade her not to offer any active opposition to the alleged "revelation," but I could not satisfy her that all was right. She even went so far as to promise to try to overcome her own feelings, for if it was really true she did not wish to be found fighting against the Lord.

She had, however, hardly ceased speaking when the thought of her little daughters crossed her mind, and once more she paced the room like an enraged tigress, declaring angrily that "no polygamist should ever marry either of her sweet girls." I had felt like this for my own darling Clara. I had now a companion in misery, some one who could sympathize with me. Even had my husband detested the abominable doctrine as I did, he could not have comforted me as a woman and a mother could. My poor friend could feel as I felt, and her sympathy was very dear to me: misery loves companionship; we were sisters in affliction. Not only so; Madame Balif declared that this painful task should not rest on me alone; she would help me in speaking to the sisters. Thus we helped each other in the time of our trouble.

It must have been about this time that I received another letter from my friend Mary Burton. The post-mark is quite indistinct, but a week or two one way or the other does not signify much. In her usual quick and impulsive manner she gave me in her letter her views of the vexed question, and perhaps the reader would like to hear what she said.

"I am very miserable, sister Stenhouse, and furiously indignant. I little thought when I last wrote to you that I should have such news to tell; but I suppose you know it all without my saying a word. How we all felt when we first learned the real nature of Mormonism, no words of mine can describe; we hardly dared look one another in the face. Let me tell you how it was. One night, quite late, Elder Shrewsbury came round in a hurry, and asked particularly to see me. I went down into the parlor to meet him, and Mrs. Elsworth came down also, and remained until he went away. Elder Shrewsbury looked very strange that night, just like a man who had been doing something very wrong and was ashamed of it.

"He excused himself for coming so late, but he said he had only just received some important news, and could not rest until he had seen us. He had been round at the Conference House, in Jewin Street, and had there seen a good many of the Elders. They were all talking earnestly upon the same subject, for that day they had received, not only letters from the Mormon Apostle at Liverpool, but also copies of the Millennial Star, with the alleged 'revelation' in it, which I suppose you have seen. Of course it was simply impossible for them to doubt any longer, but most of them felt it was a cruel blow. Elder Shrewsbury said they looked at one another, but did not dare to speak. Nearly all of them had been anxiously trying to get rid of the false scandal, as they supposed that accusation to be; and in public, in their sermons, and in private to all the weak brethren, they had over and over again solemnly declared that polygamy was unheard of among the Saints, that it was only a Gentile lie; and they had proved from the Bible, and from the Book of Mormon, that a doctrine so sinful could never be believed or practiced by God's people.

"Now all this would be thrown in their teeth. Those who hated Mormonism would revile them for it, and, worse still, the Saints themselves would despise and doubt them for the falsehoods which many of them had innocently told. Who could tell where all this would end? When they were found to have been grossly deceived in such a matter, about which it was so easy to arrive at facts and certainty, who would trust them concerning other doctrines, which depended upon their veracity and testimony alone?

"Then, too, there was worse to be said about the American elders and apostles. Who could believe that Orson Pratt or Lorenzo Snow knew nothing of that unholy doctrine? And yet they denied it in the most solemn way. And, oh, Sister Stenhouse, think of the Apostle Taylor calling God to witness his truthfulness when he proved from the Book of Covenants that they had no such thing as the doctrine, and all the while he had himself five wives in Salt Lake City! Elder Shrewsbury told us all this, but he spoke slowly and disjointedly, like a man whose mind is troubled. He said he hardly knew what he was doing. Then he gave Mrs. Elsworth a copy of the Star, and he asked me, too, to read the so-called revelation carefully before I condemned it.

"I exclaimed, 'I hate and despise it, and you, and Mormonism, and all!' I was quite in a fury, and I did feel as if I hated him then. He did not answer me; he seemed too much grieved to utter a word; but I did not pity him. I felt that men who would invent such a revelation as that for their own wicked purposes deserved all the condemnation it was possible to pronounce upon them.

"As he was about to leave he said, mournfully, 'Sister Mary, I know you have good cause for anger; but be just. I have been just as much deceived as ever you have been. It has unsettled all my faith; even our best and most tried missionaries are shrinking from it. Do not blame me for what I have not done. I never deceived you about it.'

"How can I tell that?' I said. 'If the Mormon Apostles thought nothing of deceiving us, and perjury themselves, how can I trust any one? If they had only held their tongues, I should have thought it wrong of them to passively let us be deceived; but you yourself know how solemnly they affirmed that it was all false. I tell you, fairly, I sincerely hate them.'

"The apostles,' he said, 'had told some who were strong enough in the faith to hear it, all the truth, but "they gave us milk;" we were babes and our faith was weak.' 'Nonsense,' I said, 'to tell me such stuff as that! To call lies and perjury "milk"! Nice food for babes, indeed! Why, it's monstrous to talk so!'

"I cannot help it, Sister Mary,' he said; 'I am more sorry than I can tell you—but what can I do?'

"I did not answer him; and after a few moments he said: 'Mary, I want to speak to you alone about these things. Can I see you to-morrow evening, if I call?'

"I wish you would not call me Mary any more, Elder Shrewsbury,' I said; 'it is too familiar now. We have been far too friendly; but, thank heaven! I have found out in time, and know how to act.'

"He went away looking most miserable. Then I went to my own room, and tried to think the matter out. If I were married, as you are, Sister Stenhouse, and if my husband believed in the 'revelation,' I think I should go crazy. As it was, I felt it terribly. You know, dear, I told you that I liked Elder Shrewsbury very well, but nothing more. Well, that was very true then, but now I know that it was not all the truth. I take care that he shall never know what I think of him, but I know that he is not the same to me as other people. I do not think I love him; no, I'm sure I don't now; but I do feel a great deal of interest in him. That night, however, I felt very angry with him. That he had been deceived I knew, and also that he must have felt sorry for having deceived me; and, if he cares for me, he must have felt uneasy for what I might say or do, now the doctrine was proclaimed.

"Well, the more I thought of it, the more angry I became, and I couldn't sleep all night. The next morning I wrote a little note to Elder Shrewsbury, saying that after all that had happened I had fully resolved not to see him again. Many of my friends, I said, were married, and could not help themselves, but I both could and would. The Mormon sisters I should ever pity and love; but as for the Mormon men, I would never have anything to say to one of them as long as I lived. I did not want to be unkind to him personally, but I really could not trust anyone now. Then I showed this note to Mrs. Elsworth, and asked her to give it to Elder Shrewsbury when he came.

"He came, of course, and he came again and again; but I would not see him; and I did not even go to the meetings for fear of coming across him there. He had long talks with Mrs. Elsworth, and tried to get her to interfere, and at last he sent me a long letter, entreating me not to refuse him. I was cooler now, and when Mrs. Elsworth said I ought at least to see him, even if I dismissed him, then I agreed to do so, and the next night he came. He was very humble that night. You know what torrents of eloquence he pours forth about anything that interests him, and how earnest he is. But then all his eloquence had fled. He hesitated and blundered, until I really quite pitied him. He came and sat by me, and would have taken my hand, but I would not let him. He did not tell me that he loved me, but he spoke as if I were conscious of the fact; and you know, of course, I couldn't help feeling that he cared for me, whether he spoke about it or not.

"He assured me over and over again that though he had often heard the scandal, as I had done, he did not for a moment believe it; he said that he should never himself act up to the 'revelation;' that if he loved, it should be an undivided and all-absorbing love; that he would rather have less glory in eternity with one whom he could really love, than obey the 'revelation' enjoining plurality of wives and obtain a promised higher position.

"All this time he hardly once looked at me, but when I did see his eyes, they seemed very sorrowful and very earnest. I confess to you that what he said made me feel very differently for him. For a man of his ability and talents, who has such an influence, and wins so much respect from every one he meets, to be sitting there, all bashful, like a naughty child, before a young girl like me, and all because he loved me, certainly made me feel for him a pity which was near to love.

"I told him that I had quite resolved, now such a doctrine was acknowledged, never to see him again, except as I might see the other Elders at meeting. I said I believed I was still a good Mormon, as Mormons used to be; but I would never receive the evil doctrine, or be more than an ordinary friend to any who did believe it. After that I only saw him at the meeting. And oh, dear, you should see what meetings we have now! Half the people don't attend, and everything is so cold and lifeless! Some of our most earnest elders never come; and it is said among the brethren that this doctrine will produce the greatest apostasy which our Church has ever seen. Everyone seems ashamed of it. And now, dear, I have written you a terrible long letter, but you must please forgive me, for I have no one to whom I can open my heart except to you. Kiss the babies, please, for me; and write soon to your most affectionately loving MARY BURTON."

Poor Mary Burton! I said, as I folded up her letter; but it is better for her to suffer a little now, than for her to have been married first, as I was, and then, when too late to retrace my steps, to discover their false doctrines.

JESUS THE MESSIAH.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for March 3, Mark 8: 27-38, and 9: 1. Golden Text, Mark 8: 34.

The Pharisees Still Asking Signs—The Warning Against Them—A Religion of Doing—No Contact with God—Why Jesus was not the Messiah They Wanted—The Sadducees Equally Dissatisfied—Their Idea of a Messiah—The Disciples Also Looking for an Earthly King—Peter's Avowal of Faith—A Revelation not a Discovery—Ignominy not Glory to be Looked For—Self-Denial a Rule for all Christians.

THE great Teacher, Jesus, continued His work of teaching and healing. Multitudes had gathered to hear Him, and multitudes had twice been fed miraculously, both in soul and body; and all the sick among them healed; and He had stilled the winds and waves on the lake of Gennesareth. Yet, after all these proofs that He was God, and the true Messiah who should come into the world, the Pharisees sought from Him a sign from heaven! but Jesus "sighed deeply in His spirit." What sign could there be to convince them, if His mastery over winds and waves, over sickness, and death itself, did not convince them that He was the Messiah? He left them, and departed to the other side of the sea, and charged His disciples to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the leaven of Herod. These two sects were very unlike in doctrine, yet both of them were opposed to Jesus. The Pharisees were religious to a fault. As far as doing was concerned, no one could find fault with them: they were exact in all religious duties, prayers, fasting, almsgiving, tithes—nothing was neglected; but in all this religion there was

No Contact With God.

"All their works they do for to be seen of men." (Matt. 23: 5.) They were perfect without a Saviour, in their own eyes, and they wanted no Messiah except He should justify and strengthen them in their self-righteousness. One like Jesus, whose spirit and life were so exactly unlike theirs, was most unacceptable as the Messiah. They wanted a Messiah who would admire and encourage them, and praise them for their zeal, and they found in Jesus One who saw through their unreality and self-sufficiency, and who made them feel ill at ease in His presence. The Sadducees were the free-thinkers of those days, who prided themselves on their intellectual superiority, and felt very disinclined to learn from One who had no earthly pretensions, and who referred everything to His unseen Father who was in heaven. Both Pharisees and Sadducees wanted an earthly Messiah who could make a show in the world. What if Jesus had mastered the winds and the waves, He had not rid them from the Roman yoke! what if He had fed the multitudes, and had some incomprehensible and supernatural power, He only used it for the poorest and most ignorant of the people, and probably the reports had been much exaggerated! So say the wise and prudent. "Except ye receive the kingdom of heaven as a little child, ye shall in no case enter therein." The leaven of Herod was pronounced unbelief. Thus Jesus warned His disciples to beware of all which was not real contact with God. But

and thought He reproached their forgetfulness in taking no bread with them in the ship. Was this likely to be a difficulty with Him who had so marvellously multiplied the loaves on the mountain-side? He said, "Why reason ye, because ye have no bread? Perceive ye not yet, neither understand? Have ye your heart yet hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember? When I brake the five loaves among five thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? They say unto Him, twelve. And when the seven among four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up? And they said, seven. And He said unto them, How is it that ye do not understand?" Alas! the disciples, like the Pharisees, looked at things too much from an earthly instead of a heavenly standpoint. When Jesus fed the multitude the first time, they did not take His wonderful intervention as such a light upon His character and His care for them that they had nothing more to fear. On the contrary, the same night they were filled with anxiety and terror, "They considered not the miracle of the loaves, for their heart was hardened" (Mark 6: 52); and they knew and understood Jesus no better than before. Oh how often in our life have we thus grieved Jesus with our stupidity, and our slowness of heart to understand Him! He wills that every circumstance shall be an occasion to learn more of Him. "All things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might, through the thanksgiving of many, redound to the glory of God" (11 Cor. 4: 15)—every circumstance the occasion of "abundant grace," and each one an opportunity for thanksgiving!

"And Jesus went out, and His disciples, into the towns of Cæsarea Philippi; and by the way He asked His disciples, saying unto them, Whom Do Men Say That I Am?

And they answered, John the Baptist; but some say, Elias; and others, One of the Prophets." Anybody and everybody but the true Messiah! And why? Because Jesus did not respond to the world's idea of what a Messiah should be. The world's idea is that education and the highest culture of all his own powers is to bring about the blessedness and the perfection of man. Thus Jesus, who chose as His disciples some of the poorest and most ignorant of the people, could not, in its idea, be the Messiah; therefore, they must give the rein to their imagination, and think that one of the prophets had risen again! Oh how perverse is the heart of man!

"But whom say ye that I am?" Oh the patience of Jesus! How often have we put it to the proof when, again and again, we have misunderstood Him! And yet in His marvellous patience He has waited until we would hear what He had to say to us! After all the hardness of heart, and the misunderstanding of the disciples, He put the question to them, "Whom say ye that I am? And Peter answereth and said unto Him, Thou Art the Christ."

At last there was one man on earth out of those whom He came to save, who recognized in Him his Messiah! Devils had acknowledged Him before, but Peter was the first disciple who had dared to acknowledge, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." And the heart of Jesus rejoiced, and He said, "Blessed art thou Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father which is in heaven." (Matt. 16: 17.) It was no clever discovery of Peter's, but a revelation from God, and therefore Peter had no cause to be exalted. Jesus "charged them that they should tell no man." The life of Jesus in their midst was sufficient witness to that generation. "The works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of Me, that the Father hath sent Me." (John 5: 36.) The time for the testimony to Jesus was yet to come.

And now for the first time—now that they had at last arrived at the conclusion that the wondrous man they followed was indeed the Christ of God—He "began to teach them that the Son must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again." His ministry of suffering was utterly unforeseen by them. They had counted on glory in the present world, in which, when Jesus was recognized, they should have a share; but a Saviour who should be killed and rise again, this was new, and they understood it not. "He spake that saying openly." And that same Peter who had recognized His Messiahship, now took advantage of his position, and began to rebuke his Lord. If something had been revealed to him which the other disciples had not understood, he was upon a higher platform than they, and of course he thought he might take liberties which the others might not. Oh how easily poor human nature is exalted! Peter rebuked his Lord, and said, "Be it far from Thee, Lord" (or "Pity Thyself Lord"); "this shall not be unto Thee." (Matt. 16: 22.) Oh how blind was Peter to the vocation of his Lord! Jesus rebuked him, saying, "Get thee behind Me, Satan; for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men." Self-pity is of men, self renouncement of God.

And then He taught the people and the disciples together, "Whosoever will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me."

Whosoever!

There are many who think it quite right for missionaries and evangelists to lead a life of self-denial, and to put God first in everything, but they think that for them, holding as they do a certain position in society, or occupied as they are in some particular business, they must, of necessity, do as others do in everything. Of course it is impossible to make rules for the details of life, but the rule of rules for the child of God is, "He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them, and rose again." (11 Cor. 5: 15.) "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord," and Jesus was made "perfect through suffering." Yet with Jesus there is ever the resurrection side. With Him, death leads to life, sickness to healing, temptation to victory, sorrow to joy, weakness to strength.

"Behold I Make All Things New"

(Rev. 21: 5.) "For whosoever will save his life,"—seek his own interests, take care of his own reputation, undertake to manage his own health, fight his own battles—"shall lose it." It is the invariable rule that everything which we undertake for our own sake, and by our own efforts, fails us, and ends in disappointment. "But whosoever shall lose his life for My sake, and the gospel's"—whosoever shall be a living sacrifice, taking everything that comes from God, choosing nothing, refusing nothing from Him, yielding everything, and withholding nothing—"the same shall find it." The life of one who lives to please himself is a living death, a continual disappointment. Seeking for himself all which was designed for God, he gets neither God nor what he seeks for. "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul (or life)?" What can a man do with food without an appetite, riches without health, power to do good but no heart to do it, a great treasure on earth, and obliged to leave it! Oh how different is the life of one who has taken God into everything, and yielded everything to God! With him everything is a gain, everything is welcome, because he sees God in all. "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of Me, and of My words . . . of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed," but he who owns Jesus shall He confess before His Father who is in heaven.

Holy Ghost Days. By Mrs. M. Baxter.—A volume containing twenty-three of Mrs. Baxter's articles on the International Sunday-school Lessons for 1883 has just been received. Pp. 144. Price, neatly bound in cloth, 35 cents, including postage. Address Manager CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

NOTICE TO READERS OF THY HEALER.

On January 1 the size of Thy Healer was reduced to 20 pp, and the price changed from 75 cents to 50 cents. Those whose subscriptions run into 1889 will have their time extended, to credit for the difference in size and price. It is hoped that by reducing the price the circulation will be extended, otherwise it will be a considerable loss. Will not those who have found blessing through its pages recommend it to others?

ALWAYS WITH US.

Always with us, always with us,
Words of cheer, and words of love;
Thus the risen Saviour whispers,

With us when we toil in sadness,
Sowing much and reaping none;
Telling us that in the future
Golden harvests shall be won.

With us when the storm is sweeping
O'er our pathway dark and drear;
Waking hope within our bosoms,
Still every anxious fear.

With us in the lonely valley,
When we cross the chilling stream;
Lighting up the steps to glory,
With salvation's radiant beam.

PRIMULA OBCONICA. As will be seen from the illustration of a two-year-old plant, Primula Obconica is a profuse-flowering Primrose, and is as near an everblooming plant as it is possible to obtain. The flowers are pure white, shading to lilac, and have the true Primrose fragrance. The plants produce, on long stems, spikes containing from 10 to 15 flowers; upon two plants picked at random, we counted 45 and 52 flower spikes, and they had been profusely and steadily blooming for one year. A most attractive novelty. Good, strong plants 30 cts. each, or four for $1.00, postpaid.

SCOTT'S SUPERB NOVELTY COLLECTION FOR 1889. $1.00

—TEN OF THE MOST BEAUTIFUL NEW FLOWERS FOR This grand collection contains only NOVELTIES and SPECIALTIES of rare merit, and embraces one good, strong plant each of Primula Obconica, the lovely new ever-blooming Primrose, illustrated and described above; The New Mammoth Geranium—Centaur, the largest and finest of all double Geraniums; the bold trusses, of enormous size, are almost spherical balls of rich, glowing pink; see our Colored Plate; New Abutilon—Eclipse, invaluable on account of its beautifully variegated foliage, making it one of the most strikingly ornamental of all plants; New Rose—Madame Etienne, really a grand new rose of intrinsic merit; all through the summer the plants are one mass of buds and bloom; the flowers large, very double and deliciously sweet; see Colored Plate in our Catalogue for 1889; New Carnation—Wm. Swayne, early and continuous bloomer; flowers pure white, extra large and double, with richest clove fragrance. —FOR $1.00 we send one good, strong plant each of the above, and ALSO one packet each of New White Queen Aster, large-flowering and most perfect of all white Asters; New Salpiglossis Grandiflora, superbly beautiful, rich and large; Cloth of Gold Nasturtium, unequalled for beds or borders; New Erfurt Mignonette, extra full and fragrant, and all the finest varieties, mixed, of the most beautiful New Sweet Peas. IN EACH COLLECTION, as an extra premium in celebration of Our Fortieth Anniversary, we will include a choice Flower Seed Novelty. —At our regular retail prices the above plants and seeds would cost $2.30, but the entire collection—five New Plants and six packets Flower

THE MARVELOUS
CANDLE CACTUS.

Words can not describe the charming beauty of this grand plant. It grows 2 to 4 feet high, branching like a tree, and producing hundreds of golden yellow, sweet-scented flowers, large and double, like enormous roses, making a show which no plant can equal. The stems are covered with a net work of shining spines which reflect a luminous ray of light that can be seen for a long distance, hence its name—Candle. This plant has been known and eagerly sought in the wilds of Mexico for years, and seed is now offered for the first time. It germinates quick and grows rapidly, soon making fine, large-blooming plants. Seed, per packet 20 cts. together with a new Everlasting Flower Free, and our Grand Catalogue. In ordering, ask for Catalogue if you do not already possess it. Order at once, before the supply is exhausted. You may never have another opportunity of getting this most rare and grand plant.

REV. JAMES McCOSH, D. D., LL. D.,
Ex-President of Princeton.

The Second Scottish President—Witherspoon's Grand Work—A Visit to Princeton—Dr. McCosh's Methods of Work—Birth and Early Life—Licensed to Preach—Joins the Free Church—His Valuable Services—Becomes Professor at Belfast—Visit to America—Invited to Princeton—Growth of the College—His Resignation—A Characteristic Utterance.

IT is a singular coincidence that the pre-eminence of Princeton College, its reputation, its power, and its prosperity, are mainly due to the energy of two Scotchmen. Dr. McCosh, the ex-president, whose portrait, with that of his successor, the present president, appears on the preceding page, is the second of two men whose labors under God have made Princeton what she is. The first was John Witherspoon, who was chosen in 1768. Under his administration the college grew from a mere academy to an institution of national importance. Under his training James Madison, Aaron Burr, Jonathan Dayton, and other eminent men were prepared for their life work, and of his graduates, sixteen became United States Senators, forty became members of Congress, four were Secretaries in the Cabinet, and four were Governors of States. Just a century from the date of Witherspoon's appointment, Princeton again needed a President, and again a Scotchman was chosen. Scarcely less valuable have been the services rendered by him than by his honored predecessor, for in scholarship, in the number and ability of the professors, in the number and standing of the students, in the buildings and educational apparatus, and in the income of the institution, Princeton to-day is far in advance of its position in 1868, when it called to its presidential chair Dr. James McCosh.

A Visit to Princeton

some seven years ago gave the writer the privilege of an interview with the great scholar who was then at the head of the institution. Sitting in a spacious and well-furnished library, the tables of which bore evidence of the extent and variety of the literary labors performed there, Dr. McCosh looked the genius of the place. In person tall, with a stoop of the shoulders, as if the attitude of profound study and meditation had become habitual with him, with an intellectual countenance, silvery hair, and a grave, dignified bearing in keeping with his character, he received all comers, whether students or visitors, in a kindly, genial manner, in which was mingled the courtesy and dignity of the Christian gentleman. Though he was then in his seventieth year—regular lectures to the students of the college, frequent sermons, contributions to the Princeton Review and other periodicals, and the multitudinous and varied questions which must be decided every day by the president of a great college, formed but a portion of the work which Dr. McCosh found time to perform, for he had nearly always in preparation for the press some weighty volume full of sound reasoning and requiring profound thought. The Doctor, in reply to a query as to how he contrived to get through a mass of labor which would appall the majority of men, smiled gravely. His reply is worthy the consideration of all who suffer from the effects of arrears of work, a very common form of ill, which often produces nervousness, petulance, and, in its aggravated form, insanity. He said: "I give my mind wholly to one thing at a time, and I have the power of passing from one occupation to another immediately, and without any interval of wasted time." Dr. McCosh added, for the encouragement of his listener, who obviously regarded such a power with envy, "That power is not natural; I acquired it."

The Son of a Farmer,

Dr. McCosh first saw the light in Ayrshire, the county of Robert Burns. He was born April 1, 1811, and is therefore now in his seventy-eighth year. After gaining the rudiments of education in the parochial school, he proceeded to the University of Glasgow, at the age of thirteen, where he studied for five years, and won much distinction in the various classes. Thence he removed to the University of Edinburgh, where he studied under Dr. Chalmers, to whom so many of the ablest men of the day were indebted for the development of their powers of thought. In 1835 McCosh was

and was appointed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Arbroath, in Forfarshire, Scotland. In 1838, after three years' successful labor at Arbroath, he was appointed minister of the church at Brechin, in the same county, where with his colleague he had a roll of communicants numbering 1,400. At Brechin the peculiar gift Dr. McCosh possesses of training the minds of young men and women of fifteen years of age and upward became manifest. His Bible classes became famous in the locality, and he had a regular attendance at them of over 150. During his pastorate at Brechin occurred of the Church of Scotland. Dr. McCosh, with the sturdy principles that have since made him so thoroughly American, cast in his lot with the Free Church, and quitted the comfortable manse and resigned the assured income which his conscience would not suffer him to retain. He soon became one of the most prominent leaders in the movement. He not only labored incessantly as a Free Church minister, but went to different parts of the country to assist in forming and organizing new churches. He also undertook, in conjunction with a few other ministers, a tour in England, to explain the origin and principles of the Free Church and to collect money for the building of the new churches for the "outed" congregations.

The Great Disruption

Literary Work

was resumed, when the press of the first few years of the struggle was over. In 1850 he published his work on "The Method of the Divine Government, Physical and Moral." The sterling qualities of this book were quickly recognized on both sides of the Atlantic, and the reputation of Dr. McCosh became world-wide. In it he dealt with the objections to revealed religion which had been urged by German and French as well as British sceptics, and showed that even on their own ground of philosophy the religion of the Bible was based on sound philosophical principles. The publication of this work brought Dr. McCosh into prominence before the public, and the University of Glasgow conferred upon him the degree of LL. D., which was the precursor of many similar distinctions.

In 1851 Dr. McCosh was appointed by the British Government Professor of Logic and Metaphysics at Queen's College, Belfast, Ireland, and for sixteen years he conducted a most successful work in that institution. He labored not only as a professor in the college, but took an active and deep interest in the cause of national education, in the prominent religious questions of the day, and in the management of the affairs of the Irish Presbyterian Church. He also found time to write the famous work on "Typical Forms and Special Ends in Creation," and the book which established his reputation as the prince of metaphysicians—"The Intuitions of the Mind Investigated."

His Election to Princeton followed on an extensive tour of the United States, which Dr. McCosh made in 1866. During his visit he came in contact with many men of eminence and influence, who had heard of his success at Belfast and who were profoundly impressed by his genius and learning. Two years later, when the Presidency of Princeton fell vacant, there was a general feeling that Dr. McCosh was the man to fill the responsible position. The invitation was given and accepted, and during the twenty years of his reign there, proofs of the wisdom of the choice have accumulated. Mainly by his exertions, the claims of the college were brought under the notice of wealthy and generous men, who contributed to the funds during his residence there two million and a half of dollars. Some of this has been expended in the endowment of professors' chairs, and some of it in new buildings and in the renovation of those already existing.

His Resignation,

which Dr. McCosh tendered on November 10, 1887, to take effect in June, 1888, was due to the consciousness of the need of rest which a man of seventy-seven years of age could not but feel. In placing it in the hands of the trustees, he modestly remarked that the number of students was then 603, while at the commencement of his administration it was 264, although the standard of scholarship had been gradually raised. The trustees, with many expressions of regret, accepted the resignation, and in doing so passed a resolution appropriating to his use the annual sum of $2,500, to be paid quarterly, during his life, and this whether he shall continue to teach in the college or not; and that a committee be appointed to confer with Dr. McCosh and arrange, if possible, for his continuance as instructor in philosophy.

A Characteristic Utterance, worthy of the man who has stood forth as the champion of Evangelical Christianity against sceptical scientists, and whose masterly replies to Huxley, during his lecturing tour in this country, won the gratitude and admiration of the churches, may serve as an indication of his spirit, and with this we close this necessarily brief and imperfect sketch of his long and distinguished career. In the course of a sermon, delivered recently, he said: "I have for most of my life been a student of philosophy. I have been called to study all its systems, ancient and modern. None of them could make up for the want of the Bible. However important in enlarging and establishing the mind, they cannot give peace and stability to the soul." The patriarch, back among the scenes of his youth, adds, "In all my experience I have found no other name than the One by which I must be saved. How can God be just, and the justifier of the ungodly? Human reason can give no intelligent, no satisfactory, answer to this question. All its investigations conduct into ever-tickening darkness and gloom, in which fear and doubt abide. The mind feels that it has nothing to rest on, no truth on which the understanding can rest and the heart repose, till such time as it sees 'a Lamb as it had been slain in the midst of the throne of God.'"

REV. FRANCIS L. PATTON, D. D., LL. D.,
President of Princeton.

It was no easy task to find a successor with ability to carry on the work of Dr. McCosh, but the trustees of Princeton have the gratification of knowing that in the choice which they made they have the approval of the churches. The seeds of heterodoxy sown in Princeton would have had a wide sphere of operation, bringing forth baneful fruit in the pulpits and churches of all our States. It is therefore a matter for profound thankfulness that the choice of the trustees fell on so valiant a defender of evangelical truth as Dr. Francis Landey Patton. It is also gratifying to Christians who take a worthy pride in the scholarship of Princeton, that Dr. Patton is pronounced to be "the greatest metaphysician on earth" by Dr. McCosh himself, to whom a majority of people would have accorded that title. Dr. Patton is where he was born January 22, 1843. He is therefore forty-six years old. It is a curious coincidence that he also is of Scottish descent. While still a youth, he was converted under the ministry of the pastor of the Presbyterian Church which stood near the old homestead in Bermuda. The family shortly afterward removed to Canada and there young Patton was led to consecrate his life to the Christian ministry. He studied at Knox Seminary, and in 1863 went to Princeton, where he remained until 1865. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, and was successively pastor of the Forty-eighth Street Church in that city, of the Presbyterian Church at Nyack, N. Y., and of the North Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. His predilections and talents were, however, in the direction of an

and he accordingly accepted the position of professor of Didactic and Polemical Theology in the Seminary of the Presbyterian Church of the Northwest, at Chicago. His ten years' labor at that institution proved his eminent fitness for professorial duty, as it did also his capacity for hard work. During the greater part of the time he not only efficiently discharged the duties of his chair, but was the successful pastor of the Jefferson Park Church and the editor of a weekly religious journal. During the period of a serious trial for heresy occurred before the Presbytery of Chicago, and Dr. Patton's stalwart defence of the orthodox doctrines of the Church at that trial made his name known in all the churches of the land. He his alma mater, in 1881 as Stuart Professor of the Relation of Philosophy and Science to the Christian Religion, a position which his recent efforts before the Chicago Presbytery proved his capacity to fill. He has continued to occupy that post until his recent election to the Presidency of Princeton. During the interval he has been brought into close personal relations with Dr. McCosh, and the confidence of the latter in him as a suitable successor to himself is therefore no hastily formed opinion. It is also an augury of good to Princeton that Dr. Patton has had a lengthy opportunity of becoming acquainted with the methods of administration which have raised and improved the college under Dr. McCosh. Dr. Patton's talents are most conspicuously displayed in his extemporaneous addresses; he has, however, made some notable contributions to literature in works on "The Inspiration of the Bible," "A Summary of Christian Doctrine," and "The Doctrine of a Future Retribution." Besides these he has been a contributor to the periodical press.

PRINCETON COLLEGE.

PRINCETON enjoys with Yale and Harvard the distinction of being one of the trio of the oldest colleges in the United States. It was founded in 1764, and was granted a Royal charter—an article with which younger institutions of learning have happily been able to dispense. Among its Presidents have been Witherspoon, a signer of the Declaration of Independence; the famous Jonathan Edwards; Aaron Burr, father of the Vice-President; Ashbel Green; and other eminent men. The list of the graduates would include names still more distinguished in the Senate, the House, the Law Courts, and especially in the pulpit.

The four buildings sketched on the first page may be taken as a specimen of the styles of the edifices which dot the college campus. The Library (No. 1) is one of the newest buildings, and is eminently adapted to its purpose. It cost $125,000. The President's mansion (No. 2) is the finest occupied by any college president in the country. It is a stone chateau on the brow of the hill, commanding a magnificent view of the surrounding country. University Hall (No. 3) is of brick and stone, and contains, besides dormitories, a hall used for recitations, exhibitions, etc. Nassau Hall (No. 4) is one of the oldest of the buildings. It was erected in 1756, and is 175 feet long and three stories high. It still bears the marks of bullet holes showing the heat of the struggle which was waged before Washington could drive the British troops from their refuge within the walls. Besides these buildings there are the Marquand Chapel, the School of Science building, the Halsted Observatory, Murray Hall, Witherspoon Hall, the Art Museum, etc., etc.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Testing a Watch Chain.—The Rev. Mr. McLauchlan says: "A friend of mine bought what was represented to him as a gold Albert chain. It appeared to be a bargain at the price at which it was offered, and some time after his purchase my friend went to a jeweler to have it valued. 'How much is this worth?' he asked. The chain was weighed and found to be worth about $17 if it were gold. 'Oh, it is gold. See, it is stamped,' said my friend. But the jeweler was not convinced; he went into his workshop and tested it, and came back telling my friend his chain was comparatively worthless; it was not gold, it was brass slightly gilded. There are some professing Christians who may even have the stamp of Church-membership or Church-office upon them, yet though to our eyes they may appear genuine, when the Heavenly Jeweler, preparatory to setting His jewels in His crown, shall test them, then it will be known that they are only base metal."

A Young Husband and Wife Saved.—Mr. Jack relates: "One evening, a young fellow, who had just married, providentially stepped into our evangelistic meeting, and there, by God's grace, he was constrained to accept Christ. As he was about to leave the hall, he said to the minister who had spoken to him, 'Now, sir, could you kindly give me a text that would bring salvation to my young wife?' The minister thought for a moment, then gave him that passage, 'This day is salvation come to this house.' The young man went home, and told his wife that he had found Jesus, and he went on telling her about Him, until she, too, accepted Him as her Saviour; then they sang praises together till a very late hour. Very early in the morning the husband went to the minister's house. He rang the bell. The minister, astonished at this early summons, asked, through the door, who was there. 'It is I, sir; the man who was brought to the Lord in your meeting last night.' After he had been admitted, he explained the cause of his visit. 'I have come to tell you, sir, that salvation has come to my house. Praise the Lord! my wife is saved!' The good minister rejoiced with him."

A Drunkard Made a Brand-New Man.—Mr. Venter repeats a story of "Sammy Hicks," the Methodist revivalist, who used to say: "I had in my employment a journeyman, who was a hopeless drunkard. Almost all his wages went for drink, and his poor, half-starved wife and family lived in a miserable, cold, and unfurnished room. One day, I thought, after one of his drinking bouts, which had lasted some weeks, 'I will discharge this man; he is a complete ruin.' But this other thought came into my mind, 'Sam, how long did Christ bear with you before you came to Him?' 'Twenty-five years, Lord. And I thank Thee that Thou didst bear with me,' I mentally answered. Then said conscience, 'If the Lord bore so long with you, will you not bear a little longer with this drunken workman of yours?' Our quarterly love feast was near, and I resolved to try and bring this man to it. I asked him; he came; and there the Holy Spirit made him a brand-new man. Oh! how often in our dealings with others we are apt to be short of patience, and quick to take offence, forgetting altogether that if it had not been for God's long-suffering, and great patience towards us, we should have been given up long ago."

How a Girl's Heart was Reached.—Mr. Stewart remarks: "I know a little girl, who whenever she hears the name of Jesus spoken, repeats it over and over again. 'Jesus. Yes, Jesus loves me,' she will exclaim. Though young, this girl was much tormented with an evil disposition. For instance, she would go up to the cradle where her little sister was sleeping and cruelly hurt her, that she might make her scream, and then stand by enjoying the noise. She knew she was wicked, and often resolved to become better, but never was able. The minister called at the house one day, and the mother confided to him her sorrow at the conduct of her daughter. He said he could do nothing to assist her, but they could both go to Him who was able to help. They knelt and prayed, giving the little girl over into God's hands. Soon afterwards the minister was again at the house, and the child approached him and said, 'Oh, sir! I am so bad; I have tried often to be good, but I just get worse.' The minister, looking down on the tear-stained face, said, 'Just tell that to God.' Side by side they knelt and the little one prayed. Not long afterwards the minister visited the house a third time. At the door he was met by the happy mother, who exclaimed, 'My little girl is quite changed, she is a new creature in Christ Jesus now, and I cannot be attentive enough to me, instead of trying in every way to annoy me as she formerly did.'

How a Nurse Found Christ.—An Evangelist says: "I was preaching one Sunday recently at a meeting, and when the first service was over I came down from the platform to see if I could help any weary one to Christ, when a young lady came to me and said, 'Will you please speak to a lady who is very anxious about her soul?' I immediately went, and found her in great distress, with the tears streaming down her face. When I had seated myself beside her, and was opening my Bible, she exclaimed, 'It is of no use; I know the whole Gospel. I am a ladies' nurse, and have just had four patients who died on my hands. Oh! what a hypocrite I have been. I prayed with them, tried to comfort them, and was unconverted myself.' 'There is all the more hope for you,' I said gently, 'now that you see that you are a lost sinner, who has not yet been brought to God. Christ has died for us, the just for the unjust, that we might be acceptable to God.' 'Yes,' she responded, 'that is just it.' 'Let us go on our knees,' I said; and without any shame, she knelt beside me in the midst of that crowded hall. 'Now,' I said, 'give yourself over to Christ.' Then she fairly burst out with those words, 'Lord Jesus, I take Thee as mine, and I give myself to Thee.' She rose, brushed away the tears, and went over to her friend who had brought her to the meeting, to tell her the glad news. Then she turned to me and said, 'How can I ever thank you enough for having been the means of bringing me to Christ!' It was when this young woman discovered that coming to Christ was a definite transaction, that she was able to close with Him."

"Soup or No Soup!"—Mr. Wyatt relates: "A poor old man, formerly known as John the Methodist, had been always in straitened circumstances, so that when old age came upon him he had no resource but to go into the poor-house. On the first Sunday which he spent there, he went to the chapel, where he heard the minister speak from John 3:16. The sermon was vigorous and eminently practical, and as John listened to it he could not refrain from shouting, 'Hallelujah! Praise the Lord!' whenever he heard anything he thought more than ordinarily good. The minister, a true man of God, quite appreciated John's enthusiasm, but thought he would try him; so, calling next day, he said, 'John, we were all surprised at your behavior yesterday, and I would like if in future you would try to restrain yourself. and indeed if it occurs again I shall be obliged to stop your soup at the mid-day meal on Sunday.' 'Stop my soup!' ejaculated John in horror. 'Why, that is the only thing I like in the whole diet. Ah, sir, I'll try and keep quiet.' The following Sunday the sermon was again very much to John's mind. Again and again a 'Hallelujah' was on his lips, but as often the recollection of the embargo on his soup repressed the exclamation, and so, though he sat as if on thorns, he was silent throughout the service. On the third Sunday John was paying all attention, and it was evident that he was making strenuous efforts to keep down his emotion. At length, unable to refrain any longer, he leaped out of his seat and exclaimed, 'Look here, sir, soup or no soup, Hallelujah! Praise the Lord!'"

OUR OWN GENERATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, February 10, 1889.

"David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep." Acts 13: 36.

How David Served His Generation—Responsibility to Contemporaries—A Child's Prayer About a Dead Father—What Can be Done for This Generation—I. Its Need of Food—God's Provision Sufficient—Skeletons of Half-Fed Populations—How the Grindstone is Used—II. Its Need of Clothing—One-Fourth Robbing Three-Fourths—Redistribution Necessary and Inevitable—III. Its Need of Salvation—A Generation Worth Saving—Where to Begin—Pizarro's Dividing Line—A Nevada Director's Decision—David's Lovely Sleep—The Death of Livingstone—Waking up in Heaven.

THAT is a text which has for a long time been running through my mind, but not until now has it been fully revealed to me. Sermons have a time to be born as well as a time to die, a cradle as well as a grave.

David, cow-boy and stone-slinger, and fighter and czar, and dramatist and blank verse writer and prophet, did his best for the people of his time, and then went and laid down on the southern hill of Jerusalem in that sound slumber which nothing but an archangelic blast can startle. "David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep." It was his own generation that he had served; that is, the people living at the time he lived. And have you ever thought that are chiefly with the people now walking abreast of us? There are about four generations to a century now, but in olden time life was longer, and there was, perhaps, only one generation to a century. Taking these facts into the calculation, I make a rough guess, and say that there have been at least one hundred and eighty generations of the human family. With reference to them we have no responsibility. We cannot teach them, we cannot correct their mistakes, we cannot soothe their sorrows, we cannot heal their wounds. Their sepulchers are deaf and dumb to anything we might say to them. The last regiment of that great army has passed out of sight. We might halloo as loud as we could, not one of them would avert his head to see what we wanted.

I admit that I am in sympathy with the child whose father had suddenly died, and who in her little evening prayer wanted to continue

although he had gone into heaven, and no more needed her prayers, and looking up into her mother's face, said: "O mother, I cannot leave him all out. Let me say, 'Thank God that I had a good father once, so I can keep him in my prayers.'" But the one hundred and eighty generations have passed off. Passed up. Passed down. Gone forever. Then there are generations to come after our earthly existence has ceased. We shall not see them, we shall not hear any of their voices, we will take no part in their convocations, their elections, their revolutions, their catastrophes, their triumphs. We will in no wise affect the one hundred and eighty generations gone, or the one hundred and eighty generations to come, except as from the galleries of heaven the former generations look down and rejoice at our victories, or as we may by our behavior start influences, good or bad, that shall roll on through the advancing ages. But our business is, like David, to serve our own generation, the people now living, those whose lungs now breathe, and whose hearts now beat. And mark you, it is but moving. It is a "forced march" at twenty-four miles a day, each hour being a mile. Going with that celerity, it has got to be a quick service on our part, or no service at all. We not only cannot teach the one hundred and eighty generations past, and will not see the one hundred generations to come, but this generation now on the stage will soon be off, and we ourselves will be off with them. The fact is, that you and I will have to start very soon for our work, or it will be ironical and sarcastic for any one after our exit to say of us, as it was said of David, "after he had served his own generation by the will of God, he fell on sleep."

Well, now, let us look around earnestly, prayerfully, in a common-sense way, and see

What We Can Do

for our own generation. First of all, let us see to it that, as far as we can, they have enough to eat. The human body is so constituted that three times a day the body needs food as much as a lamp needs oil, as much as a locomotive needs fuel. To meet this want God has girdled the earth with apple orchards, orange groves, wheat fields, and oceans full of fish, and prairies full of cattle. And notwithstanding this, I will undertake to say that the vast majority of the human family are suffering either for lack of food or the right kind of food. Our civilization is all askew, and God only can set it right.

Many of the greatest estates of to-day have been built out of the blood and bones of unrequited toil. In olden times, for the building of forts and towers, the inhabitants of Ispahan had to contribute 70,000 human skulls, and Bagdad 90,000 human skulls, and that number of people were slain to furnish the skulls. But these two contributions added together made only 160,000 skulls, while into the tower of the world's wealth and pomp have been wrought the skeletons of uncounted numbers of the of the earth—millions of skulls. Don't sit down at your table with five or six courses of abundant supply and think nothing of that family in the next street who would take any one of those five courses between soup and almond nuts and feel they were in heaven. The lack of the right kind of food is the cause of much of the drunkenness. After drinking what many of our grocers call coffee, sweetened with what many call sugar, and eating what many of our butchers call meat, and chewing what many of our bakers call bread, many of the laboring classes feel so miserable they are tempted to put into their nasty pipes what the tobacconist calls tobacco, or go into the drinking saloons for what the rum sellers call beer. Good coffee would do much in driving out bad rum.

How can we serve our generation with enough to eat? By sitting down in embroidered slippers and lounging back in an arm-chair, our mouth puckered up around a Havana of the best brand and through clouds of luxuriant smoke reading about political economy and the philosophy of strikes? No! No! By finding out who in Brooklyn has been living on gristle, and sending them a tenderloin beefsteak. Seek out some family who through sickness or conjunction of misfortune have not enough to eat, and do for them what Christ did for the hungry multitudes of Asia Minor, multiplying the loaves and the fishes. Let us quit the surfeiting of ourselves until we cannot choke down another crumb of cake, and begin the supply of others' necessities.

So far from helping appease the world's hunger, are those whom Isaiah describes as Grinding the Faces of the Poor.

You have seen a farmer or a mechanic put a scythe or an axe on a grindstone, while some one was turning it round and round, and the man holding the axe bore on it harder and harder, while the water dropped from the grindstone, and the edge of the axe from being round and dull got keener and keener. So I have seen men who were put against the grindstone of hardship, and while one turned the crank, another would press the unfortunate harder down and harder down until he was ground away thinner and thinner—his comforts thinner, his prospects thinner and his face thinner. And Isaiah shrieks out: "What mean ye that ye grind the faces of the poor?" It is

An Awful Thing to be Hungry.

It is an easy thing for us to be in good-humor with all the world when we have no lack. But let hunger take full possession of us, and we would all turn into barbarians and cannibals and fiends. Suppose that some of the energy we are expending in useless and unavailing talk about the bread question should be expended in merciful alleviations. I have read that on which more troops met than on any other in the world's history was the battle-field of Leipsic, 160,000 men under Napoleon, 250,000 men under Schwarzeberg. No, no! The greatest and most terrific battle is now being fought all the world over: it is the struggle for food. The ground tone of the finest passage in one of the great musical masterpieces, the artist says, was suggested to him by the cry of the hungry populace of Vienna as the king rode through and they shouted, "Bread! Give us bread!" And all through the great harmonies of musical academy and cathedral I hear the pathos, the ground tone, the tragedy, of uncounted multitudes, who with streaming eyes and wan cheeks and broken hearts, in behalf of themselves and their families are pleading for bread.

Let us take another look around to see how we may serve our generation. Let us see, as far as possible, that they have enough to wear. God looks on the human race, and knows just how many inhabitants the world has. The statistics of the world's population are carefully taken in civilized lands, and every few years officers of government go through the land and count how many people there are in the United States or England, and great accuracy is reached. But when people tell us how many inhabitants there are in Asia or Africa, at best it must be a wild guess. Yet God knows the exact number of people on our planet, and he has made and if there be fifteen hundred million, fifteen thousand, fifteen hundred and fifteen people, then there is enough apparel for fifteen hundred million, fifteen thousand, fifteen hundred and fifteen. Not slouchy apparel, not ragged apparel, not insufficient apparel, but appropriate apparel. At least two suits for every being on the earth, a summer suit and a winter suit. A good pair of shoes for every living mortal. A good coat, a good hat, or a good bonnet, and a good shawl, and a complete masculine or feminine outfit of apparel. A wardrobe for all nations, adapted to all climes, and not a string or a button or a pin or a hook or an eye wanting. But, alas! where are the good clothes for three-fourths of the human race? The other one-fourth have appropriated them. The fact is, there needs to be, and will be, a redistribution. Not by anarchistic violence. If outlawry had its way, it would rend and tear and diminish, until instead of three-fourths of the world not properly attired, four-fourths would be in rags. I let you know how the Redistribution will take Place.

By generosity on the part of those who have a surplus, and increased industry on the part of those suffering from deficit. Not all, but the large majority of cases of poverty in this country, are a result of idleness or drunkenness, either on the part of the present sufferers or their ancestors. In most cases the rum jug is the maelstrom that has swallowed down the livelihood of those who are in rags. But things will change, and by generosity on the part of the crowded wardrobes, and industry and sobriety on the part of the empty wardrobes, there will be enough for all to wear. God has done His part toward the dressing of the human race. He grows a surplus of wool on the sheep's back, and flocks roam the mountains and valleys with a burden of warmth intended for transference to human comfort, when the shuttles of the factories, reaching all the way from the Chattahoochee to the Merrimac, shall have spun and woven it. In white letters of snowy fleece, God has been writing for a thousand years his wish that there might be warmth for all nations. While others are discussing the effect of high or low tariff, or no tariff at all, on wool, you and I had better see if in our wardrobes we have nothing that we can spare for the shivering, or pick out some poor lad of the street and take down to a clothing store and fit him out the winter.

Again, let us look around and see how we serve our generation. What short-sighted portals we would be if we were anxious to clothe and feed only the most insignificant part of a man, namely, his body, while we put forth effort to clothe and feed and save his soul. We are a little piece broken off a great eternity. What are we doing for the souls for this present generation? Let me say it is

A Generation Worth Saving.

Most magnificent men and women are in it. We make a great ado about the improvements in navigation, and in locomotion, and in art and machinery. We remark what wonders of telegraph and telephone and the stethoscope. That improvement is electric light over a tallow candle! But all these improvements are insignificant compared with the improvement of the human race. In olden times, once in a while, a great and good man or woman would come up, and the world has made a great fuss about it ever since, but now they are so numerous we scarcely speak about them. We put a halo about the people of the past, but I think the times demanded them it would be found we have now living in this year 1889 fifty Martin Luthers, fifty George Washingtons, fifty Lady Huntingdons, fifty Elizabeth Frys. During our civil war more splendid warriors in North and South were developed in four years than the whole world developed in the previous twenty years. I challenge the four thousand years before the Flood and the eighteen centuries after the Flood to show me the equal of charity, on a large scale, of George Peabody. This generation of men and women is more worth saving than any of the one hundred and eighty generations that have passed off.

Where Shall We Begin?

With ourselves. That is the pillar from which we must start. Prescott, the blind historian, tells us how Pizarro saved his army for the right when they were about deserting him. With his sword he made a long mark on the ground. He said: "My men, on the north side are desertion and death, on the south side is victory; on the north side Panama and poverty, on the south side Peru with all its riches. Choose for yourselves; for my part I go to the south." Stepping across the line one by one, his troops followed, and finally his whole army. The sword of God's truth draws the dividing line to-day. On one side of it are sin and ruin and death, on the other side are pardon and usefulness and happiness and heaven. You cross from the wrong side to the right side, and your family will cross with you, and your friends, and your associates. The way you go, they will go. If we are not saved, we will never save any one else.

How to Get Saved?

Be willing to accept Christ, and then accept Him instantaneously and forever. Get on the Rock first, and then you will be able to help others upon the same Rock. Men and women have been saved quicker than I have been talking about it. What! without a prayer? Yes. What! without time deliberately to think it over? Yes. What! without a tear? Yes, believe! That is all. Believe what? That Jesus died to save you from sin and death and hell. Will you? Do you? You have. Something makes me think you have. Newlight has come into your countenances. Welcome! Welcome! Hail! Hail! Saved yourselves.

How Are You to Save Others?

By testimony. Tell it to your family. Tell it to your business associates. Tell it everywhere. We will successfully preach no more religion, and will successfully talk no more religion, than we ourselves have. The most of that which you do to benefit the souls of this generation, you will effect through your own behavior. Go wrong, and that will induce others to go wrong. Go right, and that will induce others to go right. When the great Centennial Exhibition was being held in Philadelphia, the question came up among the directors as to whether they should keep the Exposition open on Sundays, when a director, who was a man of the world from Nevada, arose and said, his voice trembling with emotion and tears running down his cheeks: "I feel like a returned prodigal. Twenty years ago I went west, and into a region where we had no Sabbath, but to-day old memories come back to me, and I remember what my glorified mother taught me about keeping Sunday, and I seem to hear her voice again and feel as I did when every evening I knelt by her side in prayer. Gentlemen, I vote for the observance of the Christian Sabbath." And he carried everything by storm, and when the question was put, "Shall we open the exhibition on Sabbath?" it was almost unanimous, "No," "No." What one man can do if he does right, boldly right, emphatically right!

I confess to you that my one wish is to serve this generation, not to antagonize it, not to damage it, not to rule it, but to serve it. I would like to do something toward helping unstrap its load, to stop its tears, to balsam its wounds, and to induce it to put foot on the upward road that has at its terminus acclamation rapturous and gates pearline and garlands amaranthine and fountains rainbowed and dominions enthroned and coroneted, for I cannot forget that lullaby in the closing words of my text: "David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep."

What a Lovely Sleep it Was!

Unfilial Absalom did not trouble it. Ambitious Adonijah did not worry it. Persecuting Saul did not harrow it. Exile did not fill it with nightmare. Since a red-headed boy, amid his father's flocks at night, he had not had such a good sleep. At seventy years of age he lay down to it. He has had many a troubled sleep, as in the caverns of Adullam, or in the palace at the time his enemies were attempting his capture. But this was a peaceful sleep, a calm sleep, a restful sleep, a glorious sleep. "After he had served his generation by the will of God, he fell on sleep."

Oh, what a good thing is sleep after a hard day's work! It takes all the aching out of the head, and all the weariness out of the limbs, and all the smarting out of the eyes. From it we rise in the morning, and it is a new world. And if we, like David, serve our generation, we will at life's close have most desirable and refreshing sleep. In it will vanish our last fatigue of body, our last worriment of mind, our last sorrow of soul. To the Christian's body that was hot with raging fevers, so that the attendants must by sheer force keep on the blankets, it will be the cool sleep. To those who are thin blooded and shivering with agues, it will be the warm sleep. To those who, because of physical disorders, were terrified with night visions, it will be the dreamless sleep. To nurses and doctors and mothers who were wakened almost every hour of the night by those to whom they ministered, or over whom they watched, it will be the undisturbed sleep. To those who could not get to bed till late at night, and must rise early in the morning, and before getting rested, it will be the long sleep.

Away with all your gloomy talk about departure from this world! If we have served our generation it will not be putting out into the breakers, it will not be the fight with the King of Terrors; it will be going to sleep. A friend, writing me from Illinois, says that Rev. Dr. Wingate, President of Wake Forest College, North Carolina, after a most useful life, found his last day on earth and that in his last moments he seemed to be personally talking with Christ, as friend with friend, saying: "Oh, how delightful it is! I knew you would be with me when the time came, and I knew it would be sweet, but I did not know it would be as sweet as it is." The fact was, he had served his generation in the gospel ministry, and by the will of God he fell on sleep. When in Africa, Majwara, the servant, looked into the tent of David Livingstone and found him on his knees, he stepped back, not wishing to disturb him in prayer, and sometime after, went in and found him in the same posture, and stepped back again; but, after a while, went in and touched him, and lo! the great traveller had finished his last journey, and he had died in the grandest and mightiest posture a man ever takes—on his knees. He had served his generation by unrolling the scroll of a continent, and by the will of God fell on sleep. In the museum of Greenwich, England, there is a fragment of a book that was found in the arctic regions amid the relics of Sir John Franklin, who had perished amid the snow and ice, and the leaf of that piece of a book was turned down at the words, "When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee." Having served his generation in the cause of science and discovery by the will of God, he fell on asleep.

Why will you keep us all so nervous talking about that which is only a dormitory and a pillowed slumber, canopied by angels' wings? Sleep! Transporting sleep! And

What a Glorious Awakening!

You and I have sometimes been thoroughly bewildered after a long and fatiguing journey; we have stopped at a friend's house for the night, and after hours of complete unconsciousness we have opened our eyes, the high risen sun full in our faces, and, before we could fully collect our faculties, have said: "Where am I, whose house is this, and whose are these gardens?" And then it has flashed upon us in glad reality. And I should not wonder if, after we have served our generation, and, by the will of God, have fallen on sleep, the deep sleep, the restful sleep, we should awake in blissful bewilderment and for a little while say: "Where am I? What palace is this? Why,

This Looks Like Heaven!

It is. It is. Why, there is a building grander than all the castles of earth heaved into a mountain of splendor—that must be the palace of Jesus. And look there, at those walks lined with a foliage more beautiful than anything I ever saw before, and see those who are walking down those aisles of verdure. From what I have heard of them, those two arm in arm must be Moses and Joshua, him of Mount Sinai and him of the halting sun over Ajalon. And those two walking arm in arm must be John and Paul, the one so gentle and the other so mighty.

But I must not look any longer at those gardens of beauty, but examine this building in which I have just awakened. I look out of the window this way and that, and up and down, and I find it is a mansion of immense size in which I am stopping. All its windows of agate and its colonnades of porphyry and alabaster. Why, I wonder if this is not of which I used to read? It is, it is. There must be many of my kindred and friends in this very mansion. Hark! whose are those voices, whose are those bounding feet? I open the door and see, and lo! they are coming through all the corridors and up and down all the stairs, our long absent kindred. Why, there is father, there is mother, there are the children. All well again. All young again. All of us together again. And as we embrace each other with the cry, "Never more to part! never more to part!" the arches, the alcoves, the hallways, echo and re-echo the words, "Never more to part! never more to part!" Then our glorified friends say, "Come out with us and see heaven." And, some of them bounding ahead of us and some of them skipping beside us, we start down the ivory stairway. And we meet, coming up, one of the kings of ancient Israel, somewhat small of stature, but having a countenance radiant with a thousand victories. And as all are making obeisance to this great one of heaven I cry out, "Who is he?" and the answer comes: "This is the greatest of all the kings. It is David, who after he had served his generation by the will of God, fell on sleep."

REITERATION IN PROPHECY.

By Rev. A. J. Gordon, D. D.

Christ's Second Coming as Revealed in Scripture—No Vagueness or Uncertainty—Misconceptions About It—Christ's Own Assurances—Descriptions of the Event—Dread of It a Sign of Decaying Love—Creation Waiting for Deliverance—What is Involved in the Question.

WE are not called to watch for Christ's second personal coming as a merely possible or remotely probable occurrence. On the contrary, the Scriptures are crowded with statements of the certainty, of the literalness, of the visibility, and of the personality of His return to the earth. And, lest there should be any mistake, reiteration comes in to enforce assertion, and emphasis to enforce reiteration. "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout." It must be evident, from these texts, that inspiration anticipated the denials, refinings, and from which this doctrine would suffer, and so provided against them. For a bare repetition of these texts furnishes the best possible answer to all the various theories of a figurative or spiritual advent.

"The destruction of Jerusalem was the coming of Christ," says one. "When Titus descended upon the doomed city, with the shout of his Roman legions, then was the promise fulfilled." "The Lord Himself shall descend," repeats the Word of God. "The occurrence of death is Christ's coming to receive His people," says another. "This same Jesus shall so come," reiterates the Holy Scripture. "The diffusion of the Gospel, and the gradual transformation which it effects in human civilization, is the coming of the Redeemer," says another. "The Lord Himself shall descend," still resounds the Word.

All this is plain, and yet, alas! that the Master has need again to convince His servants of His continued personality; that they have so diffused Him into history, so confounded Him with death, so dissipated Him into a vague and shadowy presence, that we can almost hear Him saying to them, as of old He did to His disciples when they mistook Him for an apparition: "Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself."

Jesus Has Not Lost His Identity.

or so merged it with history, or with providence, or with death, that we must look in these things for His coming. "I will come again," He says. "Behold I come quickly." And this "I," which is the sacred seal of personality, "that by which one knows and is to be known throughout eternity," He has never lent or transferred to another—except only to the Holy Spirit, who is one and co-equal with Himself. He did come, invisibly and spiritually, in the advent of the Comforter. But His visible, bodily return still remained as an unfulfilled promise.

Still further is the real and personal return of Christ enforced by the explicit descriptions of the event given in the Scriptures. It is not simply the same Jesus—no substitute, no commissioned messenger, no typical event—but He "shall so come in like manner" as He went. He went up visibly, from eager eyes that recognized Him as the veritable Lord; from outstretched hands that had handled Him as the Word of life, and as He was parted from them "a cloud received Him out of their sight." And so shall He return, visibly, personally, gloriously. "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also that pierced Him."

All this, if heeded and pondered, is calculated to keep us from

in these times—the error of spiritualizing the substance and reality out of Christ's promises. Reason always allegorizes the grand realities of Scripture when it touches them; but the heart is a rigid literalist. Its affections are never content with shadows, or semblances, or substitutes. If the Church had always kept her bridal love for her absent Lord, she would never have admitted even the suggestion of an impersonal advent. It must be suspected that only a fondness for this present world, and an indifference to the glorious hope of the Church, could ever have begotten such a thought. What we dread, or dislike to believe, we easily dissipate into vagueness and unreality. The unbelieving, to whom Christ's coming means only judgment and terror, would naturally wish to forget it, and explain away its reality. But what of her of whom the apostle wrote, "I have espoused you unto one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ?" Will the bride with the letter from her betrothed husband in her hand, saying, "Surely I come quickly," admit the suggestion that He means simply that He will send some mysterious stranger to bring her to Himself, or forward some kindly provisions for rendering her comfortable and contented with His absence, so that she shall be less inclined to love His appearing, and to look for it?

Unto Them that Look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." He shall come to save from the world those whom He is now saving in the world; to complete their redemption, to present them "faultless before the presence of His glory, with exceeding joy," and to usher in the marriage of the Lamb. He shall come to right all wrong, to consummate all good; to remove the curse from our groaning earth; to wipe away all tears from off all faces; to silence pain, and to swallow up death in victory. No promise is more constantly repeated, as none is more sacred than this. If Christians shall cease to wait for their returning Lord, creation, groaning and travailing together in pain, will not. If those whom He has redeemed with His precious blood do not rejoice with singing at every sign of His approach, then, "let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fullness thereof. Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein; then let all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord: for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth."

Personal Coming.

"If I know not that God is a person, I know not that I am a person," said a great theologian. We may say, likewise: If I am not sure of Christ's personal return, I am not sure of my personal vision of His face. If I am not certain that He shall "appear in glory," I am not certain that I shall "appear with Him in glory." His identity at the advent with the Man of Nazareth, the Man of Calvary, the Man of Olivet, is the pledge of my own identity at that day. All reality, recognition, reunion, remembrance, and fellowship in the resurrection state, seem to me to be involved in the question whether He who shall come is the same Jesus, or only some shadowy substitute, or some veiled and providential manifestation of His presence.

"Blessed," therefore, "be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to His abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." The personality that survived the grave has survived all the intervening centuries.

Unchanged and Unchangeable.

And when His appearing shall be ushered in, it will be that of the man Christ Jesus, the same holy face, the same pierced hands, the same gracious voice, as at the first. This, then, is the doctrine to which the Scriptures commit your faith. You may believe, in Christ coming in temporal judgment, coming in the crises of history, coming in the triumphs of Christianity, coming in the article of death; but do you believe and confess "Jesus Christ coming in the flesh," in that veritable body of flesh and bones which He carried up into heaven? This was the confession of apostles and martyrs and reformers; and this is the creed that needs to be emphasized anew in an age so given to spiritualizing and attenuating the plain and literal facts of Scripture.

Up, therefore, Christian! Trim your lamp let its beams shine forth to meet and ming with the first advancing rays of the bright a morning star. And let its light meantime show you the way to every path of self-denial, every work of faithful service and testimony and to every avenue of holiness and purity life. Thus, with girded loins, with busy hands with uplifted eyes and with radiant faces, may you be ready to meet your descending Lord, and to exult in His glorious appearing, saying, "I am this our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us: this is the LORD; we have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in His salvation."

HELPING THE INDIANS.

HEAVY weather, swollen streams, and biting winds are reported in the Indian Territory, by Rev. W. F. Re Qua, the self-denying missionary who is laboring in faith among the tribes. It is characteristic of him that his letter received last week contains nothing of his own hardships or privations. The bitter weather he fears, must be fatal to some of the poor orphan children, for charity among the Indians but little less cold than among the whites civilized sections. Mr. Re Qua gratefully reports that one kind Christian lady in Louisiana has undertaken to adopt one little girl orphan and promises to educate her, clothe her, and train her to work. Unhappily, it is not difficult to find a suitable child. Mr. Re Qua says there are hundreds near him of such poor, neglected creatures, and he still clings to the hope that God will so touch the hearts of His people that they will contribute money to erect an orphanage for the shelter of the waifs. So much might be done for them by collecting them under one roof, teaching them to read, and telling them of the Saviour who loved them and died for them! They are growing up like wild Arab with the surroundings that must inevitably make them a misery to themselves and a source of danger to others. Among the encouragements Mr. Re Qua has received, is an offer of service by a noble Christian lady in Luton, Canada, who has means to support herself in comfort, but who offers to go into the Territory and consecrate her life to Christ's service in teaching these American heathen. Mr. Re Qua desires us to thank most sincerely the kind readers of this journal, whose gifts have enabled him to continue his work to the present time. During the past year they sent him over $400. They cannot be recompensed by those whom directly and indirectly they have helped, but they will be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. (Luke 14: 14.)

A CABIN IN THE MOUNTAINS.

CITIZENS accustomed to boast of the prosperity and intelligence of our people should read the account of a tour recently taken by Rev. James Wharton in the mountains of Tennessee which he sends to the American Missionary. One cabin which he visited is a specimen of what he found. He says: "Several of us started on a recent Saturday afternoon for a meeting among the colored people who make their home in these mountains. We crossed a rickety old wooden bridge that had been nearly washed away by the floods, and commenced to climb the mountain side by a road that was nearly as steep as a steeple, and which wended around to nearly every point of the compass, ever going up, over ruts and rocks, roots and trunks of trees, now jumping across a ravine, and next climbing a fence. At last among the thicket and brush there were some signs of life, and we came to an opening among the trees, where we saw a miserable-looking old shanty. The first thought was, Can it be possible that human beings live in a shed like this? We entered the cabin by a door-way in which we must needs bend our heads very low to get inside. The first thing that struck us was the gloom and darkness. In each corner of the room was a bed, with a smaller one pushed underneath, and two sick people suffering from slow fever. It is no wonder, for eleven people occupied this one room, about twelve feet square. Need we wonder that misery and squalor are seen all around? An old soap-box from the grocery formed a corner cupboard. Two old chairs, which, perhaps, belonged to their great-grandmother, all frame and no seat, an empty box, and a bucket of water with a tin scoop, formed the whole furniture of the mountain cabin. Poor souls! I was told that I had done wonders when one day, during an address, I got them to smile! It was quite a treat to see a smile upon their faces. Joy seems to be outside their domain altogether, and the worst feature appears to be that they have no desire for anything different. I understand there are thousands of these people who know nothing of the outside world, and many who were never five miles away from their own door-step in their life. With a patch of ground for corn, another for tobacco, with wood for the fire, they are as contented as the President; alas, too contented!"

A HIGH-CASTE HINDU CONVERT.

THE remarkable conversion of a high-caste Hindu is described, in a letter sent by the father of a lady missionary in India to a contemporary. He says that a man named Raiju Naidu, belonging to one of the most influential families in Madras, became an inquirer, and much prayer was made for him, hoping that he might become a Christian, but the obstacles in his way were very formidable. He held an excellent and remunerative position in connection with a leading Hindu paper, and was on the way to promotion.

Despite the difficulties which surrounded him, some weeks ago he came, requesting to be baptized. Dr. Rudisill, Presiding Elder of the Madras District, had several conversations with him, and examined him carefully as to his knowledge and faith. He had already given evidence of his sincerity by breaking his caste completely—by the cutting of his hair, and in other ways. The evidence of his conversion proving satisfactory, he was baptized by Dr. Rudisill, many of the people being present from invitations to a special service. It was thus kept from his friends, who, had they known of it, would have attempted to prevent it at any cost.

As soon as the fact of his baptism was known, his friends were terribly excited, and declared their purpose to spare no labor or expense to bring him back to Hinduism.

Under Dr. Rudisill's advice, he left Madras for a short time; but as it involved the missionary to whom he was sent in some difficulty, Dr. Rudisill went to bring him back to Madras. They arrived safely on Sabbath morning. Handbills had been circulated on Saturday, announcing that Raiju Naidu would address his friends in public on Sabbath morning at the regular Tamil service. They were met at the station by a large crowd, who demanded him, and were about to take him by force, but Dr. Rudisill had him safely conducted to the parsonage.

At the time appointed, a large crowd assembled, and the police attended to preserve order. Dr. Rudisill gave them such a loving talk, sympathizing with them in their trouble, that they were quite disarmed, and made no interruption. After the convert had made his address, friends crowded around, having a scheme to get him away; but he was conducted safely to the parsonage, and there the missionaries succeeded in talking with different ones on the subject of Christianity; but it was necessary to watch and protect Raiju Naidu. He stood it bravely, notwithstanding his wife and mother and female relations came and went through their bitter lamentations. He went to Bangalore, to be in company with another convert baptized there recently.

Since the conversion of Raiju, some young men, relatives, have been to the Mission, and the missionaries had a long talk with them. They were intelligent young men, and one of them said: "There are many of us who believe as you do, but we have not the courage to come out as Raiju Naidu has done." The missionaries are praying and hoping that this is the beginning of a great work. Raiju Naidu is an English scholar, and, if faithful, will be a valiant soldier of the cross.

A FIVE-DOLLAR BILL REPLACED.

A WELL-KNOWN Christian worker, rising in the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting, New York, asked permission to make a short statement. Many of those present were acquainted with him, for he has spent all his time for more than sixteen years in laboring in the cause of the sick and the poor. He is a poor man himself, but his cheery voice, his strong faith, and his indefatigable efforts to procure work for men and women in need, have often done more to help than gifts of money. On the morning of his appearance at the Fulton Street meeting he received a letter asking him to call at one of the most wretched tenements of the city. He went. A poor sufferer lay there just recovering from a long illness. He needed five dollars to carry him into the country. His visitor said: "I am nearly as poor as you are, but I have just five dollars that I was going to spend on some necessities. I will give it you, and I think the Lord will return it to me." The poor man thanked him, and the visitor went home without making the purchase, and without the five dollars. He went to his closet and told the Lord his position. From there he went to the Fulton Street prayer-meeting. "The first man I met," said he—"and there he sits—said to me, 'You must see a great deal of suffering, and have many calls for aid. I should like to help you meet them. I can't do much, but here is a five-dollar bill; use it as you have occasion.' It was the exact sum I had given away an hour before," continued Mr. H.—"the exact sum I had asked for, and here"—holding up the bill—"is a tangible answer to prayer."

PRAYER ANSWERED BY CABLE.

A YOUNG lady, now engaged in Christian work in New York, was the subject of a remarkable experience not long ago. She is a German lady, a native of Baden. Her father was an infidel, but she was brought under the influence of the gospel while living at home, and gave her heart to the Saviour. Her changed life exasperated her father, and he tried his utmost to separate her from her Christian friends and make her give up her faith. Finally, finding that all his efforts were futile, the inhuman father turned her out of doors, and told her to consider herself disinherited. The poor girl had nowhere to go, but she longed to be engaged in religious work, and believing that there was a better prospect for securing such work in New York than elsewhere, she decided to come here. A small gift from an uncle enabled her to cross the ocean, and to live here for a short time. But she could not speak English, and she could not obtain employment. Her money was soon exhausted, and she knew not what to do. In her distress she had recourse to prayer. One whole night she spent in strong supplication.

That same night in Baden there was a strange scene. Her infidel father was under conviction of sin, and in deep distress. Among other acts of wickedness for which his conscience smote him, was his harshness to his Christian daughter. He could get no rest until that, at any rate, had been atoned for. He learned that she had gone to New York, but could not find out her address. But he was in earnest, and was not to be thwarted by any difficulty. He ascertained the name of a German newspaper published in New York, and that day, without waiting for the mails, sent by the cable a sum of money and a message.

The girl would have known nothing of her father's change of heart, or of his provision for her need, but for a circumstance quite as remarkable, as an illustration of God's providence, as the remittance itself. She set out as usual one morning on her weary quest of work. She was too poor to buy a newspaper, but she saw a soiled paper that some one had dropped in the street. It was in German, and she picked it up eagerly. When she came to read it, to her surprise, her eye caught her own name. "If Miss Sophie — would call at the office of —, she would hear of something to her advantage." She lost no time in calling, and the publisher handed her her father's message and the order on the cable company for the money. Probably, no more thankful heart than hers was beating in New York City that day. She was saved from destitution, had provision for a long time to come, and, more than all, her father's heart was changed. The clergyman to whom we are indebted for this remarkable narrative heard the story from the girl's own lips.

SLAVES TRAINING FOR MISSIONARIES.

THE romance of a fugitive slave's life, as reported by Dr. George Smith, repeats with singular similarity the vicissitudes of the life of the patriarch Joseph. He says that the present Prime Minister of the King Johannes of Abyssinia is a man who in his boyhood was stolen from that country, sold by the Arabs as a slave, made his escape to India, where he came under the care of Dr. John Wilson, the eminent missionary, received Christian training, and is now back in his native land, high in place and power and honor. Some children who have recently been received into a mission-house at Aden, on the Red Sea, may yet live to attain better honors still in the service of the King of kings. Late last year a British gunboat captured three dhows laden with slaves stolen in a raid on an Abyssinian village. In the severe conflict which was necessary, the captains of the slave dhows were killed. When brought to Aden there proved to be in the company two hundred and seventeen boys and girls of from ten to twenty years of age, chiefly Abyssinians, and hence nominally Christians. They came from the extreme south of Abyssinia on the borders of the Galla country. They were captured by the Mohammedan Gallas, and were to be sold at Mocha to Moslems for infamous purposes. The English officers, with great kindness and solicitude, sought to put these rescued children under the protection of missionaries, and the Keith-Falconer mission, connected with the Scotch Free Church, has received sixty-two of them, and proposes to raise a fund of $7,500 for the education of these youths. At first no one could understand their language. They proved to be a very docile and intelligent company; and they have been placed under careful instruction. It is believed that, trained as they may be under the direct and sole care of the mission they may be prepared for Christian labors among their own people. The mission is quite enthusiastic over the possibilities connected with these young people, and it is felt that no better method could be devised for preparing missionaries for the Abyssinians and Gallas than by training these children. Some of these rescued slaves were taken to Bombay, and we learn that the American Board has been asked to receive them.

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS, THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE.

Some subscribers who have renewed for 1889 may notice that the date on the address label has not yet been changed. This is unavoidable, owing to the large number of corrections to be made; but it is being rectified as rapidly as possible. The fact of the paper being regularly received through the mail is an intimation that the renewals have been received and credited on our books.

All subscriptions, notices of changes of address, and letters connected with the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should invariably be addressed to the MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK. Advertisements for insertion on the last page and orders for books advertised on that page should be sent to MR. J. E. JEWETT, 77 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK. Some of our friends are reversing these addresses, sending their subscriptions to Mr. Jewett and their orders for books to the Manager. In both cases the mistake causes confusion and delay, and sometimes leads to errors.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Conference on Samoan Affairs Suggested by Bismarck has been agreed to by the Washington Government, and it is expected that Great Britain will participate. It is to be held in Berlin. Mr. Bayard, in an interview on February 5 with the Washington correspondent of the New York Herald, said: "There seems little ground to doubt that a peaceable and permanent settlement of all the questions of native rights in Samoa, as well as the rights of the three treaty Powers will be attained." Whether the peaceable solution hoped for by Mr. Bayard will be in the interest of Samoa is much doubted by persons acquainted with affairs in the island. The United States consul, whose resignation Mr. Bayard called for on February 7, emphatically expresses the opinion that Germany is determined to acquire possession of Samoa, that England will support her, and consequently the United States will be outvoted in the conference, and Samoan independence will be annihilated.

The Nicaraguan Canal Project Has at Last secured congressional endorsement. On February 7 the House agreed to accept the conference report, and the Bill in its amended shape was passed by a vote of 177 to 60. It now goes to the President for his signature, and if he should veto it by Mr. Bayard's advice, it is believed that sufficient votes can be relied upon to pass it over the veto. The amendments attached to the bill by the House, and which were abandoned, were embarrassing to the projectors, and were apparently devised for that purpose. So strong is the feeling in favor of the project in influential quarters, that a considerable vote would have been recorded in favor of the Government constructing the canal. As it is, however, the work will probably be more quickly and efficiently performed by the company. The endorsement of the project by Congress is the most important act of its somewhat barren record. It is difficult to fully realize how valuable the canal will be to commerce when completed.

The International Maritime Conference, to be held in Washington, D. C., in April, is attracting world-wide interest. England having now consented to send delegates, all the maritime powers of the world will be represented. The United States will have seven delegates; two are to be officers of the United States Navy, one an official of the Life-Saving Service, two ship-masters from the merchant marine—one from the sailing marine, and one from the steam marine; and two citizens who are familiar with shipping and admiralty practice. The chief business of the conference is to be the revision and improvement of the international code of flag and night signals. By this means it is hoped that a more effective and uniform system of signals will be devised and adopted, so as to plainly indicate the direction in which vessels are moving in fog, mist, falling snow, and thick weather. The subject of buoys and the devising of means for reporting derelicts and other dangers will also be considered.

The Territories Asking Admission as States will probably have to wait the action of the Fifty-first Congress. On February 7 the conferees of the two Houses came to the conclusion that no agreement was probable, and decided to report the fact to their respective Houses. It is understood that the conferees of the House of Representatives were willing to make concessions in the direction of admitting South Dakota without further delay if the Senators would concede the admission of New Mexico; but no agreement could be reached, and it is probable that the House conferees will ask for instructions from the House before any further steps are taken.

The Mammoth Strike of Horse-Car Men in New York was officially "declared off" on February 5, and the six thousand strikers were advised to make the best terms they could individually with the companies. The news was a relief to both parties and to the public. The companies had run only just sufficient cars to protect their charters, and after sunset had not dared to run any cars. Their loss during the eight days that the strike lasted must have been enormous. Besides this, the few cars that were run suffered partial demolition. At various points on the routes they were struck by bricks and missiles of various kinds, and their windows were smashed. As the companies were victors, however, they are not depressed by their losses.

A Beautiful Memorial to a Deceased Wife was dedicated in New York on February 7. Mr. John Jacob Astor, remembering the interest his late wife took in the poor in the neighborhood of Mott Street, and especially in the children, purchased two city lots at a cost of $21,000, and has erected upon them a building costing $42,000, to be used as an industrial school for boys and girls who have to earn their own livelihood. The boys sell newspapers and shine boots in the early morning hours, and the girls have chores that they attend to before going to school. At the dedication exercises reference was made to the benefits of the late Mrs. Astor's work, notably to the good reports of the 1,500 boys she placed in Western homes. Mr. C. L. Brace, who explained the object of the institution, expressed the hope that every child who participated in its advantages would be told the character of Mrs. Astor, of whom it is a memorial, and would hear that "she tried to wipe away some tears, to bind up some wounds, to make some few people happier; and that she did this in the name of Him who had made her happy."

A Cold-Blooded Massacre is Reported from Hayti. Letters dated January 28, from St. Marc, state that the Northern Army under General Hyppolite made a sudden attack simultaneously by sea and land on Gonaives, a seaport town on the northern coast of Hayti. The town was first bombarded by the ships, and then six hundred men were landed under the command of thirteen generals. In the fight that followed, Légitime's force was utterly routed, leaving many killed and wounded and 300 men and twelve generals in the hands of the men of Gonaives. The following day, according to the tale of horror, both the generals and the captured troops were taken out and shot. The ships subsequently bombarded St. Marc.

A Remarkable Witness Gave Evidence before the Parnell Commission last week. He gave his name as Beach, but he was known in America as Dr. Le Caron, and under that name practiced as a physician at Braidwood, Ill. He has been a member of various Irish societies in this country for over twenty years, has been a trusted officer of those societies, and a delegate to Irish conventions; yet all that time he has been in the pay of the British Government as a spy. He admitted that he had regularly reported to the British police all the secrets he knew of Irish plots, and appeared unconscious that there was any disgrace in doing so. Some of the evidence he gave was exceedingly damaging to Mr. Parnell and the Irish leaders in Parliament. Among other disclosures, he said that Egan told him that there were many payments made by the League which it was impossible to make public, and he instanced the paying of Dutch officers who were sent from Amsterdam to assist the Boers during the Transvaal war. Witness said he remembered the visit of Messrs. Dillon and Parnell to America in 1880. The meetings held during their stay in the United States were organized exclusively by the United Brotherhood, or Clan-na-Gael. Witness attended several meetings at which Messrs. Dillon and Parnell were present. The counsel for the Times, in order to show the relevancy of the evidence, said he did not contend that Mr. Parnell and his associates planned murders, but that they had allied themselves intimately with the Irish Republican Brotherhood, and availed themselves of its money. Knowing the character of the I. R. B., they continued their alliance with it after most distinct and positive notice. The witness then described the character and objects of the society.

A Second Revolution has, it Appears, Occurred in Uganda, where King Mwanga, the murderer of Bishop Hannington, was recently deposed. King Kiwiwa, whom the Arabs set up in place of Mwanga, and whom they expected to govern in their interest in hostility to the English missionaries, killed two of the Arab ringleaders who had been most active in the attack on the Mission stations. Thereupon another revolution was organized. Kiwiwa was deposed and his younger brother set upon the throne. Mr. Mackay, the missionary who reports the news to Zanzibar by letter, and thence by cable, says that at Usamiro, where he has taken refuge, nothing had been heard of Stanley or of Emin Pasha.

The Succession to the Throne of Austria threatens to become a serious question. Reports are current that the Emperor would prefer his granddaughter, the only child of the late Prince Rudolph, to his brother, as his successor, and will make an effort to override the Salic law, which prohibits a woman reigning over Austria, as was done over a century ago in the case of Maria Theresa. In this attempt, should he make it, he will have the sympathy of at least one foreign power. It is known that the Italian Government views with apprehension the prospect of the heir of the Duke of Modena, who was dispossessed by the unification of Italy, becoming the presumptive heir to the throne of Austria. Furthermore, both Archduke Karl and his son Franz are ultra Catholics of the House of Savoy and enemies of Italian unity, and are ardent allies of the Vatican. Advices from Pesth say that the question already engages the anxious attention of the Ministers, although no official notification respecting the succession will be made until the end of the year.

The Italian Premier Does not Share the Sanguine hopes of peace expressed by some other European statesman. The burdens entailed on that country by its relatively large army and navy, led to an appeal being made to him on February 5 to reduce military appropriations. Signor Crispi replied: "No one desires peace more than we. For three years past none have toiled more than we to attain that object. For our own part, we should like to disarm, but we cannot disarm when throughout Europe armaments are being pushed forward with redoubled activity, and when fresh fortresses are being erected along the line of our own frontier. Italy cannot, from poetical Arcadian sentiments, be the first to disarm. That would be adopting a policy unworthy of practical statesmen."

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. A Burglar's Confession Startled a Methodist clergyman in Newark, N. J., a few days ago. During a revival service held in the Central Methodist Church a man strolled in, and took a back seat. The minister did not pay special attention to him, but when the meeting was over and the pastor started for home, the man joined him. He said: "I am a burglar. I came to Newark to rob a house, but I want to confess it all to you. I came from New York with a mind bent on crime, but, entering your church in the hope of getting a chance to pick a pocket, I have learned the greatness of my guilt. I want to be saved, and I want to talk to some good man, and tell him the story of my past life." The minister looked at the man's respectable apparel, and observing his excited manner thought he must be deranged, but he was convinced of his sincerity when, on reaching his house, his companion unbuttoned his coat, and disclosed a complete set of burglar's tools and a loaded revolver. He handed these over to the minister as a proof of his sincerity. The minister prayed with him, and pointed him to Christ, and he went his way. A letter has now been received from the man's sister, stating that her brother is a new man, and has gone to honest work.

An Insane Man's Hallucination Caused Some excitement at Newark, N.J., on February 4. Some railroad men on the Pennsylvania road, on going to open a freight car which had come on from Philadelphia, were astonished to find inside an excited man, who threatened to murder the first man who dared to enter the car. The man was soothed as quickly as possible, and he then vouchsafed an explanation. He said he was guarding enormous wealth, and meant to defend it with his life. A little later he said that he was expecting his relief to come, and wondered why he was being kept on guard after he ought to have been relieved. Acting on this suggestion the railroad men caused one of their number to march up to the car in the character of the new guard, and the excited man then quietly quitted the car, giving place to the newcomer. As he walked off toward the city he was arrested by a policeman, and was found to be an escaped insane patient. There was nothing of value in the car on which he came, but he was firmly convinced that it was full of treasure. Many persons who are counted sane among us are under a similar delusion. At the last they will find that the riches they so eagerly sought, and so tenaciously clung to, are worthless, while only those prove to be really rich who were rich in faith. (James 2: 5).

An Oak-Tree Over a Thousand Years Old, according to the opinion of experts, was cut down two weeks ago in Connecticut. It stood on the hill at Woodbridge, and was regarded as a very old tree in colonial days, when it served as a guide to mariners. The tree, which was declared by Oliver Wendell Holmes, Professors Abbott and Eaton and others, to be over a thousand years of age, sheltered Washington and Lafayette when the army marched through Woodbridge, and dined under its branches. Goffe, Whalley, and Dixwell, the regicides prominent in New Haven's early history, stood at the tree and watched their distant pursuers. It was the oldest oak in America. New Haven people cheerfully contributed money at various times to prevent the owners from cutting the tree down, but finally the decay of age rendered the destruction necessary. The great age of the tree, and its prominence in New Haven history, are the principal factors in its importance, but there are many, old and young, who have tender recollections of meetings beneath the tree, which has been a favorite trysting-place of poetic young people of the present and past generations. Its wood is to be cut up and used for souvenirs, for which there is expected to be much competition. If the fact that a tree has sheltered our ancestors, inspires so much veneration for it, how much more should the descendants of godly men be drawn to love and reverence the faith which has supported generations of them through life and death, and which never can fall into senile decay! (Ps. 22: 3-5.)

A Child's Unconscious Evidence Against her mother led to a distressing scene in a court room in Hoboken, N. J., on February 1. A woman was in prison on suspicion of having stolen a gold watch. As she had always borne a good character, there was much doubt as to her guilt. On Friday, while the Recorder was on the bench, a little girl rose in court and piteously pleaded for the woman's release. She begged the Recorder to let her come home, for she and her brothers and sisters needed their mother's care. The judge was evidently moved, but he told the child that he could not let the prisoner go until that watch was found and her mother's innocence clearly proved. The child went away, but presently returned, and gleefully putting the watch on the judge's desk, asked him to let her mother go now. It was a painful task to tell the child that she had unconsciously furnished the very proof that would involve her mother in a long imprisonment; but the judge had to do it. Her distress, when she realized the fact, touched all present, but nothing could be done to help her. In earthly courts, men perceive that not even repentance and restitution are sufficient for the vindication of law. It would be well if they realized that God's justice also demands something more of the sinner. Punishment would be inevitable in every case were it not that God has Himself provided a way of escape, through the atonement of Christ, for all who avail themselves of it. (Rom. 3: 24, 25.)

The Identity of an Unknown Neighbor astonished a lady in Montreal recently. The Witness of that city states that seven years ago a lady living in Montreal heard that her sister, who lived in a distant country district and whom she had not seen for many years, was dead. The lady put on mourning, and made no further inquiry. One day last month, in the course of conversation with her grocer, she mentioned her native place and spoke of her family connections. The grocer thereupon told her, as a curious coincidence, that a customer of his, who was now living next door to her, came from the same town, and that her maiden name was the same as her own. The lady was much astonished, and immediately made a call on her next door neighbor. She was still more astonished by discovering that the neighbor was the very sister whom for seven years she had mourned as dead. When the lawyer asked Jesus who was His neighbor (Luke 10: 29), he received a lesson that is too much forgotten in this day. If Christians heeded it, though they might not find, as the Montreal lady did, an earthly relative in their neighbor, they might find one who would become a brother in Christ. (Matt. 23: 8.)

How Death Was Held Back by a Finger for a few minutes, was told recently by an eminent physician. A Boston journal publishing the reminiscences of a surgeon who served during the war, says: "Dr. Westmoreland was one day dressing the wound of a soldier who had been shot in the neck near the carotid artery. It had not been regarded as a particularly dangerous case. Suppuration had set in, however, and while the surgeon was cleansing the wound, the blood-vessel suddenly gave way. Dr. Westmoreland as quickly put his finger into the aperture and stopped the flow. The soldier glanced questioningly into the surgeon's face. 'Doctor,' he asked, 'what does that mean?' 'It means death, my poor fellow,' answered Dr. Westmoreland, a strong sympathy in his voice. A moment the soldier lay with closed eyes, as if stunned by the fatal words, then he looked up and calmly asked, 'How long can I live?' 'Until I remove my finger,' answered the doctor. 'Will—you wait a little,' the poor man asked, 'till I can—write a few words to my wife?' The doctor bowed his head affirmatively. The soldier wrote his brief letter; and then, with the pathos of resignation, said: 'I am ready, doctor.' 'I removed my finger,' said the surgeon, 'and in a little while the brave fellow was dead.'" Happy are they who, realizing that life and death are in the hands of God, and have made their peace with Him through Christ, can use the soldier's words in calm confidence, "I am ready." (II Tim. 4: 7.)

A Panic Among Girl Operatives Resulted in several injuries and much danger in Boston, Mass., recently. A tailor's shop was found to be on fire, and when the alarm reached the workroom, in which about twenty girls were employed in stitching overcoats, there was a general panic. The girls rushed to the stairs, but they were already burning, and their escape by that avenue was cut off. Then they lost self-control entirely. They broke the windows, and screamed, and struggled one with another. The fire brigade were soon on the spot and raised ladders to the windows, but, strange to say, the women seemed unable to comprehend what was being done. They were so unnerved by terror that they resisted the efforts of the firemen to save them. Some of them tried to jump from the very windows against which the ladders were placed. Several had to be taken by force, and were carried struggling to the ladders. It was with the utmost difficulty that the firemen at last succeeded in getting them out in time to save their lives. Sometimes awakened sinners are similarly overcome of terror to their own peril. Only when they cease their vain struggles to save themselves, and trust in Christ to save them, do they find rest and peace. (Mark 5: 36.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Young Women's Christian Associations of New York State will hold their second annual convention at Newburg, N. Y., February 15-17.

Mr. George Muller, of the Bristol Orphanages, has been engaged of late in an evangelistic tour in Australia, and has just left with his wife for India.

Rev. Henry Varley is addressing largely attended evangelistic services in the Theatre Royal, Melbourne, Australia, on Sunday evenings, with gratifying results.

Dr. Henry Y. Satterlee, Rector of Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church, New York, was elected, on February 6, Bishop of Michigan in succession to Bishop Harris.

Mr. George C. Needham, the evangelist, has been having large meetings in Merrion Hall, Dublin. His special services for soldiers and policemen have proved pre-eminently successful.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has closed his services at Auburn, N. Y. The results are of the most encouraging character. Over three hundred persons have made profession of faith, and at all the churches there is increased life.

The local newspaper of Guelph, Ont., Canada, continues to report astonishing results of the services Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea has been conducting in that town. Some very remarkable conversions have occurred.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon is taking daily carriage exercise in the neighborhood of Mentone, and is recovering health and strength. His recovery has been retarded by a fall through slipping on a marble staircase. No bones were broken, but he was much shaken.

A numerous signed requisition has been sent from Edinburgh, inviting Major Whittle to revisit that city. He accepted the invitation, and commenced a month's evangelistic mission on February 10. His former visit in 1880 was productive of widespread blessing.

Dr. R. J. Preston, Superintendent of the Southwestern Lunatic Asylum, Marion, Va., would be thankful to receive copies of this and other illustrated journals, old books or other Christian literature, for the reading-room, which is a valuable aid for convalescent patients.

Rev. B. Fay Mills expects to begin services in Jersey City, N. J., on February 24. He has held a conference with representatives of seven churches of various denominations, which are uniting in the movement. Union prayer meetings will be held every day of the week preceding Mr. Mills's arrival.

Gipsy Smith, the English evangelist, commenced services at Nostrand Avenue M. E. Church, Brooklyn, on February 3. The building was crowded, and upward of twenty persons went after the service to inquire the way of salvation. Several invitations to work have been sent to him. His next sphere will probably be the Central M. E. Church, New York.

Rev. L. S. Keyser, author of "The Only Way Out," which, originally published in this journal, is now having a large sale in book form, preached his farewell sermon on February 3 in his church at Elkhart, Ind. There was an overflowing congregation. He commenced his labors as the pastor of the Third Lutheran Church, Springfield, O., last Sunday.

THE QUALIFICATION OF THE ELIGIBLE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Even empty vessels borrow not a few." II Kings 4:3.
Godly People in Poverty—Neither Wealth nor Poverty Proof of Divine Favor—Encouragement for Christ's Poor—The Widow's Appeal—A Very Sore Strait—An Apparently Foolish Proceeding—The Deliverance—The Lesson of the Narrative—I. In Reference to Grace—Empty Vessels Needed—Christ Able to Fill Them—A Ploughman's Story—Emptiness is Eligibility—When the Oil Stayed—II. In Reference to Answers to Prayer—The Widow Measured the Blessings—Promises Not Claimed—III. In Reference to the Holy Spirit's Work—A Sarcastic Lady—Empty Vessels in all Lands.

THE best of men may die in poverty: here is the widow of a prophet left in destitution. We must not hastily censure those who leave their families unprovided for: circumstances may have rendered it impossible for the bread-winner to do more than supply the pressing wants of the hour. Yet assuredly it is sad to see the widow of so worthy a man in such straits! A widow, and the widow of a prophet of the Lord, our concern for her is tender.

Her husband had been among the persecuted, and having been, by oppression, deprived of all that he had, it came to pass that when he died he left his wife and children in distress; from which I gather that holy men may be in the worst of circumstances, and yet it will be no proof that the Lord has forsaken them. We may not judge a person's character by his position in life. Certainly, poverty's no sign of grace, for there are many who bring themselves to it by their own wickedness; but, on the other hand, wealth is for many there be who will have their portion in this life only, and have no inheritance in the life everlasting. As a general rule, piety is more often found among the poor than among the rich; and in persecuting times, it is almost of absolute necessity that a clean conscience should involve poverty. Let this encourage any here who are just now very low in circumstances. You are where prophets and saints have been. God can lift you up, and would do so if it were really for your good. Be more concerned to act like a Christian in your present condition than to escape from it. Remember, however poor you are, your Master was poorer, and that whatever else you have not, you still have His love. Seek to be rich in faith, if you be poor in all besides. This sorrowing widow, when she found herself in poverty, and likely to lose her sons

Went to God in Her Trouble.

She hastened to God's prophet, for that was the way in which broken hearts would then speak to God in special trials; and it was a way with which, as a prophet's widow, she was well acquainted. But now we have another Mediator, Jesus Christ the righteous, and every Christian in trouble should take his burden to his God in Christ Jesus. We readily enough tell our friends and neighbors, and it is natural we should, for the human mind wants sympathy; but faith would teach us that there is no sympathy equal to that of the man Christ Jesus, and there is no power to help equal to that of the Father.

God was pleased to ordain by His servant a way of escape for the poor woman. The little oil that she had in the house was to be multiplied till there should be enough, when sold, to pay her debts with; from which I gather that if in our distress we take our trouble to God He will deliver us. This woman is not a solitary instance; she is one of a great multitude for whom the Lord has wrought graciously.

Yet the Lord allowed His handmaid to be very sorely pressed. She could not secure delay nor make any fair terms with the hard creditor. He was already in the house, and he would be satisfied with nothing less than both her sons. She was so reduced that she had nothing in the house but a single pot of oil; what could she do? She had hoped for deliverance, but now the night of utter misery was coming on, and she saw no light. Beloved, it has been the same with many of the Lord's tried ones, and it may be the same with you. The Lord does not promise to rescue us in our time, nor to save us from waiting; rather does He see it to be right to try our faith and patience, for our good and for His own glory. Wherefore, I say to you whose turn seems to come last, be strong to wait, and do not dishonor the Lord by unbelief. Waiting in faith is a high form of worship, which, in some respects, excels the adoration of the shining ones above.

But the way in which this woman was delivered, was one which proved and exercised and strengthened her faith. She had to go and borrow empty vessels of her neighbors. That was a strange proceeding; empty oil jars would seem to be useless lumber in her house. Her neighbors, also, might make remarks upon her singular conduct. She had to shut the door, that no curious eyes might watch her, and she had then, with full confidence in God, to take her one pot of oil and go on pouring out from it into the empty vessels till they were all filled. Unbelief might have said to her,

"That is a Wild Proceeding!"

How can you fill these vessels out of that one little jar? There is but very little oil to begin with, and certainly that cannot be enough to fill all these borrowed jars. The prophet has mocked you; he is exposing you to the jests and jeers of all your neighbors." But her faith, when exercised, was equal to the emergency. She did what she was commanded to do: she did it in faith; and the result answered the end.

I. There is teaching in this narrative, first of all In Reference to Grace that is in Christ Jesus. Now in this case, notice first of all what was required. In this miracle all that was required was empty vessels. This is, precisely all that Jesus Christ requires of us, that we be to Himself and His divine fullness as empty vessels. The grace is with Him, not with us; just as the oil was in the woman's one pot, and not in the empty vessels. Suppose that one of her neighbors had said to herself, when the boy came to borrow the vessels, "Poor woman! she modestly asks for an empty oil jar, but I will send her in a full one to help her." The lad joyfully accepts the offer, and takes home a jar full of oil. When his mother is pouring out the oil, the boy brings the vessel. She looks at it, and it is full. "My child," says she, "this is of no use to me; it is full, and we cannot fill again what is full already." So, if there be one person in this world who is by nature full of merit; if there be a man in the world that does not want mercy, that has enough natural goodness to save him, why, Christ cannot do anything for him, and he cannot be of any use as a receiver of grace. As long as the man is full of himself, there is no room for Jesus Christ.

Our own supposed fullness shuts us out from receiving Christ's fullness. It must be so. You will remember and Mr. Hervey. The ploughman asked Mr. Hervey what he thought was the greatest hindrance to men's salvation. Mr. Hervey replied, "Sinful self." "No," said the ploughman, "I think righteous self is a greater hindrance to men's salvation than sinful self. They that are sinful will come to Christ for pardon, but they that think they are righteous never will." The full oil jar can hold no more. A deserving sinner (if such a person could exist) would be of no use to the Saviour, and the Saviour could be of no use to him. Remember this. Emptiness is eligibility. Want of natural goodness proves your need of God's grace, and that need is your capacity to receive.

Some will say, "Truly, I have no good works in the past; but then, I have good resolves for the future. I am going to be what I should be." Are these resolutions formed in your own strength? These also will impede the inflow of the heavenly oil. It is when we are without strength that salvation comes to us. Ah, friend! if you can save yourself, Christ will not save you. Again I remind you that you must be emptied of self ere grace can fill you.

You are saying, "But I don't feel as I should; I don't think as I should; I don't weep as I should." This only proves how empty you are; and into all this natural emptiness of yours the superabounding grace of the Lord Jesus Christ will flow till it fills you; and overflows to His praise. Oh that by an act of faith you would receive what Jesus so freely gives to as many as will receive Him! That is all the empty sinner has to do: "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God." All that the Saviour wants of us is our need of being saved, and our acceptance of His salvation. Come along with you!

Now, observe what followed. In this miracle, as soon as the empty vessels were brought, the oil flowed till they were full, of whatever size they might be. One neighbor lent a little jar, another a large one; but they were all filled. So, when a sinner receives of Jesus, he receives till he is full. "Ye are complete in Him." "Of His fullness have all we received, and grace for grace." O soul, if you believe in Jesus you shall find in Him grace to pardon you, grace to change your nature, grace to keep that nature changed, grace to preserve you till you are perfect, grace to help you till you are brought home to glory. Christ freely gives everything a sinner wants between the gates of hell and the gates of paradise. He does not half fill, but He makes the soul to say, "My cup runneth over."

What was the space in which the miracle endured? How long did this oil continue to flow? That is a point worth noticing. It flowed as long as any empty vessel could be brought; and the command was, "Borrow not a few." I know how many souls Christ will bless. He will bless as many souls as are empty, and are placed beneath the flow of His divine grace. That He filleth the hungry with good things is always the rule; and the other rule is equally sure—the rich He sendeth empty away. We know how long Christ will continue to save sinners. It is as long as any needy sinner comes to Him to be saved. "Bring me yet a vessel." Don't tell me, "There is not a vessel more," for I am sure there must be many more. Our Lord has not come to the end of the vessels yet; there are many more to be filled. There are plenty of empty vessels still about. I pray that they may be brought to the fullness of our Redeemer, and be filled to the brim.

I have used a very simple method of preaching the gospel in thus talking; but, simple as it is, there are a great many who will not understand it. Let me just rehearse it again. You have broken God's law, and you are lost. The only way in which you can get forgiveness is through the merit of Jesus, and that He will freely give you if you simply come and confess your sin, and take Him to be your all in all. Adore His mercy, magnify His love, accept His grace, yield to the working of His Holy Spirit, and you are saved. Come, empty pitcher, stand beneath the flowing fountain, and it will surely fill you. Do you understand me? The Lord make you to prove that you do so by your practical compliance with my exhortation.

II. I shall further use the text in reference to Answers to Prayer.

My conviction is, brethren, that we do not pray enough. I do not, by this remark, measure our prayers by time, but I mean that we do not ask enough of God. We are not straitened in Him, but we are often straitened in ourselves. The prophet's advice to the woman was, "Borrow empty vessels"—notice the next word—"borrow not a few." It was needful thus to urge her to large things. Covetous men need restraining, but in asking of the Lord, our hearts need enlarging. This godly widow had the blessing now at her disposal to increase or diminish. If she borrowed few vessels, she would have but little oil; if she borrowed many vessels they should all be filled, and she should have much oil. She was herself to measure out what she should have; and I believe that you and I, in the matter of spiritual blessings from God, have more to do with the measurement of our mercies than we think. We make our blessings little, because our prayers are little.

I will take two points—prayers about ourselves, and prayers about others. Concerning ourselves. Brethren, some have never brought their sins and prevalent temptations before God. One man has a hasty temper, which he says he cannot overcome. He must overcome it, if he is to be saved from sin; and what he should do is to treat his wretched temper like an empty vessel, and bring it before the Lord. I know one who, I trust, is a child of God; but, alas! he has been carried away by folly, and has dishonored the Christian name; so that now he is in deep despair, and thinks he never can be saved. I fear his despair is only another form of rebellion. If he could have faith to bring before God as well as every other, it would be overcome for him. There is no sin which the grace of God cannot subdue in us. We must not say that such and such a sin is constitutional, and, therefore, we cannot overcome it; it must be overcome, and the grace of God can do it. Bring you this empty vessel, and set it down where Jesus can come into contact with it. Perhaps, with some of you, your special trial is not so much a sin as a lack of spiritual attainment. You are still only babes in Christ. You hear of some that have gained high degrees of grace, that have become matrons in the church, or champions in Israel. My dear friends, do not suppose that these attainments are beyond your reach. Do you want them? Would they not be honorable to God, and a blessing to you? Well, then, ask for them. Set these empty vessels beneath the dropping of the divine oil, and you shall have these boons granted to you. In the matter of grace, he is poor that will be poor; but he that desires to be rich, and has faith in God, may be rich.

Suppose she had brought a number of empty vessels into the house, but she had not used them, and the oil had stayed. She would have been a very foolish woman. But are not many of us quite as foolish? We have a great many cares—cares about our boys and girls, cares about our business, cares about household concerns; but we do not bring these cares to God: we feel as if they were too little to mention to Him. This is so absurd that I will have no more to do with such a sinful silence. Let us or otherwise the case stands thus—You have your empty vessels, and you will not bring them to be filled. Why will you be so wickedly foolish? When the Lord bids you cast your care upon Him, for He careth for you, why not cast it there? Why will you carry your sin, your need, your care? These cares are different sets of empty vessels for the grace of God to fill.

The same is true with regard to prayers for others. If our children are not converted, is it not, in some cases, the fact that we have not prayed for them as we should? We have not brought them before God in supplication, and if they remain unconverted and worldly, how can we wonder? Let us not leave the empty vessels unfilled. Come, friends, think of the unconverted at home. You have still some unsaved ones; mention them again and again in prayer by name, and cease not to pray; for Christ's grace ceases not to flow, and the efficacy of prayer is not stayed. Do not cease to pray till all the family is converted, till there is not another vessel left. Let us do the same with our neighbors. Are we sufficiently earnest before God with regard to them? Might we not expect to see a great change in London, if the districts wherein we dwell were oftener on our hearts in prayer?

Let us see what we can do in this matter. Do you hesitate? When you have the keys of heaven at your girdle, will you not use them? When God puts the whole treasury of His grace into the keeping of our faith, shall we let that grace be unused for want of earnestness? When He says to us, "There is carte-blanc for you; ask what you will, and it shall be done unto you," shall we not open our mouths widely? If the Lord promises that when two agree as touching anything concerning His kingdom, He will grant it to us, why, let us agree at once. What! will you not fill up these cheques which God has signed and left blank for you? Will you fill them up for pennies or for trifling sums, when the infinite exchequer of God is laid open to you? Oh saints of God, be not straitened in yourselves, since God does not straiten you! Bring in the empty vessels, and bring in not a few.

III. Once more. I shall use the text in a third way of application in reference to

The Work of the Holy Spirit.

There was a time, in certain churches, when, if there were a few converted to God, say thirty or forty at a time, the older friends would hold up their hands, not in astonishment exactly, but in utter unbelief; for they thought some undue influence or improper excitement must have been present to bring out such a crowd. I recollect having to deal with those who would say, "We had one baptism in ten years, under the solid doctrinal teaching of our former pastor. We had a sound divine, and we were sound ourselves (and sound asleep, too!); but see what a hurry we are now in! There have been twenty persons professing to be converted in one month!" The good brethren have added, "We hope you will be very cautious. Don't receive them too fast. There is a deal of excitement abroad, and we must be judicious and watchful, for when the excitement passes away a terrible reaction may set in!" One good old lady I know of used to say sarcastically that she hoped the Church would take care that the back door was easy to open, for she was quite sure that if so many came in at the front, there would be a good number who would soon have to be turned out at the back. I am half afraid that she hoped it would be so to justify her criticisms.

Dear brethren, is not this absurd? Do not these people act on the very reverse principle of the prophet's widow. They say, "Bring very few vessels, vessels very few. Suppose some of them should not be filled! There is oil enough for one or two; do not bring more, for fear of failure in such cases. If we see the oil filling hundreds of vessels, then we say it cannot be oil, it must be some vile imitation of it. We cannot expect it can all be good oil if so many vessels are filled with it." I hope that when the Holy Ghost comes with power, and works with His truth—as He will when we fully believe in Him and obey Him—we shall then hear sermons preached which shall be the means of conversion of a whole Tabernacle full at once. God grant this not in England only. We must not fancy that at the slow pace they have been. The population of heathendom has increased at a far greater rate than the number of converts to Christianity. When the increase does come, it will come in a different style from this—in a Godlike way. Shall a nation be born at once? Perhaps it shall be so. Why not? The Spirit of God is not straitened; and when faith comes back to the Church, and she brings her many empty vessels, then the Spirit of God that is in her shall graciously multiply His divine work, and all the empty nations shall be filled. England, the United States, France, Prussia, Russia, Italy, Spain, Hindostan, China, Arabia, shall all be filled to the brim with the outpouring of God's eternal Spirit, and myriads shall be saved by the precious blood of Jesus.

Alas, we fail because we do not believe! If the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth? I fear me He would discover but here and there a grain of mustard seed. May He grant to many of us that heroic faith which, believing in God, thinks nothing of difficulties, and does not believe in impossibilities, but does the right, and preaches the truth, and expects God to bless it above what we can ask or even think. May God bless you, and may the first part of my subject be last in your recollection; if you are empty vessels, come to Christ and be filled. May He fill you with His grace for His mercy's sake! Amen, and Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE SAVAGE'S IDEA OF SOUL.*

THE conception of another self capable of going away and returning, receives what to the savage must appear conclusive verifications from the abnormal suspensions of consciousness, that occasionally occur in members of his tribe. One who has fainted, and cannot be immediately brought back to himself, (note the significance of our own phrases, returning to himself, etc.) as a sleeper can, shows him a state in which the other self has been away beyond recall. Still more is this prolonged absence of the other self shown him in cases of apoplexy, catalepsy, and other forms of suspended animation. Here for hours the other self persists in remaining away, and on returning refuses to say where he has been. Further verification is afforded by every epileptic subject into whose body, during the absence of the other self, some enemy has entered; for how else does it happen that the other self on returning denies all knowledge of what his body has been doing? And this supposition that the body has "been possessed" by some other being is confirmed by the phenomena of somnambulism and insanity.

What, then, is the interpretation inevitably put upon death? The other self has habitually returned after sleep, which simulates death. It has returned, too, after fainting, which simulates death much more. It has even returned after the rigid state of catalepsy, which simulates death very greatly. Will it not return also after this still more prolonged quiescence and rigidity? clearly it is quite possible—quite probable even. The dead man's other self is gone away for a long time, but it still exists somewhere, far or near, and may at any moment come back to do all he said he would do.

The Wonderful Body.

A prominent evolutionist teaches that man has been evolved by mechanical causes alone, under the influence of natural forces, without purpose, design, intention, or any guidance from any agency in the nature of intelligence. Starting from this assumption, then, and for brevity's sake personifying evolution, let us see what she undertook to do, and what she has accomplished in the mechanical creation of man. Starting with a speck of animated gelatin, which came into existence no one knows how, and was the first of living things, no one knows why, the problem was to make man of the dust of the earth—of such materials as she found ready to her hand—and to fill him with the breath of life and all its concomitants.

Man was to stand upright. His framework was therefore necessarily rigid, tough, and unyielding. Evolution made it of bone, and made the bone. But bones were heavy and cumbersome; and so they were made hollow—putting the least material in the strongest form. They were also, for equilibrium's sake, made with bi-lateral symmetry—right and left sides complementarily alike. And, as bone is unyielding, and as the man was to have both motion and locomotion, flexible joints were required at a hundred points. Evolution made all the joints: some hinge-like; some ball and socket; some rolling axially in grooves; and, at every joint, evolution provided sacs of lubricating liquid to prevent friction, and saw to it that the sacs should carefully be kept full.

This bony skeleton was to be for support, for motion and locomotion, and for the protection of tender parts. The brain and its appendages were to be safely housed in a bony cranium, and down the central axis of the frame. Accordingly the skull was made a hollow globe, arched on all sides, and its appended cord of nerve centre sent down the back in a cavity hollowed in the bony spine, while the spine itself, which contained and protected this precious cord, was carefully padded between all its many joints with elastic cartilages, to permit flexion, and to prevent any violent shock which might work injury. And still further to secure this end, the bony column was given a double curvature, by which it might bend, and so lessen all shocks by its elasticity. And evolution surveyed her work at this point, and saw that it was good. . . . Let us hope that the time is not far distant when men of science will no longer hesitate to admit in their writings (as most of them do in their hearts) that God reigns, the source and sum and substance of all science.

MR. JOHN WANAMAKER.

RUMOR, just now very busy with Cabinet appointments, gives the name of John Wanamaker, of Philadelphia, as that of the future Postmaster-General. Whether that is a mere guess, or is reliable news, cannot be known yet, but that Mr. Wanamaker would be a good man for the place, is conceded by all who know him, both Republicans and Democrats. His extraordinary career, and his marvellous success, show that he possesses just the kind of sagacity and administrative ability needed in the head of the Post Office Department.

Mr. Wanamaker keeps the largest retail store in America, and since the death of A. T. Stewart, of New York, is the most conspicuous living example of what enterprise and push can do in trade. He was born in Philadelphia about fifty-two years ago. His father was a poor bricklayer, and John, when fourteen years old, was sent to work in a clothing store at a weekly salary of one dollar and a half. His industry and smartness soon attracted the notice of his employers, and secured for him rapid promotion. At the end of five years he was chief salesman of the house, and his salary had increased to an extent which had permitted him to save the sum of $2,000. Four years afterward he commenced business in partnership with Nathan Brown, who died about eight years afterward, leaving Mr. Wanamaker in sole control of the growing concern. Since that time the business has extended to enormous size, chiefly through his splendid business talents.

Mr. Wanamaker as a young man was Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and has always taken a deep interest in its welfare. Not long ago, when the question of erecting a new home for the Association was being considered, Mr. Wanamaker's contribution was $50,000. He has been equally liberal in Church work, and has given many proofs that the sharp business methods with which he is reproached are not adopted to make money for its own sake.

A POLAR BEAR RELIC.

(See Illustration.)

THE spectacle depicted in the picture on this page, was witnessed on the shores of Labrador after the wreck of a ship. The wreckage of miscellaneous kinds, as it drifted ashore was seized by four huge bears, and apparently afforded them considerable exercise of ingenuity in getting at the contents of the various packages.

An incident in connection with Labrador bears, which recently appeared in a German publication, shows how much encouragement missionaries derive from the knowledge that their safety is the subject of prayer by friends at home. A Moravian missionary laboring in Labrador, during a brief visit home for rest and recuperation, was the guest of a family in which there was a very intelligent little boy. The child was a most attentive listener to the missionary's stories of Labrador life, and especially to a narrative of a hair-breadth escape from a bear. It impressed him so much that after the missionary's departure he inserted a special petition in his evening prayer, that God would continue to protect the good man from the bears. The father of the child, writing to his friend he missionary, told him of the boy's habit.

About a year afterward, the missionary having to visit a station on the coast, was in a boat managed by two Esquimaux. As the boat entered a narrow strait, a cry from one of the men startled the missionary, and looking upward in the direction to which the man pointed, he saw a huge bear on the rock above, just about to plunge into the water after the boat. The men were in desperate alarm, fearing that the boat would be upset and the lives of the whole party endangered. The missionary, relating the circumstance afterwards, said that in that moment of dire peril the thought of the little boy's prayers for his preservation from that particular danger occurred to him and gave him calm. As the bear struck the water, a well-aimed shot crippled her, and a second shot ended her life. When she was dragged ashore, the missionary thought it would be a good thing to send one of her paws to his young friend, as a tangible evidence that his prayers were answered. The writer of the article in the German paper states that he had seen the paw, well preserved and mounted, in the boy's home.

THE WIDOW'S TRUST.

"I SEE Greville has not paid his rent, yet," said Mr. Righton, a retired merchant, who had his fortune well invested in real estate. "He has never been so late before. I wonder what the reason is!"

The secretary, whom Mr. Righton addressed, looked up from his writing as his employer spoke, and said: "Mr. Greville is dead, sir. I did not know of it until this morning, when I saw his funeral leaving the house."

"Then I suppose we shall have the cottage on our hands. Call this evening and see how things stand; or stay, I will call myself this afternoon. Some of the relatives will be there perhaps, and I may get this month's rent."

"Very sorry to hear of your loss, Mrs. Greville," Mr. Righton said, when the door of a pretty, old-fashioned cottage, surrounded by a well-kept garden, was opened in answer to his ring, by a tall lady in widow's mourning. "You are Mrs. Greville, I presume?"

The widow bowed.

"Ah, yes; never had the pleasure of meeting you before. Mr. Greville knew me very well. I am Mr. Righton, the owner of the cottage. I thought I would look in to see what you were going to do about it."

"I really have not thought about it," said Alice Greville pathetically; "our loss was so sudden that there has been time to think of nothing else. I have made no plans. I shall have to get some employment."

"Sorry to hear that. You are in a very sad condition. I should recommend you to sell your furniture, and go to boarding. I suppose there are a few debts too. There is one month's rent due me. I doubt if you can get employment. Your husband was very imprudent—very imprudent indeed—to have made no provision. Did he never say anything about it?"

"Only at the last, sir. He said he had been trying to save some little sum, but he had not been able. His salary was not large, and he had been helping his family in the old country. But he had faith in God. He said he was sure God would care for us, and I believe He will."

Mr. Righton shrugged his shoulders. "I should have had a better opinion of your husband's sense," he said, "if he had put his trust in a bank or a good life insurance company. I am afraid I shall never get my rent if you have no resource but in God."

A week later, Mr. Righton again stood at the cottage door. "Have you succeeded in getting employment, Mrs. Greville?" he asked.

"No, sir," she said; "I have made inquiries, but there seems no use for such knowledge as I have. I have found no occupation as yet."

"Well, then, you will be glad to hear that I have been more successful. A friend of mine needs a housekeeper, and he will take you on my recommendation. Your child,"—looking at a girl of some ten years old who stood by her mother's chair—"was a difficulty, but there happens to be a vacancy in an orphan asylum that I can control. So you see you are both provided for, and without any supernatural intervention."

"Must I be separated from Gracie?" asked the widow, her eyes filling with tears, while she felt the child's hand close convulsively on her shoulder. "She is all I have left in the world. Oh, I could not bear that!"

"Oh! you would get over it; you will feel glad that she is being well provided for. It will be hard at first, but you will have plenty to think about, and you would not miss her."

"You have no children, Mr. Righton?"

"I? Oh, no, I never married. I could never afford it, though I had more money than your husband had, but I had more prudence, and not so much faith."

"Then you cannot understand a mother's feelings when you ask her to give up her child."

"I have not asked you to do so, madam, I came to tell you of an opportunity—a very excellent opportunity, but I am sorry to see you do not appreciate it. I wish you good day, madam, and I hope I may be treated in the same way if I ever trouble myself again for the benefit of other people." And before Mrs. Greville could say a word he had vanished, closing the door behind him with a bang.

"I will go and see that Greville woman again," Mr. Righton said a few days later to his secretary. "I cannot afford to have her occupying the house with no prospect of ever getting the rent. Very likely she has come to her senses by this time, and will accept the offer I made her." A brighter look than he had yet seen was upon Mrs. Greville's face as she admitted him; and as he passed into her little parlor he was surprised to see a tall young man sitting there, whose resemblance to her was so decided that Mr. Righton at once rightly concluded that he was the brother of whom she had spoken.

"This is Mr. Righton, Harry," said Mrs. Greville.

"Oh, I was just coming to see you," said the young man, rising. "My sister owes you a little matter of rent. I should like to pay it, and also to ask you to accept me as your tenant. Here are my references. Mrs. Greville told me of your efforts on her behalf. You were very kind, but I can manage to keep a home for her and her child, and I propose to do it."

"That is very good of you," said Mr. Righton, "very good indeed. Few young men like you would be willing to work for another man's wife and child. However, that is your affair."

"Yes, that is my affair; and now, if you will tell me the amount of the debt, we will close our first transaction, for I have to be at the depot in twenty minutes."

The Widow and Gracie at the Gate.

"That is all right, thank you, said Mr. Righton, as he pocketed the money. Turning to the widow, he added, "This is better help than God sent you."

"Excuse me," said her brother, interposing, "God sent me to her help, as surely and directly as ever He did anything in this world."

The landlord looked incredulous; but as the two men left the house at the same time, going their several ways, the brother had in his heart the glad assurance that he was right. Had he doubted, he would have been convinced when, at the end of the lane, he turned and saw the look of grateful affection on the face of his widowed sister, as she stood looking after him, while Gracie, at her side, waved her handkerchief in adieu. Still more sure was he when, in after years, he testified that association with his sister, in the home he kept for her, had been the means of leading him to Christ.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

An Odious Task.

AFTER this I entered upon a new phase of my missionary life; the elders assured me that it was my duty to teach polygamy to the women of Switzerland. Hitherto, although I had suffered much from poverty and privation, my work as a missionary had been very pleasant. I believed with my whole heart all that I taught, and my best wishes for the people around me were that they might become altogether such as I was, except in my sufferings. Now, however, all this was changed: It was no longer salvation through faith in Christ, or repentance, or baptism; it was no longer love and peace for this world of weary, dying sinners, and the promise of everlasting joy in the world to come, that I was called upon to teach. My task hitherto had been a labor of love; now it was to be a weary work of pain. How could I teach the sisters, the affection of whose guileless hearts I had won to myself—how could I teach them that which my heart abhorred, a doctrine which I hated with my whole soul!

How I strove against my rebellious nature! how I battled with myself! That God had sent the Revelation I never then questioned, and all rebellion to His will I knew must be sinful. I had no thought of evading the responsibility; my heart must be subdued. It might be subdued; it might be crushed and broken; and I could never again, I felt, be truly happy. I tried to reason with myself, and to persuade myself that it was I who was to blame, and not the Revelation. If the Lord required me to submit, it must be for some good purpose; and I must not refuse the cross that He called upon me to bear. Sometimes for a few moments something would attract my attention and divert my thoughts; but the terrible reality—polygamy—refused to be ignored, and I felt all the more bitterly afterwards.

I never was happy, for life had lost its charm for me. Ere I slept at night, one dreadful thought was haunting my pillow—it disturbed my very dreams; and when I awoke in the morning, it was with a feverish apprehension of coming evil hanging over me. All through the long, weary, day it haunted my footsteps like a spectre; and like a fearful blight that had fallen upon me, it seemed to be withering my soul. One thought was ever present in my mind—that thought, polygamy!

It can be no wonder that I lost all interest in life, and that I should almost wish to die rather than live that life of degradation which I dreaded would be mine. But death flies from those who woo her; the wretched, the weary, the hopeless, they find her not. I felt that there was no rest for me. My only comfort was in my children; no revelation, I felt, could change their relationship to me. But over my little daughter Clara I mourned, for I thought if this Revelation were acted upon by the Saints, as doubtless it would be, she would some day be called upon to suffer as I did. How little did I then, however, anticipate in what way my fears would be realized! My Clara subsequently became the daughter-in-law of Brigham Young, having married his eldest son, Joseph A. Young.

I am afraid at that time I was somewhat of a trial to my husband, for my heart was not yet quite subdued. I grew impatient at the wrong which I felt had been done to me, and I often said bitter things against the Prophet of the Lord, and all his sex, including my husband, who was then, and for years after, a devoted Mormon, and was quite horrified at what I said. He often told me that I was a great hindrance to him, and that it was impossible for any one who lived with me to enjoy the Spirit of God—and I was afraid that he only spoke the truth.

Then I repented, and sought to chasten myself; and I fasted and prayed, and asked forgiveness of God and my husband. But even when most subdued I was as unhappy as ever, and some one was sure to say something which reminded me of my trouble; and whenever the Elders came to the house they were sure to discuss the one painful topic. Then my indignant feelings all came rushing back again, and I felt the spirit of rebellion stirring within me. I could not help it, for I felt that woman's nature itself was insulted by the degrading doctrine, and any mention of it excited my anger.

My husband and the Elders had anticipated that I would not readily submit, and they bore with me as patiently as they could, losing no opportunity of strengthening me in the faith, ever keeping before me the obligation that rested upon me in particular to explain the doctrine to the Swiss sisters. They knew very well that nothing tends more to confirm the faith of the wavering than setting them to teach others. Brigham Young has always acted on this principle, and whenever any of the brethren have evinced signs of doubt or disaffection they have been at once dispatched on a mission. Their efforts to convert others have established their own faith.

Among the Swiss we had never spoken on polygamy or any kindred subject, and we were, therefore, spared the humiliation, which the British Elders experienced in having to retract their own teachings. Nevertheless, Mr. Stenhouse and the other Elders felt great anxiety as to how the new doctrine would be received. My husband did not at once openly tell them that such a Revelation had been sent from Zion; but, whenever an opportunity presented he took them aside singly, and spoke to them about polygamy; and so great was his influence with the converts that he soon won them over to the new teaching, and made them feel that they would not be justified in rejecting the Revelation. Many of the Swiss Saints, moreover, before their conversion had been more Socialists than Christians, and they probably thought that this change in the marriage institution was a sign of advancing intellectual supremacy; but their wives were very far indeed from sharing these opinions with them.

Seeing the use that is made by the Mormons of the names of the Old Testament patriarchs to excuse their abominations, I here give a short extract from Elder Stenhouse's work, in which it will be seen that the Old Testament is not on their side, as they and many others suppose.

"In the spring of 1870 Delegate Hooper delivered a very carefully prepared speech in the American House of Representatives in Washington, in defence of his constituents practicing polygamy, upon the ground that the Bible sanctioned that institution, &c. To this speech the Rev. J. P. Newman, then Chaplain of the Senate, delivered a reply. He afterwards held a discussion at Utah with Owen Pratt, in which he exhibited at least one important fact to the Mormons, namely, that the greater portion of the renowned characters mentioned in the Bible were monogamists, and not polygamists. He denied that Abraham was a polygamist: 'At no time did he have more than one wife; his connection with Hagar was an offence against God, who commanded him to put her away. Jacob had nothing to do with the evil after his conversion at Jabbok. Isaac, Joseph, Aaron, and Joshua were all monogamists. David lived eleven years after he had put away his wives. Solomon was too wicked for either party to be proud of. The great Bible law is, Let every man have his own wife, and every woman her own husband.'"

After many days and nights of prayer and fasting I prepared myself for my work. To a certain extent I had brought my own self under control—or I thought I had; and I almost felt anxious to begin, so that I might get over the painful scenes which I fully anticipated. It was agreed that Madame Balif, of whom I have already spoken as being rather sceptical when my child recovered from her critical condition, should be the first to whom the intelligence should be imparted, for it was thought that if she accepted this Revelation without much difficulty, the other sisters would be more easily won over. She was a well educated and intelligent woman, and had seen a good deal of the world. She had met her husband while traveling in Russia, had married him, and they had returned to their native land. She was in every respect a lady, but she was a spoilt child, and had her whims; and she possessed a great influence over the minds of the other sisters. On this account it was that she was selected as the victim to whom should be first imparted the mysteries of the Revelation, for it was thought that whatever reception she might give to polygamy, her views would greatly influence the conduct of the rest.

As I before mentioned, Madame Balif and her husband were models of affection to one another, and it seemed to me quite a sin that I should introduce into such a household a doctrine which could only produce disunion and misery. I had, however, schooled my heart to what I thought was my duty, and I strove to smother the rebellion rising within me. But, after all, it seemed to me hardly fair that I should be selected for this painful task. These husbands had not courage enough, or were ashamed, to tell their own wives about this wonderful Revelation; and so I, a weak woman, hating in my heart the doctrine as much as a woman could hate—I was chosen to introduce this wretched subject, and to persuade those I loved to their own misery and ruin. I had had it all fully explained to me, and I thoroughly understood the so-called beauties of the system in the sight of the Elders, and what they considered the strong points in the Revelation; but it is miserable work to try to convince others of a thing that you yourself detest.

Now that this doctrine is openly taught and accepted, the sisters of the present day will defend it, in some instances, as energetically as their husbands. Accepting it as the will of God, they have striven hard to find beauties in it, and have so far convinced themselves that they are surprised at the dullness of comprehension of the Gentiles in not seeing with them.

In Remy and Brenchley's "Journey to the Great Salt Lake City" there is an account of a long conversation one of them had with a Mormon lady, in which she seeks to defend her cause by appeals to religion, nature, and reason. He introduces the conversation with the following remarks:

"Whatever be the value of the objections which can be made to it, it possesses a great influence over the Mormons; and such is the infatuation produced by it, that women, even the best educated—women brought up in the principles of Christianity—have suffered themselves to be enticed into it, and, whether it be from impulse of feeling, or aberration of intellect, have become its sincere converts. I had the opportunity of conversing on this delicate subject with a woman who is considered extremely lady-like among the Mormons, and would be so esteemed everywhere. It is impossible to conceive with what earnestness of mind, with what an air of sincerity and conviction, she defended the new doctrine and met the objections made to it, and what a modesty of manner and language she brought to the support of so bad a cause. The only way to be saved, she said, was to be adopted into the great family of Abraham and imitate his example."

Again, this lady being asked if a Mormon bishop having eight wives was not living in contradiction to the Apostle Paul's command that a bishop must be the husband of no more than one wife, absurdly replied: "I know not what the Apostle Paul exactly meant to say by that. But it was he also who said that 'when we live in Rome, we must do as they do in Rome,' and this perhaps will be the reply to you."

But though we may get, here and there, a woman who from a sense of duty will defend this abomination, they are the exception and not the rule. William Hepworth Dixon cannot be accused of bigoted hatred to the Mormons; and, for a Gentile, he had as good an opportunity of arriving at a just conclusion as any one. During his stay in Salt Lake City he saw the President and some of the Apostles daily, was received into many Mormon houses, and introduced to nearly all the leading Saints, dined at their tables, chatted with their wives, and romped with their children. Yet he says:

"In my opinion Mormonism is not a religion for woman. . . . We found them quiet and subdued in manner, with what appeared an unnatural calm; as if all dash, all sportiveness, all life, had been preached out of them. They seldom smiled, except with a wan and wearied look, and though they are all of English race, we have never heard them laugh with the bright merriment of our English girls. They know very little, and feel an interest in very few things. They are habitually shy, such as I have never seen, except in a Syrian tent. The grace, the play, the freedom, of a young English lady is unknown to her Mormon sister. Only when the subject of a plurality of wives has been under consideration between host and guest have I ever seen a Mormon lady's face grow bright, and then it was to look a sentiment, to hint an opinion, the reverse of those maintained by Belinda Pratt. I am convinced that the practice of marrying a plurality of wives is not popular with the female Saints."

"Besides what I have seen and heard from Mormon wives, I have talked alone and freely with eight or nine different girls who are undoubted Mormons, and have made many sacrifices for their religion; but who, after seeing the family-life of their fellow-saints, have one and all become firmly hostile to marriage. One of them has received no less than seven offers, from both the old and rich and the young and poor; but all these girls prefer to remain single, to live as servants, chamber-maids, milliners, charwomen, to a life of comparative ease and leisure in the harem of a Mormon bishop."

"More than one Saint has told me that the Mormon Sarai is willing to seek out and eager to bestow any number of Hagar on her lord. I have never found one who would own it, and every lady to whom I have put this question flushed into denial, though with that caged and broken courage which seems to characterize every Mormon wife. 'Court a new wife for him!' said one lady; 'no woman could do that; and no woman would submit to be courted by a woman.' Upon asking a damsel if the wives disliked it, she replied, 'Some don't, most do. They take it for their religion; I can't say any woman likes it. Some women live very comfortably together; not many; most have their tiffs and quarrels, though their husbands may never know of them. No woman likes to see a new wife come into the house.'"

So far for Mr. Dixon's testimony. "The women, however," says Elder Stenhouse, "are not alone the sufferers by polygamy. The intelligent of the fair sex among the Mormons will readily admit this, and some even go so far as to pity their husbands, and to extend to them the genuine sympathy of their hearts, though his action has been their own curse. Brigham openly avows the great trial of his soul when 'the order' was first taught to him by Joseph Smith. Heber used to tell about his 'shedding tears enough to float a ship,' when he was 'commanded' to take another wife. The locks of another apostle are said to have silvered in a night from mental anguish; and of another and another could be told tales of terrible struggles between love and duty."

One day, quite unexpectedly to her, they had told Madame Balif that a new Revelation had been sent from Zion, and that I would explain it to her; then Monsieur Balif left the house, and remained absent until the wife whom he so devotedly loved should have heard from my lips this new thing.

Madame Balif came down-stairs singing, in her usual gay spirits, little expecting what she was going to hear; and when she came to me I felt so unfitted for my task that I dared not look her straight in the face, although she was my dearest friend, and I had such an affection for her. I stood there pale and trembling, and she thought that I was not well. I was not indeed well; I was sick at heart. Never before had the face of a friend been so unwelcome. She asked me what it was that I had to tell her; and when I hesitatingly denied having wanted to speak to her at all, she said she knew there must be something, as her husband had told her so.

I hesitated still; but at last found courage and told her all. It was a cruel task to impose upon me. Day after day I had observed her and her husband, and I had noticed their deep affection; had seen her watching at the window for his return; and he would come with a little offering of choice fruit or flowers; and I thought no woman could be happier than Madame Balif. And now for me to so cruelly awaken them from their dream of bliss!

THE GREAT TEACHER AND HIS TWELVE DISCIPLES.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for February 24, Mark 6: 1-13. Golden Text, Mark 6: 12.

Capernaum's Opportunity—Why Some Missed it—Christ's Incisive Teaching at Nazareth—Never Without Effect—The Amazement of the People—Prejudiced Against One whom they Knew—The Limits of Christ's Power—Imposed by Respect for Free-will—The Village Ministry—The Commission of the Twelve—The Power Imparted—Their Support Assured—No Provision to be Made—The Rule for Evangelists.

CHRIST'S work at Capernaum was finished for the present; all the souls in Capernaum were not yet saved, all the sick were not yet healed, all the believers had not yet become disciples, indeed, for we find the great Searcher of hearts saying, "And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day." (Matt. 11: 23.) Alas! only some were saved in Capernaum, whereas all might have been saved if they had received the Son of God; yet He must leave the city: Capernaum had had the time of her visitation! (Luke 19: 44.) "He went out from thence." It was an awful moment for Capernaum; many of her inhabitants had been within a hair's-breadth of blessing which would have transformed their whole lives on earth and opened heaven to them—

And They Missed It.

"When the Sabbath day was come, He began to teach in the synagogue." St. Luke tells us that He read the first part of Isa. 61, and said, whether in so many words, or whether as the substance of His discourse, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." (Luke 4: 21.) There was always a grip in the teaching of the Master. Since His object was not to display His eloquence or His learning, but to bring lost men into contact with His Father, His words were always directed straight to the heart and conscience, and always aroused some response. Those who did not yield themselves to Him to be saved and taught and comforted were aroused to criticise, condemn, and persecute. When He preached, something came of it; and He taught the seventy to preach in the same incisive manner, "The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you"—whether you will or no, you must have to do with it. (Luke 10: 9, 11.) Such an effect was produced at this time that every eye was riveted on Him—"all bare Him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of His mouth." (Luke 4: 22.) But they shook off the impression which the Spirit of God had made, and began to question, "From whence hath this man these things? and what wisdom is this which is given unto Him, that even such mighty works are wrought by His hands? Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James and Joseph, and of Juda and Simon? And are not His sisters here with us? And

They Were Offended at Him."

What was wrong? They could not suffer that a man who had been bred and brought up among them should develop such wonderful power of God. What was He more than they? If one of the chief priests had healed the sick and raised Jairus' daughter, or if it had been some one they had never heard of, it had been otherwise; but they had never seen anything so extraordinary in Jesus—why, then, should He be so gifted? Although the very works were manifest in Him that were foretold of the Messiah, they held to their own ideas that the Messiah would be a mighty conqueror, a regal personage, a man of note; and now that He came as one of themselves, emptying Himself, and taking upon Himself "the form of a servant," no, they would not have it that it was He—"they were offended at Him." Jesus fulfilled the prophecies. He was the Son of David, a lineal descendant, but not recognized, not acknowledged, because of the poverty of the family. He was born in Bethlehem (Mic. 5: 2); He did fulfil the prophecy, "Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped: then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing" (Isa. 35: 5, 6); but their preconceptions and their prejudices were far stronger than their belief in the Word of God. Were they not guilty? And are not we guilty if we let any prejudice or anything else come between us and the living God, between us and His true and holy Word?

Jesus made but one remark, "A prophet is not without honor, but in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house," a truth which every Christian teacher has to learn by heart. "And He could do there no mighty work, save that He laid His hands on a few sick folk, and healed them."

Jesus Could Not.

Was there anything impossible with Him? Is there now anything which God cannot accomplish? Yes; out of respect for our free-will, and for the nature which He has made capable of reciprocating the thoughts and the love of God, He has so ordered it that our faith must meet His Word in order that His mighty works may be done. "The Word preached did not profit them (the fathers in the wilderness), not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." (Heb. 4: 2.) Oh, what would not Jesus have done at Nazareth, had He not been met with unbelief! "He marvelled because of their unbelief."

But He who had been repulsed in the city, "went round about the villages teaching." Oh how much the villages in every land are neglected! So many think that a faithful and successful pastor should always come into the large cities, where many may profit by his ministry; and thus there are numbers of villages where formality, superstition, and self-righteousness prevail, and where the light of the gospel shines with a very dim light. Jesus did in the villages just as in the towns: He went "teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the Kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease among the people." It was at this time of His village-ministry that He had compassion on the multitudes—"He was moved with compassion towards them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd;" and there it was also that He said, "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few; pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that He will send forth laborers into His harvest." (Matt. 9: 36.)

Whenever Jesus exhorts His disciple to pray, He is ready to do something. He immediately called unto Him the twelve whom He had before chosen, "that they should be with Him, and that He might send them forth to preach" (Mark 3: 14), and He began to send them forth two and two, and gave them

Authority Over Unclean Spirits.

(R. V.) It is utterly useless for any of us to go forth to preach the gospel unless we know as a certain fact that the power of Jesus with us is greater than that of the devil against us, and that the unclean, worldly, indifferent spirits are subject to Him. If we look at the opposing powers, and measure them with ourselves, there is quite enough power in Satan to make us quake; but with divine authority, with a power of attorney, to act in the name of Jesus, Satan can stand no chance. We need not consider, not measure his power, "greater is He that is with you."

Jesus had taught His disciples to "take no thought for the morrow," and to lay aside all anxiety as to food, clothing, etc., "for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things" (Matt. 6: 25-32); now they must put this teaching in practice; He commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, "save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse, but be shod with sandals, and not put on two coats." What! neither bread, nor yet a scrip to carry any? But how were they to know that it would be offered to them, and that strength would last from one hospitably given meal to another? This was to be

God's Care.

The bringing of blessing where they went was to be theirs. When they went into an house they were to say, "Peace be to this house," and where men received them, the peace of God would rest upon the family, and the spiritual joy and comfort received would be far more than an equivalent for the food which they had to offer. This is the divine model for evangelists. There is nothing here of sponging upon others, and living days and weeks in a family which can ill afford it. It is the souls who are blest who shall find it the greatest privilege to give bed and board, and to set forward on his or her journey the one who has brought light and peace and liberty into a house where little or nothing of God was known before. The apostles must prove in their own life that God does provide; they must show that they can trust Him, and that He responds to that trust. But is this, then, the unvarying

Rule for Evangelists?

There is another side. Just at the great crisis of His sufferings, Jesus said to His disciples, "When I sent you without purse and scrip and shoes, lacked ye anything? And they said, nothing. Then said He unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." Thus, although His first directions are undoubtedly the rule for evangelists and missionaries, there are circumstances where another course is the right one. Alas! in these days we have made the exception the rule. Their clothing was to be equally simple—sandals, and no extra coat. Moreover, they were not to go "from house to house," but where they brought the blessing of their presence, there they must remain. Oh, what a power such evangelists and such missionaries would be in the world! "And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them." Such witnesses cannot be lightly rejected. "And they went out, and preached that men should repent. They cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them."

NOTICE TO READERS OF THY HEALER.

On January 1 the size of Thy Healer was reduced to 20 pp, and the price changed from 75 cents to 50 cents. Those whose subscriptions run into 1889 will have their time extended, to credit for the difference in size and price. It is hoped that by reducing the price the circulation will be extended, otherwise it will be a considerable loss. Will not those who have found blessing through its pages recommend it to others?

The Christian Herald Binder.—Numerous

applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar. We have also a cheaper binder, with lace instead of steel fastenings, for 50 cents, postage paid. Subscribers in Canada ordering the binders are, we believe, required to pay customs-duty upon them.

"BREAD IN THE WILDERNESS."

Out in the wilderness dreary and bare,
Hungering, thirsting and blind with despair,
Foot-sore and fainting its mazes I tread,
Eagerly crying—"Oh! where to find bread?"

Out in the wilderness ages gone by,
Multitudes followed our Lord, and the cry—
"Where find enough that this host may be fed?"

Was heard, and the five little loaves yielded bread.

So through life's wilderness off' though we go,
Human help failing us, still do we know
If but by His spirit our foot-steps are led,
'Tis He that has promis'd to feed us with bread.

And not bread alone from earth's whitened fields,

What only a perishing sustenance yields,
But manna for souls that are faint He'll supply,
That they who partake of it never may die.

LIEUT.-COL. KITCHENER,

Governor of Suakin, on the Red Sea.

Why Suakin is Valuable—Its Connection with the Slave Trade—Its Strategic Value to the Soudan—The Characteristics of the Town—Why Col. Kitchener was Made Governor—His Irish Birth—Surveying in Palestine—First Experience with the Arabs—His Daring Effort to Communicate with Gordon—Managing the Mudir of Dongola—Diplomacy at Zanzibar—Sent to Suakin—The Siege by the Mahdi's Troops—The Battle on Dec 20—The Problem of the Future.

THE town of Suakin, a picture of which appears on the preceding page, with a portrait of the young English officer who is its Governor, is a place of great strategic importance to Egypt, and the key to the seaward districts of the Soudan. The value of the town is realized not only by Egypt and the European Powers concerned in the safety of commerce and the tranquility of the region, but by the Arabs under the Mahdi, who want the port as a depot for the shipment of slaves, ivory and their other articles of export. The town is on an island, near the western shore of the Red Sea, which is connected with the mainland by a causeway three hundred feet long. It is protected on the land side, first by a high stone wall, about three-sevenths of a mile west of the town. About half a mile beyond this wall are two Egyptian forts, connected by strong intrenchments, protecting several of the wells upon which the town depends for its water supply. It is three days' sail from Suez. A road leads from the town to Tokar, about fifty miles off to the south, and another road leads to Senkat, on the west, about a hundred miles off, and thence to Berber and Khartoum, the capital of the Soudan, where Gordon was killed.

The Siege of Suakin.

Suakin is the natural port of the Egyptian Soudan, and is the only good port on that part of the coast. Over a year ago the British forces were withdrawn from Suakin, and Egypt was left alone to guard her port. Khalifa Abdullah, the Mahdi's successor, who seems to be well supplied with news of Egyptian affairs, decided that this was a good time to take Suakin, and thus secure a port for his country. So he sent Osman Digma with a force from Khartoum numbering about 4,000 men to lay siege to Suakin. He told Osman Digma to make no terms with the Egyptians, but to drive them into the sea. The siege lasted about a year, and the Egyptian Government at length declared her inability to drive the Mahdi's troops from their position, and the English Government, therefore, well aware that the surrender of Suakin would mean the indefinite extension of the slave trade, and the perpetuation of Arab control of the Soudan, as well as a serious menace to the safety of Egypt, took the business.

The Governor

appointed was Lieutenant-Colonel Kitchener, whose portrait appears on the first page. He is an Irishman. He comes of a race of soldiers. His father is Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Horatio Kitchener, who was the first of his family to settle in Ireland. The son, the subject of this sketch, was born on June 20, 1850, at Crother House, County Kerry, and is therefore now thirty-nine years of age. He was educated first at home, and then in Switzerland, France, and Germany, under private tutors. In 1868 he entered the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. Two years later he joined General Chanzy's Army of the Loire, and it was while fighting for France, during the retreat which followed the battle of Le Mans, that Horatio Kitchener first received his baptism of fire. Cold and privations brought on an attack of pleurisy, which nearly proved fatal to the young English volunteer. In 1871 he obtained a commission in the Royal Engineers, and remained till the beginning of 1874 at Chatham and Aldershot, working in the mounted troop of the telegraphists. In that year he was Employed in Palestine with Lieutenant C. R. Conder, as second in command of the Survey Expedition. During its progress he was first initiated in the methods of Arab warfare. In the spring of 1876, their camp at Safet was attacked by the Arabs, and a hand-to-hand encounter ensued, in which Lieutenant Kitchener was wounded. In 1877 he completed the survey of Galilee alone, and a great map of Palestine bears both his name and that of Lieutenant Conder. During his stay in Palestine, Lieutenant Kitchener acquired a familiar knowledge of the Turkish and Arabic languages. In 1878 he commenced the survey of Cyprus, but this was suspended; and in May 1879 he went as Vice-Consul under Sir Charles Wilson to Anatolia. Having succeeded in restoring order amongst the Circassian refugees from Bulgaria and the Caucasus, he returned to Cyprus, where he completed his survey, which was subsequently published. While in charge of the land registration department he remodelled the whole system in such a manner as to put an end to the excessive exactions of the money-lenders, receiving addresses of thanks both from the Turkish and Christian communities, and an expression of highest approbation from Lord Derby, then the Secretary of State.

In November, 1879, as second in command of the Egyptian cavalry, he went on a surveying expedition through the peninsula of Mount Sinai to Akaba, and from Akaba to the Dead Sea. Mounted Bedouins brought him the news of the massacre of Hicks Pasha and his army, and he crossed the desert immediately with a small escort, travelling by a new and difficult road by way of Ismailia to Cairo. In March, 1884, it became evident that Berber was the real key of the Soudan. The position of the Egyptian garrison in that city was becoming day by day more perilous, and it was at last resolved by the authorities to send Major Kitchener with Lieutenant Rundle, R. A., to prevent, if possible, its falling into

The Hands of the Mahdi.

They were, however, stopped at Assouan, and directed to use every exertion to organize a series of Arab outposts between Korosko and the Red Sea. A Khedivial firman placed Major Kitchener in command of the Ababdeh and Beshareen Arabs, and 1,500 of them were enlisted for the frontier force. The months of April, May, and June were passed in camel rides across the desert, in occasional skirmishes with the enemy, and in steaming up and down the Nile. Then Berber fell, and it seemed probable that Dongola also would be lost. The Mudir would naturally try to make a friend and ally, if he could, of the conquering Mahdi to save himself from being eaten up. The English were, therefore, anxious to secure the friendship of the Mudir of Dongola. Major Kitchener asked leave to go and see the Mudir, and his request was granted. Some twenty of his escort could be counted on. A holy dervish had administered to them a solemn oath, while Major Kitchener held their hands one by one on that "his enemies should be their enemies, and their friends his friends," and when they were afterwards told they were to go with him to Dongola, they did not draw back. He put on Arab dress, took $2,500 in his girdle, and with his faithful followers set out on his six days' camel ride across the desert to Dongola. He halted for the night outside the town. Affairs were in a most critical state. The wavering Mudir had practically accepted the Mahdi's commission as Emir; three days hence he was to be officially invested, and the opinion of the inhabitants was pretty equally divided between alliance and hostility to the Mahdi. But Major Kitchener's timely arrival turned the scale in favor of loyalty to Egypt; a council was hastily summoned, and it was resolved to hold Major Kitchener as a sort of hostage for the support and protection to be expected from England, and suspend for the moment, any further negotiations with the Mahdi.

Major Kitchener entered Dongola in triumph, and had an interview with the Mudir, who as he sat cross-legged on a chair, with the brown felt cap of a dervish on his head, and a rosary in his hand, assured Kitchener, between his prayers, that a Mudir with a white skin could never make common cause with a Mahdi with a black skin. Kitchener had his own opinion about the power of this race prejudice, and knew perfectly well that but for his own arrival the alliance would have been made, the difference of color notwithstanding. With the cunning of his race, the Mudir turned the arrival of the colonel and his troops to good account. No sooner had the English entered his territory, than Mustapha doubled the price of provisions, and so made a large fortune, with which he has repaired to Mecca, where he now lives in the odor of sanctity.

Major Kitchener went forward to fortify Debbah, succeeded in opening up communications with a powerful sheikh Saleh of the Kabbabish, whose son had been killed by the Mahdi; and organized as best he could, a plan of who was then shut up in Khartoum waiting vainly for the deliverance that the dilatory English Government did not send until too late. Kitchener displayed considerable ingenuity in communicating with Gordon by means of minute letters concealed in the ferrule of a spear, a soldered box floating in a water-skin, or an empty amulet case. The majority of the envoys, however, were killed, and no one man ever got through to Khartoum twice. All that summer of 1884 Kitchener lived with his life in his hand. His position at Debbah and Dongola was identical with that of Gordon at Khartoum, for the Mudir and his men were at heart in sympathy with the Mahdi, and only by Kitchener's tact were kept from joining hands with the enemy. Then came the English advance up the Nile, and Major Kitchener was appointed Deputy Assistant-Adjutant-General of the Intelligence Department under Sir Charles Wilson. It was at this time that Major Kitchener heard from Gordon of Colonel Stewart's memorable journey down the Nile. He sent messengers to various points to warn him of the treachery of the Monasir tribe, but they must have failed to reach the river.

Then came the final catastrophe. To the eternal disgrace of Gladstone and his colleagues Khartoum fell, and the brave Christian general who had so long held the town against the Mahdi, fell a victim to treachery among his own followers, and was murdered. Kitchener's efforts at Dongola were of no further use, and he had reason to congratulate himself on escaping Gordon's fate. He was sent to Zanzibar on a mission partly military and partly diplomatic, and he was enabled to acquire there a thorough knowledge of all the affairs of the Soudan and a pretty accurate idea of the character of the country and its points of strategic importance. With this training he was well qualified for the responsible post of Governor of Suakin, to which he was then appointed.

The Raising of the Siege

was his first object. He sent out frequently squadrons of cavalry to make reconnaissances of the enemy's position, (as shown in the illustration on first page), and found them strongly entrenched. Osman Digma, the Mahdi's lieutenant, though preferring strongly a fight in the open desert, in which he is generally successful, had shown himself not unskilful in planning siege operations. He had not, however, sufficiently appreciated the danger of his proximity to the sea. He was probably unaware of the long range of the guns on the English ships.

Kitchener planned the battle with consummate skill. He had more confidence in his Egyptian troops than English commanders usually have, and believing that they understood better than white men how to deal with the Mahdi's troops, he assigned them the duty of making the assault. He massed his English regiments in the rear to support them if necessary, or to take their place should they be seized with panic. The English troops were under the command of Sir Francis Grenfell, while Colonel opened at daybreak on December 20, 1888, with terrific fire on the trenches in front of Osman Digna's position from the forts of Suakin, the English ships Starling and Racer, and two Egyptian ships. The men in the trenches held their ground until the Egyptian troops made a dash upon them, though the fire had doubtless demoralized them. The conflict in the trenches was fierce, but the Egyptians fully justified Colonel Kitchener's confidence in them. After half an hour's struggle, they won the victory, capturing two guns and driving all that were living of the Mahdi's troops out of the trenches. The English troops then went to their assistance. The Twentieth Hussars charged the Arabs' cavalry and dismounted men, and a hand-to-hand encounter ensued. When the Mahdi's cavalry saw them coming, they dismounted and planted their spears in the ground, but these proved no obstruction to the Hussars, who wept down upon the dervish horsemen like an avalanche, cut through their ranks and left half of them dead on the ground. The Hussars then reformed and charged the remaining dervishes, who fled. The Hussars followed the fleeing Arabs to a point within four miles of Handoub. The enemy were still flying when the chase was abandoned. The Hussars lost four men killed and four wounded.

Kitchener commanded one Egyptian brigade, and Colonel Hotted Smith another.

The Battle

The Egyptian troops, who fought most bravely, had about six killed and forty wounded. The Arabs' trenches were filled up and zeribas erected on the site, in a strong position. The civil population of the town was on the battle-field an hour after fight, rendering assistance to the British in filling up the trenches. A despatch to the London Times from Suakin says: "The prisoners say they believe that all the mounted gunners were killed. All tell the same story of privation and cruelty at the hands of the Mahdi and Osman Digna. None of them wished to fight, but were forced to do so, or persuaded to fight by promises of loot at Suakin, and other rewards. The trenches were bare. They found no food, clothing, or money, but only Snider rifles and cartridges."

The Problem.

Remembering the events connected with the campaigns of 1884 and 1885 the military advisers of the English Government consider that it would be wise to proceed to the occupation of the country by English troops for twenty or thirty miles inland, establishing posts at Handoub, at Tokar, and perhaps also at Sinkat, and dislodging Osman Digna from his position in the hills behind Suakin, thus securing the town as a safe trading centre on the Red Sea coast. Nothing short of a strong force in Suakin and the neighborhood can hold the country, because the Mahdi's forces under Osman Digna find nothing to resist them in the country occupied by the native tribes. These latter must be the friends of the strongest. They have no means of defending themselves against Osman Digna, or any other force the Mahdi may send. Their habits are agricultural and commercial. They are also the carriers of the Desert. To remain at war with the powers that be in the districts which they cultivate, or which they cross in commercial expeditions, is not possible for them. According to the latest information received, they profess, as they have always professed, a perfect readiness to be friends with the Egyptians and the English, but they ask, naturally: "What will you give in exchange? Osman Digna and his dervishes do not, it is true, give us much in return for our friendship, but they give us fire and sword for our enmity; can you, and will you protect us?" That is the situation at present. It remains to be seen whether England considers the retention of Suakin of sufficient value to keep there a garrison of English troops, or of Egyptian troops with English officers. If not, then Osman Digna is ready to swoop down and undo the achievement just completed.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS

Rings and Jewels Given Up for Christ.—The Rev. J. G. Gregson said: "I was attending a certain convention where the Spirit of God seemed to be very busy among the people. Sitting on one of the front benches was a very fashionably attired young lady, with her fingers on both hands almost covered with rings, and many jewels bedecking her person. From her appearance she was the very last person one would have expected to give up all for Christ. But the Spirit of God was working within her. She stood up, and made known her resolve to give up all for Christ. Taking off her bangles and her flashing rings before the large assembly, she put them on one side, saying: 'Now Christ is mine, and I am His; henceforth I shall worship none but Him.' Onward she went, facing fashionable society, and making known that now she was working in earnest for the Lord Jesus Christ. Her influence was most beneficial."

The Chaplain and the Sergeant.—A Minister relates that during the Crimean War, a young chaplain arrived in camp, inquired of a Christian sergeant the best method for carrying on his work among the men. The sergeant led him to the top of a hill, and pointed out the field of action. "Now, sir," said he, "look around you. See those batteries on the right, and the men at their guns. Hear the roar of the cannon. Look where you will, all are in earnest here. Every man feels that this is a life and death struggle. If we do not conquer the Russians, the Russians will conquer us. We are all in earnest here, sir; we are not playing at soldiers. If you would do good, you must be in earnest; an earnest man always wins his way." Such was the advice of the loyal soldier to the servant of King Jesus. "Be in earnest." The crowd must make way for an earnest man in what sphere of life he moves. The earnest man will master his business, and rise by it, if it be God's will, whilst the man who lacks earnestness will be mastered by his work, and become a slave.

A French Captain's Fatal Folly.—Mr. Scroggie said: "I remember, when in Hartlepool conducting services there, being told by a minister of the town of a French vessel that had appeared off their coast some time before. The fishermen and sailors knew from experience that a terrible storm was brewing, and it was plain from the manner in which the Frenchman sailed that they were deceived by the calm, and did not look for the hurricane which was so soon to burst upon them. A pilot put off to the vessel, and hailing her, offered to take her into the harbor, telling them that a terrific storm would soon sweep the coast. The captain leaned over the bulwarks, and taking his pipe from his mouth, leisurely surveyed the boat, while his crew, who were scattered over the deck playing cards, hardly looked up from their game. When the pilot had spoken, the captain sarcastically remarked, 'It's not our safety for which you care; it's money you want; and money you will not get. You may go back from whence you came, my friend.' 'But,' shouted the pilot, 'It's to save your life I came.' 'That is my business, and you please attend to your own,' the Frenchman replied. With a heavy heart the pilot turned his boat and made for the harbor, which he had scarcely reached ere the storm broke in all its fury. Through the blinding storm they could see the fated French ship. The captain proved himself a skilful seaman, handled his ship right well, but nothing could save him. Nearer and nearer to the frowning rocks the vessel was carried, till, borne on the crest of a mighty wave, it was lifted right on to the top of a sharp rock. Over her the waves broke, and bit by bit she was broken to pieces, her crew either drowned or dashed to death on the same rocks as had wrecked their vessel. They were warned in time, but they would not heed the warning, and the result was death. Oh, sinner, we warn you, while there is still time to escape into the harbor, come to safety, come to Christ! Right in front of you are the frowning rocks of God's justice; through them you cannot hope to go unless piloted by Christ, who will willingly carry you safely into the harbor of heaven."

The Fishermen's Bereaved Mother.—"A Woman in Newhaven had two sons, both engaged as fishermen. One night a violent storm came suddenly upon the coast. The fishing-fleet were scattered in all directions, each one trying its best to make for the harbor, but many of them never reached the shore. Early the next morning the minister got word that this woman's eldest son was drowned, and asking him to break the news to her. He went to the mother, accordingly, and informed her of her sad loss; she bore the shock wonderfully, and with the utmost fortitude. Between 4 and 5 o'clock came a telegram from a different part of the coast, stating that the poor woman's younger son was also drowned, and would the minister break the news to his mother? With a heavy heart the old man set out upon his second message, and, in his kindest, gentlest manner, told her that Willie was also gone. The poor woman looked for a moment like one dazed; then throwing up her hands, she laughed wildly. Covering her face with her apron, she rocked herself to and fro. Her neighbors watched her, and feared for her reason, and immediately sent for her sister, who had previously lost two sons in a similar way. She arrived, and did not strive to take the apron from her sister's face and calm her, but going up to the broken-hearted woman, she placed her hand lovingly upon her shoulder and said: 'Annie, do you remember what you said to me when I lost my two boys? how you spoke to me about the unerring wisdom and undying love of our dear Father in heaven?' She did not say another word; but the sorely stricken one took the apron from her face, and from that moment was calm, resigned, and comforted."

Exciting Scene on St. Lawrence River.—Mr. Scroggie relates the following: "Bishop Taylor once told in my hearing the story of a vessel being towed across the river St. Lawrence just above the Niagara Falls, when suddenly, to the consternation of those on board, the towing-line parted, and the vessel began to drift down the river. The news spread throughout the district, and hundreds of people lined the banks, watching the ship being carried down to the rapids. On one of the banks is a point called, 'Dead-Ship Point,' and the people believe that once a vessel is past that point all hope must be abandoned. With straining eyes and bated breath, the crowd saw the vessel approach that fatal point, then a groan of despair burst from the assembled multitude as she swept past it. There was no salvation for her now, they thought. Just then a fresh breeze struck the ship. With reviving hope the captain shouted to his men to spread every inch of canvas. All the sails were at once spread, and anxiously they watched the result. Slowly and more slowly still they drifted, until at last the ship stood still, as though in the balance. Which way would she move? With creaking timber and bending masts before the still freshening wind, she began to forge ahead. With shouts of joy the crew recognized the fact, and with shouts of sympathy the crowd on the shore answered, as, inch by inch, the vessel toiled up the river, until that point, no longer 'Dead-Ship Point,' but now 'Redemption Point,' was passed; and soon they were in safety. Oh, sinner, drifting down to the rapids of destruction, you may have passed that point when men cease to look for deliverance, but God's mercy and grace can still save you. Open your heart and let the wind of the Holy Spirit have full play, and you will find yourself drawn further and further from sin and destruction, and nearer and nearer to God."

JOY! JOY! JOY!

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, February 3, 1889.

[At this service Dr. Talmage gave the right hand of fellowship to 240 new members, which addition raises the number of communicants in the church to 4,508. The total amount realized at the recent sale of pews was greater than last year, and the income of the church this year will be $33,804.]

Joy! joy! joy! We banquet to-day over this accession of a multitude of souls. In all ages of the world it has been customary to celebrate joyful events by festivity—the signing of treaties, the proclamation of peace, the Christmas, the marriage. However much on other days of the year our table may have stinted supply, on Thanksgiving Day there must be something bounteous. And all the comfortable homes of Christendom have at some time celebrated joyful events by banquet and festivity.

Something has happened in the old homestead greater than anything that has ever happened before.

A Favorite Son,

whom the world supposed would become a vagabond and outlaw forever, has got tired of sight-seeing and has returned to his father's house. The world said he never would come back. The old man always said his son would come. He had been looking for him day after day and year after year. He knew he would come back. Now, having returned to his father's house, the father proclaims celebration.

There is a calf in the paddock that has been kept up and fed to utmost capacity, so as to be ready for some occasion of joy that might come along. Ah! there never will be a grander day on the old homestead than this day. Let the butchers do their work, and the housekeepers bring in to the table the smoking meat. The musicians will take their places, and the gay groups will move up and down the floor. All the friends and neighbors are gathered in, and extra supply is sent out to the table of the servants. The father presides at the table, and says grace, and thanks God that his long-absent boy is home again. Oh how they missed him!

How Glad They Are to have him back! One brother, indeed, stands pouting at the back door and says: "This is a great ado about nothing; this bad boy should have been chastened instead of greeted; veal is too good for him!" But the father says: "Nothing is too good, nothing is good enough." There sits the young man, glad at the hearty reception, but a shadow of sorrow flitting across his brow at the remembrance of the trouble he had seen. All ready now. Let the covers lift. Music. He was dead, and he is alive again! He was lost, and he is found! By such bold imagery does the Bible set forth the merry-making when a soul comes home to God.

I. First of all, there is

The New Convert's Joy.

It is no tame thing to become a Christian. The most tremendous moment in a man's life is when he surrenders himself to God. The grandest time on the father's homestead is when the boy comes back. Among the great throng who in the parlors of this church professed Christ one night, was a young man, who next morning rang my door-bell and said: "Sir, I cannot contain myself with the joy I feel; I came here this morning to express it. I have found more joy in five minutes in serving God than in all the years of my prodigality, and I came to say so."

You have seen, perhaps, a man running for his physical liberty, and the officers of the law after him, and you saw him escape, or afterward you heard the judge had pardoned him, and how great was the glee of that rescued man; but it is a very tame thing that, compared with the running for one's everlasting life—the terrors of the law after him, but Christ coming in to pardon and bless and rescue and save. You remember John Bunyan in his great story tells how the pilgrim put his fingers in his ears, and ran, crying, "Life, life! eternal life!" A poor car-driver in this city some years ago, after having had a struggle to support his family, suddenly was informed that was his, and there was joy amounting to bewilderment; but that is a small thing compared with the experience of one when he has put in his hands the title-deed to the joys, the raptures, the splendors of Heaven, and he can truly say: "Its mansions are mine, its temples are mine, its songs are mine, its God is mine!" Oh, it is no tame thing to become a Christian. It is a merry-making. It is the killing of the fatted calf. It is jubilee. You know the Bible never compares it to a funeral, but always compares it to something bright. It is more apt to be compared to a banquet than anything else. It is compared in the Bible to the water, bright, flashing, water; to the morning, roseate, fire-worked, mountain-transfigured morning. I wish I could to-day take all the Bible expressions about pardon and peace and life and comfort and hope and Heaven, and twist them into one garland, and put it on the brow of the humblest child of God in this assemblage, and cry: "Wear it, wear it now, wear it forever, son of God, daughter of the Lord God Almighty!" Oh, the joy of the new convert! Oh, the gladness of the Christian service!

You have seen, sometimes, a man in a religious assembly get up and give his experience. Well, Paul Gave his Experience.

He arose in the presence of the two Churches, the Church on earth and the Church in Heaven, and he said: "Now this is my experience: 'sorrowful, yet always rejoicing—poor, yet making many rich—having nothing, yet possessing all things.'" If the people in this house this morning knew the joys of the Christian religion, they would all pass over into the kingdom of God the next moment. When Daniel Sandeman was dying of cholera, his attendant said: "Have you much pain?" "Oh," he replied, "since I found the Lord I have never had any pain except sin." Then they said to him: "Would you like to send a message to your friends?" "Yes, I would; tell them that only last night the love of Jesus came rushing into my soul like the surges of the sea, and I had to cry out: 'Stop, Lord, it is enough; stop, Lord, enough!' Oh, the joys of this religion!"

Just pass over from those tame joys in which you are indulging—joys of this world—into the raptures of the Gospel.

The World Cannot Satisfy You;

you have found that out—Alexander longing for other worlds to conquer, and yet drowned in his own bottle; Byron whipped by disquietudes around the world; Voltaire cursing his own soul, while all the streets of Paris were applauding him; Henry II. consuming with hatred against poor Thomas à Becket—all illustrations of the fact that this world cannot make a man happy. The very man who poisoned the pommel of the saddle on which Queen Elizabeth rode, shouted in the street: "God save the Queen!" One moment the world applauds, and the next moment the world anathematizes. Oh, come over into this greater joy, this sublime solace, this magnificent beatitude! The night after the battle of Shiloh, and there were thousands of wounded on the field, and the ambulances had not come, one Christian soldier lying there under the starlight began to sing:

"There is a land of pure delight," and when he came to the next line there were scores of voices uniting:

"Where saints immortal reign."

The song was caught up, all through the field among the wounded, until it was said there were at least ten thousand wounded men uniting their voices as they came to the verse:

"There everlasting spring abides,
And never-withering flowers;
Death like a narrow stream divides
That heavenly land from ours."

Oh, it is a great religion to live by, and it is a great religion to die by. There is only one heart-throb between you and that religion this morning. Just look into the face of your pardoning God, and surrender yourself for time and for eternity, and He is yours, and heaven is yours, and all is yours. Some of you, like the young man of the text, have gone astray. I know not the history, but you know it, you know it! When a young man went forth into life, the legend says his guardian angel went forth with him, and getting him into a field, the guardian angel swept a circle around where the young man stood. It was and honor, and he must not step beyond that circle. Armed foes came down, but were obliged to halt at the circle—they could not pass. But one day a temptress with diamonded hands stretched forth and crossed that circle with the hand, and the tempted soul took it, and by that one fell grip was brought beyond the circle, and died. Some of you have stepped beyond that circle. Would you not like, this day, by the grace of God, to step back? This, I say to you is your hour of salvation.

There was in the closing hours of Queen Anne what is called the clock scene. Flat down on the pillow in helpless sickness, she could not move her head or move her hand. She was waiting for the hour when the ministers of state should gather in angry contest, and, worried and worn out by the coming hour, in momentary absence of the nurse, in the power, the strange power which delirium sometimes gives one, she arose and stood in front of the clock, and stood there watching the clock when the nurse returned. The nurse said: "Do you see anything peculiar about that clock?" She made no answer, but soon died. There is

A Clock Scene in Every History.

If some of you would rise from the bed of lethargy, and come out from your delirium of sin, and look on the clock of your destiny this morning, you would see and hear something you have not seen or heard before; and every tick of the minute, and every stroke of the hour, an every swing of the pendulum would say: "Now, now, now, now!" Oh, come home to your Father's house! Come home, O prodigal, from the wilderness! Come home, come home!

II. But I notice that when the prodigal came there was the father's joy. He did not greet him with any formal "How do you do?" He did not come out and say: "You are unfit to enter; go out and wash in the trough by the well, and then you can come in; we have had enough trouble with you." Ah no! When the proprietor of that estate proclaimed festival it was an outburst of a father's love and a father's joy.

God is Your Father.

I have not much sympathy with that description of God I sometimes hear, as though He were a Turkish Sultan, hard and unsympathetic, and listening not to the cry of His subjects. A man told me he saw in one of the Eastern lands a king riding along, and two men were in altercation, and one charged the other with having eaten his rice; and the king said: "Then slay the man, and by post-mortem examination find whether he has eaten the rice." And he was slain. Ah! the cruelty of a scene like that. Our God is not a Sultan, not a Czar, not a despot but a Father—kind, loving, forgiving, and He makes all heaven ring again when a prodigal comes back. "I have no pleasure," He says "in the death of him that dieth."

If a man does not get to heaven it is because he will not go there. No difference the color, no difference the history, no difference the ante dents, no difference the surroundings, no difference the sin. When the white horses of Christ's victory are brought out to celebrate the eternal triumph you may ride one of them, and as God is greater than all, His joy is greater; and when a soul comes back there is in His heart the surging of an infinite ocean of gladness, and to express that gladness it takes all the powers of pleasure, and all the thrones of pomp, and all the ages of eternity. It is a joy deeper than all depth, and higher than all height, and wider than all width, and vaster than all immensity. It overtops, it undergirds, it outweighs, all the united splendor and joy of the universe. Who can tell what God's joy is? You remember

The Story of a King

Who, on some great day of festivity, scattered silver and gold among the people, and sent valuable presents to his courtiers; but methinks when a soul comes back, God is so glad that to express His joy He flings out new worlds into space, and kindles up new suns, and rolls among the white-robed anthems of the redeemed a greater hallelujah, while with a voice that reverberates among the mountains of frankincense and is echoed back from the everlasting gates, He cries: "This, my son, was dead, and he is alive again."

At the opening of the Exposition in New Orleans I saw a Mexican flutist, and he played the solo, and then afterward the eight or ten bands of music, accompanied by the great organ, came on: but the sound of that one flute as compared with all the orchestra was greater than all the combined joy of the universe when compared with the resounding heart of Almighty God.

For ten years a father went three times a day to the depot.

His Son Went Off

In aggravating circumstances, but the father said: "He will come back." The strain was too much, and his mind parted, and three times a day the father went. In the early morning he watched the train, its arrival, the stepping out of the passengers, and then the departure of the train. At noon he was there again watching the advance of the train, watching the departure. At night, there again; watching the coming, watching the going—for ten years. He was sure his son would come back. God has been watching and waiting for some of you, my brothers, ten years, twenty years, thirty years, forty years, perhaps fifty years—waiting, waiting, watching, watching; and if this morning the prodigal should come home, what a scene of gladness and festivity, and how the great Father's heart would rejoice at your coming home! You will come, some of you, will you not? You will, you will!

III. I notice, also, that when a prodigal comes home there is of religion. Oh, it is a grand thing to preach this gospel! I know there has been a great deal said about the trials and the hardships of the Christian ministry. I wish somebody would write a good, rousing book about the joys of the Christian ministry. Since I entered the profession I have seen more of the goodness of God than I will be able to celebrate in all eternity. I know some boast about their equilibrium, and they do not rise into enthusiasm, and they do not break down with emotion; but I confess to you plainly that when I see a man coming to God, and giving up his sin, I feel in body, mind, and soul a transport. When I see a man who is bound hand and foot in evil habit emancipated, I rejoice over it as though it were my own emancipation. When to-day in our communion service such throngs of young and old stand at these altars, and in the presence of heaven and earth and hell attest their allegiance to Jesus Christ, I feel a joy something akin to that which the apostle describes when he says: "Whether in the body I cannot tell, or out of the body I cannot tell; God knoweth."

Oh, have not ministers a right to rejoice when a prodigal comes home? They blew the trumpet, and ought they not to be glad of the gathering of the host? They pointed to the full supply, and ought they not to rejoice when souls pant as the hart for the water-brooks? They came forth saying, "All things are now ready;" ought they not to rejoice when the prodigal sits down at the banquet?

Why Ministers Live Long.

Life-insurance men will all tell you that ministers of religion as a class live longer than any other. It is confirmed by the statistics of all those who calculate upon human longevity. Why is it? There is more draft upon the nervous system than in any other profession, and their toil is most exhausting. I have seen ministers kept on miserable stipends by parsimonious congregations, who wonder at the dullness of the sermons, when the men of God were perplexed almost to death by questions of livelihood, and had not enough nutritious food to keep any fire in their temperament. No fuel, no fire! I have sometimes seen the inside of the life of many of the American clergymen—never accepting their hospitality, because they cannot afford it; but I have seen them struggle on with salaries of five and six hundred dollars a year—the average less than that—their struggle well depicted by who says in a letter: "Thank you for your last remittance; until it came we had not any meat in our house for one year, and all last winter, although it was a severe winter, our children wore their summer clothes." And these men of God I find in different parts of the land, struggling against annoyances and exasperations innumerable; some of them week after week entertaining agents who have maps to sell, and submitting themselves to all styles of annoyance, and yet without complaint, and cheerful of soul. How do you account for the fact that these life-insurance men tell us that ministers as a class live longer than any others? It is because of the joy of their work, the joy of the harvest-field, the joy of greeting prodigals home to their Father's house.

Oh, we are in sympathy with all innocent hilarities. We can enjoy a hearty song, and we can be merry with the merriest; but those of us who have toiled in the service are ready to testify that all these joys are tame compared with the satisfaction of seeing men enter the kingdom of God. The great eras of every minister are the outpourings of the Holy Ghost, and I thank God I have seen eighteen of them. Thank God! thank God!

IV. I notice, also, when the prodigal comes back, all earnest

Christians Rejoice.

If you stood on Montauk Point and there was a hurricane at sea, and it was blowing toward the shore, and a vessel crashed into the rocks, and you saw people get ashore in the lifeboats and the very last man got on the rocks in safety, you could not control your joy. And it is a glad time when the Church of God sees men who are tossed on the ocean of their sins plant their feet on the rock Christ Jesus.

Oh, when prodigals come home, just hear those Christians sing; just hear those Christians pray. It is not a stereotyped supplication we have heard over and over again for twenty years, but a putting of the case in the hands of God with an importunate pleading. No long prayers. Men never pray at great length unless they have nothing to say, and their hearts are hard and cold. All the prayers in the Bible that were answered were short prayers: "God be merciful to me a sinner." "Lord, that I may receive my sight." "Lord, save me or I perish." The longest prayer, Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple, less than eight minutes in length, according to the ordinary rate of enunciation. And just hear them pray, now that the prodigals are coming home! Just see them shake hands! No putting forth of the four tips of the fingers in a formal way, but a hearty grasp, where the muscles of the heart seem to clench the fingers of one hand around the other hand. And then see those Christian faces, how illumined they are! And see that old man get up, and with the same voice that he sang fifty years ago in the old country meeting-house, say, "Now, Lord, lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." There was who was hurled into prison in time of persecution, and one day he got off his shackles, and he came and stood by the prison door, and when the jailer was opening the door, with one stroke he struck down the man who had incarcerated him. Passing along the streets of London, he wondered where his family was. He did not dare to ask lest he excite suspicion, but passing along a little way from the prison, he saw a Keith tankard, a cup that belonged to the family from generation to generation—he saw it in a window. His family, hoping that some day he would get clear, came and lived as near as they could to the prison-house, and they set that Keith tankard in the window, hoping he would see it; and he came along and saw it, and knocked at the door, and went in, and the long-absent family were all together again. Oh, if you would start for the kingdom of God to-day, I think some of you would find nearly all your friends and nearly all your families around the holy tankard of the holy communion—fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, around that sacred tankard which commemorates the love of Jesus Christ our Lord. Oh, it will be great communion day when your whole family sits around the sacred tankard. One on earth, one in heaven.

V. Once more I remark that, when the prodigal gets back, the Inhabitants of Heaven Keep Festival.

I am very certain of it. If you have never seen a telegraphic chart, you have no idea how many cities are connected together, and how many lands. Nearly all the neighborhoods of the earth seem articulated, and news flies from city to city, and from continent to continent. But more rapidly go the tidings from earth to heaven; and when a prodigal returns, it is announced before the throne of God. And if these souls this morning should enter the kingdom, there would be some one in the heavenly kingdom to say, "That's my father," "That's my mother," "That's my son," "That's my daughter," "That's my friend," "That's the one I used to pray for," "That's the one for whom I wept so many tears;" and one soul would say, "Hosanna!" and another soul would say, "Hallelujah!"

"Pleased with the news, the saints below,

In songs their tongues employ;

Beyond the skies the tidings go,

And heaven is filled with joy.

"Nor angels can their joy contain,

But kindle with new fire;

The sinner lost is found, they sing,

And strike the sounding lyre."

At the banquet of Lucullus, sat Cicero the orator; at the Macedonian festival sat Philip the conqueror; at the Grecian banquet sat Socrates the philosopher; but at our Father's table sit all the returned prodigals, more than conquerors. The table is so wide its leaves reach across seas and across lands. Its guests are the redeemed of earth and the glorified of heaven. The ring of God's forgiveness on every hand, the robe of a Saviour's righteousness adroop from every shoulder. The wine that glows in the cups is from the bowls of ten thousand sacraments. Let all the redeemed of earth, and all the glorified of heaven, rise, and, with gleaming chalice, drink to the return of a thousand prodigals. Sing! sing! sing! "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive blessing and riches and honor and glory and power, world without end!"

TEN SIGNS OF THE END.

VI.—Moral Signs.

But it is not only an age of intense human activity and intellectual achievement, but also of great and unprecedented wickedness. As it was in the days of Noah, so also now. Not only are there giants of splendid human production, but the earth, also, is corrupt before God, and all flesh has corrupted its way; prophetic pictures of Daniel, Paul, Peter, and Christ Himself, are being terribly fulfilled. "The wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand." "Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold." "In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." "In the last days perilous times shall come, for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemous, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good . . . men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the truth." "In the last days there shall come scoffers, walking after their own lusts."

VII.—Ecclesiastical Signs.

The condition of the Church as a whole at the time of His coming is foreshadowed in gloomy terms in the pages of the New Testament. Every dispensation has closed with an apostasy, a mingling of the Church and the world, and a little remnant of separated and saved ones. So it was before the Flood. So it was before the Babylonish captivity. So it was when the Church went into the corruption of Romanism, after wedding the world under Constantine. And so it will be at the end. Already the unholy alliance has begun. Already the Church of Laodicea has become the type of nominal Protestantism, and after this comes the Lord Himself. When He came to His ancient temple, both at the commencement and the close of His ministry, He had to come with a whip of small cords, and when again He comes it will be to cleanse and consume. Already the stalls and tables are ready for His presence. And the Lord indeed shall suddenly come to His temple. But who may abide the day of His coming, and who shall stand when He appeareth?

VIII.—Human Scepticism.

Peter says that "There shall come in the last days scoffers, saying, Where is the promise of His coming, for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning."

The scepticism of our time is singularly described in this passage by the expression: "All things continue as they were from the beginning." This is just what the evolution philosophy declares. And this is the very form of scepticism at present in the world. Everything develops; there have been no startling changes, no sudden creations—there will be none. While unbelief is not the worst or most prominent feature of our age, yet that it is one that strikes the minds of thoughtful observers, is indisputable. One of America's greatest poets has also given the world his picture of the age, with special reference to this very matter of infidel thought:

"Men feel old systems cracking under 'em:
Life saddens to a mere conundrum
Which once Religion solved, but she Has lost—has Science found?—the key.
They make things admirably plain
But one hard question will remain:
If one hypothesis you lose,
Another in its place you choose:
But your faith gone, O man and brother,
Whose shop will furnish you another—
One that will wash, I mean, and wear,
And wrap us warmly from despair?"

But the very profoundness of the world's sleep is only the stronger assurance of His speedy coming. It will be just when men are saying "peace and safety," and making their boldest calculations upon the future. Then, as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be: "They did eat, they drank, they planted, they builded, they married and were given in marriage, and knew not until the day the Flood came and carried them all away."

But it is not only in the world that the spirit of slumber is to prevail. It is yet more significant in the Church. There, too, there are to be the slumbering virgins, and the servant whose house is to be broken into. There is no more signal evidence of the imminency of the Lord's coming, than the veil that hides it to-day from the eyes and hearts of the great mass of the worldly church, who neither expect nor desire the coming of the Master, but reign as kings without Him, and are trying to make a kingdom without the King.

IX.—The Expectation of His Coming.

Paradoxical as it may seem, the waiting attitude of those who do expect His coming, and the unveiling of their vision, is as great an indication of His advent as the blindness of the others. For it was distinctly declared to Daniel that at the time of the end, the vision should be unsealed and made plain. The fact of the remarkable unfolding of the prophetic Scriptures in these days, and the clearness and vividness with which the inspired picture of the advent is being revealed to the hearts of many of God's children, shows that "the time of the end" is indeed at hand. The fact, also, that it is only to a few that this revelation is made, is also in exact accordance with the Scriptures. "Those who walk in the light shall have the light." "None of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand."

Allied with this sign is the spirit of entire consecration and the revival of the doctrine of sanctification in this day. Daniel described this as one of the peculiar signs of the end. "Many shall be purified and made white, and tried, but the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand." This would seem to imply that the purified ones are to understand the doctrine and hope of His coming. The doctrine of holiness is always, in the New Testament, intimately connected with the Lord's coming as the especial preparation and enrobing for that great and glorious hour. Thank God, this is the especial message which Christ has of late been giving to His bride. Thank God, still more, that she has heard His call, and "hath made herself ready," and when she shines once more in her pure raiment, bright as the morning, fair as the noon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners, "we may know that the bridal day is just at hand."

X.—Revival Signs.

Another sign of the close of the age is the special outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the world, and the conversion of great multitudes to God. This is called the latter rain. The day of Pentecost was the early rain. But it is in "the last days" that the Spirit is to be poured out upon all flesh in such profusion that "whoever shall call upon the Lord shall be saved." Are we not seeing such great awakenings, during the past half century especially, both in the home and foreign fields? They are the last great ingatherings before the world's harvest home. Over the world the heralds are hastening, a great army—Moody and Muller, Hammond and Haslam, Whittle and Harrison, Somerville and Varley, Radstock and Radcliffe—and many are turning to God, and yet there shall be many more, for one of the features of Daniel's last vision is: "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

One of the most definite of all the signs given by our Lord is this: "This Gospel of the kingdom must first be published in all the world as a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." This gives to the work of missions a peculiar interest and responsibility. This puts the key to the door of the bridal chamber and marriage feast almost in the hands of the waiting bride. Only for about a century has she begun to use it, and before this generation closes she may, if she only will, so fulfil this last condition that she can claim Him, in her waiting arms.

There is a yet more precious promise which the Master speaks to each of us singly. "I will give him the Morning Star." The Morning Star is the precursor of the sunrise. This promise, therefore, means a special intimation of His glorious coming. Just as to the watchers for the first Advent there came a star in the East, so to us who look for Him will there come the confidential intimation of what the world will only know by the full blaze of His appearing. When a distinguished visitor is coming to our shores, the public know of his arrival at the time, but long before, his confidential friends have received his private messages and prepared their homes for his reception, and they are quietly waiting at the wharf to welcome him. So would He have us, His friends, look for Him. Then shall we meet Him with the glad cry: "Lo, this is our God. We have waited for Him, and He will save us; we have waited for Him, we will be glad, and rejoice in His salvation."

A LEGAL OUTRAGE IN INDIA.

A CONTEST is being waged between the missionaries and the friends of morality in India on the one hand, and the Hindus, and the British government on the other, over the possession of a girl-widow named Lachmin. The girl has received Christian training, and clings to the missionaries for protection. It seems that her mother, an immoral old woman was anxious to get rid of her, as the girl is a widow, and cannot according to Hindoo laws marry again, but must be supported by her parents. Her boy husband died some time ago, and the mother appears to have offered her for sale to a man named Radhakissen. The girl did not know of the bargain until she was taken to Radhakissen's house, where he feasted her and decked her in jewelry. The girl's conscience was stirred as she beheld the life of sin before her, and she "chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin," and laying off her costly garb she fled to her missionary friend Miss Abraham for safety. Radhakissen and the girl's mother then appealed to the law, and the British Magistrate decided that the mother had a legal right to the care of the girl, and could if she chose carry out her bargain with Radhakissen. The missionaries appealed to the Governor-General, but he declined to interfere, and the Magistrate listened to the mob, and sent the girl back to be beaten and tortured in order to testify against Miss Abraham, and ultimately to live a life which her Christian principles would make more odious than death to her. Telegrams were sent by the missionaries to the English Parliament, and an effort is now being made to rescue the girl.

What is thought by the natives of the weakness of the Government may be learned from the following extract from The Indian Spectator, a Parsee journal which says: "The Government in India appears to be powerless before the law as it stands. Is it so powerless that it cannot vouchsafe even a word of sympathy to the aggrieved? To a question in the House of Commons the India Office replies that 'the Queen's Government is under the most solemn obligation to respect religion and the social customs of the Hindus.' What a position for the Queen's Government! Think of this answer—without one word of regret, one offer of inquiry, one hope of explanation. 'The Queen's Government . . . solemn obligation . . . religion . . . social customs'! Where is the 'religion' of the thing? And what is the social custom that the officials are bound to respect? Though the law may be sound enough, we can imagine the missionaries saying that the answer given by the India Office is the veriest drivell of official drivellers. Are we living under a civilized Christian Government, or under a company of washed-out old gentlemen doing business as white-washers? Our gentlemen officials who are so ashamed of their civilization and their Christianity, and so afraid of sympathizing with a child in poor Lachmin's position would do well to remember that the white-washing process does not last in government any more than in other departments of human affairs, that every time the wash is removed it shows the nakedness on the surface more hideous than before."

THE STRUGGLE WITH VICE.

THE daily journals have so much of their space occupied with reports of races, prize fights, the proceedings of Divorce Courts, and similar matter, that they have failed to give a fair report of the work of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. Mr. Anthony Comstock, therefore, has appealed to the religious press, and at his request we publish an extract from its recent report. In the course of that statement he says:

During 1888 we have made 94 arrests, secured 101 convictions, with penalties amounting to 14 years and 7 months imprisonment and $6,585 in fines. 8,088 pounds of books, 50 pounds of stereotype plates, 402 pounds of newspapers with obscene matter, 555,723 pictures, 239 negatives for making obscene photographs, 32,550 circulars, 23 copper plates, 205 obscene figures in Dime Museums, 200,145 lottery circulars, 33,200 pool tickets, 674 lottery tickets, besides a large variety of other gambling paraphernalia, making a total of over 5 tons seized during the past year. Altogether 1,331 arrests have been made. More than 41 tons of obscene matter and 11 tons of gambling matter, paraphernalia, etc., have been seized.

A careful study of our tabular statement will disclose many startling facts. We have secured penalties amounting to 278 years and 15 days imprisonment and $92,103.95 in fines, while bail bonds have been forfeited amounting to $76,700 more, making a total secured for the Public Treasury of $158,803.95, not one dollar of which has gone into our Treasury. 45,114 pounds of books and sheets, 26,473 pounds of stereotype plates for printing these books, 700 pounds of lead moulds, 91,974 articles of immoral use, 809,235 obscene pictures, 4,949 negatives for making obscene photographs, 1,495,557 obscene circulars, songs, etc., 293,456 lottery tickets, 394,401 lottery circulars, 1,389,203 pool tickets, 74,852 chips for gambling, besides a vast amount of other kinds of devil's wares have been seized and destroyed. Besides this we have seized 982,370 names and post office addresses in the possession of dealers of contraband wares, to whom circulars are to be sent. Do not these startling figures emphasize the value and the necessity for a continuance of this work?

A SUNDAY IN A CHINESE TEMPLE.

IN a description of a tour recently taken in China, which Dr. J. C. Thomson sends to the Church, he gives the following account of his stay in a treble Temple: It being market day at Na Tuk, we meet many returning, and are agreeably surprised to be once called "Sin-shang" (Mr.), and find we have met an interesting young fellow, whose uncle Mr. Hayes had baptized in the district beyond. But reaching "Ridge-end," we look in at a temple, Buddhist, Taoist, and Confucianist all in one, as is often the case, and call for a friend of the shaven-head order, where, though the priest known to us is away, we find a welcome, and enjoy a quieter Sabbath than at an inn. Though we are requested not to sleep before the gods, who, we are told, get down and walk about at night, we arrange our boards—"hard wood" ones left over probably in the making of the temple—by the great temple bell, which is itself an object of worship. The priest suggests to our boy that he buy a duck with other provisions, and then, on his bringing it, hopes he will not eat it, lest it might be his grandfather. The Buddhist priests are seemingly not much more than temple keepers, and Buddhism with other western religions, is not most kindly accepted. This temple is comparatively new, and the big gods came from our city of Yeung Kong, only costing ten dollars each, it was said.

The three gods, representative of the three religions, are the goddess of mercy, seated on the lotus; god of war; and the north god, standing on a snake and turtle, with the usual attendant gods; the aged doorkeeper with a lump of gold in his hand, the fierce hostler holding the pony which died of grief when his master Mars died. Some of this god's kinsfolks live about Canton, which may account for the war-like tendencies of this province. We have also a barefooted god with a bell, a black fellow on a tiger, etc., to the number of fifteen or so. Beside me are the oracular answers to prayers, one hundred of them, one of which fits the number on one of a hundred strips of bamboo, which in worship are jerked out of a large dice-box as it were. We have seen no one worship since coming here, and the priest only in lighting joss-sticks and the lantern.

THE LATE DR. SUMMERS.

THE following note on the death of Dr. Summers, who died in Africa, and whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on Nov. 29, last, is given by his friend and teacher Dr. George D. Dowkontt, in his Medical Missionary Record: Particulars of the death of our dear brother, Dr. W. R. Summers, have just been received from Mr. Chatelain.

On May 20 the Doctor, acting under the advice of the official in charge of that part of the Congo state where he was laboring, started on a journey towards the coast, hoping to reach Madeira and recruit his health. The poor fellow had, however, gone but a short distance when the Master said, "It is enough, come up higher;" for on May 24 he went "Home." On the very same day we were watching the departure of a veteran preacher of the gospel, of three score and ten, who had often aided the Doctor in his struggles while preparing himself for his life work, and who was the first man to pray for the Divine blessing upon the inauguration of the Medical Mission in New York in 1881. This dear brother, the Rev. Charles Parker, of Brooklyn, N. Y., had been blind for twenty years before he went home to see the King in His beauty. Thus the two who had walked the streets of earth together—the one being eyes to the other—on the same day began to walk the streets of the New Jerusalem together. "Father, I will that they also whom Thou hast given me, be with me where I am."

A JAPANESE FAMILY.

AN interesting letter from Mrs. Pierson, who is laboring at Yokohama, in Japan, appears in the Missionary Link. The following extract shows the character of her work: About seven years ago I visited at the house of a native tea-merchant, who had recently removed to Yokohama. His family consisted of wife and two daughters—the wife being very low with some lingering disease, from which she had long suffered. The truth as it is in Jesus was presented to them without delay, accompanied by earnest exhortations, to repent now, to believe now, and to be saved immediately. They had heard of our Lord Jesus, and His blessed salvation, but their hearts seemed closed to heavenly things, and absorbed in the earthly. The wife recovered, in answer to prayer, and the two daughters entered our school as day scholars. Subsequently, he, with other tea-merchants, was accused of adulterating his teas, and suffered great loss. The girls were withdrawn from the school, but the Holy Spirit did not permit me to give them up, although their case appeared so discouraging. Sometimes I did not visit them for months, and then was again prompted to seek them. After their great trial, their hearts were softened, and I felt that a change had passed over them. The wife listened with tears to the Word of God, and responded "Amen" to my prayer for them. Last year the younger daughter returned to school, and is now a boarder in the house. The mother has been converted, and is about to enter the Church, after seven years of instruction, prayer, and waiting. The Holy Spirit has sealed the truth to her heart, and she is now a new creature.

AN ELDER'S REMOVAL.

THE providential removal of an elder to another district in Africa has been blessed to his new neighbors. Mr. Scott, a missionary in Natal, writes: "One of my elders, by name Shem Cubee, at Impolweni, in Natal, left the locality some eight years ago, to reside at a distance of about 150 miles. He did not wish to sever his connection with the church, and asked my permission to be allowed to preach the gospel where he was going. Of course I gladly consented. Shem departed. According to some adverse critics of mission work, he should have at once laid aside his coat and his religion and gone back to paint, grease, and flesh worship; but he did nothing of the kind. A few months afterwards he made his appearance at my house, accompanied by two men, with the news that not only they who accompanied him, but over forty people in the district where he stayed had accepted Christ as their Saviour through his preaching, and wanted to be baptized. My wife and I went back with Shem, and found, just as he had said, between forty and fifty souls sealed for Christ. He has continued in his work, and now has nearly a hundred converts around him. He is a most indefatigable worker, preaching every day, and on Sabbaths two or three times. This is how God works in Africa. Nearly every brand snatched from the burning carries fire deep into the enemies' camp, and like a snowball, that increases as it rolls, we shall go on until Africa is won for Christ."

A MOHAMMEDAN BOY PERSECUTED.

A SPECIMEN of the tricks practiced on converts to Christianity in India is given by the Rev. James Lyon, of the American M. E. Mission in Hyderabad. He says: "On one occasion after our bazaar service we were followed by a young Mohammedan boy. He was impressed with the truth, and became a candidate for baptism. At the end of one month, seeing his changed life and feeling, we could no longer deny him the privilege of being baptized, and he received baptism on the 17th of June, 1888, in the presence of the congregation in our English church. This man is now in the employment of a native Christian gentleman as a general servant, who speaks well of his faithfulness and obedience as a servant. Shortly after the baptism of Ahmed Ali, the news reached his friends in Hyderabad city, and they sent three or four armed Arabs to take him away by force, giving out as their reason for so doing that he had been stealing. (This is a common trick.) The native Christian gentleman who employs him, seeing they were determined to take him, had to let him go, but took the precaution of sending to the Superintendent of Police, giving particulars, and becoming surety for the convert if, as alleged, he had stolen, and hinting that if any evil befell him, he, the Superintendent, would be held responsible. The Police Superintendent took the hint, and evidently exerted himself, for after an absence of twelve hours, he, Ahmed Ali, returned safe, and we rejoiced greatly. They threatened him, and coaxed him to come back to Islamism, but he stood fast."

The Christian Herald Binder.—Numerous applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar. We have also a cheaper binder, with lace instead of steel fastenings, for 50 cents, postage paid. Subscribers in Canada ordering the binders are, we believe, required to pay customs-duty upon them.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE.

Some subscribers who have renewed for 1889 may notice that the date on the address label has not yet been changed. This is unavoidable, owing to the large number of corrections to be made; but it is being rectified as rapidly as possible. The fact of the paper being regularly received through the mail is an intimation that the renewals have been received and credited on our books.

All subscriptions, notices of changes of address, and letters connected with the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should invariably be addressed to the MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK. Advertisements for insertion on the last page and orders for books advertised on that page should be sent to MR. J. E. JEWETT, 77 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK. Some of our friends are reversing these addresses, sending their subscriptions to Mr. Jewett and their orders for books to the Manager. In both cases the mistake causes confusion and delay, and sometimes leads to errors.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Long-Pending Question of Adding a Secretary of Agriculture to the President's Cabinet was settled, so far as Congress is concerned, on January 31. An agreement was reached on that day between the conferees of the Senate and the House by the House yielding the questions in dispute. The bill as passed by the Senate will now, therefore, go to the President for his signature. The points pressed by the House and now abandoned were mainly the addition to the new Secretary's Department of the Signal Service, and the Geological and Fish Commission. President Cleveland is not expected, if he signs the bill, to appoint a Cabinet officer for the remaining three weeks of his term. It is thought likely that the first officer of the new Department will be Jonathan J. Woodman, of Paw Paw, Mich., who has been strongly recommended to the President-elect.

The Admission of the Territories was Fully discussed last week, in a caucus of Republican Senators. It was decided to agree to the admission of the two Dakotas, Montana, and Washington. On New Mexico, opinion was divided, but the majority advocated rejection, on the ground that, owing to the peculiarities of the people, the Territory was not fitted at present for admission as a State. It is expected that the Senate will advocate Constitutional conventions being called in North and South Dakota to pass upon the two Constitutions. The caucus finally resolved that the Committee on Territories should draft a substitute for the House Bill, of a liberal character and fair in terms. Senators Platt, Cullom, and Butler have been appointed Conferees for the Senate.

The Gravity of the Situation in the Samoan Islands increased last week. On January 31 Mr. Bayard received a dispatch from our consul at Apia, stating that Germany had declared war on Gen. Mataafa, had proclaimed martial law in Samoa, and had given notice that all vessels arriving there would be searched for contraband of war. The import of this intelligence admitted of no doubt. It is evidently a bold and impudent effort on the part of Bismarck to take possession of Samoa. The espousal of the cause of Tamasese by Germany is a pretence that deceives no one. Tamasese has no Samoan support, and Bismarck has clearly no object in placing him on the throne, except to secure a pliant tool for the advancement of German interests. How far our Government will tolerate the German arrogance we have yet to see. The discussion in the Senate on Thursday showed that the Republican leaders are ready to endorse and support the protests Mr. Bayard has made against the attempt to subvert Samoan independence. An opinion was generally expressed that whether American citizens in Samoa had been injured or not, and apart from the insult to the United States flag, our Government is pledged to maintain the independence of the islands. The Senate refrained from discussing the whole question, but the fact that it passed without division the appropriation for the coaling station at Pango-Pango, and the larger appropriation for the fulfilment of our treaty obligations, proved that the gravity of the situation was realized, and that there is to be no shrinking from duty in the matter. The President has notified the Senate that Bismarck is sending by mail proposals for a conference.

A Notable Illustration of the Methods of New York legislators came to light last week. It was discovered that the ceiling of the Assembly Chamber at Albany, instead of being carved oak, for which the money was appropriated, consisted of jute bagging covered with plaster. In the course of the investigation which followed the discovery, it was admitted that the only signed copy of the plans and specifications in existence was in the possession of the contractors. The cost of the wretched counterfeit was $277,000. The legislators are now naively inquiring what became of the difference of cost between the value of the carved oak and the jute bagging. It is not likely that it went into the pockets of the contractors. A committee has been appointed to investigate the matter. It would be well, also, if the committee could find out how it is that the Capitol, which was estimated to cost four millions, is not yet finished, though eighteen millions have been spent.

A Deplorable Labor Dispute Caused Serious trouble in New York City last week. On January 28 twenty-one lines of surface cars were tied up, and over six thousand drivers and conductors went on strike. The men asked for an increase of wages from $1.75 to $2 a day, but the main difficulty was not involved in that demand. The companies refused to recognize the executive committee of the Union to which the men belong, and would not treat with any but their own men. This resolution precluded negotiation, and the strike took effect. The men offered to submit their case to arbitration, and appealed to the State Board, but the companies rejected the offer and declined the services of the Board. For two days scarcely any cars were run, but on Wednesday new men were engaged, and gradually each road had a few cars running to save its charter. The President of one company actually sent to Castle Garden for Italian immigrants to take the place of the drivers. The running of the cars was opposed by a few of the strikers, and by many of the roughs, who had nothing to do with the strike, but who are always ready for violence. Trucks were overturned on the tracks, bonfires built, stones thrown at the cars, and other unlawful acts committed. Policemen were put on each car, and there were frequent fights, and in two cases the police used their pistols. By the end of the week the companies were sanguine of winning the victory. As in other cases, the weakness of the cause of the employees consists in the fact that there are so many unemployed men in the city willing to take the place of the strikers. While this condition continues, a strike has little prospect of success, and the sooner this fact is recognized by the men the less suffering they will have to bear.

A Scathing Denunciation of Bismarck was published last week in an English review. It was not signed, but it was evidently written by some one possessing an intimate knowledge of German affairs. The writer charges the statesman with deliberately plotting the death of the late Emperor by insisting on his making the journey to Berlin from Italy on his accession to the throne. He asserts that Bismarck desired to see Frederick give place to William II., in order that his own son, Count Herbert Bismarck, might succeed him as Chancellor, in the event of his death, which he could not hope to do under Frederick. He also charges him with instigating the young Emperor to behave undutifully to his mother, and to punish every one of prominence who had been loyal to Frederick. Facts are given in proof of the writer's assertions, and Bismarck's whole career is pitilessly analyzed, with the object of showing him to be a selfish and unscrupulous man, in whom patriotism is subordinated to ambition.

General Boulanger's Election as Member of the legislature by the citizens of Paris has caused a profound sensation, not in France only, but throughout Europe. His triumph was decisive. There were several candidates for the vacant seat, but Boulanger received a majority of all the votes cast, and a plurality over the next highest vote of 81,550. This enormous majority is doubtless due in part to the peculiar situation of French political parties, which the General showed marked skill in turning to his own advantage. Apart from the direct and honest support of the voters who have confidence in his political programme, he had the support of the Monarchists, the Bonapartists, and all who desire to see the Republic overthrown. They regard him as a man capable of making himself dictator, and paving the way for a restoration of monarchical institutions. Republicans, also, who are disgusted with the incapacity of the present administration, voted for him as an enemy of the Government. The fact, however, of his receiving so large a vote in Paris impresses every one with its profound significance. One prominent French journal remarks: "It is to dictatorship, to Cæsarism, to revolution, to civil war, that Paris has opened the doors of the Republic. Behind Cæsars come ruin, war, defeat, invasion, and the dismemberment of the country."

A Startling Speech on the Probability of a European war was made by a member of the English administration on January 29. Addressing a political meeting, the Hon. Edward Stanhope, Secretary of War, said that a thundercloud was hanging over Europe, and that sooner or later, probably sooner, it would burst, bringing the fiercest and most horrible war ever known. It was impossible, he declared, to view the preparations for war now being made throughout Europe without feeling that a war was approaching. He hoped, however, that the wisdom of England's statesmen would prevent that nation from becoming involved. Mr. Stanhope's official position in the Cabinet affords him exceptional opportunities of gaining accurate knowledge of the European situation. His prognostications, therefore, are all the more ominous.

The Mysterious Death of Prince Rudolph, the heir to the Austrian throne, was announced on January 30. The Prince, who was but little over thirty years of age, had gone with a shooting party to Meyerling, a country castle about twelve miles from Vienna. He retired from the company, on a plea of indisposition, and shut himself up in his room. There his valet found him lying dead on his bed. It was at first officially stated that he died of apoplexy, but rumors were spread that he had been shot, and on Friday another official statement was issued, stating that he had shot himself while suffering from insanity. The statement is not credited by the public, as the Prince was of a remarkably cheerful disposition, enjoying his life and possessing a clear, well-balanced mind. He had travelled extensively, and had distinguished himself by literary work, displaying considerable mental ability. He was married in May, 1880, to Stephanie, daughter of the King of the Belgians. His married life was not a happy one, and his wife sought a divorce on the plea of his unfaithfulness. His only child is a daughter six years of age. Under Austrian law she will not succeed to the crown on the death of her grandfather, the Emperor. The next heir is the Emperor's brother, the Archduke Charles Louis.

City Missionaries, Christian Workers, and others may obtain miscellaneous back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for mission, hospital, and prison work, and for general distribution, at $1 per 100. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our acknowledgment to the amount of $13.75. They were from: Seawards, Me., $1; Mason, Mich., $1; Rock City, Ill., $1; Baltimore, Md., 25c.; Centreville, Mass., 50c.; Galt, Ont., Can., $1; Morganville, N. Y., $1; Hanover, Ont., Can., $2; Newark, N. J., 50c.; Newark, N. J., $1; Bozeman Mont, $1; Omaha, Neb., $1.50; Archer, Tex., $1; Norwood, Ill., $1. A colored minister in Delaware, who received the paper last year through this fund, writes: "It would take me some time to tell you the amount of help it has been to me. It has greatly aided me in my work, been a fruitful source of instruction to me, and encouraged me in my difficulties frequently. I wish I had the money to subscribe, so that I might be sure of it all the time. But I am very poor, and my salary is hardly enough to live on. I should be very glad if you will continue it through your fund as last year; it would greatly aid me in my work."

A Mysterious Explosion Caused Severe if Not fatal injuries to six workmen in New York on January 19. They were preparing the foundation for a mammoth gasholder in Sixty-second Street, and while making their excavations a tremendous explosion shook the earth, and huge blocks of stone were hurled into the air. There was a general stampede of the men at work, but as there were no more explosions they returned after a time to see if any of their number had been injured. They found six men imprisoned under pieces of rock. Two of them had broken legs, three of them were hurt on the head, and the sixth had received spinal injury. An examination of the place showed that the explosion had been caused by a dynamite cartridge, which one of the men had struck with his pick. It had been placed there a week before, when the blasting was done. It had failed to explode then, and had been forgotten. Analogous catastrophes sometimes occur in the spiritual and moral world. Sins which have not been found out have remained so long concealed that the very perpetrators have forgotten them, but exposure and retribution are sure to come at the final judgment, if not in this life. (Eccles. 8: 11, 12.)

The Use of a Turkey as an Envelope is likely to benefit a girl in Connecticut. She and her widowed mother live near Waterbury, and are in very straitened circumstances. Of late, owing to the mother's sickness, the burden of providing for their wants has seriously increased. The girl has employment, but is not earning sufficient money to provide all that is needed for the home and her invalid mother. In an emergency a short time ago, the girl resolved to sacrifice a pet turkey, which she had reared from a chick, and to which she was much attached. The bird was killed, but before sending it to market she put inside of it a prettily worded note, in which she expressed a hope that the eater would enjoy it, and stated the circumstances under which she had sacrificed her pet. The purchaser proved to be a business man having no children. He read the note, and, having consulted with his wife, sent the girl a handsome present. He told a reporter that they intend to visit the girl's home shortly, and if they find the facts as she represents them, there will be "developments of permanent benefit to the girl." Thus her sacrifice may bring her great gain. It is so with the sacrifices made in Christ's cause. The woman who broke the alabaster box of ointment to anoint her Lord won His approval and immortal fame. (Matt. 26: 13.)

A Night in a Tomb Was Spent by a Young man in Brooklyn, N. Y., recently. Some laborers were at work on the graves in Greenwood Cemetery on January 23, under the direction of the junior partner in a well-known firm of florists. About 5 o'clock in the afternoon they quitted work, and the young florist went around to see that all was right before going home. He opened the gate of a vault, in the granite walls of which there are twenty-five receptacles for coffins, eight of which are filled. As he passed in, he carelessly pulled the gate to after him, and the spring-lock snapped with a sharp click, and he realized that he was a prisoner. He was not much troubled at first, as there were several parties in the cemetery, and he thought some one would pass, by whom he could send a message to the gate-keeper. Presently two ladies came by, and the young man shouted to them and beckoned. They were, however, too much terrified to approach, and ran out of the cemetery as quickly as they could, telling the gate-keeper that they had seen a ghost. No one else came near all night, and the young man walked up and down the narrow passage-way between the coffins until morning, when the superintendent saw him and released him. It was a weird experience even for a man whose business makes him familiar with the resting-places of the dead. Everyone would shrink from it, yet, though everyone knows that his own body will one day lie with the dead, comparatively few take advantage of God's promise to all who trust in Christ, that He will "redeem their souls from the power of the grave." (Ps. 49: 14, 15.)

A Contest Over an Eccentric Will was the subject of investigation in New York on January 30. Thirty years ago John Hayden, a wealthy bachelor in Ireland, died, leaving the whole of his property to his sister for life. After her death, the property was to be given absolutely to any female relative of his who should marry a man named John Hayden, who must be a resident of County Tipperary, born and brought up a Roman Catholic. Mr. Hayden had no definite person in view. Only two female relatives of the testator were living when the property became subject to this provision in the will. One of them set out to find a man fulfilling its conditions. She discovered one, and having made known to him the situation, he agreed to aid her in gaining the property by marrying her. They were married, and took possession of the estate. The other relative, who lives in Brooklyn, N. Y., has commenced a Chancery Suit, asking to have the estate divided on the principles governing the administration of intestate estates, on the ground of the eccentricity of the will. The British Consul in New York is commissioned to inquire into her identity, and last week commenced the inquiry. The decision of the court will probably be against her, as she did not fulfil the conditions of the will, while her relative did so. There is reason to fear that many will fail to gain a heavenly inheritance for the same cause. They do not chose to accept salvation on the terms God has laid down, and there is no other way. (Rom. 10: 3, 4.)

A Vessel Without Captain or Crew Has Crossed the Atlantic safely, and entered the harbor of Stornoway, Scotland, after nearly a year's wandering. On February 29 the schooner W. L. White left Doboy, Ga., with a cargo of lumber for New York. On March 12 she was struck by the memorable hurricane, and became water-logged. The captain and crew, despairing of saving her, abandoned the ship and took to an open boat. They were picked up four days afterward by a passing ship, and taken to port. The abandoned vessel drifted into the Gulf Stream, and subsequently into the track of the transatlantic steamers. She was seen at various points during the summer drifting aimlessly about. On more than one occasion a captain reported passing her at a point more than six hundred miles from the place where she had been passed a month before. Before the end of June she had covered a distance of three thousand miles. The last time she was seen was on November 29, and nothing more was heard of her until last week, when news was received of her entering the Scottish harbor, seven hundred miles away from her position in November. During the whole year she has been a source of danger to other vessels, and mariners are relieved by learning that she is safe in port. Unhappily the derelicts on the sea of life, who are a source of danger to those with whom they come in contact, seldom drift into the harbor of safety. There are no currents to bear them to port, and none can be saved unless the Captain of Salvation takes command. (Ps. 18: 16, 19.)

An Obnoxious Bell was Presented to Cornell University last week by the Rev. Robert Collyer, of New York. In the letter accompanying the gift, Mr. Collyer says that when he was a boy, working in a blacksmith's shop in England, that bell was suspended over a factory. Its ringing in the morning was the signal for him to get up and go to work. He does not know its tone according to musical classification, but to him it was positively hateful in those days. Recently the factory was demolished to make room for a reservoir for the town of Leeds, and Mr. Collyer wrote to a friend in that town, asking that when the bell was broken up for old metal a piece of his old enemy might be sent to him for a paper-weight. The Leeds town council, hearing of his request, presented him with the whole bell, and Mr. Collyer has now given it to Cornell. He says it will be pleasant to think of it as converted to new uses—a regenerate bell, calling people to nobler occupations, and therefore giving a welcome sound, instead of the old harsh summons to servile labor. We may hope that Mr. Collyer's wish may be fulfilled, and that the sound of the bell may be always a welcome one in the University. Its tone will be the same as when it grated on his ears half a century ago, but its associations will be changed by its consecration to better uses. It is a type of the time which is coming, when all things animate and inanimate, will be so changed, and the bells will bear the inscription, "Holiness to the Lord." (Zech. 14: 20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea's meetings at Guelph, Ontario, Canada, have been attended by large numbers of persons. Some came from distant towns to attend them.

Six medical students promised to go out as medical missionaries at the recent conference in Cincinnati, at which Dr. Scudder and Mr. C. K. Oder gave addresses on Foreign Missions.

Mr. D. L. Moody's meetings in San Francisco are attracting immense crowds. He is assisted in the singing by Mr. George C. Stebbins. The Occident gives full reports of his sermons.

The Eighth Anniversary of the organization of the first Christian Endeavor Society occurred on February 2. There are now seven thousand societies with an aggregate of 400,000 members.

The petition of the W. C. T. U., for the suppression of the sale of alcoholic liquors in military and naval institutions is being circulated among officers and men of the Army and Navy, and among officers and members of the G. A. R.

Rev. C. H. and Mrs. St. John have been holding very successful meetings at Bradford, Ill. Among those who have made profession of faith have been several old soldiers. The evangelists now go to Seward, Neb., and thence to Los Angeles, Cal.

Rev. Sam Jones has been holding meetings at Los Angeles, Cal. The Pavilion has been crowded at each service. Local journals describe the movement as the most wonderful ever seen in that vicinity. The interest grew and deepened from day to day.

Mr. E. W. Bliss and Prof. D. B. Townner and wife will be associated together in evangelistic work this season. They closed a very successful work in Chicago in January, and went to Sedalia, Mo., on the 14th. Thence they go to Omaha, Neb., and possibly Madison, Wis.

Bishop H. C. Riley delivered an interesting lecture with stereopticon views at Association Hall, New York, on January 29. A large and appreciative audience greeted him with frequent applause. The Bishop has consented to deliver another lecture in the same place on February 12.

Mr. Narde, the Italian evangelist of New York, and his blind wife, are working among the Italian laborers in the iron and coal mines at Newcastle, Pa. Cottage meetings have been held, and house to house visitation systematically carried on. The Italians there are notoriously ignorant and godless, but have shown appreciation of the teaching in their own language of the evangelists.

Half-rate fares have been secured for delegates and friends to the 23d annual meeting of the Y. M. C. Associations of New York State, to be held at Watertown, February 21-24. Gen. O. O. Howard will deliver the opening address, and among the speakers will be Messrs. Cleveland H. Dodge, of New York, Prof. A. G. Hopkins, of Hamilton, and Prof. B. I. Wheeler, of Cornell.

ESSENTIAL POINTS IN PRAYER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The Lord appeared to Solomon the second time, as he had appeared to him at Gibeon. And the Lord said unto him: I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication, that thou hast made before me: I have hallowed this house, which thou hast built, to put My name there for ever; and mine eyes and My heart shall be there perpetually." 1 Kings 9: 2, 3.

The Blessing of the First Appearance to Solomon—The Second Appearance Needed—Not a Re-Conversion—The Higher Life Enjoyed from the First—The Lord's Reference to Solomon's Prayer—Its Characteristics—I. The Place in Prayer—Not Always Found—Can be Found in Public Prayer—Not the Place for Scolding and Criticising the Brethren—To be Directed to God—II. The Great Desideratum—To be Heard—And Accepted—An Answer Looked for—III. Assurance of Answer—How it Comes—In Strong Confidence—In Actual Observation.

BELOVED friends, it was an exceedingly encouraging thing to Solomon that the Lord should appear to him before the beginning of his great work of building the temple. See in the third chapter of this First Book of the Kings, at the fifth verse, "In Gibeon the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream by night; and God said, Ask what I shall give thee." Some of us remember how the Lord was with us at the beginning of our life-work, when we started as young men and women newly converted, full of zeal and earnestness, determined to do something for the Lord. How we sought His face! with what simplicity, with what tenderness of heart, with what dependence upon Him and diffidence as to ourselves! It is a priceless blessing to begin with God, and not to lay a stone of till the Lord has appeared unto us. It is an equal, perhaps a superior, blessing for the Lord to appear to us after a certain work is done; even as in this case: "The Lord appeared to Solomon the second time, as He had appeared unto him at Gibeon." Solomon had now finished the temple, and he needed another visit from on high. There is great joy in completing a work; and yet there is, to some minds, a great drop when the once engrossing service ceases to keep the mind upon the stretch. You run up-hill, and you have gained the summit; there is no more climbing, for the present, and then you almost wish that you had to struggle again. A work like that of Solomon, lasting for seven years, must have become a delight to him; to see the house growing, and to mark all the stages of its beauty. He may have been in peril of pride, if not of depression: in either case it was a remarkable season, and its need must have been remarkable also; "and so the Lord appeared unto Solomon the second time, as He had appeared unto him at Gibeon."

Brethren, we want renewed appearances, fresh manifestations, new visitations from on high; and I commend to those of you who are getting on in life, that while you thank God for the past, and look back with joy to his visits to you in your early days, you now seek and ask for a second visitation of the Most High.

I think that we should be seeking those second appearances: we should be crying to God most pleadingly that He would speak to us a second time. We do not want a re-conversion, as some assert. I hope that we do not; if the Lord has kept us, as we should be, steadfast in His fear, we are possessors of what some call

"The Higher Life."

This we have many of us enjoyed from the very first hour of our spiritual life. We do not need to be converted again; yet we do want that again over our heads the windows of heaven should be opened, that again a Pentecost should be given, and that we should renew our youth like the eagles, to run without weariness, and walk without fainting. The Lord fulfil to every one of His people His blessing upon Solomon! "The Lord appeared to Solomon the second time, as He had appeared unto him at Gibeon."

Now, what the Lord spoke upon in the commencement of His interview with Solomon concerned His prayer; and as the Lord answered that prayer, and here, in this second appearance, recapitulated the points of it, we may be sure that there was much about that prayer which would make it a model for us. We shall do well to pray after the manner which successful pleaders have followed. In this case we will follow the Lord's own description of an accepted prayer. I shall use the text to that end briefly.

I. First,

Our Proper Place in Prayer.

The Lord said, "I have heard thy prayer, and thy supplication, that thou hast made before Me." There is the place to pray—"before Me;" that is to say, before the Lord. This place is not always found. The Pharisee went up to the temple to pray, and yet, evidently, he did not pray "before God;" so that even in the most holy courts he did not find the place desired. In his own esteem he prayed; but, in his going home to his house without justification, there was evidence that he either had not prayed at all, or that he had not prayed before God. It is not because you pass these portals, and come into these pews, that therefore you are before God. Nay, and if you were to seek the shrines which have been most eminently regarded in the Church; if you stood by the site of Jerusalem, if you sought out that little skull-like hill called "Calvary," and prayed there, or if you went to Olivet, and bowed your knee in Gethsemane, you might not therefore be before God. The nearer the Church, sometimes, the farther from God; and in the very centre of it, in the midst of the assembly where prayer is wont to be made, you may not be "before God" at all.

This blessed place "before God" can be found in public prayer. Solomon's prayer before God was offered in the midst of a great multitude. The priests stood in their places, and the Levites kept their due order.

The People were Gathered together, and all the armies of the tribes of Israel stood in the streets of the holy city when Solomon bowed his knee and cried mightily unto his God. It is evident that he was enabled, that day, not to pray to please the people, nor that they might note his eloquent language and be gratified with the appropriate performance; but he was inspired to pray before the Lord.

Ah, brethren! those of us who have to conduct your devotions, strive hard that we may be seen of God in secret, when heard of men in public; and I am sure that we never pray so rightly or so usefully for you as when we only remember you in a very inferior sense, but seem to be surrounded as with a cloud, enclosed within the secret place of the Most High, even when we stand supplicating aloud for you in the public assembly of God's people. The same is true of each of you: it is wrong for you, in a prayer-meeting, to pray with a view to an individual of importance, or with the remembrance of those present whose respect you would like to obtain. The mercy-seat is no place for the exhibition of your abilities. More evil still is it to take the opportunity of about others. I have heard of oblique hints having been given in prayer, I am sorry to say that I have even heard of remarks which have been so directly critical and offensive, that one knew what the brother was at, and lamented it. Such a proceeding is altogether objectionable and irreverent. We do not even pray in prayer-meetings to correct doctrinal errors, nor to teach a body of divinity, nor to make remarks upon the errors of certain brethren, nor to impeach them before the Most High. These things should be earnest matters of supplication, but not of a sort of indirect preaching and scolding in prayer. It is conduct worthy of the accuser of the brethren to turn a prayer into an opportunity of finding fault with others. Our prayer must be "before God," or else it is not an acceptable prayer.

But prayer before God can just as well—perhaps more readily—be offered in private, though

I am not sure that it is not easily missed even there. You are in your room, where you are accustomed to pray. Do you not find yourself upon your knees repeating goodly words, while your heart is wandering? May you not confess that often the prayer, which has been a matter of habit, has been said as much before the walls of your room, or before the bedpost, as before God? You have not realized His presence; you have not spoken distinctly and directly to Him. Although you have observed the Saviour's canon, and have shut to the door, and nobody else has been there, so that you have not prayed in the presence of others; yet you have mainly prayed in your own presence, and God has to your inmost soul been far away. It is poor work merely to talk piously to yourself. Brethren, the main point of supplication is neither to pray in the presence of others, nor yet, first of all, in your own presence, but to present your prayer "before God."

Now, it is clear that this means that the prayer is to be directed to God. "Well," says one, "I know that." I know you do; and yet, my brother, you too often forget it.

Indefinite Praying

is a waste of breath. It will never do to begin praying, neck or nothing, because the time has come for it. We must think, "I am about to ask of God what I want: I am to speak to the great King of kings, from whom all grace must come: it is to Him that my prayer must be directed. What, then, shall I ask at His hands?" Does anybody here suppose that the repeating of certain words out of a book, or of his own making, has any virtue in it? Some seem, by their frequent repetitions of that blessed model of prayer, the Lord's Prayer, to think that there is a magical charm in that sacred arrangement of words; but, I tell you solemnly, you might as well repeat that perfect prayer backwards as forwards, if your heart is not in it. If your very heart is not in it, and if your soul is not looking Godwards, you profane your Lord's words, and are guilty of all the greater sin because of their excellence. Make not praying a piece of witchcraft, and your supplications an imitation of the abracadabra of the wizard; else it is vain superstition, and not acceptable supplication. Pray thou distinctly, with all thy wits about thee, to thy God. Speak thou to Him.

And hence it becomes needful that we should endeavor, in prayer, to

of God. Oh, to come before the living and acting God! Not before a God lame and impotent, nor before the new God, who is impersonal and dead, but before the true God—God in Christ Jesus! If we did but realize who He is to whom we speak—God, very nigh to us in the person of the Only Begotten, who has taken our nature upon Himself, what praying ours would be! And that is the right sort of praying.

If there are any here that have never prayed, let their prayer at this time be to one who is close to them, ready to hear them. Do not ask, "What shall I say?" Say to God what you wish to say. What is your desire to-night? Would you be saved? Beg Him to save you. Would you be forgiven? Ask forgiveness. "The words," say you, "tell me the words!" Nay, you need no words. If you have none, look, look to Him. Let your heart think out its desires. There is music without words: and there is prayer without words.

II. I will change the run of our thought for a little while, to notice, with much earnestness,

Our Great Desideratum

in prayer. It is that which God said that He had given to Solomon. "I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication." I have often had occasion to remark that the wise men of modern times, whose principal characteristic is that they think so much of themselves, and so very little of anybody else, tell us that prayer is an excellent exercise, good and comforting and useful, but that we are not to suppose that it has any effect upon God whatever. We inquire of them, "Would you have us go on praying after the information you have given?" "Oh, yes," they say, "Oh yes, of course; it is a pious exercise, a proper and edifying thing. Go on praying, but do not think that God hears." Brethren, it is evident that

They Think Us Idiots.

Evidently they consider praying men to be born fools. If it be certain that prayer has no effect upon God, my brother, I would just as lief whistle when I rise in the morning as pray, and I would as soon close my eyes at night in dumb silence as run over a set of ineffectual words. If there is neither hearing nor answering, we shall have reduced ourselves to the level of the worshippers of Baal, if we continue to cry; and we have not come to that yet. But, brethren, what we desire in prayer is really to be heard. If I pray, I pray not to the winds, nor to the waves, but to God; and if He does not hear me, I have lost my breath.

The first thing the soul desires in prayer is audience with God. If the Lord do not hear us, we have gained nothing. And what an honor it is, if you come to think of it, to have audience with God! You notice that, generally in the Psalms, David says very little about God's answering; but he always speaks about God's hearing, and he asks that He would hear. That He should deign to hear us is quite enough, quite enough from such a God as He is. If I can get my petition placed in His hand, I am fully satisfied. If I can pour my desire into His ear, and He has once observed it, all Further Fear is Removed.

But we want more than that: we want that He should accept. It were a painful thing to be permitted to speak to a great friend, and then for him to stand austere and stern, and say, "I have heard what you have to say. Go your way." We ask not this of God. We beg Him kindly and graciously to accept our poor confessions, supplications, and adorations.

Still, there is a third thing which we want, which God gave to Solomon, and that is an answer. He asked the Lord to hallow the house, and the Lord did hallow the house. And as to you and me in prayer, while there are some things which we must always pray for with a great deal of diffidence, evermore saying emphatically, "Not as I will, but as Thou wilt," yet are there certain other boons which we are encouraged to pray for with importunity, being resolved to have them. Those are spiritual blessings, covenant blessings, distinctly promised, and evidently necessary: these we may ask for without any question, using a sacred importunity, and refusing to let the angel go unless he blesses us. Oh, for more holy boldness! Oh, for more assured confidence; We have need to believe that we have the petitions that we ask of Him. We must ask in faith, nothing wavering, or we may not expect to receive anything of the Lord.

III. This makes me mention, thirdly, our Assurance of Answer to Prayer.

Can we have an assurance that God has heard and answered prayer? Solomon had it. The Lord said unto him, "I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication, that thou hast made before Me." Does the Lord ever say that to us? I think so. Let us consider how He does so.

I think that He says it to us very often in our usual faith. I hope that I speak for many of you when I say that we constantly pray believingly. It is habitual with me to expect God to answer me. I go to Him very simply, and ask for what I want; and, if I did not have that which I humbly sought for, I should be greatly surprised. When I do have it, I reckon it as a matter of course, for the Lord has promised to answer prayer, and it is certain that He will keep His promise. I am speaking now about the daily mercies, and the daily trials, and the ordinary events of life: in these matters God is sure to answer prayer, and our faith, in its ordinary operation is, to our hearts, the voice of God, saying, "I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication."

But sometimes you require strong confidence.

You have to solicit some extraordinary blessing. You get a place like that to which Jacob came, when common prayer was not sufficient. At such times it is a stronger faith than usual, brought into exercise by necessity, which assures the soul of the blessing. "According to thy faith be it unto thee." If we can trust God—for that is the thing—we shall have the thing we seek. Faith is not saying, "I know that I have it," when you really have it not. That would be telling yourself a lie. Here is a man who says, "Believe that you are sanctified, and you are in a moment sanctified." But you are not. You may believe a lie in believing that, and be, perhaps, less sanctified than you were before you believed it, and ten times more proud, and thus far more under the influence of Satan. God keep us from the falsehood of folly, and lead us into the truth of wisdom! I will believe anything, however monstrous it may appear, if God says it. I will believe nothing, however desirable, merely because my own fancy imagines it, or because your heated brain suggests it.

Sometimes this comes in the form of a comfortable persuasion. Have you never known what it is to leave off prayer when you are in the middle of it, and say, "I am heard: I am heard"? When a man goes to a bank with a cheque, and he gets the money, he does not stand loafing about the counter: he goes off about his business. And oftentimes before God, he that is prepared to be a long time in prayer, if it should be necessary, feels that he must be brief in petition and long in thanksgiving. He rises from his knees with the persuasion, "I need not ask any more: I am heard;" and he goes about his business, to do and seasonable than praying; for it is always better to serve God in a pressing practical duty than it is to continue to pray when prayer has no longer any reasonableness in it, seeing that you are already heard. If God has given you the blessing, why ask for it any further? "The Lord says to Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto Me? speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward;" and that going forward was a better thing than praying, now that praying had had its day. So there comes a comfortable assurance at times that it is even so, and you go your way rejoicing. This inward persuasion is no fanatical imagining, nor excitement of the brain, but a work of the Spirit, which none can imitate, and only the receiver can understand.

Actual observation also breeds in us a solid confidence that our suit is succeeding. Sometimes God gives us an assurance that He has heard our prayer when He makes us look back and observe the past. How He has answered us! He changes not; He hears us still. Throughout life it has been my habit to wait upon God about many things, and especially about extraordinary necessities which have arisen out of the demands of the great institutions committed to me. I shall not stay to tell the stories of the Lord's supplies in answer to prayer. Some of you know them in a measure; but, in very truth, the Lord has heard as distinctly as if He had rent the heavens, and put out His right hand filled with good. Many of you could bear similar witness, could you not? The fact that the Lord has heard us in the past speaks in our souls, and fills us with the assurance that He will hear us yet again.

Now I have come to the end of what I had to say, with this one sole exception. In the case of Solomon prayer turned in one direction, and in that direction I want to turn it now. You learn what Solomon's prayer was when you hear how God fulfilled it. God said to him, "I have hallowed this house which thou hast built, and put my name there forever, and mine eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually." Oh, that the eye of the Lord might be upon this house, and upon this Church, to watch over it, to keep it from all harm! But may His heart also be with us, to fill us with His divine life and love, and to make us know His inner self! Oh for the love of God to be shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost! May we know that God's feelings of affection and delight are towards us! This shall be our joy unspeakable. The Lord bless you, dear friends, for Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A CONTEMPTIBLE KING.*

ONE country alone, or rather one person, came out of the struggle with marked discredit. The position of Charles II. of England was indeed contemptible. Peace had been made without his concurrence—in spite, indeed, of his utmost efforts. He had lived by chicanery, and his chicanery had ended in complete discomfiture. Louis now, neither needing nor fearing him, met his appeal for part at least of the money he claimed with a contemptuous refusal. In December, 1678, the Lords united with the Commons in insisting on his immediately disbanding his troops, and from that moment, baffled in diplomacy and crippled for war, he had no further voice in Continental affairs. His position with his own people was as humiliating as his position in the face of Europe. To the Parliament and the Church he was an object of suspicion. His supplies were doled out with jealous parsimony, and his use of the money was vigilantly watched. From the control under which he fretted, his only chances of escape had been trickery and foreign alms. His servants were indeed capable, but bitter personal rivalries prevented all co-operation; and though the extravagances of an opposition as unscrupulous as himself, aided by his own coolness of head and cynical good-temper, afforded him before long an opportunity of establishing an apparently complete ascendancy in his kingdom, it was an ascendancy maintained only by a scrupulous observance of conditions which he had now for nineteen years in vain endeavored to evade.

The Murder of De Witt.

The prospect of final rescue was, however, so dim that the States General determined to negotiate with Louis. When their deputation reached his camp at Doesburg they were told by Louvois that satisfaction for the allies of France and the payment of the entire expenses of the war were necessary preliminaries to a treaty. The States General were disposed to yield, but the deputies of Amsterdam, in the Provincial Estates of Holland, stood firm. Come what might they declared that they would have no part in such a submission. As unity of command grew indispensable the restoration of the Stadtholderate was demanded with increasing insistence, and to this restoration, John De Witt was regarded as the main obstacle. On June 21 he was attacked in the streets and left for dead, and on the same day an attempt was made at Dordrecht upon the life of his brother Cornelius. A terrible crime signalized the triumph of the reaction. The enmity against the De Witts has been disarmed neither by the murderous attack upon them nor by the dignified address in which, after recounting the services of nineteen years, John de Witt resigned to the Provincial Estates of Holland his charge as Grand Pensionary. The populace determined on a full accomplishment of their design. The blow fell first upon Cornelius, who, accused of plotting the murder of

The Clergyman Explains Why He Abstains.

William, was enticed to the Hague, and there, by order of the Court of Holland, put to the torture, and ordered to be banished from Holland and West Friesland. As he lay crippled from the rack, the mob surrounded the prison to prevent his departure. By a feigned message his brother was induced to visit him there. Means were found to remove the guards who protected the prison from attack. Then, bursting open the gates, the crowd rushed to the room where the brothers were expecting their fate. They found Cornelius stretched on the bed, while John De Witt read aloud from the Bible. A blow struck the reader on the face and covered him with blood. Then Cornelius was dragged to his feet. Almost before the brothers had exchanged a last kiss he was hurled to the bottom of the stairs. Pushing their victims before them, the mob rushed into the street, and there the butchery was completed. As John De Witt, struck to the earth, raised himself on his knees, and holding his clasped hands to heaven, opened his lips to utter a last prayer, he was dashed backwards; a man placed his foot upon his throat and blew out his brains with a pistol.

THE LATE FATHER GAVAZZI.

THE death of the eminent Italian patriot and orator, whose portrait appears on this page, was mentioned in these columns on January 16.

Alessandro Gavazzi was born at Bologna, in Italy, on March 21, 1809, and was therefore in his eightieth year when he died. He was the second of twenty children. His father was a barrister and a judge, and many of his ancestors were most eminent magistrates of his native city. At the early age of fifteen he became, by his own choice, a monk of the Barnabite order. Possessing great physical and intellectual energy, of commanding stature and countenance, and gaining almost unprecedented fame for his academic successes, he was appointed Professor of Rhetoric in Naples at twenty, and afterwards of Belles Lettres at Leghorn. In both places he was admired as a man of genius, and beloved as a friend. Desirous, however, of instructing his fellow-men in a larger sphere, in 1833 he quitted the chair for the pulpit, and the principal towns of Italy were soon ringing with his name and resounding with his eloquence.

Wherever he preached, the churches were crowded to excess. He was, however, a reformer, not preaching the superstitions of the Romish Church, but contending for purity of life, and salvation by faith.

His discourses aroused the enmity of the priests, and after eight years they succeeded in getting him banished. His own ecclesiastical superiors also moved against him, and by their order he was restrained from preaching, and in 1846 kept in a monastery, under rigorous discipline, for eighteen months. During the convulsions of 1848 he regained his freedom, and became chaplain of the army, at first with Papal sanction, but afterward, when the Italian arms were turned against the Pope, with his dire displeasure. The Pope's return after his inglorious flight rendered Rome an unsafe place for Gavazzi, and he made his escape to England, where he supported himself by teaching Italian. There his conversion took place, and he saw the glorious truths of the Reformation in a new light. He recognized in evangelical Christianity the true and only remedy for the ills of his country, and longed to preach it in Italy.

It was not until 1870, when the temporal power was wrested from the Pope, that Gavazzi could return to Italy. He went immediately, and took the foremost place among evangelists. He founded the Free Christian Church of Italy, evangelical in doctrine, and resembling the Free Church of Scotland in Church government. He was formally excommunicated by the Pope, but he heeded it not, and went on preaching with vigor the doctrine of salvation through faith in Christ alone. In 1872, and again in 1881, Gavazzi visited the United States, and received liberal contributions toward his work.

WHY THE CLERGYMAN ABSTAINED.

(See illustration.)

A YOUNG clergyman was one of a large party seated at dinner in the house of Colonel Towers, a prominent member of his congregation. Total abstinence at that time had not attained the influence and power it now exerts in our churches, and it was quite customary for clergymen and the officers of their churches to drink wine and liquor in moderation. It consequently occasioned some surprise when the young clergyman, who had but recently accepted the charge of the congregation, respectfully but firmly declined Colonel Towers's invitation: "Will you give me the pleasure of taking a glass of wine with you, Mr. Winsor?"

The dinner-party passed off pleasantly, and the guests took their departure in the best of moods, pleased with their new clergyman, and glad to have had the opportunity of meeting each other and him in pleasant social intercourse. They, like their host, were a little disappointed that Mr. Winsor was a total abstainer, thinking that it would render him less friendly and social than he would have been if he had taken his glass and cigar with his friends. Mr. Winsor did not leave with them. Colonel Towers asked him to remain for an hour longer and drink a cup of tea with himself and daughter, and his business partner, Mr. Sutton.

"Now, Mr. Winsor," Colonel Tower said, when the quartet were gathered around the table. "I should like to know your reasons for taking up this fanatical teetotal idea. Every man has a right to adopt his own rules of life in such matters, but I think you will decrease your opportunities of usefulness if people come to regard you as an ascetic."

"I cannot answer your question better, Colonel, than by telling you how I became a total abstainer," said the clergyman. "It is a very mournful episode in my life, and one I cannot describe without some pain, but it is best you should understand why I regard total abstinence as an imperative duty for me."

"Up to the time of my leaving college I was in the habit of drinking wine, and sometimes a glass of spirits, but I never cared much for intoxicating liquors of any kind. I was in no danger of indulging too freely, for I had an aversion to the exhilarated condition of mind that a very small quantity produced in me. But among my college friends was one who was very dear to me, who was differently constituted. He was somewhat slow and sluggish, but I had seen him light up with animation, and I knew that under his dull manner there was a very brilliant mind. He had a dislike to social gatherings, and avoided them when he could do so without discourtesy."

"When I was leaving college I gave a little supper to my old friends, and as they considered my rating on the honors' list a kind of triumph there was an enthusiastic party. Bennett of course was there, though I had to use some pressure to get him to come. We were all very jubilant, but no one drank to excess. Bennett, however, surprised us all. We did not notice his drinking much, and I do not think he did, but he was so witty and brilliant that he was the life and soul of the party. More than one of us was surprised, though I, who knew him best, did not wonder at the great change so much as did the others.

"All passed off well, and we separated in good spirits. The next day a message was brought to me by a stranger, asking me to go immediately to a saloon in the neighborhood. The proprietor met me at the door, and said, 'We thought it best to send for you, as we have a young man here who is likely to make trouble. He is a friend of yours, it seems, and you could not do him a better service than in getting him away. He will do some mischief to himself or some one else if he drinks much more.'

"I went in, and there was Bennett uproariously intoxicated; laughing, singing, making speeches, and playing jokes on the men around. I could do nothing with him. 'No, old fellow,' he said, 'I must have more. I have not tasted it for two years until at your supper last night, and now I must have it!' I persuaded him to come away at last, and saw him safely to bed, and waited by him until he fell asleep. But after I left, he got up, went back to the saloon and began drinking again. That night, in going home, he staggered right under the wheels of a brewer's wagon, and was killed.

"It came out, afterward, that his father and grandfather had both drunk themselves to death; and Bennett, knowing the taint in his blood, and having once fallen under the power of liquor himself, had abstained, until at my table he had tasted liquor again and was unable to restrain himself. I cannot describe my remorse. 'Oh,' I said, 'if I had but known!' It was useless to lament then, but I resolved that never again should my example or my hospitality ever lead any man to drink, for we know not who may be in danger. 'If meat make my brother to offend,' said the apostle, 'I will eat no flesh while the world standeth;' and I forswore liquor on the same ground.

"So I am a total abstainer, and I hope the time is coming when, for the sake of our poor, weak brethren, every Christian man will encourage them to abstain by denying himself that very questionable luxury."

THE ORIENTAL GATE.

(See Illustration.)

THE picture on this page will throw light on many Biblical passages. It is that of the street of an Oriental city by which the gate of the city is approached, and is familiarly spoken of as "the gate." There to this day it serves the purpose of business and public meeting. It is analogous to the Exchanges of our cities, and an Eastern merchant or broker who goes to the gate may be assumed to have the same object in view as the merchant of Western countries when he says he is going on 'Change. Boaz, in settling the affair of Ruth, went to the gate and sat him down there to wait for the kinsman nearer to Naomi than he; and there, with ten elders, the right of redemption, and of being the husband of Ruth, was legally transferred. (Ruth 4.) In the gate, too, Abraham negotiated the purchase of a burying-place. (Gen. 23: 10.) The manslayer who fled to the city of Refuge was to declare his cause in the gate in the hearing of the elders. (Josh. 20: 4.) The prediction of Elisha was that the provisions would be sold at the gate of Samaria at the prices he named. (II Kings 7: 1.) There, also, acts of idolatrous worship were performed. (See II Kings 23: 8, and Acts 14: 13.) The gate also seems to have been the place of execution as well as judicial proceedings, as the parents of an irreclaimable son were to bring him to the gate and state their charges against him, and if they were proved, the son was to be stoned there. (Deut. 21: 19-21.) In the book of Job, too, reference is made to the gate as a place in which recognition and honor were esteemed evidences of integrity (Job. 29: 7); and Jeremiah mentions the deserted place as a sign of the decadence of the city. (Lam. 5: 14.)

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Polygamy Revealed.

IT is believed that Smith preached polygamy at least as early as 1838, yet when the storm arose in 1842 from Bennett's exposure of what he asserted to be the teachings of the prophet, there was inserted in the Times and Seasons an article on "Marriage," by Oliver Cowdrey, and placed in the appendix to the book of modern revelations, to which Joseph added an editorial note in which he states: "We have given the above rule of marriage as the only one practiced in this Church, to show that Dr. J. C. Bennett's polygamy system is a matter of his own manufacture, and further to disabuse the public ear, and show that Bennett and his misanthropic friend, Origen Batchelor are perpetrating a foul and infamous slander upon an innocent people, and need but to be known to be hated and despised."

It was on July 12, 1843, that the "revelation" authorizing the plurality of wives was said to have been given to Joseph Smith, yet on February 1, of the following year, this doctrine is spoken of in a document signed by Joseph and his brother Hyrum, as "false and corrupt." Joseph F. Smith, the son of Hyrum, glossed this over in a similar manner to the others. How much longer the Smiths would have carried on this deception, before publishing the revelation, we cannot tell. Three months after the signing of the above document, in 1844, while they were waiting their trial, the mob broke into the prison, and after throwing them out, shot them both.

This system of deception was continued by his disciples till August, 1852, and in England until January, 1853, when the "Revelation" was published. At this time the British Mission was in the highest prosperity; the elders were travelling over the country, meeting with great success. The Utah elders then in England, and a few only of the native elders, knew some little time before that it was to be published. When it did appear, it fell like a thunderbolt upon the "Saints," and fearfully shattered the mission. The British elders, who in their ignorance had been denying polygamy, and stigmatizing their opponents as calumniators, were confounded and paralyzed, and from that time to the present, the avenues of preaching have closed one after another, and the mission that was once the glory of the Mormon Church is withered and shrivelled into comparative insignificance. The Mormon Church in Great Britain then numbered 30,690 members, over which, in addition to the Utah missionaries, there were 6,682 native elders, priests, teachers, and deacons; but within six months there were no less than 1,776 persons separated from the Mormon movement, while the power of the elders was broken, and converts since then have been comparatively few. Men naturally asked themselves whether teachers who had deceived the people on the subject of polygamy were worthy of trust in other matters.

Conferences were held semi-annually, and missionaries were appointed to Palestine, Africa, and Europe, and to each Congressional district in the United States. The best educated, the most inquiring and restive ones, were sent on these errands in order to give them a chance to let off the steam of discontent. They were sent with all the promptness of military orders, with a three days' notice for an absence of three years from home and family, which were cared for by the presidency and bishops. Three hundred missionaries were appointed at one of these conferences. Previous to starting they received orders from Joseph, who preached a rousing sermon to them that stimulated their pride of conquering difficulties, without scrip or purse; the main point was that "spiritual wifehood" was to be most pointedly denied; and that they should teach that one man was to live with one woman "in chaste fidelity." He told them to buckle on the armor, "to confound the wise and unwise," etc., thus enlisting their pride, which was the sure way to make full Mormons of the wavering.

The first really traceable indication of the purpose of the prophet to introduce polygamy was in 1841-42, and then it was so furtively done that the thousands that then believed, and still believe, in the mission of Joseph Smith, as set forth by himself, deny that he ever taught such a doctrine. It was brought before the residents of Nauvoo by a quarrel between Major-General Bennett of the Nauvoo Legion, who (after he had left the Saints) published a book called "Mormonism Exposed," and related his "teaching the Mormon sisters the doctrine of affinity at the command of the Prophet."

There had been whispers of polygamy among the leaders of Mormonism at Kirtland, and more than whispers of its existence among them in Missouri—Sidney Rigdon, it is said, having suggested it to Smith, who at first was scandalized at the thought of its introduction among his followers, but easily adopted its practice, and had a "revelation" allowing the higher officers of the church to have "as many wives as they could support." Smith's wife, Emma, the "Lady Elect," made a violent opposition at first to this law, and the consolation given to her was "that a Prophet must obey the Lord, and he would be obedient to the heavenly vision."

It is not now denied that polygamy existed at Nauvoo, at first secretly and afterward openly; but everything that could be done was done to mislead the public as to the veritable teachings of the Mormon leaders concerning marriage, from the quarrel of Bennett, in 1842, until the open announcement of the revelation by Brigham Young at Salt Lake City in 1852. The missionaries were commanded to prevaricate, and even positively denied that the Mormon Church was other than monogamic. The sons of the Prophet have denied that their father believed in or practiced polygamy; but there is overwhelming proof that Joseph Smith had doubtful relations with many "sisters," and was, as he said, a "law unto himself."

Many Mormons, who personally knew the prophet, have affirmed that Joseph said it was necessary to have a "revelation" on the subject of marriage "to allay the storm that was brewing among the married women, and to satisfy the young women whom it was desirable to convert." Mrs. Joseph Smith denounced the "revelation," and talked openly of a separation from the Prophet but was "softened down" by being told that the angel commanded her "to cleave unto Joseph."

Intestine quarrels on this subject of polygamy and other causes brought on a crisis in affairs at Nauvoo, in 1844. The people in the neighborhood were jealous of the rapidly growing and flourishing city; they complained that their property disappeared mysteriously, and that law cases tried in Nauvoo court were always decided against them. No Mormon, they affirmed, was brought to justice. It was widely reported that the Mormons desired to rule the State, and intended to set all laws at defiance. A number of talented and influential persons who had become residents of Nauvoo, finding themselves deluded as to the sanctity of the Prophet and in the advancement of their temporal affairs, deserted his standard, denouncing him for licentiousness, drunkenness, and boastful tyranny. Smith justified his inebriation by the assertion that it was necessary for him to be seen in that condition to prevent his followers from worshipping him as a God. Women accused him of attempted seduction, and he replied that he made such attempts "to learn if they were virtuous."

My husband enjoined me not to speak of what I had heard, and I felt very little inclination to do so—my heart was too full. The pleasant dreams and hopes of life were ended now to me. What could I look forward to? Henceforth the stern realities of a lonely and weary existence were all the future that should be mine. Still, the "Revelation," sanctioning a change in the doctrines and practice of the Church, was not yet published; and until polygamy was openly avowed I felt that the doom of my happiness was not yet sealed; and like many another heart-broken woman, I hoped even against hope.

And time flew by; at length the dreaded Revelation came. One very pleasant morning, early in January, 1853, two elders of the Italian Mission, Jabez Woodward and Thomas Margetts, took breakfast with us; and with them also was Mons. Petitpierre, from Geneva, the Protestant minister of whom I have already spoken. While I was busy preparing the meal, Mr. Stenhouse and the two English elders went to the post-office to get their letters, for at that time they were expecting important news. When they returned, breakfast was quite ready, and they took their seats at the table. I asked if there were any letters from England; and my husband said, "No, no letters; but there is a Star, and it contains the revelation of polygamy." He handed me a copy of the Millennial Star, a Mormon paper published in Liverpool; and as I took it, I felt as if I were receiving my death-warrant. It was indeed the death-warrant to all my hopes of happiness. I rose from the table, asking them to excuse me; and overcome with agitation and conflicting emotions, I retired to my own chamber. There, for the first time, I read that document which has since brought such sorrow and misery to so many wronged and heart-broken women.

And this was the Revelation!—this mass of confusion, cunning, absurdity, and falsehood. This was the celebrated document which was henceforth to be law to the confiding men and women who had embraced Mormonism! Looking at it now—noting its inconsistencies and its flagrant outrage upon common decency and morality, I can hardly credit that I should ever have been such a silly dupe as to give it a second thought. And yet what could I do? I was bound hand and foot, as it were, and my very vision itself was distorted. Unquestioning obedience, we had been taught, was the highest virtue; rebellion was the sin of witchcraft.

I had been convinced of the truth of some of the tenets of the Mormon faith; and confident in them, I accepted without question all the rest. Never, till the possibility that polygamy might some day be acknowledged by the Church began to be whispered among the Saints—never did a solitary doubt respecting my religion intrude itself upon my mind; and after my apprehensions were fairly aroused by these rumors, whenever I felt the faintest shadow of unbelief or suspicion arising in my heart, I banished it as an unholy thing. The time had not yet come when I could judge dispassionately: the revelation aroused within me feelings of horror and dismay, but I did not dare to question its authenticity. It brought bitterness to my soul, but I believed it was from God, and that I must learn to bear the cross patiently.

I did not at that time read the document through from beginning to end. No; my indignation was such that before I had read half of it I threw it from me in anger. Perhaps if I had read it all, and considered it carefully, my own judgment and my sense of right and wrong might have pointed out its absurdity and wickedness. But I was far from being tranquil enough to think calmly. I felt bitterly that this new doctrine was a degradation to woman, and I wondered why God should see fit to humiliate my sex in this way. I was willing to devote myself, my life, my all, to His service, but wherefore should He doom me to everlasting sorrow?

What now was to be a woman's lot among the Mormons? A life without hope! Who can express the terrible meaning of those words—without hope? Yet so it was. Hereafter our hearts were to be daily and hourly trampled upon: the most sacred feelings of our sex were to be outraged, our affections were to be crushed. Henceforth we were to be nothing by ourselves; without a husband, we were told, we could not even enter heaven! But had our trials been limited to this life we might have borne them, as many a weary soul has done, waiting for the relief of death. But death was to bring no hope to us; we were told that in the other world polygamy should be the only order of marriage, and that without it none could be exalted in glory. We were told these things by men who, we believed, were true and holy men of God; and we trusted in them.

Rebellious I felt, indeed, as I paced the room after I had thrown the Revelation on the ground: I almost felt as if I should lose my reason. A woman in the time of trouble always looks to some one in whom she can confide; but to whom could I turn for one kind or cheering word? who would comfort me? I had neither relation nor friend to whom I could speak of this trial; there was no one who could understand me. I could not turn to my husband in this sorrow, and I dared not even kneel to my God to implore His aid. It was He, they said, who had declared this Revelation was His will; how then could I turn to Him? No; my heart sank within me; henceforth there was to be no hope, no peace, for me!

There was a knock at my chamber door, and my husband came in. He knew how acutely I must feel, and he came to comfort me. I was almost choked with emotion and tears, but he threw his arms round me tenderly, and spoke to me as if I had been a child that needed consolation. He tried to persuade me that God as a loving Father could never have intended the pain or misery of His children, and that when we came to understand the doctrine better, we should find that all would be well. He spoke also of his own unchanging attachment; and appealed to me whether I thought he could ever love me less, or place his affection on another. I tried to believe, and when I felt a little better I went with him to the breakfast-room, where the others were waiting for us.

We were not a very entertaining party that morning. The elders present of course knew what had kept me in my room, and their attempt at cheerfulness was not very successful. My husband was in sympathy with me, and I have no doubt that I looked sad enough. There was only one person present who did not appreciate the situation—Monsieur Petitpierre, the Protestant minister—and they handed the Revelation to him. Mr. Stenhouse and the other elders had some misgivings as to how he would receive it, and they were afraid it might disgust him with Mormonism. But the old gentleman stood the test bravely; and I saw then, as I have seen since, that men can be easily satisfied that the Revelation on polygamy, or any other revelation, is divine, if they desire it to be so.

Old Pasteur Petitpierre was for a time completely victimized by the wicked "Revelation." He was a man of more than threescore years, and childless. To him the example of Abraham and Solomon appeared most instructive—an example which might be followed with advantage. His wife, like Sarah of old, had never been called by a mother's name; and now, although thus far he had no idea who might act the part of a second Hagar, there seemed a fair chance that a little Ishmael might perpetuate the race of Petitpierres on earth, if only the Revelation was acted upon by the faithful. "It ought to be prayerfully thought of," he said.

Prayerfully thought of! Poor, silly, old man! Before then I had respect for his years and learning; but now—what could I think of a man who talked such nonsense? Had the Revelation told him that the wife of his youth, now tottering in step, and with hair silvered by age, was commanded to take two or a dozen young husbands—I wondered whether he would have added with such satisfaction, "It ought to be prayerfully thought of!"

From that day I learned to regard polygamy as an essential part of the Mormon faith, and such for many years the world has considered it; but when I first joined the Church, such an innovation would have appeared to the European Saints the wildest fancies of a dream.

THE TIMID WOMAN'S TOUCH.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for February 17, Mark 5: 25-34. Golden Text, Mark 5: 36.

Christianity not Propagated by Force—The Petition of the Ruler—Led to it by Affliction—Lessons Learned by Discipline—An Interruption at a Critical Moment—A Weary Sufferer—Ceremonially Unclean—Conscious of her Opportunity—The Touch of the Throng and the Touch of Faith—Jesus Conscious of the Touch—The Woman Reassured—The Distress of Jairus—His Daughter Restored.

ALTHOUGH the Gadarenes gave no welcome to Jesus, yet on the other side of the sea "much people gathered unto Him." "If they persecute you in one city, flee ye into another." (Matt. 10: 23.) Our Lord would never force Himself where He was not welcome, and He teaches us to follow His example. Where Christianity has been forced upon a people, they have rarely embraced it with their whole hearts. Let us pray for those who will not receive us until the Lord shall open our way with them. When He has set before us an open door, no man can shut it. (Rev. 3: 8.) He was teaching, as He so often did, by the seaside, "and behold there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jairus by name; and when he saw Him, he fell at His feet, and besought Him greatly, saying, My little daughter lieth at the point of death; I pray thee, come and lay Thy hands on her, that she may be healed, and she shall live." Perhaps nothing short of this deep affliction would have driven him to Jesus.

"Whom the Lord Loveth He Chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." (Heb. 12: 6.) But it is with no unmeasured and unsparing hand that He chastens His children; it is only "for our profit, that we might be partakers of His holiness." And truly, "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous, nevertheless, afterward (i. e. when it is over) it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby." (Heb. 12: 11.) God has no delight in cutting off a young life in its early promise. Again and again He promises "length of days and long life" to those who will serve and obey Him. (Ex. 20: 12; Deut. 4: 40; 5: 16; 32: 47; Prov. 3: 2, 16; 9: 11; 10: 27; Eph. 6: 3; 1 Pet. 3: 10.) But He wanted to bring both Jairus and his daughter into real, immediate contact with Him who has all power both in heaven and in earth. In how many cases it has had to come to the loss of one child, then another, then another, before the parent's heart and will were fully yielded, and the life fully given up to God! How often has the successful man of business to see his prosperity vanish, and to suffer one loss after another before he comes to see that, after all, he is but a steward, and that nothing which he possesses is really his own! How often has a Christian worker to experience the gradual diminution of physical power, and to give up one meeting after another, one sphere of service after another, until he has learned to know that the work and he are not really necessary the one to the other! and then faith in God that He will care for His own work succeeds to the restless anxiety, which has exhausted heart and brain and voice. If we could only learn our lessons earlier, at the beginning of our career, instead of blundering on and injuring other people and the work of God by our mistakes, how much better would it seem to be! But, then, the very humiliations which form our lessons would be absent. If the parents always did like Jairus, and carried their grief and trial to Jesus as the Universal Redeemer and Remedy, it might end with others, as with him, in the restoration of the child on whom the Lord had laid His hand. Jairus doubted neither the power nor the willingness of Jesus to comply with his request. All was well; if Jesus went with him, his daughter would be healed. But True Faith is Always Tried Faith.

At this very critical time, when his daughter's life was hanging on a thread, there came an interruption. Many had heard Jairus's request, and the people followed the great Healer and the anxious father, and "thronged" them. No doubt this very fact tried Jairus. At such a moment, his child's life hanging by a thread, he would have wished the crowd to open and allow him to hurry back to the sick-room with Jesus. But Jesus was not in a hurry; He could control disease as well at a distance as if He were close by. And a certain woman, who had been afflicted with hemorrhage twelve years, and "had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, when she heard of Jesus, came in the press behind, and touched His garment." "For," she said, "if I touch but His clothes, I shall be whole." To Jairus it might have seemed that she could have waited; that hers was not such a pressing case as his daughter's; to her, perhaps, it seemed that it must be now or never. Condemned by the law as one unclean (Lev. 15), she could not come, as others did, and ask for healing; her very condition hindered her; like the leper's, hers was an unusual case, and in her heart were, no doubt, the words, "If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean." But how to come into contact with Jesus was the puzzle. She must not make herself known, but she must not lose the opportunity when Jesus was passing by. All other physicians, all other remedies, had not only failed her, but run away with all her little fortune—her only hope was Jesus.

When a sinner gets to this point, he is not far from the salvation of God. When a tempted Christian reaches this point, and his efforts and struggles to heal his temper, his pride, his self-love, etc., have only proved him bankrupt, he is near the point of yielding himself unreservedly to Christ, and letting Him undertake the conflict which has cost him his all, and done nothing for him. When a sick one is persuaded that all remedies avail him nothing, that can heal him, he is near to the deliverance. The poor woman had stepped out in faith farther than the leper had ventured, for she said: "If I may touch but His clothes, I shall be whole." And straightway the healing was accomplished, the disease arrested, "and she felt in her body that she was healed of that plague." It was but a touch; but it was the touch of faith; she was sure of her point. All hung on whether she could touch Him. Oh, how many there are who fail to reach this point! they are among those who throng and press Jesus; they know what He says, they know what He does, but it is all outside of themselves—they and Jesus have not touched yet. What He can do, what He does do leaves them unchanged still.

Jesus was not unconscious; the wild roar of the storm did not wake Him, but a disciple's cry aroused Him on the instant; the crushing of the crowd was a matter of indifference to Him, but one touch of faith, though it was only on His garment, found him keenly sensitive. "Jesus, immediately knowing in Himself that virtue had gone out of Him, turned Him about in the press and said, Who touched My clothes?" The disciples thought the question an unreasonable one. The multitude thronged Him and pressed Him; no doubt many were touching Him at one and the same time; how could it be told how many? But Jesus persisted, "Somebody hath touched Me, for I perceive that virtue hath gone out of Me." (Luke 8: 46.) Let no timid heart fear; if all the world doubt thee,

He has felt thy touch. The poor woman was hardly prepared for this; twelve years she had hidden away from other people, on account of her ceremonial uncleanness, and now hers was more than a nervous shrinking from the crowd. But His glory, who had delivered her, demanded that she should make known the truth. So when she "saw that she was not hid, she came trembling, and falling down before Him, she declared unto Him before all the people for what cause she had touched Him, and how she was healed immediately." (Luke 8: 47.) And He said to her, "Daughter!"—oh, how this word must have reassured her!—"Daughter! be of good comfort (Luke 8: 48), thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague."

"Oh, I wish I had such a faith!" says many a one; "if I only had the right faith, I should be all right"; and they sit down and pity themselves for their want of faith, instead of looking to see if He in whom they should believe is worthy of credence. This woman believed that there was such a power about Jesus, and such a certainty, that if she could only get at Him she should certainly be healed, that she

she did not weigh any "ifs," or "buts," but she said in her heart, "If I may but touch His clothes, I shall be whole." She did not think it needful to make any great effort, she did not clutch or hold on to His garment. It was but a touch, but it said, "He is able. He is willing; He is the Lord that healeth me"; and it was done.

But what about the anxious father and his dying child? Every second seemed of importance, and this delay over the poor woman's case must have seemed to him interminable. While Jesus spoke the word of life and healing to the woman, there came from the centurion's home the message of death. "Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further?" Oh, the blasted hopes of that poor father, the temptations to condemn himself bitterly that he had not come a little sooner, to accuse the poor woman of selfishness! etc., etc. But a word from Jesus stilled him, "Be not afraid; only believe." He was in the presence of death's Master. Let things come to a last extremity,

What Matters it, if Jesus is There;

He can destroy death, sickness, sin, with far more ease than He can get a human heart to trust Him. With only His chosen three, and the parents of the child, He entered the house, and said to the wailing women, who were the customary attendants in a house of death, "Why make ye this ado and weep? The damsel is not dead, but sleepeth." "They laughed Him to scorn." But He quietly put them out of the room, and the dead was left alone with Him who is the Resurrection and the Life, in the presence of believing parents and three believing disciples. Then "He took the damsel by the hand, and said unto her, Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise"; the same touch which had healed the woman brought back life to the young girl. Straightway she arose, and walked, and when the door opened, the astonished mourners saw for themselves that death is only sleep in the presence of the Son of Man. The timid woman expected nothing from herself, but boldly trusted Jesus. The parents of the child took their part not with the scornful mourners, but with Jesus, and their child was given back. They trusted, and He worked—that was all.

Volume XI., of the Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1888, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price, $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, and 1887 are also for sale. We can also furnish complete volumes for 1884, 1885, and 1888, unbound, price $1.00, including postage.

NOTICE TO READERS OF THY HEALER.

On January 1 the size of Thy Healer was reduced to 20 pp., and the price changed from 75 cents to 50 cents. Those whose subscriptions run into 1889 will have their time extended, to credit for the difference in size and price. It is hoped that by reducing the price the circulation will be extended, otherwise it will be a considerable loss. Will not those who have found blessing through its pages recommend it to others?

CORDS AND BANDS.

I DREW them with cords of a man, with bands of love. Hosea 11:4.

I PRAISE thee, Jesus Christ, my Lord,
For thy sweet drawing power,
That drew my feet into thy way,
And keeps me there each hour.

As man, thou only couldst thus draw
Poor helpless man to thee,
Through human woes, joined with the cords
Of perfect sympathy.

Yes, through thy human sympathy,
Thou hast, Lord, entered in,
To all our trials great and small,
Except the guilt of sin.

And thou, with bands of love divine,
Dost fold us to thy heart,
From which no power can separate,
Nor life, nor death can part.

DURING the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's absence from his church in London, which is necessitated by the suffering he endures from the cold and damp of the English climate in the early months of winter, extraordinary evangelistic services have been held in the building. Great good has been done, and Mr. Spurgeon's heart has been cheered in his retreat at Mentone, in the south of France, by the news of many souls being brought to Christ. The daily services were conducted by Messrs. Fullerton and Smith, the two evangelists whose portraits appear on the preceding page. They were both trained for their work in Mr. Spurgeon's Pastors' College, and are continually engaged in conducting revival services under Mr. Spurgeon's guidance in various parts of Great Britain. The pastor's absence rendered their labor at the Tabernacle in London advisable, and God has wonderfully blessed it. It is now nearly eleven years since the project of employing two evangelists was formed and executed by Mr. Spurgeon. Mr. Fullerton was one of the first two, and his colleague was Mr. Clarke. They were very successful, but Mr. Clarke's health breaking down, he went by the advice of his physician to Australia, where he is still engaged in evangelistic work. His place was filled by Mr. J. Manton Smith, who was evidently specially raised up and prepared by strange providential circumstances for his work.

Mr. William Young Fullerton is an Irishman. He was born in Belfast on March 8, 1857, so that he is now nearly thirty-two years old. He is a worthy colleague of Mr. Smith. Rich in natural endowments, profound in the intensity of his convictions, and mature in his Christian experience and attainments, he is just the man to reach the people. He has an inexhaustible store of energy, and capacity for hard work. To preach from eight to ten times a week; to conduct daily Bible readings; to give addresses at the noon prayer-meetings; to direct the difficult work of the inquiry-rooms; to preside over a Bible Union numbering thousands of members; and to carry on all the correspondence incidental to so great a work, is an undertaking which would try the capacity of any man; but Mr. Fullerton carries it on without any sign of weariness or fatigue.

Mr. Fullerton went to London a mere boy, to enter a mercantile house, but he was soon heard of as speaking at evangelistic meetings in the evenings, and on Sundays at places within reach of the house of business in which he was engaged. Subsequently, he applied for admission to the Pastors' College, and there he came under Mr. Spurgeon's notice. The pastor has a quick eye for workers, and he speedily recognized in young Fullerton a man fitted for evangelistic work. He was inducted to the Tabernacle Evangelists' Association, and was one of its most active members until Mr. Spurgeon assigned him to his present work. His forte is the accurate and extensive knowledge of Scripture which he possesses, and the ready use he can make of it in his discourses. He is a Bible student, and rarely advances a truth without quoting texts in point, giving chapter and verse, from memory. His command of racy anecdote is truly remarkable, and his skill in telling a story is equalled by adroitness of application.

Mr. Joseph Manton Smith

is an older man than his colleague. He was born at Northampton, on February 29, 1844, and is now therefore nearly forty-five years of age. His father was a boot and shoe factor, and was a member of the Congregational Church under the pastorate of the Rev. E. T. Prust. In early childhood the boy was regularly carried to the chapel by his mother.

A Remarkable Escape

from a horrible death is among Mr. Smith's boyhood reminiscences. He says: "One morning Mr. and Mrs. Prust, after conversing with my father and mother in our square pew, bade them good-bye, and my mother took my hand to lead me home. We had not gone many yards from the building before a tremendous crash was heard, and the people thought the chapel was on fire. An alarm of that kind was at once raised, but instead of smoke pouring forth from the windows, it was dust; the chapel ceiling had fallen to the ground. In a short time the minister and his wife had returned, and saw, where they had stood five minutes before, tons of timber and debris scattered in all directions. One beam of immense weight had fallen right across the top of the pew where I had been sitting. They all felt that God's hand was in this marvellous escape, and I now, with gratitude, record it as one of the many instances of God's watchful providence over my path."

While quite a youth Mr. Smith married, and went to London, where he obtained employment in one of the largest engineering firms in the metropolis. He writes: "At the close of the first week's work I felt somewhat proud to carry home two bright sovereigns as my own earnings, part of which I transmitted to my wife in the country, and some of it I deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank. A portion was spent during the next week at the various theatres in London. I was fond of the theatre, and to save expense, I often fought my way to the front seat in the gallery. After six months' London life of this kind, and constantly having my meals at a restaurant, I was anxious once more for real home life, and therefore wrote my wife to pack all up and 'emigrate to London.'"

Mr. Smith was a Good Singer, and narrowly escaped becoming a variety-theatre "star." But Providence was preparing him for the honorable field of service which he was presently to fill. He found a new situation at a much higher rate of wages. At a Methodist breakfast meeting he was conscious for the first time of being drawn towards God, and he was converted in Pigott Street Methodist Chapel, in the same locality. One Whit-Monday, which day is a legal holiday in England, a large barge was engaged by his Christian landlady, and over thirty persons had arranged to go to Greenwich Park for a picnic. Mr. Smith was urgently invited to accompany them with his cornet to lead the Christian excursionists in sacred song, and consented.

At 8 o'clock all the party had met at the place appointed for embarking on the barge; the order was given, "Let her go!" and at the word, off went

The Barge Into Mid-Stream.

At the same time up went the song, "Whither, pilgrims, are you going?" from all the friends in the boat. (See illustration on first page.) On the arrival of the party at Greenwich Park, Mr. Smith had a conversation with the owner of the barge, which was the opening of a friendship of long duration. The bargeman told him his story. He said that he had been a wicked drinking scamp, until he reached middle life, but then he had been converted. One of his first acts, after his conversion, was to try to get into a new business. He determined to buy a barge to ply on the Thames. He heard of one to be sold at auction, and went to the place the next day. He bought the barge for $150, and when he went to take possession of her he was surprised to find that she was named The Grace. He said, "That is all right; it shall stand, for it was by grace I came to own her." The bargeman said she had never been idle a day since he bought her, and the investment had been the best he ever made.

His First Address,

Mr. Smith says, was made at that picnic. His landlady urged him to speak to the people, saying that perhaps there were some there who were not saved. It was only a few words that he could say then, but shortly after that picnic he became a teacher in the Sunday-school and became an adept in gospel speaking. His first sermon was delivered under peculiar circumstances. The minister of the church of which he was a member, had commenced holding meetings on Sunday afternoons in a country village. He used to preach in the cottage, a picture of which appears on the first page, in the panel under Mr. Fullerton's portrait. One Sunday the minister was sick, and sent to Mr. Smith asking him to take his place. Smith said he would go and hold a prayer-meeting, and went. But he found that the farmer and the little company would be grievously disappointed if there was no sermon, and he therefore announced as his text; "Looking unto Jesus" (Heb. 12: 2), and spoke for a short time earnestly to the little congregation. At the close of the service "my misgivings about the sermon were removed," says Mr. Smith, "when, bringing his heavy hand upon my shoulders, my farmer friend said, as he struck the blow, 'Fust rate! You've done right well this morning we've had a grand time of it, young man. The Lord has been with you.'"

An Afternoon in a Hayfield

is one of the reminiscences Mr. Smith relates of his experience in those days. He was becoming well known for his lively temperance addresses, and had promised to deliver one at a Band of Hope meeting in a country village. His host was a farmer, and Mr. Smith on his arrival at his house found that the farmer was at work carrying hay in a distant field, and would have hard work to get through in time for his men and boys to go with him to the meeting. Mr. Smith immediately set out for the field, and having found the party, set to work with them, giving them the benefit of the strength of his broad shoulders and muscular frame to get the work done in time for meeting. (See illustration under his portrait.)

Mr. Spurgeon's Stockwell Orphanage

has a warm place in Mr. Smith's sympathies, and he has frequently accompanied the Orphanage Choir on its visits to provincial towns. "Once," he says, "in the city of Bath, after a large meeting in the Guildhall, we were invited to the bedside of the widowed lady by whose instrumentality the Orphanage was first established. She placed her fortune in the hands of Mr. Spurgeon for this purpose, and as she, years afterwards, heard the boys sing in her sick-chamber—

"They're gathering homeward one by one," and saw their bright cheery faces, she must have felt that all her money was more than returned; and I realized with greater emphasis than before that the Lord truly does take up the orphans, and sometimes in wonderful ways. A frequent visitor at the Stockwell Orphanage, I feel I can, without disparaging similar institutions, warmly recommend it to the notice of the Lord's faithful stewards. Such happiness reigns here, under the careful management of Mr. Vernon J. Charlesworth, who has ever been to me as a brother, that I always feel the better for seeing even the shady, quiet walk leading up to the gate. (See illustration.)

"A very Band of Hope are the 500 boys and girls there being cared for. One can scarcely fancy that the Lord could have found any better servant to 'take up' these orphans than the President, C. H. Spurgeon. With his great fatherly heart, big enough for ten times the number of children, and his simple and gentle ways with the 'bairns' he is ever a welcome visitor. One day, I called on Mr. Charlesworth, who was just coming out of his house with a bunch of grapes. 'Look here,' said he, 'I have just brought these from the City, for a dear lad who is dying. Come and see him.' I went to the bedside of the dear child, who was pleased with the grapes, though past eating them. As the tears stood in the head-master's eyes, he said to the lad, 'You don't know this gentleman, do you?' 'Yes, sir,' said the orphan with a smile. 'It's Mr. Smith. Will you ask him to sing to me?' 'What would you like him to sing to you?' said Mr. Charlesworth. "Sweetly I'm resting in Jesus," was the dying lad's request. I sang the song of the sweet Christian experience, and then said, 'Are you sweetly resting in Jesus?' 'Yes, sir, and shall soon rest with Him, sir.'"

To judge of Mr. Smith by his radiant face and ringing songs, one is almost tempted to think that his sky has always been without clouds; but it is not so. He has known more than one

Trial of Faith.

One of them is vividly impressed on his mind, and often told for the encouragement of others. He was thrown out of work. "At last there came a day when, after seeking work all the forenoon without success," Mr. Smith says, "I returned to dinner, and looked towards my wife for my meal. She burst into tears, and said, 'I have nothing to give you, dear. I only had a penny left this morning; I have bought a penny loaf, and divided it among the children. We must go without.' 'But,' said I, 'can you not get some food on credit at some shop?' 'No, dear,' said my wife, 'I have never done so yet, and I never can eat food if it is not paid for.' 'Then,' I said, 'I must sell your piano.' 'Well,' said my dear wife, 'I would rather do that than go in trust for food.' But I saw this would break her heart, and said, 'Could you go and pawn my watch?' 'No, don't talk like that,' she replied; 'let us try and keep away from those places. Let us kneel down and make our case a matter of prayer; God will surely hear us. He has said He will never leave us, nor forsake us. I feel sure He will not let us want long. He will surely open a door for us somehow.' Then my wife and I began to pray, and ask God to send us immediate relief."

"After prayer a bright idea struck me, and I said, 'Don't fret, dear, I will go and see my friend the bargeman. I went to his home and found him there, the centre of one of the happiest family groups I have ever seen, (See Illustration), and I told him all my trouble. He asked me why I did not let him know my condition before, and then pressed me to stay and take some dinner. He also at once sent round provisions for my wife and children quite sufficient to last several days. The cheerfulness and joy of this home did me as much good as the substantial help."

Later on the Lord sent a second answer to their prayer. The postman brought a letter from Mr. Smith's old pastor at Northampton. Opening it, he read: "Dear Joseph,—I have seen your mother to-day, and heard of your trying circumstances. I forward you by this post one of my dear wife's memorial books for your acceptance; also a small cheque for your personal use, with best love." In this manner the Lord made provision for pressing needs, and turned the darkness into day.

Subsequently, Mr. Smith went to London and joined Mr. Archibald Brown's church, who made him useful in evangelistic work. Shortly afterward came to London, and Major Cole, who was with Mr. Moody, made Mr. Smith's acquaintance, and invited him to give addresses to the young at the Bow and Camberwell halls. At the request of Mr. Moody, he and the Major also conducted a month's mission at the Victoria Theatre. Eventually, in 1875, he entered Mr. Spurgeon's college as a student, and remained there two years. His genial manner, his musical talent, and his inexhaustible store of anecdotes and illustrations, combined with his zeal and piety, won the confidence of Mr. Spurgeon, who, when Mr. Clarke's health failed, invited him to become Mr. Fullerton's colleague in evangelistic work. The result justifies the choice. The record of their meetings in any place they have visited—and they have visited all the chief towns, and many smaller ones, in England, Scotland, and Ireland—proves their adaptability to the work.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Lady's Lost Jewels.—The Rev. Dr. Elder Cumming remarks: "A lady had a box of very precious jewels, and on one occasion, when she was going away from home, she entrusted them to the care of a friend in whom she could put entire confidence, all except two which she took with her to wear. On her return home the box was restored to her. She looked carefully over her treasures, and found that they were just as she had left them. The box was safe, the trust was honored. But what of the two gems that she had taken with her? They alone were missing. She had accidentally lost them. I think I hear some doubting Christians inquire, 'How far will the Lord keep me?' Tell me this, dear friend, How much have you committed to Him? Because as much and as far as you commit to Him whatever concerns you, He will keep it safely. He is 'able to keep that which I have committed unto Him.'"

A Transformed Christian.—"A Man Came to me one day and said, 'Mr. Haslam, I want a salvation to keep me from sinning.' 'That is just what Christ is offering,' I said; and then I repeated the lines,

'Lord Jesus, I long to be perfectly whole,
I want Thee for ever to dwell in my soul,
Break down every idol, cast out every foe—
Now wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.'

Lord Jesus, let nothing unholy remain,
Apply Thine own blood, and extract every stain;
To get this blest cleansing I all things forego,
Now wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.'

'That is just what I want,' the man exclaimed, when I had finished. 'Ask the Lord for it,' I said, and just there he knelt and repeated that verse as a prayer. He was subject to a very bad temper, and the Lord took it away. And now, meet him where you will, he is always rejoicing, and busy working for the Lord."

Christ and Belgravia.—"Some People Act as if Christ were only for the very respectable, and religion had nothing to offer to the lapsed masses, as the people are called. Why, even the critic Carlyle seemed to understand that Christ made Himself 'a man of no reputation.' One evening, when seated in a fashionable drawing-room in Belgravia, a lady said to him, 'Oh, Mr. Carlyle, what a pity it is Christ came into the world as a Saviour so long ago. Why, if He had come now we should all be so glad to see Him.' 'Madam,' he replied, 'I think if Jesus were to come now, we should find Him not in Belgravia, but in the East-end of London. Then, if you did come across Him, you would say, 'Away with that vulgar fellow, away with Him!' But it is gloriously true that Christ came to all—to rich and poor alike, though too often the rich despise Him, but not one of the poor was ever too poor, or one of the wicked too great a sinner for the Lord Jesus to save.'"

Found Dead on the Railway.—"Not Long ago a man was found dead, cut in two, lying across the lines of a railway. It could not be ascertained how the sad event had occurred, but it was supposed that the man had laid himself across the rails, to try to keep himself awake. He was stationed at that spot, where a number of sleepers had been taken up to be repaired, that he might wave a red flag to warn approaching trains. They conjectured that the tedious monotony had made him so sleepy that in order to keep himself awake and ready for duty, he had stretched himself across the lines, knowing that he dare not sleep there; but the drowsiness had got the better even of his fears, and he had dropped fast asleep. Soon after, the express came sweeping round the curve. At first the driver saw nothing, but as he came nearer he observed a dark figure stretched right across the track. 'Oh heaven,' he exclaimed, 'it is a man!' At once the engine was reversed, and the brakes put on; it was too late. On, on the train glided, right over the man, cutting him in two. I tell you, dear unsaved ones, who go about without having come to Christ for pardon, you are far more foolish, and in far greater danger than was that man as he lay across the rails. While there is yet time to escape, ere God's judgment rolls over you and cuts you off from all hope of mercy, awake from your sleep and flee to Christ."

Putting George into God's Hands.—The Rev. J. G. Gregson said: "I was visiting a lady some time ago, who said to me, 'At one time I thought God would not take charge of everything for His people, but He has shown me that He does carry their burdens and answer their prayers. My son ran away from home one winter night, and went to America. At first I lay awake night after night grieving over him, and wondering where he might be; but at last a precious thought came to me. My fretting could not help my son, but God was able to keep him and guard him wherever he was. I placed my boy in His hands, and rested. By-and-bye a letter came, not from my son, but from a friend. My George was dangerously ill. Off to America I went, to find that God had been true to His trust. He had cared for my boy, and brought him low in sickness, that he might see Christ as his Saviour.' Yes, leave all to God. Though the threads seem to get awry, He can make it straight, and the seeming tangle is only because we cannot see the glorious pattern He is working out."

"Bring Him Unto Me."—A Lady Who Was in great distress on account of a wild and wayward brother, went one Sunday morning to her accustomed seat in the House of God. A visiting minister occupied the pulpit that day, and was reading the ninth chapter of Mark. While he read, this Christian woman became deeply interested, and for the time forgot her sorrow. When the nineteenth verse was reached, the minister read with emphasis the direction of the Master, "Bring him unto Me." These last words came with strange power and comfort to the sad and burdened heart. The Holy Spirit sent the words home with power to her soul, and she was enabled then and there to cast her burdens on the Lord as never before. In prayer and faith she carried her erring loved one to the compassionate Saviour. The load was lifted, and this trusting child of God, sitting at the feet of Jesus, was assured that in some way or other all would be well. She had carried her brother to Him. She was permitted to see an answer to her prayer, and had the unspeakable joy of knowing that before he died, he confessed Christ as his Redeemer.

Why God Sent a Man to Hastings.—"When I was at Hastings I met a gentleman who had been sent to the seaside there to recruit his health, which had broken down through overtaxing his strength in Christian work. He was so unhappy about the work he had left, as if the world could not get on without him. 'Oh, my work, my work!' he was continually murmuring, until one day I said to him, 'The work in which you have been engaged, my dear friend, is the Lord's, not yours. No wonder He has put you here, and He will keep you here until you confess that it is not your work, but His. You are like a bird in a cage, dashing its poor breast against the bars to get free.' 'Yes,' he interrupted, 'I am just like that.' 'Get back to your perch and sing, then,' I replied. His wife, who was present, smiled at my words, but he, becoming somewhat annoyed, said, 'Are you making fun of me when I am so much in earnest?' I assured him I was not making fun, but was in sober earnest too. We knelt and prayed over the matter, he confessing to God that he had hitherto looked upon the work as his own, but that now he had been shown that it was God's. He seemed to be changed from that time, and soon the Lord sent him back to the scene of his Christian efforts in London strong and happy."

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

EVANGELISM VINDICATED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, January 27, 1889.

"And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up; and it was in my mouth sweet as honey; and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter. And he said unto me, Thou must prophesy again before many peoples and nations and tongues and kings." Rev. 10: 10, 11.

The Exiled Seer—His Supernatural Dream—Another Book that Disagrees—People Who Cannot Digest the Creeds—None but Idiots Without Creeds—Scoffing an Evidence of Ignorance—The Assault of Caricature and Misrepresentation—Creeds of Representative Churches Assailed—The Trinity in Daily Life—The Regeneration of the "Constellation"—Conversion of a Liquor Seller—A Dying Girl's Joy—A Ship-Captain in a Fog—His Prayers for the Sick Heard—A Teacher's Vicarious Life—Scoffers in a Burial-Ground.

DOMITIAN, the Roman Emperor, had in his realm a troublesome evangelist who would keep preaching, and so he exiled him to a barren island, as now the Russians exile convicts to Siberia, or as sometimes the English government used to send prisoners to Australia. The island I speak of is now called Patmos, and is so barren and unproductive that its inhabitants live by fishing.

But one day the evangelist of whom I speak, sitting at the mouth of a cavern, and perhaps half asleep under the drone of the sea, has and before him pass, as in a panorama, time and eternity. Among the strange things that he saw was an angel with a little book in his hand, and in his dream the evangelist asked for this little book, and the angel gave it to him, and told him to eat it up. As in a dream things are sometimes incongruous, the evangelist took the little book and ate it up. The angel told him beforehand that it would be very sweet in the mouth, but afterward he would be troubled with indigestion. True enough, the evangelist devours the book, and it becomes to him a sweetness during the mastication, but afterward a physical bitterness.

Who the angel was and what the book was, no one can tell. The commentators do not agree, and I shall take no responsibility of interpretation, but it suggests to me which sceptics take and chew up and find a very luscious morsel to their witticism, but after a while it is to them a great distress. The angel of the church hands out this little book of evangelism, and the antagonists of the Christian Church take it and eat it up, and it makes them smile at first, but afterward it is to them a dire dyspepsia.

All intelligent people have creeds—that is, favorite theories which they have adopted. Political creeds—that is, theories about tariff, about finance, about civil service, about government. Social creeds—that is, theories about manners and customs and good neighborhood. Aesthetic creeds—that is, theories about tapestry, about bric-a-brac, about styles of ornamentation. Religious creeds—that is, theories about the Deity, about the soul, about the great future. The only being who has no creed about anything is the idiot. This scoffing against creeds is always a sign of profound ignorance on the part of the scoffer, for he has himself a hundred creeds in regard to other things. In our time the beliefs of evangelistic churches are under and misrepresentation. Men set up what they call orthodox faith, and then they rake it with the musketry of their denunciation. They falsify what the Christian Churches believe. They take evangelical doctrines and set them in a harsh and repulsive way, and put them out of the association with other truths. They are like a mad anatomist, who, desiring to tell what a man is, dissects a human body and hangs up in one place the heart, and in another place the two lungs, and in another place an ankle bone, and says that is a man. They are only fragments of a man wrenched out of their God-appointed places.

Evangelical religion is a healthy, symmetrical, well-jointed, roseate, bounding life, and the scalpel and the dissecting knife of the infidel or the atheist cannot tell you what it is. Evangelical religion is as different from what it is represented to be by these enemies as the scare-crow which a farmer puts in the cornfield to keep off the ravens is different from the farmer himself.

For instance, these enemies of evangelism say that the Presbyterian Church believes that God is a savage sovereign, and that He made some men just to damn them, and that there are infants in hell a span long. These old slanders come down from generation to generation. The Presbyterian Church believes no such thing. The Presbyterian Church believes that God is a loving and just Sovereign, and that we are free agents. "No, no! that cannot be," say these men who have chewed up the creed and have the consequent embittered stomachs. "That is impossible; if God is a sovereign, we can't be free agents." Why, my friends, we admit this in every other direction. I, De Witt Talmage, am a free citizen. I go when I please and I come when I please, but I have

At Least Four Sovereigns.

The Church court of our denomination; that is my ecclesiastical sovereign. The mayor of this city; he is my municipal sovereign. The Governor of New York; he is my State sovereign. The President of the United States; he is my national sovereign. Four sovereigns have I, and yet in every faculty of body, mind, and soul I am a free man. So, you see, it is possible that the two doctrines go side by side, and there is a common-sense way of presenting it, and there is a way that is repulsive. If you have the two doctrines in a worldly direction, why not in a religious direction? If I choose to-morrow morning to walk into the Mercantile Library and improve my mind, or to go through the conservatory of my friend at Jamaica, who has flowers from all lands growing under the arches of glass, and who has an aquarium all asquirm with trout and gold fish, and there are trees bearing oranges and bananas—if I want to go there, I could. I am free to go. If I want to go over to Hoboken and leap into a furnace of an oil factory, if I want to jump from the platform of the Philadelphia express train, if I want to leap from Brooklyn Bridge, I may. But suppose I should go to-morrow and leap into the furnace at Hoboken, who would be to blame? That is all there is about Sovereignty and Free Agency.

God rules and reigns, and He has conservatories and He has blast furnaces. If you want to walk in the gardens, walk there. If you want to leap in the furnaces, you may. Suppose, now, a man had a charmed key with which he could open all the jails, and he should open Raymond Street Jail, and the New York Tombs and all the prisons on the continent! In three weeks what kind of a country would this be? all the inmates turned out of those prisons and penitentiaries. Suppose all the reprobates, the bad spirits, the outrageous spirits, should be turned into the New Jerusalem. Why, the next morning the gates of pearl would be found off hinge, the linchpin would be gone out of the chariot wheels, the "house of many mansions" would be burglarized. Assault and battery, arson, libertinism, and assassination would reside in the capital of the skies. Angels of God would be insulted on the streets. Heaven would be a dead failure if there were no great lock-up. If all people without regard to their character when they leave this world go right into glory, I wonder if in the temple of the skies Charles Guiteau and John Wilkes Booth occupy the same pew! Your common sense demands two destinies! And then as to the Presbyterian Church believing there are infants in perdition, if you will bring me a Presbyterian of good morals and sound mind who will say that he believes there ever was a baby in the lost world, or ever will be, I will make him a deed to the house I live in, and he can take possession to-morrow.

So the Episcopal Church is misrepresented by the enemies of evangelism. They say that Church substitutes forms and ceremonies for heart religion, and it is all a matter of liturgy and genuflection. False again. All Episcopalians will tell you that the forms and creeds of their Church are worse than nothing unless the heart go with them.

So also the Baptist Church has been misrepresented.

The Enemies of Evangelism

say the Baptist Church believes that unless a man is immersed he will never get into heaven. False again. All the Baptists, close communion, and open communion, believe that if a man accept the Lord Jesus Christ he will be saved, whether he be baptized by one drop of water on the forehead, or be plunged into the Ohio or Susquehanna, although immersion is the only gate to their earthly communion.

The enemies of evangelism also misrepresent the Methodist Church. They say the Methodist Church believes that a man can convert himself, and that conversion in that church is a temporary emotion, and that all a man has to do is to kneel down at the altar and feel bad, and then the minister pats him on the back and says, "It is all right," and that is all there is of it. False again. The Methodist Church believes that the Holy Ghost alone can convert a heart, and in that Church conversion is an earthquake of conviction and a sunburst of pardon. And as to mere "temporary emotion," I wish we all had more of the "temporary emotion" which lasted Bishops Janes and Matthew Simpson for a half century, keeping them on fire for God until their holy enthusiasm consumed their bodies.

So all the evangelical denominations are misrepresented. And then these enemies of evangelism go on and hold up the great doctrines of Christian Churches as absurd, dry, and inexplicable technicalities. "There is your

they say. "Absurd beyond all bounds. The idea that there is a God in three persons! Impossible! If it is one God, He can't be three, and if there are three, they can't be one." At the same time all of us—they with us—acknowledge trinities all around us. Trinity in our own make-up—body, mind, soul. Body with which we move, mind with which we think, soul with which we love. Three, yet one man. Trinity in the air—light, heat, moisture—yet one atmosphere. Trinity in the court room—three judges on the bench, but one court. Trinities all around about us, in earthly government, and in nature. Of course, all the illustrations are defective for the reason that the natural cannot fully illustrate the spiritual. But suppose an ignorant man should come up to a chemist and say: "I deny what you say about the water, and about the air; they are not made of different parts. The air is one; I breathe it every day. The water is one; I drink it every day. You can't deceive me that go to make up the air and the water." The chemist would say: "You come up into my laboratory and I will demonstrate this whole thing to you." The ignorant man goes into the chemist's laboratory, and sees for himself. He learns that the water is one, and the air is one, but they are made up of different parts. So here is a man who says, "I can't understand the doctrine of the Trinity." God says, "You come up here into the laboratory after your death, and you will see—you will see it explained, you will see it demonstrated." The ignorant man cannot understand the chemistry of the water and the air until he goes into the laboratory, and we will never understand the Trinity until we go into heaven. The ignorance of the man who cannot understand the chemistry of the air and water does not change the fact. Because we cannot understand the Trinity, does that change the fact?

About the Elements

"And there is your absurd doctrine about justification by faith," say these antagonists who have chewed up the little book of evangelism, and have the consequent embittered stomach—"justification by faith; you can't explain it." I can explain it. It is simply this: when a man takes the Lord Jesus Christ as his Saviour from sin, God lets the offender off. Just as you have a difference with some one, he has injured you, he apologizes, or he makes reparation, you say: "Now, that's all right, that's all right." Justification by faith is this: a man takes Jesus Christ as his Saviour, and God says to the man: "Now, it was all wrong before, but it is all right now; it is all right." That was what made Martin Luther what he was. Justification by faith, it is going to conquer all nations.

"There is your absurd doctrine about regeneration," these antagonists of evangelism say. What is Regeneration?

Why, regeneration is reconstruction. Anybody can understand that. Have you not seen people who are all made over again by some wonderful influence? In other words, they are just as different now from what they used to be as possible. The old Constellation, man-of-war, lay down here at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Famine came to Ireland. The old Constellation was fitted up, and though it had been carrying gunpowder and bullets, it took bread to Ireland. You remember the enthusiasm as the old Constellation went out of our harbor, and with what joy it was greeted by the famishing nation on the other side of the sea. That is regeneration. A man loaded up with sin, and death loaded up with life. Refitted. Your observation has been very small indeed if you have not seen changes in character as radical as that.

A Liquor Seller Converted.

A man came into this church one night, and he was intoxicated, and at an utterance of the pulpit he said in a subdued tone: "That's a lie." An officer of the church tapped him on the shoulder, and said: "You must be silent, or you must go out." The next night that stranger came, and he was converted to God. He was in the liquor business. He resigned the business. The next day he sent back the samples that had just been sent him. He began to love that which he hated. I baptized him by immersion in the baptistry under this platform. A large salary was offered him if he would return to his former business. He declined it. He would rather suffer with Jesus Christ than be prospered in the world. He wrote home a letter to his Christian mother. The Christian mother wrote back congratulating him, and said: "If in the change of your business you have lack of means, come home; you are always welcome home." He told of his conversion to a dissolute companion. The dissolute companion said: "Well, if you have become a Christian, you had better go over and talk to that dying girl. She is dying with quick consumption in that house." The new convert went there. All the surroundings were dissolute. He told that Jesus would save her. "Oh!" said she "that can't be, that can't be! What makes you think so?" "I have it here in a book in my pocket," he replied. He pulled out a New Testament. She said: "Show it to me; if I can be saved, show it to me in that book." He said: "I have neglected this book, as you have neglected it, for many years, and I don't know where to find it, but I know that it is somewhere between the lids." Then he began to turn over the leaves, and, strange and beautiful to say, his eye struck upon this passage: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." She said: "It isn't possible that is there!" "Yes," he said, "that is there." He held it up before her dying eyes, and she said: "Oh, yes, I see it for myself; I accept the promise: 'Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more.'" In a few hours her spirit sped away to the Lord that gave it, and the new convert preached the funeral sermon. The man who a few days before had been a blasphemer and a drunkard and a hater of all that was good, he preached the sermon. That is regeneration! that is regeneration! If there are any dry husks of technicality in that, where are they? All made over again by the power of the grace of God!

The Dying Girl

A few years ago

came in here, and sat yonder under the gallery. He came in with a contempt for the Church of God, and with an especial dislike for Talmage. When an opportunity was given he arose for prayer, and as he was more than six feet high, when he arose for prayer no one doubted that he arose! That hour he became a Christian. He went out and told the ship-owners and the ship-commanders what a great change had been wrought in him, and scores and scores have been brought to God through his instrumentality.

A little while after his conversion he was on ship off Cape Hatteras in a thick and prolonged fog, and they were at their wits' ends, and knew not what to do, the ship drifting about hither and thither, and they lost their bearings; and the converted sea-captain went to his room, and asked God for the salvation of the ship, and God revealed it to him while he was on his knees that at a certain hour, only a little way off, the fog would lift; and the converted sea-captain came out on the deck, and told how God heard his prayers. He said: "It is all right, boys; very soon now the fog will lift," mentioning the hour. A man who stood there laughed aloud in derision at the idea that God would answer prayer; but at just the hour when God had assured the captain the fog would lift there came a flash of lightning through the fog, and the man who had jeered and laughed was stunned, and fell to the deck. The fog lifted. Yonder was Cape Hatteras lighthouse. The ship was put on the right course, and sailed on to the harbor of safety.

When in a seaport the captain spends most of his time in evangelical work. He kneels down by one who has been helpless in the bed for many months, and the next day she walks forth in the streets, well. He kneels beside one who has long been decrepit, and

He Resigns the Crutches.

He kneels beside one who had not seen enough to be able to read for ten years, and she reads the Bible that day. Consumptions go away, and those who had diseases that were appalling to behold, come up to rapid convalescence and to complete health. I am not telling you anything second-handed. I have had the story from the lips of the patients in this very house, those who were brought to health of body while at the same time brought to God. No second-hand story this. I have heard the testimony from men and women who have been cured. You may call it faith-cure, or you may call it the power of God coming down in answer to prayer; I do not care what you call it: it is a fact. The scoffing sea-captain, his heart full of hatred for Christianity, now becomes a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus, giving all the time to evangelical labors, or all the time he can spare from other occupations. That is regeneration! that is regeneration! Man all made over again!

"There is your absurd doctrine of vicarious sacrifice," say these men who have chewed up the little book of creeds, and have the consequent embittered stomach.

"Vicarious Sacrifice!"

Let every man suffer for himself. Why do I want Christ to suffer for me? I'll suffer for myself and carry my own burdens." They scoff at the idea of vicarious sacrifice, while they admire it everywhere else except in Christ. People see its beauty when a mother suffers for her child. People see its beauty when a patriot suffers for his country. People see its beauty when a man denies himself for a friend. They can see the beauty of vicarious sacrifice in every one but Christ.

A young lady in one of the literary institutions was a teacher. She was very reticent and retired in her habits, and she formed no companionships in the new position she occupied, and her dress was very plain—sometimes it was very shabby. After a while she was discharged from the place for that reason, but no reason was given. In answer to the letter discharging her from the position, she said: "Well, if I have failed to please, I suppose it is my own fault." She went here and there for employment, and found none, and in desperation and in dementia she ended her life by suicide. Investigation was made, and it was found that out of her small means she had eighty years of age, and was paying the way for her brother in Yale College on his way to the ministry. It was found that she had no blanket on the bed that winter, and she had no fire on the very coldest day of all the season. People found it out, and there was a large gathering at the funeral, the largest ever at any funeral in that place, and the very people who had scoffed came and looked upon the pale face of the martyr, and all honor was done her; but it was too late. Vicarious sacrifice! All are thrilled with such instances as that. But many are not moved by the fact that Christ paid His poverty for our riches, His self-abnegation for our enthronement, and knelt on the sharp edges of humiliation, that we might climb over His lacerated shoulder into peace and heaven.

Be it ours to admire and adore these doctrines at which others jeer. Oh, the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable is His wisdom, and His ways are past finding out! Oh the height, the depth, the length, the breadth, the infinity, the immensity, the eternity of that love! Let our earnest prayers go out in behalf of all those who scoff at these doctrines of grace. When was raging in the year 1665, there was a hotel near the chief burial-place that excited much comment. England was in fright and bereavement. The dead-carts went through the streets day and night, and the cry, "Bring out your dead!" was answered by the bringing out of the forms of the loved ones, and they were put twenty or thirty in a cart, and the wagons went on to the cemetery; and these dead were not buried in graves, but in great trenches, in great pits—in one pit eleven hundred and fourteen burials! The carts would come up with their great burden of twenty or thirty to the mouth of the pit, and the front of the cart was lifted and the dead shot into the pit. All the churches in London were open for prayer day and night, and England was in a great anguish. At that very time, at a hotel, at a wayside inn near the chief burial-place, there was who sat day after day and night after night blaspheming God and imitating the grief-struck who went by to the burial-place. These men sat there day after day and night after night, and they scoffed at men, and they scoffed at women, and they scoffed at God. But after a while one of them was struck with the plague, and in two weeks all of the group were down in the trench from the margin of which they had uttered their ribaldry. My friends, a greater plague is abroad in the world. Millions have died of it. Millions are smitten with it now. Plague of sin, plague of sorrow, plague of wretchedness, plague of woe! And consecrated women and men from all Christendom are going out trying to stay the plague and alleviate the anguish, and there is a group of men in this country base enough to sit and deride the work. They scoff at the Bible, and they scoff at evangelism, and they scoff at Jesus Christ, and they scoff at God. If these words shall reach them, either while they are sitting here to-day, or through the printing-press, let me tell them to remember the fate of that group in the wayside inn while the plague spread its two black wings over the doomed city of London. Oh, instead of being scoffers let us be disciples! "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful."

AN INDIAN BOY'S VISION.

AT a missionary conference held in Calcutta on December 10, reported in the Indian Witness, Mr. Mason, of the American Baptist Mission in Assam, told a most wonderful incident of the power of the Gospel. A few years ago he was constrained to tell a native Christian boy that he could not keep him longer in his school. The boy seemed to be unusually and hopelessly stupid, and Mr. Mason did not think it was proper to keep up schools at mission expense for such disappointing cases. The boy was sent off. He returned after a little time, and told Mr. Mason that a teacher was needed in a certain village, and, if Mr. Mason would consent, that he would go. The boy went to the village at $1.50 a month. At the beginning of his work he had a vision. God said to him, "You are the only witness I have here. Let your light shine." The boy was obedient to the heavenly vision. Today there is a Christian church of two hundred members in that village, and the people have built a house for Mr. Mason, hoping to have him come and live with them awhile. Mr. Mason said that when he went to this village first, the men and women hid away, lest he should see them, and the boys and girls climbed up the trees and stretched themselves on the branches, like squirrels. When he went the second time, a few people heard him, but soon turned away. Now there is a church, and a house for a preacher, built without instruction from the mission.

A PROVIDENTIAL SICKNESS.

A REMARKABLE incident which providentially led to the benefit of missionary work in Persia, is related by Dr. E. W. Alexander in a letter from Hamadan to the Church. He says: "Early in the spring of 1888 the old Armenians of Sheverine, who are completely under the influence of their priest, and have always stoutly opposed our work in their midst, succeeded in enlisting the governor of the village in their cause. For a time their triumph was complete. Our school was closed, and we appealed to the khan in vain. Soon, however, he was called from home to a village at some distance. Shortly after his departure one of his children was taken seriously ill. Native hakims were called, but failed to restore the little patient. The child's mother knew that I had saved her little sister's life some time before, and so at the eleventh hour sent for me. The khan's servant came one Sabbath morning just as I was starting for church, and requested me to hasten to Sheverine. I regarded the occasion as quite providential, and obeyed the summons. The efforts to save the child were blessed, and she made a rapid recovery. In return the khan sent a very nice present for the dispensary, and gave us a permit in writing to go on with our work in the village. He had received orders from Teheran to the same effect, but without his personal permission we could do nothing, as his servants would constantly have annoyed our workers."

THE McALL MISSION AFLOAT.

THE success which has attended the labors in Paris of Mr. McAll and his co-workers, has encouraged them to extend their efforts to other cities and towns of France. Valuable aid in the work has been tendered to them by a gentleman who appreciates their efforts. He has lent them two vessels; a small one, suitable for navigating the canals, and a larger one to cruise around the coast. The latter is appropriately named The Herald of Mercy. An account of its recent visit to Cherbourg, the great garrison port, is given in the McAll Record. Mr. S. R. Brown, who had charge of the expedition, says: "Soldiers' meetings were held on board every night from 7.30 to 8.30, and two on Sundays. Nor shall we soon forget these military gatherings, numbering from 80 to 150 on week nights, and from 400 to 500 on Sundays. We sold 150 New Testaments, and 500 copies were distributed among these young men, some now en route for foreign service. We noticed many under-officers of the marines. One evening there was a stir in our meeting—a superior officer came in full uniform, and sat near the harmonium. He joined in singing, and listened attentively. The preacher declared all were sinners, then stopping, added, 'One is righteous, one only.' 'Yes!' he exclaimed, 'Jesus Christ!' The meeting closed, and the men waited for the officer to lead the way out. He offered me his hand and said, 'Thank you, thank you for these good words of consolation you have brought to Cherbourg.' The civil authorities were equally favorable to our work. A French brother who gave away tracts to the military men, was taken to the Commissaire de Police by an over-zealous sergeant. The Commissaire inquired, 'Who are you?' and on learning that he hailed from the Protestant boat, he was dismissed with the order to give away as many tracts as he could. 'I have been to the boat,' said the Commissaire, 'and I heard very good things there.' Thanks, ye civil and military authorities, for ye have not hindered the gospel as your fathers did; but ye helped us, moving one day a torpedo boat, that we might be quiet on our last Sunday."

A PRAYER FOR RAIN IN AFRICA.

In a recently published work by Rev. A. Briggs, containing a history of his twenty-five years' labor as a missionary in Africa, he relates the following incident: "At Bensonvale we were threatened with an entire failure of the crops. Month after month passed away, and no rain came. The bright hopes of the husbandman, like his crops, began to wither away; when a request, for which I had waited, was made by the heathen, that a day might be set apart for prayers for rain. They said, 'Why does not the missionary appoint prayers to the God of heaven?' The native sorcerers had exhausted all their arts. Under these discouraging circumstances it was made widely known that I would preach on the subject on the coming Sunday, and announce a day for prayer. A large congregation assembled. I read from the First Book of Kings about Elijah and the prophets of Baal, for the benefit and instruction of my heathen as well as Christian hearers, and preached a sermon on Jer. 14: 22. I closed the sermon with an announcement that on the following Wednesday, at mid-day, all must come together in the chapel to beseech God for rain upon the land. To my great surprise and gratification, when the day arrived some hundred and fifty or more heathens, who never ordinarily entered our sanctuary, joined us. We spent about an hour and a half in humble, earnest prayer. That day we saw no sign of change. Even as late as 10 o'clock P. M., when I went out to look at the weather, before retiring to rest, the sky was perfectly clear. I knelt down, and pleaded with the Lord, and saying that every eye was up unto Him, and all our expectation was from Him alone, besought Him to exert His wonder-working power in the sight of the heathen. Next morning, what a sight met my eyes, as I drew the window-blinds aside! The heavens were covered with clouds! dull, leaden, low-lying masses of vapor, raking the mountain-sides, hung 'o'er all the thirsty land!' At about half-past 7 the rain began to fall gently, increasing towards 8; by 9 it became a steady downpour, and so it continued persistently and plentifully. Prayer was answered. Even the heathen exclaimed, 'This is God's rain.'"

THE ZENANA PRISONERS.

THE work now being prosecuted among the women of India through lady missionaries, who are allowed access to the Zenanas, or private rooms, in which the women live, is being much blessed. Miss Anna M. Hull, an American missionary at Kolhapur, thus describes her experience of the work in a letter to the Church: "The Zenanas that I visit are chiefly in Mohammedan houses. I find the women, owing to their seclusion, more thoughtful and inclined to take grave views of life; perhaps too, as is to be expected, more melancholy in temperament. They have so little to brighten their monotonous lives that a visit from the Bible-woman or the missionary lady is something they look forward to with pleasure. They seem to me a step above Hindus, as their religion is a step above that of the Hindu. One can always appeal to them on their belief in the one God, and then try to reveal to them the Isa Paigamber (Jesus the Prophet) as Jesus the only Saviour. 'But how can He be the Son of God?' At this stumbling-stone they stumble. Still, when we speak of His life of love and mercy upon earth, and His death for sinners, they are touched. Not long ago one woman asked, 'You speak of praying; what does it mean to pray?' It is encouraging when they ask questions of this kind, instead of being merely curious about our dress, our way of living, &c., as so many are. It is not pleasant to encounter the men of the families, for they are fanatical and intolerant, as Mohammedans usually are; but the visits to the women, when I find them alone, are often hopeful. There are faint signs that some are beginning to hunger and thirst for something better than they have here. These women generally pride themselves upon their life of seclusion. They think it marks them as being a little higher in the social scale than others; but in one house where I lately visited they said to us, 'We hate this life we lead,' and one added, pathetically, 'We spend our lives as prisoners.' They looked with envy at the Bible-woman with me, and one said, 'She goes where she pleases through the streets, and no one gives her a word of blame.' 'Yes,' I said, 'because her heart is pure.'" in answer to prayer is one of a very large number of Mr. C. J. Lanphier's testimonies. "I advanced ten dollars to a very poor family," he says. "I knelt down and prayed, saying, 'Lord, if it pleases thee to send it back, let it come.' I could ill afford to part with the money, but I could not see suffering without relieving it. The next day, in the noonday meeting, a stranger met me, and said, 'There is ten dollars. You must have a great many calls for material aid!' As this was the exact amount I advanced, I took it as a direct answer to prayer."

TEN DOLLARS GIVEN

A SAILOR'S LETTER.

AN interesting story is told in a letter recently received by a lady connected with a mission for seamen in New York. The writer had shipped for a long voyage, and before leaving, wrote to his friend at the mission. He says that he has a Godfearing mother, who brought him up until he was sixteen years of age in godly ways. He went to Sunday-school, and even became a member of a Methodist Church. But a restless desire to be quit of the restraints of home came over him, and in spite of his mother's tears and prayers he went to sea. His first voyage was to San Francisco, and it was a disastrous voyage to his soul. On the way, and after his arrival, he consorted with evil men, and learned to scoff at religion, laughed at the Bible, and fell into vicious ways. Money was plentiful with him, and he spent it in sinful places, sinking lower and lower in degradation. "The downward road," he says, "was so easy to travel."

As he continued his sea life he made the acquaintance of infidels, and as is natural with a man who is violating his conscience, he gladly listened to men who tried to prove to him that there is no God. At length he avowed himself an infidel, and sinned more recklessly than ever. Last November he arrived in New York from Calcutta, and set out to enjoy himself in the city. With him one of the elements of enjoyment was to get drunk, and while he was in that state his money disappeared. In the miserable state of a man just coming out of intoxication, ashamed of himself, mortified at losing his money, and anxious to get somewhere quietly by himself to sober up before going to look for a ship, he turned into the mission. The lady to whom he writes saw him, recognized, from sad experience with such men, what his condition was, and went and spoke to him. He frankly says that he had no feeling toward her but contempt, for he had long ago given up any faith in religion. Still, she was a lady, and he instinctively answered her civilly and accepted her invitation to go into the little room at the side of the Mission, which has been the birth-place of many a soul. Had a man spoken to him, he says he should have refused, but he could not refuse a lady.

Once in the room, she chose the one subject on which his heart was tender. He could have argued about religion, but when she asked him about his mother and his home he melted. Before he left the room he had knelt down and prayed for the first time in many years. "I was all broke up" is the expressive phrase he uses to describe his state. He tried to shake off the feeling afterward, "but it stuck." He even obtained money somehow, and tried to drown his discomfort in liquor. It was useless; he grew more miserable than before. Finally he went back to the mission, sought out the lady who had spoken to him, and she was enabled to lead him to Christ. The man was transformed! His joy was wonderful to witness. It continued with him all the time he was in port, and his letter written on the eve of his departure shows how thoroughly it permeates his being. He appears to have no dread of temptation, feeling assured that Christ will keep him, and that the happiness he enjoys has forever rendered him incapable of finding enjoyment in sin.

TEN SIGNS OF THE END.

By Rev. A. B. Simpson, Pastor of the Gospel Tabernacle, New York.*

I. National Signs—Increasing Democratic Power—General Unrest and Apprehension—II. The Papal Signs—Rome Deserted by Her Friends—III. Mohammedan Signs—The Euphrate—Drying Up—IV. Jewish Signs—V. Intellectual and Commercial Signs—VI. Moral Signs—VII. Ecclesiastical Signs—VIII. Scepticism—Its Predicted Characteristics—IX. Increased Prophetic Study—X. Revival Signs.

ARE there any divine and definite landmarks whereby we may, in some measure, at least, understand our situation, and anticipate the events that lie before us? Thank God, His little flock shall not be left in painful uncertainty and bewilderment. To the reckless world it will come as a thief. "When they shall say, 'Peace and safety,' then sudden destruction." "But ye are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief." We are therefore divinely directed to watch with vigilant and prayerful hearts, and, "when these things begin to come to pass, to lift up our eyes, for our redemption draweth nigh." What then, are some of the divinely appointed signs of the Lord's immediate appearing?

I.—National Signs.

Already we have seen in Daniel's vision that four great empires must succeed each other, and be in turn succeeded by ten smaller kingdoms before the end. This has all been fulfilled. There have been just four universal empires. And they are gone, and in their place have come a number of smaller states. To-day, we see the world filled with various nationalities. They are all independent, and fairly equal; at least, they maintain a balance of power sufficiently even to check the preponderance of any one.

Again, we have seen in the visions of John that the nations are to grow more democratic toward the end, and finally to be uncrowned powers. Certainly we see this tendency very strongly marked, and rapidly increasing in the nations of Europe. The French revolution struck the knell of despotisms a century ago. Since then the spirit of liberty and revolution has swept over Italy, Germany, Spain, and Austria, as well as France and England. And in Russia, the most despotic of nations, the throes of revolution are most terribly and surely preparing a still wilder upheaval. The most striking tendency of all European governments to-day is toward revolution and popular freedom and license.

A third national sign is the state of unrest, agitation, and apprehension that is everywhere apparent. As one of the signs of the end, it is said by our Lord that there shall be "wars and rumors of wars, and on earth distress of nations with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth."

During the last quarter of a century, what nation is there that has not been rent by war or revolution? And was there ever a time of such expectancy of war: nations armed to the teeth, standing at bay, declaring that the only guarantee against war is an enormous military armament, and feeling that everyone of them is at any hour in danger of dismemberment, if not destruction. Germany does not trust France an hour; Russia is waiting the right moment to devour Turkey at a mouthful; and England watches Russia's every movement with the feeling that her great Indian empire is constantly at stake.

II.—Papal Signs.

The prophetic picture of its rise and reign have been almost literally fulfilled. The predictions of its later history have also begun their course. It was to be supported by the European states, and then ravaged by them, and so we have seen the very powers that supported Rome for centuries, especially France and Italy, turn against her and despoil her of her temporal power and earthly honor.

All these things have been crowded into the present century, and many of them the present generation. The last prophetic signs of the Papacy are rapidly approaching their fulfilment. It only remains that she should make her last desperate assault upon the souls and liberties of men, and her last attempt to control the great democratic masses of society as she has the governments of the earth, and then sink to her final and tremendous fall, and the mystery of Babylon will be complete.

III.—Mohammedan Signs.

It has been shown that the Mohammedan power is destined to play an important part on the prophetic stage. Already has it spread over "the East and the South and the pleasant land." Already has it set up its "abomination" in the holy place, and "trodden under foot the sanctuary" of God. Already has it "practiced and prospered." When we see it begin to wither, and relax its hold on Jerusalem, we may know that the end is near. Daniel was informed that when it should have accomplished to scatter his people and the sanctuary be cleansed from its presence, the end was begun.

And John tells us that when the sixth vial was poured out (Rev. 16), the water of the great river Euphrates was dried up, that the kings of the East might be prepared. This undoubtedly means the withering of the Turkish power to make way for the restoration of Israel. This drying up of the Turkish power has been going on for one hundred years. Again and again have the Turks been crushed before the Russian armies, and robbed of province after province. Greece, Egypt, Bulgaria, Servia, Moldavia, Wallachia, Roumania, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Montenegro, Cyprus, have been torn from her grasp, and her religious intolerance and oppressive power in Syria and Palestine have been curtailed and restrained, until now the Jew and the Christian have recognized rights in all parts of the empire. It is the mighty and marvellous hand of God, and one of the most impressive foretellings of the end.

VI.—Jewish Signs.

The downtreading and oppression of the Hebrew people, and yet their distinct and inextinguishable national life are among the most signal fulfilments of prophecy. The conversion of a remnant throughout all the Christian age has also been realized. Among the more remarkable signs of the present day, are the remarkable facts of Jewish missions and conversions, the great work at present going forward in Southern Russia under Mr. Rabinowitch, the steady movement of Jewish colonies toward Palestine, where nine separate colonies have already begun to establish themselves, and as many as 100,000 Jews already have congregated, and are at this very time erecting a synagogue under the auspices of Mr. Rothschild; and, in this same connection, the movements in Germany and Russia which are forcing upon them the necessity of some such movement. God is sending after them His hunters to hunt them from all nations, and His fishers to draw them to their ancient home. These things are indeed beginning to come to pass.

V.—Intellectual and Commercial Signs.

In his far-sighted glance at the days of the Son of Man, Daniel caught this brief but significant vision of our times, which flashes like a gleam of electric light on the busy world of this nineteenth century. "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." What a picture of our age! Was there ever such running to and fro? Such lines and leagues of railway, such miles and messengers of telegraphic communication, such extension of the mail to every quarter of the world, such myriads of ships and sails on every sea and stream, such multitudes of travellers on business, pleasure, and investigation, such opening and exploring of new countries, such additions to our geographical knowledge, such busy enterprise and commercial activity, such a spirit of rush and excitement? To the eye of heaven we are like a great ant hill swarming with innumerable living, moving forms, treading each other down in the rush and drive of life and business.

"And knowledge shall be increased." What additions have been made in this century alone to human knowledge! It is not too much to say that they are worthy of comparison with all the previous accumulations of human culture. Look at the newspaper of the nineteenth century. Look at the multiplication of books, periodicals, papers, and writers. Look at the progress of physical science, especially. Look at the additions to our knowledge of astronomy, geology, chemistry, geography, and other sciences. It is real knowledge, real progress, real genius, and man fully recognizes it, and begins to believe in it, and in himself, so much that he will soon not want to believe in God; and human progress will have reached a pinnacle where there must be either submission to heaven or humiliation to hell. Man is already rearing his tower of Babel, and God must soon come to confound it. Our wisdom has not led us to God, but strengthened the pride of self-sufficiency and unbelief.

What is the real character of our present civilization? We may as well face the facts. Civilization itself is turned into the stronghold of unbelief; its imaginations and inventions are high towers that exalt themselves against the knowledge of God, and the thoughts of our great thinkers have not been brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. We have the ripest form of worldly civilization, but the ripeness borders on rottenness; while men boast of the fabric, its foundations are falling into decay, and that awful anarchy which is the last result of atheism, even now threatens to dissolve society itself.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1889.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

This is unavoidable, owing to the large number of corrections to be made; but it is being rectified as rapidly as possible. The fact of the paper being regularly received through the mail is an intimation that the renewals have been received and credited on our books.

All subscriptions, notices of changes of address, and letters connected with the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should invariably be addressed to the MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK. Advertisements for insertion on the last page and orders for books advertised on that page should be sent to Mr. J. E. JEWETT, 77 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK. Some of our friends are reversing these addresses, sending their subscriptions to Mr. Jewett and their orders for books to the Manager. In both cases the mistake causes confusion and delay, and sometimes leads to errors.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Samoan Difficulty Became More Ominous last week. The steamer Alameda, which arrived at San Francisco on January 19, brought news that the German war vessels had torn down the Stars and Stripes, parties of German soldiers had attacked and wounded American citizens, and carried some of them prisoners on board German vessels. Orders were immediately dispatched from Washington for the Vandalia and the Trenton to proceed to Samoa, and the former sailed from San Francisco on January 20. That ship and the Trenton will probably arrive there in about six weeks. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations also came to the aid of the State Department by recommending an addition to the Consular and Diplomatic appropriation bill of $500,000, to be immediately available for the execution of the obligations of the Government under the treaty with Samoa, and $100,000 more to construct a coaling station at Pagopago, in the island of Tutuila. All the information that can be obtained on the question confirms the belief that Germany is seeking to gain possession of the islands, and has fomented the present civil war with the object of putting her puppet on the throne. The transactions of the conference held in 1887 between representatives of Germany, England, and the United States on the Samoan question have not been fully disclosed, but it would appear that Mr. Bayard's aim was to maintain the independence of Samoa from foreign aggression. The Conference proved abortive, and since that time Germany has been strengthening and extending her hold there. King Malietoa, who desired a United States protectorate, has been deposed, and is now a prisoner in German hands. The tone of the German press in discussing the question is insulting to the United States, and has stirred popular indignation to a remarkable degree.

The Final Vote on the Senate's Financial measure was given, to the relief of all concerned, on January 22. The Senators call the bill a substitute for the Mills Bill, which came to them from the House, but it is an entirely new bill, based on different principles from that of Mr. Mills. Senator Morrill, of Vermont, who spoke on the last day of the debate, expressed his conviction that the bill would effect a reduction in the revenue of at least seventy-three millions, inclusive of the twenty-four millions taken off tobacco and liquor. The final vote was a strictly party division of thirty-two Republicans against thirty Democrats. This situation confirms the rumors current for some time past, that there is scarcely a Senator who approves the bill in all its parts or who is satisfied with it other than as a compromise measure. In some cases, Senators, in voting for it, contradicted their own past utterances in their own States and elsewhere. It was, however, recognized as a party measure, which balanced the various interests affected by it with some skill, and did not seriously injure any interest which had powerful Republican representatives. The chief complaint urged against the bill, which, it may be hoped, will not be realized, is that it will lower the cost of luxuries used by the wealthy and increase the cost of necessities used by the poor. That would be an arrangement so cruel that the charge of designedly making it should not be brought against men of so high a character as United States Senators, without absolute proof. The bill now goes to the House, and if, as is probable, it is rejected there, will be sent in practically the same shape to the House of the next Congress.

The Admission of Five New States to the Union was voted by the House on January 18. This was a substitute for the Senate Bill to admit Dakota only. The House proposes to admit Dakota as one or two States, and Montana, Washington, and New Mexico. The bill was opposed by the Republicans, who advocated the admission of Dakota only. It was, however, finally carried by a vote of 144 to 98. Mr. Dougherty, of Florida, proposed to include Utah and Arizona in the list, but the proposal found no supporters. It is thought that although the Republicans in the House opposed the bill, it may find some Republican advocates in the Senate. One Senator of that party, who is on the Committee on Territories, is known to favor the admission of all the Territories. Mr. Quay and Mr. Sanford are also believed to have leanings in the same direction. The three votes added to the solid Democratic vote, would suffice to carry the bill in the Senate.

The Possibility of an Agreement on the Nicaragua Canal question is announced. A press dispatch from Washington states that the conference committees on the part of the two houses, on the Nicaragua Canal bill, have succeeded in reaching an agreement on the questions at issue. They have not disclosed the basis of agreement, but sufficient is gathered to warrant the assumption that the bill has been divested of such of the amendments added by the House as made it, according to the common understanding, undesirable for the company to accept. Among the amendments which it is believed have been dropped, or modified, are those requiring that ten per cent. of the capital stock be paid up before any bonds are sold; providing for the printing across the face of the bonds of a notice that the United States is not responsible for them; and allowing the United States to fix the rate of tolls on the canal.

The Romish Campaign Against Dr. McGlynn advanced another stage last week. On Sunday, January 20, a notice was ordered by Archbishop Corrigan to be read at mass in every church of the diocese. It recapitulated the offences of Dr. McGlynn, and referred in general terms to his last attack on the Pope, in which the ex-priest spoke compassionately, but not reverently, of the head of the Church as "an old bag of bones." The Archbishop then proceeded to say: "In order, therefore, to safeguard the interests of souls, for whom I must render an account on the day of judgment, I hereby make and declare attendance at meetings of the Anti-Poverty Society a reserved case." This means that, while absolution is not absolutely withheld from Roman Catholics who attend Dr. McGlynn's meetings, ordinary priests cannot give absolution, but must refer the culprits to the Archbishop himself. They will not then be entitled to absolution, but if the sin be confessed, and pardon be implored, the Archbishop will take the matter under consideration, and grant or withhold absolution according to his judgment. Dr. McGlynn's old parishioners at St. Stephens, and many other Catholics who attend his meetings, will now, therefore, have to decide whether they will desert him or dispense with the absolution of their confessors. As Dr. McGlynn's audience on Sunday night was larger than usual, it may be inferred that the Archbishop's threat has not scared them.

Mr. Phelps, the United States Minister to England, was made the recipient of unwonted honors last week. The Lord Mayor of London gave a banquet in his honor in the executive mansion, at which a large number of distinguished guests of both the political parties were present. The Lord Chancellor, several judges, the Earl of Rosebery, Lord Dunraven, and many members of Parliament were among the guests. The Lord Mayor in expressing his regret at Mr. Phelps's approaching departure said: "There have been misunderstandings, but the hearts of both nations still beat true. England will do her best to maintain friendly relations. In case of future trouble, we will appeal to the sense of right in the Christian-like spirit of brothers." Mr. Phelps in the course of his reply said that there were many ways of saying goodbye and farewell, but it was hard to part from so many friends, and he was sorry to say that goodbye. It was some comfort to be able to take home to America so many kind remembrances. Mrs. Phelps also was highly honored. On January 22, Lady Salisbury and Lady Rosebery called upon her, and informally presented her with a superb bracelet. The bracelet is inscribed: "Presented to Mrs. Phelps on her leaving England, as a token of affectionate regard from some of her English friends. January 22, 1889."

The Evidence Given Before the Parnell Commission last week tended still further to show the justice of the charge made by the Times, that the Irish League abetted if it did not incite crime. The journal, however, labors under the disadvantage, inevitable in such an inquiry, of drawing its witnesses either from criminals or the police. An important witness was Captain Plunkett, of the Cork police, who testified that he had heard Father O'Connor, the parish priest of Fries, denounce at a cattle sale a farmer named Curtin, and that a week later the farmer was murdered. A man named Farragher deposed that Archbishop Walsh, in Mr. Davitt's presence, had advised him not to pay his rent, and that he (Farragher) was evicted. He was afterward employed in the office of the Dublin branch of the League. Witness also testified that he had carried letters, some of which contained checks, from Mr. Patrick Egan to Mullett, the Invincible. Dennis Tobin deposed that he was a member of the Kilconolly band of moonlighters. He said that when the members of the band were sworn, the leader told them that, by order of the League, tenants who paid their rents were to be raided. The moonlighters were paid for committing outrages. The set to which he belonged had received two dollars each for killing the cattle of an obnoxious farmer. This and similar evidence, if not rebutted, cannot fail to alienate public sympathy from Mr. Parnell and the League.

Prince Bismarck Continues His Disgraceful assaults on the dead Emperor, and last week incidentally attacked the Emperor's sister-in-law, the late Princess Alice, whose memory is cherished by all who came within the circle of her influence. His organ in the press has been making dark allusions to the case of Professor Geffcken, whom Bismarck and the present Emperor failed to convict of responsibility for the publication of the late Emperor's diary. The journal hints at the existence of certain documents, which were not published at the Geffcken trial because political and dynastic interests might suffer. These documents are letters written by Morier while at Darmstadt, in which Princess Alice and several English royalties are involved. According to statements current in the official circle, if Prince Bismarck is forced, by political exigencies, to publish these letters, they will prove that Frederick and his wife were indiscreet, and divulged the plans of Prussia, and that even before the opening of the campaign of 1870, Darmstadt was the focus of intrigues against the unification of Germany. Public feeling, even in Germany, is strong against Bismarck and the Emperor, in their ghoulish outrages on the memory of the dead.

The Testimony of an Eminent Lawyer, an ex-Attorney-General of the United States, was given at one of Mr. Moody's meetings in Oregon. Judge George H. Williams said: "I have been poor, and I have been prosperous; I have been in lowly positions in life, and in high positions of trust and honor; but my soul was never satisfied until I found Christ, the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. My morality, in which I trusted, was but a great Chinese wall shutting me out of the kingdom of heaven."

Medical Mission Work in Japan was Described at the twenty-eighth anniversary of the Women's Union Missionary Society, held in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on January 23. Dr. Elizabeth Reifanyder and Dr. McKechie, the two well-known medical missionaries, who are here on a brief visit, were present, and spoke most hopefully of the present position and prospects of their labors in Japan. Two interesting letters were read; one from the Rev. Mr. Ballagh, stationed in Japan, in which he reported encouraging progress in the American Mission Home School for Girls in Yokohama, and the other from Mrs. Ralph Emerson, of Illinois, giving an account of the recent great convention of missionaries in London, where she represented the society. The income of this excellent society last year amounted to $40,562, and the expenditure to $37,373.

The Baptism of a Roman Catholic Priest, the Rev. J. P. Daly, was witnessed by an immense crowd at the Baptist church of Marlboro', Mass., on January 20. Mr. Daly had charge of a Roman Catholic church in Virginia for fourteen years. He became convinced of the errors of the Church, and resigned his pastorate. He went to Pittsburgh, Pa., to consider his position and earn a livelihood. A position on a newspaper was offered him, which he accepted, and he has been engaged in journalistic work ever since. He has done good work on journals in Buffalo and other cities, and has refrained from religious controversy. Lately, light has come to him, and he resolved to completely sever his connection with the Romish Church. He decided on joining the Baptist communion, and has accordingly been publicly baptized by immersion. It is expected that he will be a Baptist minister.

A Passenger's Negligence has Involved Him in considerable legal expense in New York. He brought a suit last week in the City Court against the Inman Steamship Company for $500, the value of his baggage, which was burned on the City of Montreal. There was no dispute about the value of the baggage, but the company contended that their liability was limited to fifty dollars. In proof, they produced a copy of the ticket which the plaintiff had bought from them, and upon the back of it there was printed a stipulation that, in case of the loss of baggage, the purchaser was entitled to compensation to the amount of fifty dollars, and no more. The plaintiff said his attention had not been called to the stipulation, and he had not read any of the printing on the back of his ticket. The judge instructed the jury to find a verdict for the company, inasmuch as, "a passenger is supposed to have acquiesced in the terms printed on the ticket." Ignorance could not be pleaded in such a case. The costs of the suit, therefore, had to be borne by the negligent passenger. Negligence will have far more serious consequences at the last judgment. Numbers of men, who are careful to keep themselves informed about worldly affairs, neglect to study their Bibles, in which God has revealed His will. (Hos. 8:12.)

Eight Years of Hermit Life Were Passed by a lady who died on January 18. She came to this country in 1875, and went to Baltimore, Md. There she consulted a Roman Catholic priest, to whom she said that she was a Frenchwoman, and had passed most of her life in Paris. Her husband was a barber, who at his death left among other secrets of his trade a receipt for beautifying the complexion. She started an establishment, but trade not being brisk she adopted a new plan. She advertised extensively, promising astonishing results. When her victims came she charged them large prices for the lotion. The lotion, however, brought out ugliness and blotches instead of beauty, and she then demanded exorbitant prices for removing these blotches. She made a great deal of money, but was arrested, tried, and convicted. She managed to escape to America, and having no occupation, had leisure to think of her past life. She became concerned about her soul, and went to the priest for advice. The priest counselled penance, and the woman, anxious to atone for her sins, went to Catonsville, about fifteen miles from Baltimore, where she secluded herself until she died, seeing no one but a priest, and spending her life in mortification and the repetition of prayers. As she was evidently anxious to make her peace with God, it is a pity that she did not have more enlightened counsel. Repentance and faith in Christ, with the restoration of their money to the people she had swindled, would have brought her the peace which penance and mortification could never give. (Isa. 1:11-18.)

A Virginia Lady's Fidelity and Confidence in a lover are soon to be rewarded. Eight years ago she was engaged to a young lawyer living in the same town with herself in Virginia. During the exciting political campaign of that year the lawyer was nominated for Congress. The lady's father and brothers belonged to the opposite party, and did their best to defeat him. He was defeated; but that was not his worst trouble. During the campaign political excitement had been at fever heat, and words had been used which caused personal animosity. The young lady was commanded to break off all relations with her lover, and never to see him again. Though her heart was breaking, she dutifully obeyed. The young lawyer could not bear to stay in the neighborhood, and went West. He settled at St. Paul, Minn., where he has succeeded in making a fortune by some profitable speculations in land. His love for the Virginia lady did not abate by absence, and finally the temptation to write to her could not be resisted. He wrote, and on January 23 he received his answer. She said she had felt sure he would claim her some day, and, therefore, though she had no idea where he had gone, or what he was doing, she had waited for him all these years. All difficulties were now removed, and there were no obstacles to the marriage. When Christ returns to claim His bride, will He find her looking and waiting for Him with similar faith and constancy? (1 Thess. 5:23, 24.)

A Physician's Story of a Grateful Patient was told in New York last week. Dr. George F. Shradly, the well-known physician, relating some of the reminiscences of his large practice, said that about a year ago he went into the country for a little rest. During one of his rambles he met an elderly lady and a boy of about eight years. The boy looked weak and sickly, but he touched his cap politely to the stranger, and his little wan face lighted up as his greeting was returned. A few days afterward, the doctor was visited by the old lady and the boy. "I could do nothing to stop his coming," explained the woman. "He says, over an' over, ever since the day he saw you, that you can make him well an' like other boys. He give me no peace, night or day, an' so I have taken the liberty of bringing him to you to cure." "The faith of the old lady and her little grandchild was so touching," said the doctor, "that I resolved to do my very best to effect a cure, and in time the youngster was running about, strong and well as his companions." Last Thanksgiving Day, a box containing a turkey arrived by express at Dr. Shradly's New York house. Inside was this note: "Dear doctor, this is from the boy what you made well. I know the turkey is young and tender, for I raised him from the egg myself." "I have often received munificent fees from grateful patients that my skill has helped relieve," said the doctor, "but I was never more touched by a gift in all my professional experience." We may be sure that the Great Physician also is pleased when those whom He has "made well" in soul manifest their gratitude to Him in the way He has prescribed. (Matt. 25:40.)

A Casual Glimpse of a Newspaper Paragraph promises to bring a fortune to a family at Utica, N. Y. A young man while waiting in a grocery store while his order was being executed, stood idly reading a newspaper in which a parcel lying on the counter was wrapped. A paragraph caught his eye, mentioning the death of an old man of the same name as his own in Baltimore, Md. The old man was reported to have left property worth a million dollars and had made no will. The youth tore the paragraph out of the paper, and when he went home showed it to his father. The old man thought for a moment, and then said: "Why, that must be my brother." The matter was at once placed in the hands of a lawyer, who examined the case, and believes that he can substantiate the claim to the estate. The expectant heirs being very poor, are naturally much elated by the prospect of wealth, and are very thankful that the lad spent his moments of waiting in looking at the newspaper and thus getting the first clue to the unclaimed estate. If those who envy them their good fortune, would but look in their neglected Bibles, they would find there the title to an inheritance infinitely more desirable, because eternal, and might learn how to obtain it. (Rom. 8:17.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Six thousand Chinamen visited the new Temple of the idol Joss in New York on the day of his installation in his new quarters at 16 Mott Street.

The Central W. C. T. U., of Chicago, has opened a lunch-room in one of the largest office-buildings in that city. The room was formerly occupied by a saloon.

Rev. Dr. George C. Noyes, author of the famous "Clement" letters, and pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, of Evanston, Ill., for more than twenty years, is dead.

Petitions said to represent 14,000,000 persons have been presented to the U. S. Senate, praying Congress to forbid "needless" Sunday work in the mail and military service, and in interstate commerce.

Mrs. Spencer W. Coe is conducting a series of special meetings for women at the Cremorne Mission, 32d Street and Sixth Avenue, New York. She would be glad of the assistance of ladies, especially of King's Daughters. Meetings at 7:45 p. m.

The Sixteenth Annual Report of the Bethany Institute, located at No. 105 East Seventeenth Street, New York, shows that more than three hundred students have been trained and sent forth, both to Home and Foreign fields, since it was established.

A local contemporary says that a certain preacher in Maine distributes to his auditors a printed skeleton of his morning sermon, which not only helps them to follow him as he preaches, but enables them to carry away the sermon in a concrete form.

The Rev. E. P. Gould, formerly Professor of New Testament Exegesis at Newton Theological Institute, and well known as one of the foremost Biblical scholars of the country, has withdrawn from the Baptist Church to enter the Protestant Episcopal ministry.

Rev. E. P. Hammond, the children's evangelist, commenced meetings at Saginaw City, Mich., after the close of those at Marshall. At the latter place, in addition to the afternoon services specially for children, meetings were held at night for adults, at which there were many conversions.

The Rev. Frederick N. Knapp, well known in connection with the Sanitary Commission in the war, is dead. He was a personal friend of Lincoln and Grant. As Superintendent of the Special Relief Department he personally attended and relieved over fifty thousand sick and wounded soldiers.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings in the Brooklyn Tabernacle have been used of God to the conversion of many souls. On Sunday, January 20, seventy-three united with the church on profession of faith. These make over two hundred that have joined since Dr. Munhall came. The singing, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Lowe, has made a deep impression on the audience, which Dr. Munhall has known how to improve.

Booksellers and Newsdealers Desiring Sample copies for distribution, with the object of increasing their weekly sales and for obtaining subscriptions, may have them free of cost, postage paid, by sending a postal-card, stating number of copies required, and mentioning that they are for this purpose, to the Manager, 63 Bible House, N. Y. City.

IRON SHOES.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And of Asher he said, Let Asher be blessed with children; let him be acceptable to his brethren, and let him dip his foot in oil. Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days, so shall thy strength be." Deut. 33:24, 25.

A Triplet of Blessings—Needed by Christian Workers—I. The Shoes—Treasures Under the Feet—Mines of Treasure in the Bible—In Providence—Protection for the Feet—to Travel With—The Journey Unceasing—The Way Rough—Preparation for Fighting—Foes to be Trampled on—Self—Shoes for Climbing—Lasted Enoch Three Centuries—II. Strength Promised—For Days of All Kinds—One Day's Supply at a Time—Proportioned to the Day's Need—Special Grace for Special Trials.

I ONCE heard an old minister say that he thought the blessing of Asher was peculiarly the blessing of ministers; and his eyes twinkled as he added, "At any rate, they are usually blessed with children; and it is a great blessing for them if they are acceptable to their brethren, and if they are so truly anointed that they even dip their foot in oil." Well, I pray that all of us who preach the gospel may enjoy this in the highest sense. If our quiver is not full of children according to the flesh, yet may we have many born unto God through our ministry. May we be blessed by being made spiritual fathers to very many, who shall be brought by us to receive life, pardon, peace, and holiness, through our Lord Jesus. It is a great blessing from the Lord when our speech is sweet to the ears of saints—when we have something to bring forth which our brethren in Christ can accept, and which comes to them with a peculiar preciousness and power, so that they can receive it, and feel that it is thoroughly acceptable to them. And what could we do without the third blessing, namely, that of unction? "Let him dip his foot in oil." Oh, for an anointing of the Holy Spirit, not only upon the head, with which we think; but upon the foot, with which we move! I was asking, concerning a preacher, what kind of man he was; and the simple, humble cottager answered me, "Well, sir, he is this kind of man: if he comes to see you, you know that he has been." We must not only have oil in the lamps of our public ministry, but oil in the vessels of our private study.

For all Workers.

Well, now, if these three blessings be good for ministers, they are equally good for all sorts of workers. You in the school, you who visit tract districts, you who manage mothers' meetings, and you who in any shape or way endeavor to make Christ known, may you have the threefold blessing! The Lord give you many spiritual children; may you be blessed with them, and never be without additions to their number! The Lord make you acceptable to those among whom you labor; and the Lord grant you always to go forth in His strength, anointed with His Spirit!

That is the first part of our text, and I am not going to say any more about it, as the second part is that to which I shall call your especial attention. "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days, so shall thy strength be." There are two things in the text—shoes and strength. We will talk about these two, hoping to possess them both.

I. "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass." This promise meant that Asher should have

that there should, in fact, be mines of iron and copper within the boundaries of the tribe. Metals enrich nations, and help their advancement in many ways. Tribes that possess minerals are thereby made rich, whatever metals those may be; but such useful metals as iron and copper would prove of the utmost service to the people of that time, if they knew how to use them. Is there any spiritual promise at all in this! Asher is made rich with iron and copper lying beneath his feet. Are saints ever made rich with treasures under their feet? Undoubtedly they are. The Word of God has mines in it. There are treasures upon the surface of the Word which we may pick up very readily; even the casual reader will find himself able to understand the simplicities and elements of the gospel of God; but the Word of God yields most to the digger. He that can study hard, and press into the inner meaning—he is the man that shall be enriched with riches current in heavenly places.

You will find these treasures, not only in the Word of God, but everywhere in the providence of God, if you will consider the ways of the Lord, and believe that God is everywhere at work. He that looks for a providence will not be long without seeing one. All events are full of teaching to the man that has but grace and wit to interpret them. "Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord." There shall be treasures under your feet if your feet keep to the ways of truth.

The Revised Version puts this in the margin. He shall have Protection for His Feet.

The chief objection that has been raised to this is that it would be a very unusual thing for shoes to be made of iron and brass. Such a thing is not heard of anywhere else in Scripture, neither is it according to Oriental custom. For that reason I judge that the interpretation is the more likely to be correct, since the protection which God gives to His people is unusual. No other feet shall wear so singular a covering; but those who are made strong in the Lord shall be able to wear shoes of iron, and the Lord shall give them sandals of brass. You have peculiar difficulties, you are a peculiar people, you traverse a peculiar road, you have a peculiar God to trust in, and you may, therefore, find peculiar consolation in a peculiar promise: "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass."

We want to have shoes of iron and brass,

To Travel With.

We are pilgrims. We journey along a road which has not been smoothed by a steam-roller, but remains rough and rugged as the path to an Alpine summit. We push on through a wilderness where there is no way. Sometimes we traverse a dreary road, comparable to a burning sand. At other times sharp trials afflict us as if they cut our feet with flints. Our journey is a maze, a labyrinth: the Lord leads us up and down in the wilderness, and sometimes we seem further from Canaan than ever. Seldom does our march take us through gardens: often it leads us through deserts. We are always travelling, never long in one stay. Sometimes the fiery, cloudy pillar rests for a little, but it is only for a little. "Forward!" is our watchword. Ever onward; ever forward; ever moving! This is our lot. Be it so. Our equipment betokens it: we have appropriate shoes for this perpetual journey.

Perhaps I address some friend whose way is especially rough. You seem to be more tried than anybody else. You reckon yourself to be more familiar with sorrow than anyone you know: affliction has marked you for its own. I pray you take home this promise to yourself by faith: the Lord saith to thee, "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass." This special route of yours, which is beset with so many difficulties—your God has prepared you for it. You are shod as none but the Lord's chosen are shod. If your way is singular, so are your shoes. You shall be able to traverse this thorny road—to journey along it with profit to yourself, and with glory to God. For your travelling days you are well fitted, for your shoes are iron and brass.

Shoes of iron remind us of military array—they are meant to fight with. We are soldiers as well as pilgrims. These shoes are meant for Trampling Upon Enemies.

All sorts of deadly things lie in our way, and it is by the help of these shoes that the promise is made good. "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet." Yes, believer, with thy foot thou hast crushed thy foe, even as thy Lord, who came on purpose that He might break with His foot, even with His bruised heel, the head of our serpent adversary. Be not afraid, therefore, in the day of conflict, to push onward against the foe. Do not be afraid to seize the victory which Christ has already secured for thee.

What a blessing it is when we get self under our feet! We shall have good use for iron shoes if we keep him there. What a mercy it is when you get a sinful habit under your feet! You will need to have shoes of brass to keep it there. What a mercy it is when some temptation that you have long struggled with at last falls to the ground, and you can set your foot upon it! You need to have both of your shoes strengthened with iron, and hardened with brass, that you may bruise this spiritual enemy, and crush out its life. Feet shod with sound metal of integrity and firmness, will be none too strong in this evil world, where so many, like serpents, are ready to bite at our heels. Only so shod shall we win the victory. Next, we have fit shoes

For Climbing.

One interpreter thinks that the sole of the shoe was to be studded with iron or copper nails. Certainly, those who climb would not like to go with the smooth soles which suit us in our parlors and drawing-rooms. There are many instances where a rough tip of iron, or a strong nail in the heel of the shoe, has checked the slipping mountaineer when gliding over a shelving rock, and there he has stayed on the very brink of death. Our spiritual life is an upward climb, with constant danger of a fall. It is a great mercy to have shoes of iron and brass in our spiritual climbings, that should our feet be almost gone, we may find foothold before we are utterly cast down.

Rise to the highest graces and the noblest virtues. As is the food we feed on, such should our actions be. Let us love, for God is love, and as dear children we must be imitators of Him in all gentleness, tenderness, and forgiveness. Climb to the heights of self-denial, the summits of consecration. Be as near heaven as is possible for those who dwell on earth. Have you not the shoes to climb with?

Once more: these shoes are for travelling, for trampling, for climbing; they are also made of iron and brass for perseverance. You would not need such shoes for a little bit of a run—for a trip up the street and back again. Since the Lord has shod you in this fashion, it is a warning to you that the way is long and weary, and the end is not by-and-by. The Lord has furnished you with shoes that will not wear out. It is a good pair of shoes that lasts a man for forty years; yet there are some of us who can testify that God's grace has furnished us with spiritual shoes of that kind. I can speak of nearly that length of time since I knew the Lord, and I bear my unhesitating witness that I have found the grace of God all-sufficient, and His promises most sure and steadfast.

If we are allowed to live till we touch the borders of a century, or if we even fulfil our hundred years, these shoes would never be too old. These are the sort of and was it not for more than three hundred years that he walked with God? He was always walking, but his shoes of iron and brass were never worn out. It matters not, dear friend, how severe may be your trials and troubles, or how long may be your pilgrimage through this wilderness, God, who gives these extraordinary shoes, such as no other has ever fashioned, and such as men are not accustomed to wear, has in this provided you against the utmost of endurance, the extremity of suffering. "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass"—does not this symbol signify the best, the strongest, the most lasting, and the most fitting provision for a pilgrimage of trial? Thy shoes shall last as long as thou shalt last. Thou shalt find them as good as new when thou art about to lie down on thy last bed, to be gathered to thy fathers.

I may be addressing some here that are very low in spirit: they fear that they shall not hold on their way, they are ready to halt, yea, ready to lie down in despair. I trust the way will hold you on when you can hardly hold on your way. May you hear the ring of your iron sandals, and be ashamed of cowardice. They should be iron men to whom God has given iron shoes. I would encourage you to go forward in the way, for you are, by God's grace, made fit for travelling. You are not bare-footed, nor badly shod. You ought to go forward bravely, after your heavenly Father has put such shoes as these upon your feet. We have examined the shoes, now let us consider

The Strength.

II. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." This provision is meant to meet weakness. The words carry a tacit hint to us that we have no strength of our own, but have need of strength from above. Remember that, if you have a sense of weakness, you have only a sense of the truth. You are as weak as you think you are; you certainly do not exaggerate your own helplessness. The Saviour has said, "Without Me, ye can do nothing"; and that is the full extent of what you can do. The Lord promises you strength, which He would have no need to promise you if you had it naturally apart from Him. But He promises to give it, and therein He assures you that you need it. Come down from your self-esteem: stoop from the notion of your own natural ability; divest yourself of the foolish idea that you can do anything in and of yourself, and come now to the strong for strength, and ask your Lord to fulfil this promise in your experience: "As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

The strength which is here promised is to abide through days. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." Not for to-day only, but for to-morrow, and for every day as every day shall come. The longest and the shortest day, the brightest and the darkest day, the wedding and the funeral day, shall each have its strength measured out, till there shall be no more days. The Lord will portion out to His saints their support even as their days follow each other.

This strength is

To Be Given Daily.

We shall never have two days' grace at a time. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be:" this secures you a day's burden and a day's help, a day's sorrow and a day's comfort. After all, what more do we want? If a man has a meal, let him give thanks for it: he does not want two meals at once. If a man has enough for the day, he certainly is not yet in want for to-morrow. He cannot eat to-morrow's food to-day; or, if he did, it would injure his health, and be no comfort to him. Let us narrow our vision as to the necessities of daily life, not looking so far ahead as to compress into to-day more evil than naturally belongs to it; for "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Our strength is to be given to us daily.

And then the text seems to say clearly that it will be given to us proportionately. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." A day of little service, little strength; a day of little suffering, little strength; but in a tremendous day—a day that needs thee to play the Samson—thou shalt have Samson's strength. Great grace will be sent to us to meet our great necessities. And is not that a most desirable thing? I remember that for a long season the Lord was very gracious to me in the matter of funds for the extensive works which I have been called upon to originate and superintend, and I felt very grateful for the ease which I enjoyed; yet it crossed my mind that I was learning less of God than in more trying seasons, and I trembled. Years gone by, there were considerable necessities which did not appear to be met at once, and I went with them to God in prayer, and I trusted Him, and He supplied my needs in such a wonderful way that I seemed to have the closest intercourse with Him. I could most plainly see His hand stretched out to help me. I could see Him working for me as gloriously as if He wrought miracles. These were glorious days with me! I cannot tell you what holy wonder often filled my soul when on behalf of the Orphanage or the College. The record reads so charmingly that unbelievers would never accept it as true. Then God made me by grace like one who steps from the summit of one mountain to another: I stepped across the valleys, leaving the deep places far below. So in my easy seasons I thought to myself, "Everything comes in regularly and abundantly. I am like a little child walking along a smooth lawn. This is but a common, ordinary state of affairs, in which even a man of no faith could pursue his way. I do not see so much of God, though assuredly I ought to see Him as clearly now as ever." So I did not ask to have a time of need; I hope that I shall never be so foolish as that; but when I found a time of need hurrying up, as I soon did, I felt a special delight in it—I took pleasure in my necessities. My heart cried, "Now I shall see my Lord; now I shall see Him again. Now I shall get hold of that great arm, and hang upon it, and I shall see how the Lord will deliver me in time of need." I did thus lay hold upon my Lord again, and I found Him still God All-sufficient, for which I bless His name.

Mark, again, that strength will be given to us in all forms. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." Our days vary, our trials change; our service varies, too. He can bestow physical strength, and mental strength, and moral and spiritual strength. He gives strength and of that peculiar kind which the trial demands. We have no need to fear because we feel weak in a certain direction: if we need strength in that special quarter, the strength will come there. "But if I am tried," says one, "in a certain way, I shall fail." No, you will not. "As your days, so shall your strength be." "I am horrified," says one, "at the thought of having to pass through the ordeal of a surgical operation." Do not be horrified at it; for though at the present moment you may be quite unfit for the trial, you will be quite ready for it when it comes. Have you never been in great danger, and found yourself cool and calm beyond anything you could have expected? It has been so with me, and I have learned, from my experience, not to measure what I shall be in a trying hour, by what I happen to be just now. The Lord will take care to fit us for our future, and, as our days, so shall our strength be.

An hour or so ago, I stood by what will certainly be the death-bed of one of our best friends, and I was cheered and comforted when I heard him so blessedly speaking both of the present with its pain, and of the future with its near descent into

The Vale of Death.

He said, "I have no doubt as to my eternal bliss. I have had no doubt—no, not a shadow of doubt—of my interest in Christ through my long illness. In fact, I have felt a perfect rest of mind about it all." Thus, dear friends, shall we also be supported, for the brother of whom I speak is a simple-minded man, who makes no pretensions to learning, but is one of our own selves.

I am sorry, very sorry, for those among you who have no portion and lot in such a promise as this. I am sorry for you in your present condition, for you have no strength but your own, and that is a poor piece of weakness. You are troubled even now: what will you do in the swellings of Jordan? The common footmen of daily life have wearied you: what will you do when you have to contend with horses? Oh, souls, what will you do when you are ushered into the presence of the dread mysteries of another world? Oh, sirs, you are without strength; but is not that a grand verse, "When we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly"? Ungodly as you are, clutch at such a word as that. "Without strength" as you are, yet lay hold upon the Lord's strength.

It is for those who have no strength that Christ came into the world. It is for the ungodly that he laid down His life. Come, and trust Him. Let Him become your strength and your righteousness from this time forth; and may He manifest Himself to you in a special and gracious way; and unto His name shall be praise for ever and ever. Amen.

THE DUTCH REPUBLIC.*

IN striking contrast to the success of the monarchical principle in France and England was the development of the power of the Dutch Republic. By the side of the absolute monarchy and the caste feeling of France, and the threefold system of King, Established Church, and Parliament in England, was reigning a form of government in which there was neither arbitrary power, aristocratic privilege, nor ecclesiastical supremacy. It consisted of a league of seven provinces, each province preserving perfect independence as regarded its internal affairs, but contributing its share to mutual defence. Each province sent deputies to the States General, who, assisted by a Council of State composed of twelve members, selected from different provinces, voted upon the imperial questions of the Republic—peace, war, and the measures for defence; fixed the contingent of each province to the army and fleet; and had the right of concluding alliances and of nominating the commanders-in-chief, both by land and sea.

The Famous John De Witt.

By this time [1660] the Republic had fallen under the domination of a single province, Holland was overwhelmingly preponderant in the federation. She possessed the richest, most populous, and the most powerful towns. She contributed more than one-half of the whole federal taxation. The fact that the States General met on her territory—at the Hague—necessarily gave her additional influence and prestige. The Provincial Estates of Holland, therefore, under the title of their High Mightinesses, became the principal power—to such an extent, indeed, that the term "Holland" had by this time become synonymous among foreign powers with the whole Republic. Their chief minister was called "The Grand Pensionary," and the office had been filled since 1653 by one of the most remarkable men of the time, John De Witt. He represented, roughly speaking, the power of the merchant aristocracy of Holland, as opposed to the claims of the House of Orange, which were supported by the nobility, the army, the Calvinistic clergy, and the people next below the governing class. Abroad, the Orange family had the sympathy of the monarchical governments. Louis XIV. despised the government of merchants, while Charles II. of England, at once the uncle and the guardian of the young prince of the House of Orange, the future William III. of England, and mindful of the scant courtesy which, to satisfy Cromwell, the Dutch had shown him in exile, was ever their bitter and unscrupulous foe.

The Invader Foiled.

The French king [invading the Republic in 1672], advancing from the Yssel, took up quarters at Utrecht, and published a proclamation calling upon the towns which still held out to surrender, under the severest penalties of war, and waited for the submission of Amsterdam. But that submission never came. As early as April the supreme necessity had been foreseen by DeWitt. All had been in readiness to open the sluices and cut the dykes. On June 15 the memorable resolution was come to; by the 18th the sacrifice was consummated. The sea poured in, placing a waste of water between the French army and Amsterdam, and the province of Holland, at least, was saved. The citizens worked with the intensest energy to provide for their defence. The archives and State treasures were transferred thither from the Hague, and the States General held their sittings there. The mills were set to grind powder instead of corn; the regiments which had followed William were taken into the pay of Holland; every fourth man among the peasantry was enlisted; marines and gunners were drawn from the fleet. A strong force was sent to guard the shores of the Zuyder Zee, while a swarm of light vessels rendered any attempt of the French ships to make use of the inundation hopeless. The resolution of the men of Holland rose day by day, now that they were fighting for their own province. The Republic had been wellnigh lost through the want of imperial spirit; it was now saved by the vigor of local patriotism.

OSCAR S. STRAUS.

U. S. Minister to Turkey.

DURING his recent visit to New York, on a brief leave of absence from his post at Constantinople, Mr. Straus received the thank of many Christians for his energy and indefatigable efforts on behalf of Christian missions. On more than one occasion during his tenure of office, his intercession with the Sultan has secured concessions which have aided the American missionaries in the Turkish provinces. The underlings of the Turkish Government have learned to dread his name, for they have found that when, in their zeal for Mohammedanism, they have closed Christian schools opened by Americans, a reprimand was apt to come from the Sultan at Mr. Straus's request. This energy was all the more notable because Mr. Straus is a Jew. It is a singular coincidence that the ruler of Palestine should grant concessions to Christian teachers on the intercession of a Jew.

Mr. Straus is a native of Germany, born in the year 1850. He was three years old when brought to this country by his parents. The family settled in Talbottom, Ga., and remained there until 1862, when they removed to the city of New York. There Mr. Straus was a pupil at the Columbia Grammar School, and afterward a student of Columbia College. He was graduated in 1871, when he entered the Columbia Law School. Receiving his diploma in 1873, he began practice forthwith, in partnership with lawyers of good standing. In 1880, his health having failed, he went to Europe for rest and recuperation. On his return, he did not resume the practice of law, but devoted himself to politics and literary pursuits. He published a work on the Origin of Republican Government in the United States, and several articles in the Reviews, which displayed considerable learning and literary ability.

THE MISAPPROPRIATED PREMIUM.

(See Illustration.)

In a busy street where lawyers and brokers had their offices, and where for seven hours of the day clerks were hurrying to and fro, and middle-aged men, with eager, anxious faces, passed in and out, every thought intent on the pursuit of money-making, a young man was walking irresolutely. His appearance was that of a clerk aping the dress and style of a man of fashion. He looked at a name on the brass plate of a lawyer's office, and seemed about to enter, but changed his mind and walked on. Suddenly he turned about and went with a quicker step to the same door, but again he passed it and dropped into his former slow pace.

"There is no need to pay it to-day," he said to himself; "thirty days' grace are allowed. It is only the old man's fidgetiness having it paid to-day. I shall have my salary before the time is up, and I could use this money to put me straight, and make it all right again. I hate to vex Helen; but women don't understand how a man gets cornered."

Finally he turned his steps to quite another quarter of the town, called at a tailor's and paid a bill, at a jeweler's and paid another, and at a billiard saloon and paid a third, which was a much larger one. That night he did not return home until late, and then his face was flushed and excited and his steps slightly unsteady.

"Robert," said his sister Helen, "let me have that life-insurance receipt. Father is sure to ask for it when he wakes."

"Is he any better?" Robert asked.

"No," said Helen, the tears gathering in her eyes. "The doctor told me yesterday that it was useless holding out any hope; he cannot recover." And the poor girl covered her face with her hands, and wept bitterly. Her brother tried to comfort her, for he really loved her, but his effort was not very successful. He was not a bad fellow, but deplorably weak; and his fellow clerks could lead him easily into dissipation, over which he mourned, but which was sure to be repeated, in spite of good resolutions.

"You did not give me the receipt," Helen reminded him as he was setting out.

"No, I haven't it," Robert answered, in some confusion. "I did not pay yesterday; there is no hurry, we have thirty days yet."

"Oh, Robert, do pay it to-day! Father will worry so, and the doctor says worry is the worst thing that can happen to him."

As Robert left the house, he wished he had not used the money, but regret was useless now.

Somehow pay-day never seemed to Robert so long in coming as it did that month. There were expenses to meet, and he had to borrow money of a fellow-clerk to meet them; and he was unfortunate, too, with his play, and incurred another debt in that way, so that when at last he received his salary, and had paid the two debts, as he was obliged to do at once, his creditors knowing that he had money, and wisely insisting on prompt payment, he had not sufficient money left to pay the premium on his father's policy. He went home and consulted with Helen, hoping that she might have some money by her to make up the deficiency. That hope, however, proved futile, for Helen confessed there was not a dollar in the house, the expenses of her father's illness having exhausted all available funds. Indeed, Helen said, but for the kindness of the landlord, and the tradesmen in giving them credit, she did not know how they could have lived.

Robert groaned over his folly, and was almost heart-broken to think of his sister's trouble, and the disappointment from which he could not relieve her. But there was the life insurance; he could not spare a dollar. That must be paid, for the time was drawing near when if it were not paid the policy would lapse.

During the next few days he made frantic efforts to get the money, but without avail. The policy lapsed, and Robert knew that when his father died the resources which his father hoped would be available for Helen's wants would not be in her hands. One thing he was spared. He had not to endure his father's reproaches. The old man was lying in a state of stupor, very near his end, the doctor said, and in the intervals when he was sensible he was suffering too acutely to think of money. Helen, too, was so occupied with attention to the dying man that she had forgotten all about the policy.

"You will have the insurance money, my dear," her father said in the last of his lucid intervals.

"Thank God! I have been able to save that. It will keep you from starvation anyhow. I am afraid Robert will never do much for you."

Helen spoke of it to Robert after the funeral, and asked him when he thought it would be paid, as there were many debts that must be discharged. Then the truth had to be told. Helen was too much distressed to say much. She had thought that in some way Robert would surely have made up the deficiency and paid the premium. His failure prostrated her. That night when Robert returned home he found his sister packing a trunk.

"What are you doing, Helen?" he asked.

"I am going to Uncle William's for a few days," she said. "All the furniture must be sold, and I cannot bear to see it go. After that I must try to get a position where I can support myself."

Robert raised his hand in dismay. "Is it so bad as that?" he asked.

"Oh yes, we owe a great deal. I am afraid even the furniture and books will not bring enough to pay all. I wish we could have saved the books."

When Robert saw the bills he could come to no other conclusion. Oh! if he had only paid that premium when his father gave him the money all this trouble might have been saved, and Helen would have had a little money to support her! If remorse and bitter sorrow could have undone the past, Robert's were intense enough to have done so; but he, like so many others, had to learn by painful experience that the evil moral weakness works can never be undone.

THE PASTEUR INSTITUTE, PARIS.

(See Illustration.)

THE inauguration of the new Pasteur Institute in Paris took place recently, in the presence of some 600 persons, among whom were M. Carnot, the President of the Republic, the Grand Dukes of Russia, the presidents of the French Chamber and Senate, and many other celebrities. The building is of great size, covering 14,300 square yards of ground. The right wing will be used as M. Pasteur's residence. It is situated at the extreme south end of Paris—just off the Boulevard de Vaugirard, and behind the Invalides. The building has been constructed with a special view to giving plenty of space to all the various sections which will be quartered there. There are two separate buildings, connected by a covered gallery, and the spacious grounds outside have been provided with kennels, hutches, &c., for the reception of the animals which are required for experimental purposes. The Institute has been established by a fund—including handsome subscriptions from the Czar, the Emperor of Brazil, and the Sultan—amounting to $500,000. Of this $300,000 has been spent in building—leaving $200,000 as an endowment fund. The grants made by the Government have hitherto been about $25,000 a year, but M. Pasteur's wish is to obtain a sufficiency of subscriptions to render the Institute independent of the State.

M. Pasteur's New Hospital in Paris for the Treatment of Hydrophobia.

It is expected that the Institute will be completed in February or March next. The work carried on by M. Pasteur and his assistants will be of two kinds, namely, researches into the character of the different species of virulent microbes, and the treatment of patients suffering from hydrophobia. Of these from sixty to eighty persons are at present inoculated every morning, and twenty to thirty in the evening. M. Pasteur's work has been carried on since June, 1885, when the first two sufferers from bites of rabid dogs were inoculated. Since that time M. Pasteur has operated on 5,384 persons who were in danger of hydrophobia. Of these only about forty succumbed to the disease after his treatment, and in their cases the operation was delayed so long after the bites that the poison had permeated the system before M. Pasteur treated them.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Polygamy Confessed.

ONE morning not long after this, Madame Balif brought me a letter, which, as it bore the English post-mark, she supposed came from my husband. The writing, however, was strange to me; and dreading that some dreadful thing might have happened, I tore it open. There, at the bottom of the last page—for the letter was very long—in neat, clear characters, was the signature of my fairy friend, as I called her, Mary Burton. I read the letter through with the deepest interest. It was addressed to "Darling Sister Stenhouse," and was over-flowing with affection. Used as I was to all her endearing ways, I could almost fancy that while I read I heard her speaking the words. After a great outpouring of love, she said:

"Since you went, I have grown quite an old woman. You used to call me 'Little Fairy,' but, Sister Stenhouse, I am much bigger now. I am now a good deal over seventeen, and people say that I am getting to be quite a woman. I might tell you some other pretty things that are said about me, but I'm afraid you would say it was all vanity of vanities. If you stay away much longer, you won't recognize me when we meet again.

"And now I want to tell you something that interests you as much as me. I have not been able to discover anything more with certainty about those hateful things of which I told you, although the word 'polygamy' seems to me to become every day much more familiar in people's conversation. Elder Shrewsbury tells me that there is not a word of truth in it; and he has had a good deal of conversation upon that subject with the apostles who are here, and also with a man named Curtis E. Bolton—an elder from the Salt Lake; and they all positively declared that it is a foul slander upon the Saints of the Most High. So you see that all our unhappiness was for naught. Our Saviour said we should be blessed when all men spoke evil of us falsely, for

His name's sake; and the wicked scandal which has been raised against our religion has had a tendency to strengthen my faith, which, you know, was rather wavering.

"And yet you know, Sister Stenhouse, that even while I am writing to you in this strain, I am weak enough to allow doubts and fears to creep into my heart, when I think of the conduct of some of the American brethren. They appear to me, for married men, to act so very imprudently; and to call their conduct 'imprudent' is really treating it with the greatest leniency, for I have often been quite shocked at the way in which some of the brethren and sisters acted. But I will tell you a little about it, and you shall judge for yourself.

When I found out, as I had long expected, that dear papa was going to marry again, I at once resolved that I would no longer be a burden to him, but would find some employment and support myself. I was induced to do this, partly because, as you know, step mothers and daughters do not always love each other quite as much as they might. So I communicated my wishes to papa, and told him that I had been introduced to a very nice lady, who had a large dressmaking establishment at the West End of London. She is a member of the Church, and has always been very highly spoken of. I told him that she employed a number of highly respectable young girls, and that four, at least, of them were members of the Church, and that, in consideration of my lonely situation, and at the earnest request of Elder Shrewsbury, she was willing to take me into her house, to board and lodge me, and teach me the business thoroughly, if my father would undertake to pay her a premium of fifty pounds ($250). This papa readily agreed to do, as I expected he would, for he is so taken up with my step-mamma that is to be; and besides which he has, I know, been unfortunate lately in some railway speculations, and has lost a great deal of money, and therefore wishes to economize. In this way I went to London, and became a member of Mrs. Elsworth's family—and here I am still.

"Now you have been in London, Sister Stenhouse, and must remember 'the office' in Jewin Street—the headquarters where all the elders congregate, and where the American elders board, and Church business is managed. Well, the very first week I was at Mrs. Elsworth's I noticed that the four young sisters who were working there were constantly talking of Jewin Street, and the dear American brethren who were stopping there. One of them in particular was always talking about dear Elder Snow; and another girl whispered to me that she went to Jewin Street every evening, and frequently remained there to tea with him, and went afterwards to the theatre with him, or to a meeting, as the case might be; and the young lady added, 'She does make such a fuss over him, toying with him, and brushing and combing his hair. I know that she does it, for I have been there with her, and have seen her do it; and he appears to enjoy it quite as much as she does; and I believe, if polygamy were true, as some affirm it is, he would marry her.'

"But," I said, 'it is not true, and therefore it is very wrong for her to act in that way, for he is a married man.' 'Oh, but you know,' she answered, 'that we are all brothers and sisters, and the brethren tell us that those little attentions make them feel that they are not so far from home, and they are thus enabled to perform their mission better; and if that is so, it is the duty of the young sisters to encourage them. These little attentions cost nothing, and I'm sure it's quite a pleasure to me.' 'Then you go to Jewin Street?' I asked.

"Yes," she said, 'sometimes, but not very often, for my elder calls her frequently, as he is acquainted with Mrs. Elsworth; and then I take my work up into the parlor sometimes, and have a long talk with him. Mrs. Elsworth does not like it, I know, but she does not care to oppose the elders; in fact, her husband will not allow any such thing—he has dared her to do so. After all, she is very silly, for we ought to love each other and be free and friendly. My elder—I call him my elder, you know, simply because I like him very much better than the others—calls Mrs. Elsworth 'Gentilish,' and says she'll get over it when she goes to Zion. But she says she won't. She is awfully jealous of her husband and a certain Miss Caroline somebody, though she doesn't care for him.'

"But what difference can it make to him?" I asked her. 'He has a wife, and ought not to pay attention to any other woman.' 'Ah, you silly child,' she said, 'it is only brotherly love, after all, and men often have wives who do not make them happy, and that makes them seek the society of the young sisters, for those who are far from home are lonely. My own elder's wife is here in London, but he isn't much with her. He spends nearly all his time in Jewin Street; he is a travelling elder, and when he is going anywhere to preach he always calls for me, as he does not like going alone, he is such a genial soul. If polygamy were true, I'd promise to marry him when we reached the Valley.'

"Then I asked why his wife didn't go with him; and she said, 'Oh, poor man! he has no pleasure in her society. She is always moping and unhappy. You know, some women are naturally so. I do all I can to make him feel well, for it must be awful to be married to a woman who is always sad.'

"I asked her why his wife should be so unhappy; and she said, 'He tells me that she has got into her head that somehow or other polygamy is practiced in Zion; and I'm sure I, for one, wish it was so, for then we could marry whoever we pleased.'

"Oh, for shame!" I said. 'I'm sure I'd never go there, if I thought so.' Then I asked her whether she did not think it was wrong for her to encourage the attentions of her elder; and she said, 'He wishes it just as much as I do; and his wife had better behave herself, or I'll marry him whether polygamy exists or not in Zion; and he does not know, though we both suspect, that there is something in the rumors which we have heard.' Then I told her I thought it was very wicked to encourage the visits of that man; for I believe that if he paid a little more attention to his wife she would be less unhappy—for I supposed she knew of his attentions to her.

"She said the wife knew nothing about it; that he was obliged to be out late at night, preaching, or at Jewin Street—which I knew meant flirting with the sisters and going to the theatre; and I fancy he does more of that than preaching. But she seemed to think it was all the wife's fault, and blamed her. I asked if she would like to be treated so, if she were an elder's wife, and had to work as hard and endure as much as all the missionaries' wives do. But she said she never could be in such a position, and told me that I was not a good Mormon or I would not set myself up as the accuser of the brethren. But I ask you, Sister Stenhouse, if that is the Mormonism which the elders used to teach us?"

"And now I have told you all our long talk together, and so you can judge for yourself what a change has taken place since you left. The same day, after dinner, Brother Snow called, in company with two other elders, to see Mrs. Elsworth, and to ask her and the girls to a tea-party the next day. Mrs. Elsworth declined; but one young lady would go with Brother Snow, and Miss Caroline went with another elder; and my light-hearted friend waited till her elder came also to ask her. After that, came Elder Shrewsbury, and I, of course, was to go with him.

"With all my faith, I am very much troubled about these things. They are not right, I think. Why, scarcely a day passes but some of these elders, who appear to have very little to do, call here, and send for one or two of these young sisters, and detain them from their work, much to the annoyance of poor Mrs. Elsworth, who, I believe, will apostatize over it eventually. See what a long letter I have written to you! I am afraid it will tire you. I often long to have you here, that I might come to you and tell you all my troubles. But perhaps after all I am wrong, and ought to see things in a different light. Have not the elders and apostles positively denied that polygamy or any other sin was practiced in Utah, or formed any part of the Mormon religion? and we know that these men of God would not deceive us. Be sure, dear, to write a nice long letter to me very soon; and, with fondest love, remember your own MARY BURTON."

I read this letter carefully through, and I sat down and thought of dear Mary Burton, and felt deeply sorry that she should be placed in a situation surrounded by so many temptations. To myself the letter brought a sad confirmation of all my fears. There was something painful in the thought. Had polygamy been openly avowed as a Mormon doctrine, I should never have joined the Church. But now what could I do?

After three months' absence, Mr. Stenhouse was to return home, and I went to Geneva to meet him, feeling very happy when I saw him once again. Numbers of persons, both in Geneva and Lausanne, had been converted while he was away, and were waiting for him to baptize them—among them was a retired Protestant minister, Monsieur Petitpierre, of whom I have something yet to mention. We began at last to rejoice in our success, and to be thankful that the Lord had answered our prayers.

I was now more than ever anxious about polygamy. From much thinking on that subject, it had become the haunting spectre of my existence, and I dreaded what every day might bring forth. The news which my husband brought with him by no means reassured me. He told me that he had heard in England from American elders that there was a general expectation among the Saints in Utah that at the October Conference in Salt Lake City, Brigham Young would publish to the world that polygamy was a doctrine of the Mormon Church. After all the prevarications and denials, then, of the apostles and elders, polygamy among the Saints was really a fact. As the truth became clearer to my mind, I thought I should lose my senses. The very foundations of my faith were shaken, and not only did I feel a personal repugnance to the unholy doctrine, but I began to realize that the men to whom I had listened with such profound respect, and had regarded as the representatives of God, had been guilty of the most deliberate and unblushing falsehood; and I began to ask myself whether, if they could do this in order to carry out their purpose in one particular, they might not be guilty of deception upon other points? Who could I trust now? For ten years the Mormon prophets and apostles had been living in polygamy at home, while abroad they vehemently denied it, and spoke of it as a deadly sin. This was a painful awakening; we had all of us been betrayed.

I lost confidence in man, and almost began to question within myself whether I could even trust in God. There was no argument between Mr. Stenhouse and myself. It would have been worse than useless, for it was not his doing, and he assured me that he had as great a repugnance to the doctrine as I had. He had at first only hinted that it might eventually be acknowledged by the leaders of the Church; but it was a matter of too deeply personal a character for me to keep silence, and I did not rest until he had told me all. He had not seen the revelation, but the information which he had received was beyond a question; and singularly enough, Elder Margetts, the London elder of whose flirtation in Southampton I have already spoken was at that time on a visit to Switzerland, and confirmed all that my husband had said. Thus the very man who, two years before, first excited my suspicions, now confirmed my fears, and openly stated as a fact that which he then was ashamed to suggest.

Elder Margetts had been in Utah from the time I saw him in England, and was now on a mission to Italy. He knew, therefore, very well what was said and done among the Saints in Zion. I, and those like me, whose faith was not too strong, were spoken of as "babes," to whom milk only must be given; and in this way any deception necessary to quiet our tender consciences was allowable; but Elder Margetts was one of the "strong men," to whom meat was necessary—in other words, they were initiated into all the mysteries of the faith.

As Mr. Stenhouse has remarked in his book, "The Rocky Mountain Saints": "In the early history of Mormon polygamy, it is claimed that it was the conclusion among the leading elders that the world should not know everything that 'the Lord' had revealed; and that evasiveness on the subject of marriage was an obligation for the protection of the Church, and to aid the Lord in the establishment of that institution until it became strong enough to take care of itself. Besides, great truths freely offered to the world might be like casting pearls before swine."

This was also the principle acted upon by Joseph Smith, the "Prophet," and founder of this religion. In his pretended revelation, "The Book of Mormon," first published in 1830, he writes, "Behold David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord. . . . Wherefore, I, the Lord, will not suffer that this people shall do like unto them." While these words are so clear and definite, taken by themselves, yet a few lines lower down on the same page we see the spirit of prevarication in these words, "For if I will, saith the Lord of Hosts, raise up seed unto Me, I will command my people, otherwise they shall hearken unto these things."

The Mormons also condemned polygamy in the "Book of Doctrine and Covenants," the first edition of which was published in 1835. "Inasmuch as this Church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication and polygamy, we declare that we believe that one man should have one wife, and one woman but one husband, except in case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again." "This is definite," one would say; and it was considered so by the converts. Missionaries cited it in sermons, and published it from the press, as an unanswerable refutation of calumny. Listen, then, to Brigham Young's (who was a friend of Smith's) apology for these words, and we get a piece of sophistry of which the Jesuits might have been proud. He claims that the expression being "crime," and not "crimes" shows that the condemnation is not attached to polygamy, but only to fornication. Again, "One man should have one wife," means that he should have at least one, and as many more as he shall find it convenient to get, as may be seen by the word "but" not being placed before the "one," as it is done in the case of the woman.

SATAN CONQUERED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for February 10, Mark 5: 1-20. Golden Text Mark 5: 19.

The Varied Pathway of Jesus—Divine Order in It—A Painful Encounter—The Haunt of the Demoniac—Possessed Men Now in More Dangerous Places—The Powerful Holders of the Man—Their Recognition of Christ—A Question for Every One—The Exorcising Voice—A Commission of Mercy and Judgment—The Terror of the Gadarenes—Afraid of Christ's Presence—The Witness Left—The Right Kind of Testimony.

THE path of Jesus, when He was upon earth, lay through scenes and circumstances which varied greatly. He began life in the stable at Bethlehem, was carried down into Egypt, and returned to follow the trade of Joseph. Yet in His early youth, a single glimpse of His coming mission broke in upon His parents when they saw Him, as a child of twelve, in the temple, surrounded by the learned men of the day, "both hearing them, and asking them questions." But again, His pathway lay among the ordinary surroundings of a workman until He was thirty years of age. Then a solitary witness, the same John who baptized Him, saw the Spirit descend and abide upon Him, and heard His Father's witness to His Son.

Led of the Spirit,

His pathway lay through the wilderness, through temptation in every form, while only the wild beasts were near as His companions. Coming up out of the wilderness, His path lay through a career of success; "He returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee. (Luke 4: 14.) But it was immediately followed by persecution; for the people who had been bowed under the power of the Word which He read, and His close application of it to them, turned round upon Him, and sought His life. Sometimes His path lay over the obedient waves of the sea, as Master of the storms; and again, it ran by the well of Sychar, and the one lost sinner whom He met there. But varied as it was, there was a divine order in the life of Jesus.

After the storm upon the sea of Galilee, He and His disciples landed on the coast of Gadara on the opposite side from Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Tiberias. "And when He was come out of the ship, immediately there met Him out of the tombs, a man with an unclean spirit." It was another turn in the pathway of Jesus; and who can tell how painful to the Holy One was such an encounter? Yet, directed always by His Father, He went forward. "The Lord hath opened Mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back." (Isa. 50: 5.) This unhappy man "had

His Dwelling Among the Tombs."

Would that every man in whom is an unclean spirit knew his place as well! If every immoral man would betake himself to the tombs and sepulchres, instead of haunting the homes of the young and virtuous, and infecting them with his own impurity, the world would be the better for it. If every man who was possessed with a drink demon would confine himself to the churchyards and cemeteries, instead of ill using his wife and children, and destroying the peace and happiness of his home—if he has not already drunk it away—the world would be the better for it. If every man who has the gambling demon in his heart would play his cards in grim solitude over the graves of the dead, instead of over the hopes and prospects of the living, the world would be the better for it. A sinner who has enough respect for those who have never fallen as he has, to keep at a distance from them, is getting uneasy in his bondage, and if the pathway of Jesus leads that way, he is "not far from the kingdom of God." And does it lead that way? "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." (1 Tim. 1: 15.) Sinner, His path leads by you; stop Him; do what this man did. Christ's vocation is to save you.

None could bind this man; the legion that possessed him were strong enough to laugh at men, the chains and fetters with which they sought to bind him broke like a brittle thread. In his restless liberty he wandered in the mountains and in the tombs, anywhere away from human beings, "Crying, and cutting himself with stones." But some sudden irresistible instinct drew him to Jesus. With all the will power left to him, "he ran, and worshipped Him." And it was not in vain. "Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit," said the Voice which made all things to be. And now the demons which possessed him got the upper hand for a moment, and forced the man to speak their words, and say, "What have I to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of the most high God?" What an awful condition it is to be the bondsman of Satan, and have Lost Liberty of Will.

Often and often have we heard the testimony of those who serve the enemy of souls: "Something made me say it; I had no power to resist"; or "Something made me do it; I was forced on by a power too strong for me." Look at the pitiable object we call drunkard, and you see a brain and will and moral power capable of comprehending the thoughts of God, so fallen as to become the plaything of Satan, made to act like an idiot, and play the fool; made to speak words which in sober moments would be loathsome, made to act in devilish enmity to the one best loved in life! Oh what a comment upon the words, "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin" (John 8: 34); and again, "Know ye not that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness." (Rom. 6: 16.) Here was a man longing for salvation, but the enemy which possessed him made him cry, "What have I to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of the most high God?" Oh that every sinner would settle this question, "What have I to do with Jesus?" Does His salvation touch me? Can it reach me just where I am in my sins? Do my prayers touch Him? Is there anything real taking place between Jesus and me? Or is the Saviour of the world come, and His salvation touches others, but it cannot reach me? "I adjure Thee by God that Thou torment me not." The presence of Jesus meant hope to the poor man, but it meant judgment to the unclean spirits which possessed him. Jesus asked his name, and again the spirits from within answered, "My name is Legion, for we are many." Many indeed! A few moments later, and enough demons went out of this man

To Fill Two Thousand Swine.

Were there two thousand demons? We know not. "They besought Him much that He would not send them away out of the country." So Jesus gave them a mission which was at the same time a mission of mercy and of judgment. "There was there, nigh unto the mountains, a great herd of swine feeding." The swine was one of the unclean beasts forbidden by the law of Moses to the children of Israel. The Gadarenes were a kind of half-caste, mingling their own heathen superstitions with the worship of God. Jesus would utilize the demons to remove this cause of sin from the people. The demons "besought Him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them.

And forthwith Jesus gave them leave." The change of dwelling made no difference to the demons; they had just the same spirit when they possessed the swine as when they possessed the man; death, death and destruction, lay in their path. They hurried the poor swine down a steep place into the sea, and destroyed them. God had a purpose of mercy to their keepers and their owners. But "they that kept the swine," instead of coming to Jesus to ask the meaning of what He had done, "fled, and told it in the city, and in the country." It was a great opportunity, the first visit of Jesus in the country of the Gadarenes; what might not come of it? The people "went out to see what it was that was done." No swine were there, no trace of them, or of their tormenters; but Jesus was there, and sitting quietly by him, was the madman who had been the terror of the country, "clothed, and in his right mind." Oh, if they had been unselfish, how they would have rejoiced! But they had lost their swine; this was the one prevailing thought. What was it to them that the man was delivered? Their income would be short, and this kind of Man who had such wondrous power was better at a distance.

"They were Afraid."

Not so much afraid of the man when he was filled with unclean spirits, as they were afraid of "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world"! Like the Philipians, who could easily tolerate in their midst the evil spirit which, possessing the poor girl, brought gain to her masters, but Paul, who in the authority of his Master's name cast out the evil spirit, was not to be tolerated among them! "Welcome, demons, if you bring gold," says the world, but a Christ who gives no earthly riches, or honor, who gives in the present time only forgiveness and holiness and comfort, "We will not have this Man to reign over us." They listened to the testimony of eye-witnesses, and then gave their verdict that Jesus should "depart out of their coasts!" It is an awful thing for a man to pray, "Jesus I pray Thee go away from me;" but these men prayed it, and their prayer was answered; Jesus went. He will never force Himself upon an unwilling heart.

But there was one who sorrowed at His departure: the former maniac "prayed Him that he might be with Him. But Jesus suffered him not." The Gadarenes had rejected Him, yet His heart yearned over them. He would leave them a witness who should testify in their very midst. "Go home," He said, "to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee." And in spite of the reception which they gave to Jesus, a real work was done. "He departed, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him; and all men did marvel." A great impression was made, and the way was paved for the preaching of the Gospel. Thus the enemy of souls was defeated by a Stronger than he.

This is the right kind of testimony. First, it was commanded by Jesus, "Go home to thy friends;" then, it was a testimony to what the Lord had done, in which self could find no place; it was a story of His compassion to one who was without merit, and utterly without power to help himself.

"Yea, let Him take all."

BY FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

Take my life, and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee.

Take my hands, and let them move
At the impulse of Thy love.

Take my feet, and let them be
Swift and "beautiful" for Thee.

Take my voice, and let me sing
Always, only, for my King.

Take my lips, and let them be Filled with messages from Thee.

Take my silver and my gold:
Not a mite would I withhold.

Take my moments and my days;
Let them flow in ceaseless praise.

Take my intellect, and use
Every power as Thou shalt choose.

Take my will, and make it Thine;
It shall be no longer mine.

Take my heart: it is Thine own!
It shall be Thy royal throne.

Take my love; my Lord I pour
At Thy feet its treasure-store!

Take myself, and I will be,
Ever, only, ALL for Thee!

THE fame of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting has gone into all the earth. Wherever Christ has His people, and wherever men take an intelligent interest in religious events, the Daily noon Prayer-Meeting in Fulton Street, New York, is familiarly spoken of. It would appear that in a day when, not only blaspheming infidels, but staid men of science, to whom the world has been accustomed to pay respectful attention, have assailed the belief in the power of prayer, God Himself has interfered for the support of the faith of His people, by establishing a conspicuous evidence of His faithfulness. The records of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, which have been carefully preserved by its founder, and which we have been privileged to examine, furnish convincing proof, if that were needed, that God does answer prayer. Isolated cases are often set aside by scoffers as mere coincidences, but there is no "doctrine of chances" which can explain the large number of coincidences recorded in this history. If they appeared in a scientific investigation, the scientist would recognize them as results, and would feel compelled to look for their cause. Taking the records in his hand, the Christian meets the scientist, who tells him that the laws of nature are never suspended at the request of individuals, and that God, if there be a God, is not moved by prayer; and he points his antagonist with one hand to the promise in God's Word, and with the other hand, to the facts of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, as irrefragable proof that, in spite of scientific theory, prayer is a mighty power.

The Origin of the Meeting has often been described. In June, 1857, the North Reformed Dutch Church of New York, assembling in the building depicted in the upper panel on the left of the illustration on the first page, became concerned about the neglected condition of the masses living around its site at the corner of Fulton and William streets, New York. A committee was formed to seek out and employ some suitable person to visit the families in the vicinity and invite them to attend the services, and to get the children to come to the Sunday-school. The committee set to work with alacrity, and by the first day of July were able to report that they had found exactly the man for the work. He was engaged, and the opinion of the committee was speedily justified by the results. He visited the boarding-houses which at that time abounded in the neighborhood and not only urged the proprietors to come to the church, but induced them to hang up a card in the dining-room, inviting the guests to come, and designating by its number a pew in the church especially set apart for that particular boarding-house. At the hotels, cards were given to the employees, to be placed in the rooms of transient or permanent guests, inscribed with earnest and cordial invitations. Besides this the private houses, tenement houses, and every habitation was visited systematically with the same object. The result was soon apparent in the increase of attendance and a corresponding revival of interest both in the church and Sunday-school. Evidently the committee had been guided to the right man for the work. That man's name is now known the world over—Mr. J. C. Lanphier.

The Founder of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, whose portrait appears on the first page. Jeremiah Calvin Lanphier, was born in Coxsackie, N. Y., in 1809, and therefore is this year eighty years of age. He came to New York about the year 1838, to engage in mercantile pursuits. Four years later he made a public profession of faith at the Broadway Tabernacle, then under the pastoral care of the Rev. E. W. Andrews. Some years later he was transferred to the Presbyterian church under the ministry of the Rev. James W. Alexander D. D. While continuing his business work, he was active in Christ's cause, and became known through the city as one of the most unassuming but energetic laymen in the Christian Church. Ministers were coming upon his tracks everywhere, and though they saw little of him personally, heard of him continually in their visits to the poor and sick. It was not difficult, therefore, when the committee of the North Dutch Church wanted a missionary, to recommend a suitable man. If Mr. Lanphier, could be induced to leave his business, no better man could be found. Mr. Lanphier considered the invitation, saw in the opportunity offered him a higher and better life than business could ever give him, and accepted, cheerfully resigning the prospects of a large fortune, which he might at that time have reasonably hoped to attain, that he might devote all his time to Christ's service.

The Missionary's Appearance

inspired confidence at the outset. Tall, dignified in bearing, courteous, a pleasant face, an affectionate manner, cheerful, and possessing plenty of tact, a musical voice well-trained in singing, he was a welcome guest in any house. He had an aptitude for getting acquainted with strangers, was not easily offended, gentle and persuasive in conversation; men, women, and children were instinctively drawn to him at first sight, and soon grew to love him, whatever might be their attitude toward religion. With all these qualifications for his work, in spite of the success which God gave him, he necessarily met with many discouragements. Sometimes, coming from his visits his heart sank, his faith faltered, and his hopes withered. But the earnest worker knew where to trim his lamp. He knew of Him who "giveth more grace." In the room in the old Consistory building set apart for his use, he regained strength and courage. Going in and "shutting to the door," he communed with Him who is invisible, and renewed his strength.

His experience opened up to him increased and ever increasing confidence in the power of prayer. He longed for others to enjoy it with him, and to learn as he had learned its blessedness. His visits through the busy districts of his parish had suggested to him the thought that a short prayer-meeting in the temporary cessation of work in the middle of the day would attract some who were unable to attend an evening meeting. The merchant could spare a few minutes at that time. The Christian clerk, with an hour for dinner, could snatch a quarter of it, anyway, to join in prayer and praise. Carmen, porters, and day laborers were at liberty, and some might gain needed help and strength in their daily struggle by coming. Mr. Lanphier spoke about it to the Consistory, and though they were not so sanguine as he, permission was given. A daily meeting was not thought of then, but perhaps once a week a company might be gathered.

The First Meeting

was called for September 23, 1857. Some effort and trouble had been taken to make the meeting known. A handbill was circulated, stating that "A day prayer-meeting is held every Wednesday, from 12 to 1 o'clock, in the Consistory Building, in the rear of the North Dutch Church, corner of Fulton and William streets. This meeting is intended to give merchants, mechanics, clerks, strangers, and business men generally an opportunity to stop and call upon God amid the daily perplexities incident to their respective avocations. It will continue for one hour; but it is also designed for those who may find it inconvenient to remain more than five or ten minutes, as well as for those who can spare the whole hour. The necessary interruption will be slight, because anticipated; and those who are in haste can often expedite their business engagements by halting to lift up their hearts and voices to the throne of grace in humble, grateful prayer." The handbills were freely scattered, and at noon the door of the room was thrown open. Mr. Lanphier seated himself at the table and waited. A few years afterward, when the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting was a familiar name in the Christian households on both sides the Atlantic, a photograph was taken of the room, exactly as it was furnished at the first meeting, and from that photograph the illustration in the lower panel on the left of the frontispiece is taken.

It was a trial of faith for Mr. Lanphier. Minute after minute passed, and no one came to join him in supplication. Half an hour passed, and then there was a footstep on the stairs. One man entered, and during the following half-hour four more dropped in. On the next Wednesday there were twenty present, and on the following Wednesday the number had increased to forty. Thus encouraged, Mr. Lanphier suggested to the Consistory that the meeting be held every day. Permission was given, but before he could announce it at the meeting, one of the persons present rose, and presented a request that the meeting should become daily, and a resolution to that effect was passed unanimously. From that day to this there has been no break. The meeting was transferred, as the numbers grew, to a more commodious room on the ground floor (a picture of which as it may be seen at noon on any business-day occupies the right of the first page illustration). Over thirty-one years have glided by, the church has been pulled down to meet the growth of the city, but the old room still stands, and daily men have come together at the appointed hour to call upon God. Sometimes it has been in seasons of national trouble, as during the war; sometimes in business crises, as in the decennial panics, but always, and with ever-growing confidence men have assembled to lay before God their trials and perplexities and seek His aid.

How it is Conducted.

thousands know by experience. Mr. Lanphier, with the organizing and penetrative faculty which characterizes him, early found that it was possible to throw "a wet blanket" on the meeting. Good but indiscreet brethren would preach, would indulge in "vain repetitions," would monopolize the time, and rules had to be established and observed. Ten minutes were allotted for opening the meeting with singing and reading a passage of Scripture. A pile of letters on the table, sent from all parts of the world, have previously been opened and their contents summarized. The chairman reads that a son in North Carolina asks prayer for the conversion of his friend. That a father in Vermont asks prayer for the reclamation of his wandering son. That a pastor of a dead and cold church wants the meeting to pray for the quickening influence of the Holy Spirit, etc., etc. One and another rises in the meeting to present special requests. Prayers limited to five minutes follow, until a quarter of 1. Then a few words from the chairman touching on various requests, mentioning letters received containing grateful acknowledgment of answers received to prayers asked at former meetings. Then a hymn, the benediction, and the meeting separates for another twenty-four hours.

Notable Answers to Prayer,

if they were all recorded, as they have been reported during the thirty-one years, would multiply books almost to the extent that John supposed that a full report of the words of his Lord would have done. Many books have been written, but not a tenth can be known. A very few taken at random from the multitude may be accepted as specimens of the whole. On one occasion the old room was beautifully decorated with hot-house flowers. Mr. Lanphier explained the unusual appearance. He said that six years before he had found an intoxicated man in a corner of the room. It was necessary to remove him then, but he was looked after and brought to the meeting again. Prayer was offered for his conversion. It was answered. The man became the superintendent of a great public institution. Friends knowing his love for flowers, and his skill in their nurture, and desiring to give him a testimonial, built a large hot-house for him. On the sixth anniversary of the day when God guided his staggering footsteps to the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, the rescued man had decorated the walls with fragrant tokens of his gratitude.

An Infidel Lawyer

received an invitation to attend the meeting. Fifteen years afterward, when he was himself conducting the meeting, he said, "My first impulse was to reject the invitation, but after a moment's reflection I concluded to go. I went to the meeting again and again for several weeks, with feelings of deep distress constantly increasing, when, in an unexpected moment, Christ revealed Himself to me as my friend and Saviour. Ever since then I have felt a constant realization of the prophet's declaration, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee.' Every day Christ has become more precious to my soul and my trust is in Him."

The Conversion of Two Sons

was described, one day at the meeting, by a plain hard-working man who came from Syracuse to tell the story for the encouragement of others. He said that a widow with two sons, young married men, the heads of families, came to him in deep distress. Years of prayer had gone by and no change had taken place in them. She begged him to write a statement of the case and send it to the Fulton Street-Prayer Meeting, and beg those attending, to join with her in pleading for her impenitent sons. He complied. "I kept track of that request," the speaker said, "and knew the very day on which it was presented here. These men lived twelve miles apart, and knew nothing of the request being sent here. But now mark what followed. Those two men, on the same day, at night, established family prayer unknown to each other, and thus commenced their religious life. Confession of faith soon followed, and those two men are now faithful and devoted Christians. I know them both intimately."

Another man rose and said, "In looking over the early books of this meeting, containing requests for prayer, I noticed one for a boy twelve years of age. I was that little boy, but it is not till lately that I came out as a decided Christian." "Four years ago," said another speaker, "I asked your prayers in behalf of a young lady sick with consumption. Her case had been pronounced hopeless by eminent physicians; but, as I fully believe, in answer to your prayers, her health has been completely restored."

A Dilapidated Man,

evidently partly intoxicated, heard the singing in the meeting, and crept up near the door. He was invited in. "Do you let such a wretched creature as I in?" he said. "Oh yes! come, and welcome." He went in, and after a time rose and asked the people to pray for him, if they thought he was not too far gone. He lodged in a wretched den in Water Street, but that night he preferred getting away from the noise and blasphemy, and slept on a stoop somewhere in the streets. He prayed there, and God heard him and forgave his sins through Christ. It was in the summer, and he went as soon as the sun rose into one of the public parks and sat down and read the Testament which Mr. Lanhier had given him. A gentleman passing noticed the wretched-looking object, saw what book he was reading, and asked him where he got it. The man told him, told him of his shame and sin, and of the change that had come over him in the night. "Come to my store," said the stranger, giving him his card; "I'll give you a chance." The man went, was started with a decent suit of clothes, and there never was a more faithful, zealous worker or more sincere Christian than he proved to be.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Crossing a Bridge of Rocks.—Mr. Thomson said: "I remember a violent storm that ravaged the east coast of Scotland. All the fishing-boats scudded before it. A number of them made for the harbor, but before they could get safely into it they had to cross a terrible ridge of rocks, they being in some places up to the surface, while the water outside the bar was five fathoms, and inside twenty-two fathoms. The brave fellows knew their danger, and employed all their skill to surmount it. Some of the boats went down, and many brave lives were lost. My brother was among those boats off the bar that terrible night. As they approached they lashed each other to the boat so that they might not be carried overboard. Nearer and nearer they came. They could hear the roar of the waters, and see the waves—then they were rushed into the midst of it. For five minutes they could not tell whether they were sinking or not. The water poured over them in floods, but none were lost. Then the boat steadied itself and went easier, and looking back they saw they had crossed the bar and were safe. Many of us can remember the time when we crossed the bar that brought us from the tossing and stormy sea of sin into the safety of the Harbor, Christ Jesus, and we rejoice."

Jim Transforms.—Mr. Fuller was the friend of the city arabs, who earned a precarious living by the sale of papers, etc. One of these youths was known by the name of "Dirty Jim," partly from his appearance and partly from some rhymes under that title which he could recite. He was the son of a drunken father. The boy earnestly begged Mr. Fuller to get him some employment, and, as the first step towards doing so, and at the same time in hope of appealing to the better feelings of his degraded parent, Mr. Fuller cleansed him, got a lady to furnish him with clothing, and himself made him a handsome suit of navy blue. In this transformed condition he then got him to recite a new piece at a meeting in the hall at which the father was present. The latter scarcely recognized his boy in his altered dress, and was charmed with the change. Alas! however, a few days afterwards Mr. Fuller met him in the act of taking the new suit to the pawnshop in order to buy liquor. Not discouraged, Mr. Fuller got the boy on board a training ship, and from thence he passed into the navy. Some years afterwards, as the writer and his wife were sitting at home together, a fine, manly lad, dressed as a sailor, called on them. It was "Dirty Jim," now a thriving, good-looking young man, clean in appearance, correct in principles, and having a goodly sum in the savings bank.

An Atheistic Medical Student Converted.—Mr. H. Hamilton related: "I know a young man, now an earnest worker for Christ, who at one time bade fair to be an energetic worker for Satan. He was a medical student, and, unfortunately, a number of his friends, both at college and at home, had learned to mock at the Bible. There was no such charm for them as to get a Christian into their midst and shock him by abusing that which he held most sacred. At that time this young man was strictly moral; though his companions might drink or otherwise misconduct themselves, he would not. 'No,' he said, 'it did not pay. In order to get on, one had to keep a firm hold on the bridle.' This young man had a praying mother, but she died, and it seemed as if her prayers for her boy were not to be answered. A young lady friend, with whom he was intimate, also prayed for him. In all the vainglory of infidelity he had told her one evening he did not wish to be a Christian, but she quietly replied, 'I will pray for you.' From that time he began to think, 'Well, there might be after all an eternity, and truth in Christianity. If so, I should like to be with my mother.' It softened his heart. Just at that time a clergyman invited him to breakfast. He went, and over the breakfast-table the minister strove to point him to Christ, and the youth, despite his arrogant disputatiousness, promised that when he did come to Christ he would let him know. About a week after the minister received a visit from the young man, who had come to tell him that he had accepted Christ. Ten minutes before, when walking on the street, he had resolved to put away his doubts and his reasonings and come to Christ as a poor, lost sinner, who needed rest. 'As such he came, as such he was received; brought thus by the Holy Spirit in answer to the prayers of a mother and two friends.'

An Old Gaol-Bird Converted.—The Rev. Mr. McDonald remarks: "I was once preaching in a country district in which lived a notorious criminal. He was the terror of the whole neighborhood; his poaching and drinking exploits were spoken of with bated breath; none cared to oppose him, and most respectable people would rather cross to the opposite side of the street than pass him too closely. He had been in prison forty times, and from his mode of behavior seemed likely to end his days there. Once I was surprised to see him walk into the place where I was preaching. I looked at him. He was the same man, there could be no doubt, yet there was an indescribable something about him altogether strange. He looked another person. I said, 'There is a great change in you to-day; what is it?' 'I am saved,' was all he solemnly replied. And as he turned away I thought, 'Yes, God had saved the Manasseh of our village; the chief, the most open sinner, had come to Christ, and openly avowed it.' From that time forward he wrought as strenuously for God as he had wrought against Him."

Saved by a Girl From the Wreck.—The Rev. McLauchlan observes: "I once visited a ship just before it took its last voyage. It had returned to Glasgow after a rapid and prosperous voyage, and was once again leaving Great Britain; but when just off the coast it ran upon a rock during the night, and went down almost immediately. Their signals of distress, however, had been heard, and the peasants of the neighborhood had gathered upon the shore to see if they could be of any use in rescuing the perishing. When day broke they could see here and there masses of wreckage, but nothing more. One girl observing some tangled spars near the rocks, thought that there might be some poor creature clinging there, and too weak even to cry for help. She clambered up the rocks, and looking down she was almost certain she saw some object like a human being. Quickly she went towards the place, followed by one or two companions, and going into the water discovered two men, quite unconscious. Grasping them by the hair, one in each hand, she essayed to return, but was unable, and she felt herself being overpowered by the sea. All three were almost lost, when her sisters on the shore joined hands, and one remaining on land, the others extended themselves in a chain into the sea, and catching hold of the struggling party, all got safely ashore. Though the men were far gone, there was still life in them, and while many strove to revive them, this same intrepid girl again ventured into the wreckage, and succeeded in bringing out two other poor fellows who lay there benumbed. What courage and devotion that brave rescuer manifested that she might save her fellow-creatures from danger! Should it not be a lesson to us, as Christians, to be as earnest in bringing the souls of our fellow-creatures into safety?"

The Christian Herald Binder.—Numerous applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding at the end of the year. To meet this demand, a stock of such covers has been prepared, and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States, on the receipt of one dollar. We have also a cheaper binder, with lace instead of steel fastenings, for 50 cents, postage paid. Subscribers in Canada ordering the binders are, we believe, required to pay customs-duty upon them.

THE MARCH HOMEWARD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, January 20, 1889.

"Pursue; for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all." 1 Sam. 30:8.

THERE is intense excitement in the village of Ziklag. David and his men are bidding goodbye to their families, and are off for the wars. In that little village of Ziklag the defenceless ones will be left until the warriors, flushed with victory, come home. But will the defenceless ones be safe? The soft arms of children are around the necks of the bronzed warriors, until they shake themselves free and start, and handkerchiefs and flags are waved, and kisses thrown, until the armed men vanish beyond the hills. David and his men soon get and start homeward. Every night on their way home, no sooner does the soldier put his head on the knapsack, than in his dream he hears the welcome of the wife, and the shout of the child. Oh, what long stories they will have to tell their families, of how they dodged the battle-axe! and then will roll up their sleeve and show the half-healed wound. With glad, quick step they march on, David and his men, for they are marching home. Now they come up to the last hill which overlooks Ziklag, and they expect in a moment to see the dwelling places of their loved ones. They look, and as they look their cheeks turn pale, and their lip quivers, and their hand involuntarily comes down on the hilt of the sword. "Where is Ziklag? Where are our homes?" they cry. Alas! the curling smoke above the ruin tells the tragedy. The Amalekites have come down and consumed the village, and carried the mothers and the wives and the children of David and his men into captivity. The swarthy warriors stand for a few moments transfixed with horror. Then their eyes glance to each other, and they burst into uncontrollable weeping; for when the grief is appalling. It seems as if the emotion might tear him to pieces. They "wept until they had no more power to weep." But soon their sorrow turns into rage, and David inquires of the Lord what he shall do, and receives the reply: "Pursue: for thou shalt overtake them, and, without fail, recover all." He swings his sword high in air, and the march becomes a "double-quick." Two hundred of David's men stop by the brook Besor, faint with fatigue and grief. They cannot go a step farther. They are left there; but the other four hundred men under David, with a sort of panther step march on in sorrow and in rage. They find by the side of the road a half-dead Egyptian, and they resuscitate him, and compel him to tell the whole story. He says: "Yonder they went, the captors and the captives," pointing in the direction. Forward, ye four hundred brave men!

Very soon David and his enraged company come upon the Amalekitish host. Yonder they see their own wives and children and mothers, under an Amalekitish guard. Here are the officers of the Amalekitish army holding a banquet. The cups are full, the music is roused, the dance begins. The Amalekitish host cheer and cheer and cheer over their victory. But without note of bugle or warning of trumpet David and his four hundred men burst upon the scene, suddenly as Robert Bruce hurled his Scotchmen upon the revelers at Bannockburn. David and his men look up; seeing their loved ones in captivity, under Amalekitish guard, throws them into a very fury of determination—for you know how men will fight when they fight for their wives and children. Ah, there are lightnings in their eye, and every finger is a spear, and their voice is like the shout of the whirlwind. Amidst the upset tankards and the costly viands crushed under foot, the wounded Amalekites lie (their blood mingling with their wine) shrieking for mercy. No sooner do the victory, than they throw their swords down into the dust—what do they want with swords now?—and the broken families come together amidst a great shout of joy that makes the parting scene in Ziklag seem very insipid in the comparison. The rough old warrior has to use some persuasion before he can get his child to come to him now, after so long an absence; but soon the little finger traces the familiar wrinkle across the scarred face. And then the empty tankards are set up, and they are filled with the best wine from the hills, and David and his men, the husbands, the wives, the brothers, the sisters, drink to the overthrow of the Amalekites, and to the rebuilding of Ziklag. So, O Lord, let thine enemies perish!

Now they are coming home—David and his men and their families—

A Long Procession,

men, women, and children, loaded with jewels and robes and with all kinds of trophies that the Amalekites had gathered up in years of conquest—everything now in the hands of David and his men. When they come by the brook Besor, the place where stayed the men sick and incompetent to travel, the jewels and the robes and all kinds of treasures are divided among the sick as well as among the well. Surely, the lame and exhausted ought to have some of the treasures. Here is a robe for this pale-faced warrior. Here is a pillow for this dying man. Here is a handful of gold for the wasted trumpeter. I really think that these men who fainted by the brook Besor may have endured as much as those men who went into battle. Some mean fellows objected to the sick ones having any of the spoils. The objectors said: "These men did not fight." David, with a magnanimous heart, replies: "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

This subject is practically suggestive to me. Thank God, in these times a man can go off on a journey, and be gone weeks and months, and come back and see his house untouched of incendiary, and have his family on the step to greet him, if by telegram he has foretold the moment of his coming. But there are Amalekitish disasters, and there are that sometimes come down upon one's home, making as devastating work as the day when Ziklag took fire. There are families in my congregation whose homes have been broken up. No battering-ram smote in the door, no iconoclast crumbled the statues, no flame leaped amidst the curtains; but so far as all the joy and merriment that once belonged to that house are concerned, the home has departed. Armed diseases came down upon the quietness of the scene—scarlet fevers, or pleurisies, or consumptions, or undefined disorders came and seized upon some members of that family, and carried them away. Ziklag in ashes! And you go about, sometimes weeping, and sometimes enraged, wanting to get back your loved ones as much as David and his men wanted to reconstruct their despoiled households. Ziklag in ashes!

Some of you went off from home. You counted the days of your absence. Every day seemed as long as a week. Oh, how glad you were when the time came for you to go aboard the steamboat or rail-car and start for home! You arrived. You went up the street where your dwelling was, and in the night you put your hand on the door-bell, and, behold! it was wrapped with the signal of bereavement, and you found that Amalekitish Death, which has devastated a thousand other households, had blasted yours. You go about weeping amidst the desolation of your once happy home, thinking of the bright eyes closed, and the noble hearts stopped, and the gentle hands folded, and you weep until you have no more power to weep. Ziklag in ashes!

A gentleman went to a friend of mine in the city of Washington, and asked that through him he might get a consulship to some foreign port. My friend said to him: "What do you want to go away from your beautiful home for, into a foreign port?" "Oh," he replied, "my home is gone! My six children are dead! I must get away, sir. I can't stand it in this country any longer." Ziklag in ashes!

Why these long shadows of bereavement across this audience? Why is it that in almost every assemblage black is of the apparel? Is it because you do not like saffron, or brown, or violet? Oh, no! You say: "The world is not so bright to us as it once was"; and there is a story of silent voices, and of still feet, and of loved ones gone, and when you look over the hills, expecting only beauty and loveliness, you find only devastation and woe. Ziklag in ashes!

In Ulster County, New York, the village church was decorated until the fragrance of the flowers was almost bewildering. The maidens of the village had emptied the place of flowers upon one marriage altar. One of their own number was affianced to a minister of Christ, who had come to take her to his home. With hands joined, amidst a congratulatory audience, the vows were taken. In three days from that time one of those who stood at the altar exchanged earth for heaven. The wedding march broke down into the funeral dirge. There were not enough flowers now for the coffin lid, because they had all been taken for the bridal hour.

The Dead Minister of Christ is brought to another village. He had gone out from them less than a week before in his strength; now he comes home lifeless. The whole church bewailed him. The solemn procession moved around to look upon the still face that once had beamed with messages of salvation. Little children were lifted up to look at him. And some of those whom he had comforted in days of sorrow, when they passed that silent form, made the place dreadful with their weeping. Another village emptied of its flowers—some of them put in the shape of a cross to symbolize his hope, others put in the shape of a crown to symbolize his triumph. A hundred lights blown out in one strong gust from the door of a sepulchre! Ziklag in ashes!

I preach this sermon to-day because I want to rally you as David rallied his men, for and the lost. I want not only to win heaven, but I want all this congregation to go along with me. I feel that somehow I have a responsibility in your arriving at that great city. I have on other Sabbaths used other inducements. I mean, to-day, for the sake of variety, hoping to reach your heart, to try another kind of inducement. Do you really want to join the companionship of your loved ones who have gone? Are you as anxious to join them as David and his men were to join their families? Then I am here, in the name of God, to say that you may, and to tell you how.

I remark, in the first place, if you want to join your loved ones in glory you

Must Travel the Same Way

they went. No sooner had the half-dead Egyptian been resuscitated than he pointed the way the captors and the captives had gone, and David and his men followed after. So our Christian friends have gone into another country, and if we want to reach their companionship we must take the same road. They repented; we must repent. They prayed; we must pray. They trusted in Christ; we must trust in Christ. They lived a religious life; we must live a religious life. They were in some things like ourselves. I know, now that they are gone, there is a halo around their names; but they had their faults. They said and did things they ought never to have said or done. They were sometimes rebellious, sometimes cast down. They were far from being perfect. So I suppose that when we have gone, some things in us that are now only tolerable may be almost resplendent. But as they were like us in deficiencies, we ought to be like them in taking a supernal Christ to make up for the deficits. Had it not been for Jesus, they would have all perished; but Christ confronted them, and said, "I am the way," and they took it.

I have also to say to you that the path that these captives trod was

and that David and his men had to go over the same difficult way. While these captives were being taken off, they said: "Oh, we are so tired: we are so sick: we are so hungry!" But the men who had charge of them said: "Stop this crying. Go on!" David and his men also found it a hard way. They had to travel it. Our friends have gone into glory, and it is through much tribulation that we are to enter into the kingdom. How our loved ones used to have to struggle! how their old hearts ached! how sometimes they had a tussle for bread! In our childhood we wondered why there were so many wrinkles on their faces. We did not know that what were called "crow's feet" on their faces were the marks of the raven of trouble.

Did you never hear the old people, seated by the evening stand, talk over their early trials, their hardships, the accidents, the burials, the disappointments, the empty flour-barrel when there were so many hungry ones to feed, the sickness almost unto death, where the next dose of morphine decided between ghastly bereavement and an unbroken home-circle? Oh, yes! it was trouble that whitened their hair. It was trouble that shook the cup in their hands. It was trouble that washed the lustre from their eyes with the rain of tears until they needed spectacles. It was trouble that made the cane a necessity for their journey. Do you never remember seeing your old mother sitting, on some rainy day, looking out of the window, her elbow on the window-sill, her hand to her brow—looking out, not seeing the falling shower at all (you well knew she was looking into the distant past), until the apron came up to her eyes, because the memory was too much for her?

"Off the big, unbidden tear,
Stealing down the furrowed cheek,
Told in eloquence sincere,
Tales of woe they could not speak

"But this scene of weeping o'er,
Past this scene of toil and pain,
They shall feel distress no more,
Never, never weep again."

"Who are these under the altar?" the question was asked; and the response came: "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Our friends went by a path of tears into glory. Be not surprised if we have to travel the same pathway.

I remark again, if we want to win the society of our friends in heaven, we will not only have to travel a path of faith and a path of tribulation, but we will also for their companionship. David and his men never wanted sharp swords and invulnerable shields and thick breastplates so much as they wanted them on the day when they came down upon the Amalekites. If they had lost that battle, they never would have got their families back. I suppose that one glance at their loved ones in captivity hurled them into the battle with tenfold courage and energy. They said: "We must win it! Everything depends upon it! Let each one take a man on point of spear or sword! We must win it!" And I have to tell you that between us and coming into the companionship of our loved ones who are departed, there is an Austerlitz, there is a Gettysburg, there is a Waterloo. War with the world, war with the flesh, war with the devil. We have either to conquer our troubles, or our troubles will conquer us. David will either slay the Amalekites, or the Amalekites will slay David.

And yet is not the fort to be taken worth all the pain, all the peril, all the besiegement? Look! who are they on the bright hills of heaven yonder? There they are, those who sat at your own table, the chair now vacant. There they are, those whom you rocked in infancy in the cradle, or hushed to sleep in your arms. There they are, those in whose life your life was bound up. There they are, their brows more radiant than ever before you saw it, their lips waiting for the kiss of heavenly greeting, their cheek roseate with the health of eternal summer, their

up the steep, their feet bounding with the mirth of heaven. The pallor of their last sickness gone out of their face, never more to be sick, never more to cough, never more to limp, never more to be old, never more to weep. They are watching from those heights to see if through Christ you can take that fort, and whether you will rush in upon them—victors. They know that upon this battle depends whether you will ever join their society. Up! strike harder! Charge more bravely! Remember that every inch you gain puts you so much farther on toward that heavenly reunion.

If this morning, while I speak, you could hear the cannonade of a foreign navy, coming through the "Narrows," which was to despoil our city, and if they really should succeed in carrying our families away from us, how long would we take before we resolved to go after them? Every weapon, whether fresh from Springfield, or old and rusty in the garret, would be brought out; and we would urge on, and, coming in front of the foe, we would look at them, and then look at our families, and the cry would be:

"Victory or Death!"

and when the ammunition was gone, we would take the captors on the point of the bayonet, or under the breech of the gun. If you would make such a struggle for the getting back of your earthly friends, will you not make as much struggle for the gaining of the eternal companionship of your heavenly friends? Oh, yes! we must join them. We must sit in their holy society. We must sing with them the song. We must celebrate with them the triumph. Let it never be told on earth or in heaven that David and his men pushed out with braver hearts for the getting back of their earthly friends for a few years on earth than we to get our departed!

You say that all this implies that our departed Christian friends are alive. Why, had you any idea they were dead? They have only moved. If you should go on the 2d of May to a house where one of your friends lived, and found him gone, you would not think that he was dead. You would inquire next door where he had moved to. Our departed Christian friends have only taken another house. The secret is that they are richer now than they once were, and can afford a better residence. They once drank out of earthenware; they now drink from the King's chalice. "Joseph is yet alive," and Jacob will go up and see him. Living? are they? Why, if a man can live in this damp, dark dungeon of earthly captivity, can he not live where he breathes the bracing atmosphere of the mountains of heaven? Oh, yes,

They are Living!

Do you think that Paul is so near dead now as he was when he was living in the Roman dungeon? Do you think that Frederick Robertson, of Brighton, is as near dead now as he was when, year after year, he slept seated on the floor, his head on the bottom of a chair, because he could find ease in no other position? Do you think that Robert Hall is as near dead now as when, on his couch, he tossed in physical tortures? No. Death gave them the few black drops that cured them. That is all death does to a Christian—cures him. I know that what I have said implies that they are living. There is no question about that. The only question this morning is whether you will ever join them.

But I must not forget those two hundred men who fainted by the brook Besor. They could not take another step farther. Their feet were sore; their head ached; their entire nature was exhausted. Besides that, they were broken-hearted because their homes were gone. Ziklag, in ashes! And yet David, when he comes up to them, divides the spoils among them. He says they shall have some of the jewels, some of the robes, some of the treasures. I look over this audience this morning, and I find at least two hundred who have

Fainted by the Brook

Besor—the brook of tears. You feel as if you could not take another step further, as though you could never look up again. But I am going to imitate David, and divide among you some glorious trophies. Here is a robe: "All things work together for good, to those who love God." Wrap yourself in that glorious promise. Here is for your neck a string of pearls, made out of crystallized tears; "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Here is a coronet: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Oh, ye fainting ones by the brook Besor, dip your blistered feet in the running stream of God's mercy. Bathe your brows at the wells of salvation. Soothe your wounds with the balsam that exudes from the trees of life. God will not utterly cast you off, oh, broken-hearted man, oh, broken-hearted woman, fainting by the brook Besor!

A shepherd finds that his musical pipe is bruised. He says: "I can't get any more music out of this instrument; so I will just break it, and I will throw this reed away. Then I will get another reed, and I will play music on that." But God says He will not cast you off because all the music has gone out of your soul. "The bruised reed He will not break." As far as I can tell the diagnosis of your disease,

You Want Divine Nursing, and it is promised you: "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." God will see you all the way through, oh troubled soul, and when you come down to the Jordan of death you will find it to be as thin a brook as Besor; for Dr. Robinson says that in April Besor dries up, and there is no brook at all. And in your last moment you will be as placid as the Kentucky minister who went up to God, saying, in the dying hour: "Write to my sister Kate, and tell her not to be worried and frightened about the story of the horrors around the death-bed. Tell her there is not a word of truth in it, for I am there now, and Jesus is with me, and I find it a very happy way; not because I am a good man, for I am not; I am nothing but a poor, miserable sinner; but I have an Almighty Saviour, and both of His arms are around me."

May God Almighty, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, bring us into the companionship of our loved ones who have already entered the heavenly land, and entered the presence of Christ, whom, not having seen, we love; and so David shall recover all, "and as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

A LOST BROTHER FOUND.

"I BELONG to a family from which a brother strayed away fifteen years ago," said a man at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting. "We thought he might be in California, but could hear nothing from him. We advertised largely, and sent letters in every direction. One day a member of our family was here in this meeting. Requests were read for the sorrowing, the afflicted, the unconverted, the erring, and the lost. The thought was suggested, Why not send a request for our absent brother? With much doubt and trembling the request was written. The next day I was seated among the crowd of worshippers at this famous meeting. I had been a professor of religion many years; but I never before was so affected by a song of praise. The Scripture read went to my heart; it seemed fitted to my case. I melted under the prayers. I trembled from head to foot when the leader took up a bundle of papers, and began to read the requests. Oh, how my heart throbbed when he said, 'Will some one pray for this afflicted family, that the lost brother may be restored to it?' I turned from the sanctuary, saying, in the fullness of my heart, 'How dreadful is this place! It is none other than the House of God, and the gate of Heaven.' In a short time, and in a very extraordinary manner we heard from our lost brother. Better than all, he was a new man in Christ Jesus. We are now a family happily united, as we believe, in answer to prayer. I now come to return thanksgiving to the Lord for His great mercy to our household."

A NEW ZEALANDER'S STRUGGLE.

THE following incident related in Dr. Cullis's Times of Refreshing illustrates the power of Christ over the natural resentments of the heart: We have a fine example from the South Seas, of the most recent date. Shortly before his visit to England, the missionary, Mr. Taylor, assembled the New Zealanders who had become believers through his means. The religious farewell service, held in the closely packed church, closed with the communion of the Lord's Supper. When the first row were kneeling in a semicircle round the table of the Lord, a man suddenly rose and went back through the whole length of the church to his seat. After some time he returned and partook of the bread and wine. After the close of the service the missionary questioned the islander respecting his singular behavior, and received the following answer: "When I approached the table I did not know beside whom I should have to kneel. Then I suddenly saw that I was beside the man who, some years ago, slew my father and drank his blood, and whom I then swore I would kill the first time that I should see him. Now, think what I felt when I suddenly knelt beside him! It came upon me with terrible power, and I could not prevent it, and so I went back to my seat. Arrived there I saw, in the spirit, the upper sanctuary, and seemed to hear a voice: 'Thereby shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' That made a deep impression upon me, and at the same time I thought that I saw another sight—a cross, and a Man nailed thereon—and I heard Him say, 'Father, forgive them; they know not what they do.' Then I went back to the table."

A LETTER FROM DR. SUMMERS.

LIKE a voice from the dead, a letter was received recently by Dr. Dowkontt from his dearly loved friend and pupil, Dr. Summers, whose death has been reported by telegraph, and whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on November 29, 1888. It was dispatched from his field of labor in Central Africa, on March 30, 1888, and has only just arrived. In his letter he says he had received only two days before a letter from Dr. Dowkontt, dated August, 1886. He had been twenty months and no word from a living soul, outside of those by whom he was surrounded—no wonder that he felt, as he says, almost heart-broken and forsaken. A few days before, he was lying sick in bed with burning fever, and no kind hand to minister, nor any refreshing, cooling draught, until one of his grateful patients, a Portuguese officer, brought a little pot of jam, a jar of Liebig, and some canned pears. This was a delicious feast, and helped him much, he says, but he had had a much richer feast that same day from another hand, and had proved the truth and meaning of the promise, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come unto you."

While lying in terrible suffering from fever and pain, the Doctor says: "While I felt heart-broken and forsaken, and ready only to die, Jesus Himself drew near, and said, 'I will never leave thee;' 'Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world,' and I fairly cried for joy, but my poor negro boy could not understand it, and thought I was in pain."

"He who would get pearls," says Dr. Dowkontt, "must go down into the depths of the sea for them; and he who would see stars, into the depths of the earth; but not more true is it than that he who would know much of the Divine personal presence must be in prison with Joseph, Peter, or Paul—fettered by the chain of adverse circumstances—or in the fiery furnace with the three Hebrew children."

"But it is just here that the Christian is compensated for trial and tribulation, even by the presence and voice of the Lord."

HOW A PLEDGE WAS TAKEN.

A YOUNG man, in a good business, was addicted to intemperance. He felt a strange drawing toward the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting. He came in contact with Mr. Lanphier, who urged him to sign the pledge. "You must do it on your knees," he said; "give your heart to Christ, and He will take away the love of the intoxicating cup." Kneeling in the place of prayer, all alone with his friend, all at once a change came over him. "My appetite for drink is gone," he said; "I never felt in my life as I do now." "I think you are a converted man," was the reply; "praise the Lord." So it proved. He united with a Christian church, and became an earnest worker. His business interfered with mission work, and he resolved to throw up his position and go out and labor among the lowly. He made a full and entire consecration of himself to the service of God. He is one of the noblest workers in the city, and for over five years he has worked in the mission field; during all that time he has given clear evidence of a complete consecration to Christ.

A RESOLUTE GIRL.

A GENTLEMAN said that speaking to a girl visiting at his house, on the subject of religion, he was answered: "I don't want you to talk to me on religion, and I don't want to be a Christian." "She turned from me," he continued, "and being a resolute girl, I knew that further conversation was then useless. The next morning she was entirely changed in temper and spirit. She said to me: 'I resolved last night to give my heart to the Saviour, and I yielded to Him all that I have to give.' Six months afterward she was again at my house, a cheerful and happy Christian. She said to me: 'Do you remember my refusal to talk with you on the subject of religion? Well, I meant what I said. A change came over me as I entered my chamber, and I could not account for it. About a week ago I learned that on that very day my brother asked prayers for me in the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, and I believe my change was in answer to that prayer.'"

A SECRET VOW PAID.

THE following incident communicated to a Chicago journal by one of its correspondents shows how a true Christian honors the vows made in a time of sorrow and anxiety: Some years ago a successful doctor was stricken before he had reached middle life, and was dying. He was not a Christian, and his wife, who was a devoted one, was in great grief. She went alone to her God and wrestled for him, as one does for the dying, whom they cannot let go without the assurance of their salvation. She asked more than life, natural life. She pleaded that she might find him when her time came, beside the river of the water of life, saved from the power, the love and guilt of sin, through the merits of his Saviour. He did not linger long, but accepted for himself this great salvation, and sealed it by partaking, with his wife, on his bed of death, of that supper when they together met, for the first time, their common Lord and Saviour.

The sting of death had passed for her, for the shadow of her life was changed to joyous certainty. Her children, two daughters and a son, grew up to bless and comfort her. While the young ladies were still at home, during a temporary absence of their mother, a young man, a minister, who was going out as a missionary, came to spend a Sabbath in F. Monday morning he said to the pastor, "I am looking for a young lady willing to go out with me in this work, and would like to be introduced to the Christian young ladies in your congregation, if you are quite willing to do so."

Among other places they called at Mrs. B.'s, finding the daughter at home. Upon leaving, the young man said to his friend, "I don't care to go farther until I have seen Miss B. again." He called again, and made known his wishes to the young lady, who responded as readily as Rebekah of old. The mother was speedily informed. Reading the letter, she burst into tears, saying, "The Lord has come to claim my promise; I must go and make her ready." Then her friends learned for the first time that, when pleading for her husband's salvation, she consecrated one of her children to the entire service of her Lord. Through all these years it had been a secret between herself and her God; and as Abraham took Isaac to the sacrifice in command, so she joyfully hastened to make her eldest daughter ready to go to the island of Singapore.

AN EVANGELIZING BLACKSMITH.

A STRANGE story of the transformation of a village through the blessing of God on the preaching of a blacksmith in Eastern Turkey, is told by Mr. Browne in a letter to the Missionary Herald. He has recently made a tour through outlying districts from his station at Harpoot, and in the course of his journey came to Char-nakji, of which place he writes:

"A few years ago, on a tour, we were attracted to this fair and large Armenian village, but we were speedily disenchanted on entering it, by being rudely expelled, and refused even a night's shelter. Since then no attempt has been made by us to introduce the gospel. Yet how different this visit! Far outside the village I was greeted, and conducted to my stopping-place; and I was welcomed and feasted, and forced to hold an almost continuous meeting all that day and evening. Let me condense the story of Sahag, the blacksmith, which shows us the secret of this contrast. 'For one long year after I moved my family here, the villagers used every means in their power to drive us away, convinced, as some said, if these Protestants once get a foothold here they'll turn our village upside down. Finally I succeeded in hiring this place, with its two rooms, of which, you see, one is my shop, the other my kitchen, and this I secured only by the kind offices of the government. For the two years following, the entire village boycotted me, not a person spoke to me; and had it not been for the surrounding Koordish villagers I should have been starved out. We are now three Protestant families. Armenians now often attend our Sabbath meeting here in my shop, and they are beginning to ask us why we do not build a chapel and have a preacher, so they can understand our religion.' 'Such is the working of the leaven in this mountain village, the fruit of that love that hopeth all things, endureth all things. I slept that night with my head touching this good brother's anvil and my feet his furnace, and I thought, as I dropped off to sleep, both were excellent types of two elements of his piety. A long row of fowls nearly over my head roused me long before dawn, but I found the sturdy blacksmith up and waiting to have one more strengthening talk ere he should send me on my way."

THE MISSING ONES.

By J. W.*

ONE summer evening, for a part of our family worship, I read the fourth chapter of 1 Thess. Before retiring to rest, I seated myself on my easy-chair, and mused on the last few verses of the chapter, and as I mused, I fell into a deep sleep, and had a most wonderful dream. My mind seemed to be clear and distinct, and my intellectual faculties stronger and brighter than in my wakeful condition.

I thought I had awakened in the morning, and was somewhat surprised to find that my wife was not beside me as usual. Supposing, however, that her absence was but temporary, I waited, expecting her speedy return to our chamber; but after the lapse of what I considered a reasonable time, as she did not make her appearance, I arose and dressed.

My wife's apparel was where she had placed it on retiring, and I felt confident she was somewhere about the house. So I went to my daughter Julia's room, thinking she might know the whereabouts of her mother; but after knocking several times without response, I entered and found that she also was missing.

"Strange, Passing Strange!"

said I to myself; "where can they both be?" Then I went to the room of our son Frank, and found him up and already dressed, which was something quite unusual for him at an hour so early. He said he had passed a very restless night, and thought he might better get up. I told him of the absence of his mother and sister from their rooms, and requested him to look around and see if he could find them. In the meantime I hurriedly completed my toilet, and soon Frank returned and said the missing ones were nowhere to be found, and that every door leading outward was securely locked, as on the preceding evening. We were at our wits' end, and what to make of this strange occurrence we did not know. On again visiting Julia's room we found on a stand her well-marked open Bible. One prominent verse attracted my attention; it read, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not

The Son of Man Cometh."

This passage, my wife had always declared, referred to the coming of Christ for His saints, the redeemed Church, according to 1 Thess. 4: 14, 17, while I insisted that it meant only the preparation for death. But I am digressing. Frank and I concluded that, without waiting for breakfast, we should each take a different route, and visit some of our most intimate friends, in quest of our dear ones.

I first called on my wife's sister, Mrs. E., who, with her husband, were good, respectable people, members of a Christian Church, though rather worldly minded. After I had rung the bell several times, and waited somewhat impatiently, she appeared, and apologized for her dilatoriness by saying that she was "in a peck of trouble," and had to prepare breakfast herself, for her colored servant girl, whom she had always considered to be a real good Christian, had played her a mean trick. "She had gone off somewhere, without even putting the kettle on the range, or saying a word to any of us. But what puzzles us to know is, how she got out of the house, for the doors are all locked and the keys inside, just as we left them last evening on our return from Mrs. B.'s progressive euchre party."

"Indeed," said I, "it is exceedingly strange," and then I explained to her the object of my morning visit. When she heard of

of my wife and Julia, she became so very nervous that I was glad to change the subject by saying that, as I had not yet breakfasted, I would join them in their morning repast. When her husband heard my story he treated it with a good deal of levity, and declared that my wife was only playing me a practical joke, to induce me to rise earlier in the morning. He was sure the missing ones had secreted themselves somewhere about the house, and when I returned home I would find them all right.

As we seated ourselves at the table, Mrs. E. said we would have to take coffee without milk, as her milkman, who had heretofore been very reliable, had failed to make his appearance.

Presently the door-bell rang, and Frank entered in a state of great nervous excitement, saying he had been all over inquiring for his mother, and that, in almost every house he found trouble similar to our own. Almost every family was anxiously Searching for Missing Ones.

He had just come from our home where he found the servant girl alone, but much agitated in consequence of the numerous calls she had had to answer about missing friends. He also stated that the streets were thronged with excited people, hurrying to and fro, many of them weeping bitterly. At this announcement, Mr. E. showed evident signs of alarm, and related a conversation he had held yesterday with a friend, whose religious ideas he looked upon as quite heretical.

His friend insisted that a vast majority of church members, in these days, were but nominal Christians, "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God," and that the love of the masses for religious things had reached a very low ebb. "My friend also assured me," said Mr. E., "that the Scriptures clearly taught that, when the elect number of Christ's Church would be completed, Christ would come as unexpectedly as a thief in the night, and call His saints, both dead and alive, to meet Him in the air. The transformation would be effected in the twinkling of an eye; and although the call would be made with a shout and the sound of a trumpet, yet none would hear it but those for whom it was intended. Then would be realized the import of Christ's words, 'Then shall two be in the field, one shall be taken and the other left; two women shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken, and the other left.' I fear that time has now come, and, sad to say, we are among the left ones."

Now as the morning was far advanced, it was suggested that we go down to our business places. Frank had already gone to his office, and I, with a heavy heart, wended my way along the avenue among an unusual throng of men and women, whose faces betokened

Intense Sorrow.

In the business parts of the city I observed that many stores were closed, and those that were open did not appear to be doing any business. Every saloon that I passed was open, as usual, with groups of men outside, apparently engaged in serious discussion. As I passed by the City Hall, there was no perceptible diminution of the usual crowd of political "hangers on" around the building.

When I reached my own store, I found that my book-keeper, and the faithful old porter who had served me so many years, had not yet put in an appearance. My two other clerks were on hand, doing nothing; nor did I feel like asking them to do anything.

Yesterday I agreed to sell to a worthy mechanic a small piece of land which I owned in the outskirts of the city, and had an appointment to meet him at my lawyer's office to sign the contract, but he failed to come, and I presumed he also had joined the absent ones. I then went to the Chamber of Commerce, and found the largest gathering of merchants that I had seen there in many months. Instead of the lively, noisy bustle of buying and selling, and of clerks and messenger boys running to and fro, there was a solemn gloom pervading the whole assembly. By unanimous consent, and in consequence of the great calamity that had overtaken the community, it was voted that "three days grace be allowed on all contracts falling due this day." I will not attempt to set forth any of the reasons and speculations that were advanced as to the cause of our present troubles, but all agreed that the visitation was a supernatural one, and that in some way we who were left on earth were blamable for it.

In the evening mostly every church in the city was open, with overflowing congregations. Everybody was anxious to know the cause and and to learn how lost hopes might be regained. Many of the pastors had gone with the missing ones, but some were present in their churches. All order of service was dispensed with, and noisy confusion prevailed; crimination and recrimination were bandied to and fro, between the pastors and the people, the latter asserting that, if the pastors had done their duty, and taught their flocks the plain truths of the Bible, instead of lulling them to sleep with philosophical and moral essays, they would not now be in their present sad condition. In my own church the pastor was present, with scores of persons whom I had but rarely seen at meetings.

The pastor was speaking when I entered the room, and was entreating the audience to endeavor to allay their feelings, while he would attempt to speak to them for a few minutes. Quiet being somewhat restored, he said, "This pastor's heart is bleeding at every pore in sympathy with his sorely afflicted people. The anguish which I experience at being, in a measure, the cause of our present unhappy condition, is indescribable. None of you can realize the

Keen Disappointment

I endure at this result of my labors. I am accused of having preached too much about the affairs of this life, and too little about the heavenly state, and the things to come; and of having kept you in ignorance of the imminency of the awful visitation which has manifested itself among us this day. In reply to all these accusations I can only say that I have taught you the same theology that was taught to me in college, and which I, in common with the great majority of our ministerial brethren, firmly believed to be the teaching of God's Word.

"But now I have to confess that I was sadly mistaken, for, after what has occurred, I cannot help believing that God's Word means just what it says. My pastoral labors, during all the time I have been with you, have been excessive, and in consequence, I have not been able to devote to the study of prophecy the time which a subject so deep and intricate demanded. I am glad, however, now to be able to say for your comfort that, since this morning I have made a prayerful examination of the Scriptures, as to our present condition, and find that we are yet in the place of hope."

Here a chorus of voices ejaculated, "Thank God for that!"

The pastor proceeded: "Although we have lost the glorious privilege of the raptured saints, salvation is yet ours, if we humbly and truly accept it. We may have to pass through greater trials and tribulations than the world has ever yet experienced ere we reach the Kingdom, but he that endureth to the end shall be saved. Now what is left for us is to reorganize our Church in the spirit of true holiness, to serve the Lord with all our heart and soul, and, according to His promise, He will pour out upon us such an abundant blessing that we will not be able to receive it."

Here the electric light suddenly went out, and there arose such fearful screams that I sprang to my feet in terror—and—awoke!

My wife, who was in an adjoining room, hearing my sudden uprising, hastened in to see what was the matter. Oh, how glad I was to see her, and to realize that my terrible experience in my easy-chair was only a dream. But the more I thought of it afterwards, the more solemn seemed the Scripture truths which it contained, and the more was I impressed with the importance of having our lamps trimmed and burning, ready to go out and meet the Bridegroom.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE.

WILL subscribers please understand that the fact of their continuing to receive the paper regularly through the mail is an intimation that their renewals have been received and credited to them on our books? It is not our custom to send receipts, the date on the label always being changed as soon after receipt of money as possible, to show the time the paper is paid to. Some subscribers who have renewed for 1889 may notice that the date on the address label has not yet been changed. This is unavoidable, owing to the large number of changes to be made; but it is being rectified as rapidly as possible. Any subscriber having renewed, and receiving a notice of expiry, may conclude it was mailed before his subscription was entered on the list, and need, therefore, pay no attention to the letter.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President has Sent to Congress a Report and correspondence about the German interference in the affairs of Samoa. It included an unequivocal letter from Commander Mullan, of the United States steamer Nipsic, severely censuring the German policy. The Commander states that from all he could learn from trustworthy and responsible American, English, and native citizens he is convinced that the Tamasese party is assisted by German subjects. Tamasese seems well supplied with arms and ammunition, while the other party is lacking in ammunition. The German men-of-war, Commander Mullan says, do all they can to aid Tamasese and discourage Malietoa. The Malietoa party outnumber by far that of Tamasese, and were not the former interfered with by the German element there is not a shadow of a doubt that at an early day the former party would be successful and set up its own Government at Apia. As long as the present state of affairs is allowed, however, it is his deliberate opinion that this internal war will last for some time to come, and may eventually end in placing Tamasese upon the throne, not through the choice of the Samoan people, but through German assistance. He is convinced that were German interference withdrawn the internal strife would cease, and the much needed foreign capital would flow in.

An Accession to Republican Strength in the United States Senate was gained on January 15, when Delaware for the first time elected a Republican Senator. Mr. Higgins, on whom this distinction has fallen, has long been a recognized leader of his party in the State. He was President Grant's United States District-Attorney for Delaware. He was chairman of the Republican State Committee in 1868, and the next year he received the complimentary vote of his party for Senator, in opposition to Mr. Bayard. He took an active part in subsequent campaigns, and in 1884 he ran for Congress, polling a large vote, but not sufficient to secure his election. Mr. Higgins is forty-nine years of age.

The Notorious and Unblushing Bribery practiced at the recent election, has so stirred public indignation that a bill was introduced last week in the New York Legislature, with the ostensible object of checking the evil. As might be expected, it was so feeble and inadequate that it excites only ridicule. It requires candidates to file a statement of their expenses, and punishes a failure to do so by a fine of a thousand dollars and forfeiture of office. On its face the bill is unconstitutional, because a man elected by the people cannot be deprived of his office, but some recognition of the popular feeling was necessary, and this bill is probably considered sufficient for the purpose. The extent of the evil may be inferred from the fact that the Governor of New York, declared in his message that at least one hundred thousand dollars were expended in two districts of the State. No man in the State is more likely to know than he, so the statement deserves credence. He also said that the election was "the most corrupt of any in the history of the country so far as the direct use of money was concerned in influencing the electors." He might have added that there never was more dealing or barter of votes by mixed tickets and otherwise. In other States, also, bribery was practiced, though probably not to so great an extent. It may be hoped that patriotic citizens, who cannot fail to perceive the danger to our institutions involved by this corrupt expenditure of money, will agitate and protest until a really effective preventive law is enacted by every Legislature in the country.

The Loss of Eight Lives by a Railroad Disaster occurred on January 14, near Akron, O. A west-bound freight train broke in two about five miles from that place, and before the rear section could be removed from the tracks an east-bound passenger train on the New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio line ran into it. A brakeman had been detailed to flag any approaching train, but he was absent at the critical moment, having gone to the forward section in answer to a call that he believed was made from the locomotive. Almost immediately after the collision occurred, the passenger-cars were on fire from the overturned stoves. A scene of horror ensued, for some of the passengers were held by the broken seats, and were slowly roasted to death. The engineer of the passenger train, the fireman, the express messenger, and five passengers all lost their lives, and many other passengers were injured. The necessity of prohibiting railroad companies imperilling the lives of their passengers by stoves is emphasized by this holocaust.

The Result of the Inquiries on the Subject of restricting immigration, which were made in the chief cities last year by the Ford Committee, are embodied in a report on which a bill will probably be based. The chief recommendations of the committee are that all intending immigrants be compelled to give three months' notice of their intention to come to this country, and to submit to an examination by a United States consular agent as to their character, antecedents, and general fitness, upon the result of which will depend their admission to the United States. It is also recommended that provision be made for the return to their native country of immigrants who, after two years' residence in the United States, shall prove to be objectionable, and that the Government assume control of Castle Garden. A tax on immigrants is also to be suggested, but there are differences of opinion in the committee as to its amount. Some members believe it ought to be fixed as low as one dollar a head, while others would make it twenty-five dollars. A compromise on five dollars will probably be made.

The Parnell Commission Resumed its Sessions on January 15. An important witness was examined on the following day. He was a convict named Delaney, who was implicated in the Phoenix Park murders. He was tried and sentenced to death, but his sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life, and he was brought from the Penitentiary to give his evidence. He swore that the organization known as the Invincibles, which it is admitted were a gang of murderers, received money from the National League. He was at a Fenian meeting in 1879, at which Parnell, Egan, Biggar, and other Parliamentary leaders attended, and took part in the consultations. He testified that the Invincibles were bound under oath to assassinate the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Mr. Forster, and other officials. He had himself kept the people from crossing a bridge while two Invincibles tried to murder Mr. Forster. Carey, one of the Phoenix Park murderers, had told him that Egan was one of the leaders of the Invincibles. He had never seen money paid by an officer of the League to the Invincibles, but he had seen the money in gold and bank-notes lying on a table at which Byrne was sitting. This is the most direct and important testimony yet given, and if it is true, proves the case of the Times. The man, however, did not stand cross-examination well, and he admitted that he had been guilty of highway robbery, and other offences besides.

Fears of Trouble at Panama When the work on the Canal ceases, are entertained. Our consul there had been notified, in common with the consuls of other nations, that the contractors would probably suspend work when the funds at their command were exhausted, and consequently large numbers of men would be out of employment. The consuls were advised to apply in time to their governments for permission to send the subjects of their respective countries to their homes, when they might thus be deprived of the means of subsistence. President Cleveland and his Cabinet have referred the matter to Congress, having, as they believe, no authority to transport American laborers without a special appropriation for the purpose. Not many Americans are employed on the canal, but whenever the crisis comes they will need all the protection the Government can give them. It seems probable also from Mr. Bayard's letter that we are under obligations by treaty to maintain order at the Isthmus to some extent. Should this be so, the sudden idleness of a large number of laborers of all nationalities will involve a task of serious difficulty and responsibility.

Mr. H. M. Stanley's Letter to Tippoo Tib was received in Brussels last week, and its contents published. In it the explorer announced his return to Boma, on August 17, with three soldiers and sixty-two natives, having left his forces with Emin Pasha, with whom he had parted eighty-two days before. Stanley said: "Emin has ivory in abundance, thousands of cattle and sheep, goats and fowls, and food of all kinds. His soldiers blessed our black men for their kindness in coming so far to show them the way. Many of them were ready to follow me out of the country, but I asked them to stay quiet a few months, that I might return and fetch the other men and goods left at Yambunga. They prayed to God that He would give me strength to finish my work. May their prayer be heard!" He asked Tippoo Tib to come to him, promising to wait ten days for his arrival, at a big island in which there were plenty of houses. A communication of later date from an officer at Stanley Pool reports the arrival there of Tippoo Tib's secretary, who said that Stanley had taken the men left with the late Major Barttelot, who were under the command of Bonny, and had returned with them to Emin Pasha, at Wadelai. He thought that Stanley would not return by the same route. Stanley's letters for Europe are eagerly awaited, as this letter to Tippoo Tib, though relieving anxiety as to his safety and that of Emin Pasha, contains no details as to Stanley's own adventures.

The Emperor of Germany and Prince Bismarck made another effort last week to depreciate the esteem in which the character of the late Emperor Frederick is held by the German people. By command of the Emperor, the official journal published the indictment in full of Professor Geffcken, who was charged with having published the extracts from Frederick's diary. The indictment contains many disparaging references to the late Emperor, and, among others, states that Frederick's proclamation, announcing his accession to the throne, issued on March 12, was prepared by Professor Geffcken as early as June, 1885, when the late Emperor William was seized with fainting fits during a stay at Ems. This attempt to injure Geffcken, and influence public opinion against him by an ex parte statement, is generally condemned by the German liberal press. One prominent journal says: We cannot recollect any previous instance in Germany, or any other country, of a trial of the kind being conducted before the bar of public opinion in an official form by means of legal documents. The English press is still more outspoken, and denounces the unfilial conduct of the Emperor in plain terms.

A Large Audience Gathered in Association Hall. New York, on January 15, to hear the third lecture of Bishop H. C. Riley's series. The wonderfully beautiful pictures thrown on the sheet by his stereopticon elicited frequent applause. Probably few of those present had previously anything like so clear an idea of the scenes and buildings of Mexico, or of the picturesque beauties of South America, as they gained from the pictures and the Bishop's descriptive remarks. His narrative of the rise and progress of evangelistic work in Mexico, and of the struggles and dangers of the noble men who are laboring in the Church of Jesus there, was listened to with intense interest. Dr. Riley's next lecture will be given on January 29, in the same place.

An Interesting Ceremony was Witnessed by a large concourse of people in New York on January 12. The interest was aroused by the laying of the corner-stone of the new Gospel Tabernacle by the pastor, the Rev. A. B. Simpson. The building is being erected on the corner of Eighth Avenue and Forty-fourth Street, and will cost, including the land, $110,000. The old church in Madison Avenue has been advantageously sold. The new one is intended to afford accommodation for the college, a Deaconess' Home, and other departments of evangelistic work. The college will have about fifty students. The Tabernacle will have a seating capacity for 1,200 persons, and the lecture-rooms are to be so arranged as to increase the capacity of the main room when necessary. The Bera-chah Home will be removed from its present quarters in Sixty-first Street to a new building adjoining the Tabernacle.

A Petition for the Pardon of a Murderer has been sent to the Governor of Maryland. Six years ago a murder was committed at Cambridge, Md., by a well-known citizen, who had previously borne an irreproachable character. In a moment of passion, and under circumstances of extreme provocation, he drew his revolver and shot a man. He was tried, and a strong effort was made to have him acquitted. The facts, however, were plain, and the jury convicted him of murder in the second degree. He was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. The man has behaved well in prison, and with the allowance of time for good conduct is entitled to his discharge next week. It might be supposed that there was, therefore, no necessity for a pardon, but he is extremely anxious to save his citizenship. If he serves out his sentence he will lose his rights and privileges as a citizen, but a pardon from the governor would reinstate him. The petition has therefore been prepared by his friends, and as there is no opposition it is expected that Governor Jackson will grant the pardon. It is still more than that that God does for the sinner when He pardons him. The merits of Christ's propitiation are so great that God can still be the righteous judge while justifying the sinner who pleads the work of his Saviour. (Rom. 3: 26.)

A Circular to Lady Suitors was Mailed on New Year's Day from Ann Arbor, Mich. A few months ago an eccentric bachelor of that city died, leaving an enormous fortune. He bequeathed it to a nephew on condition that he should take up his residence in Ann Arbor, and marry within five years of the date of testator's death. He went there as required, and the other condition of the old man's will having found its way into the papers, opportunities have been proffered him for the fulfilment of that also. He reports that he is constantly receiving letters from ladies who are willing to sacrifice themselves for his benefit. His daily mail is larger than that of any business firm in Ann Arbor. He has had to employ a secretary, whose only duty is to file these love missives; and the secretary affirms that he is kept well employed. The prospective heir sent to his lady correspondents on January 1 a printed circular with the compliments of the season, and explaining to them that considerable delay must result from a suitable consideration of their various proposals, and an examination and comparison of numerous accompanying photographs, and that answers could not well be given at present. It is a pity that these ladies who are so eager to unite themselves with a man of whom they know nothing, except that he is wealthy, have not more wisdom. Then they would seek and gain eternal riches through union with Christ. (Hosea 2: 19, 20.)

A Son-in-Law's Singular Suit Was Dismissed in the City Court of Baltimore, Md., on January 3. The young man who brought it alleged that before his marriage his prospective father-in-law offered to make him a full partner in his lucrative business, which was estimated to yield a net income of $100,000 a year. After the marriage he received less than a tenth of the profits, and when he complained, and insisted on a full share, he was requested to cease all participation in the business, and his authority to sign the name of the firm was revoked. Thereupon he brought suit to compel his father-in-law to fulfil his promise. The father-in-law, in reply, said that he had two sons, and another daughter besides the one who was plaintiff's wife. His daughter had fallen in love with plaintiff, and though he did not approve of the match, he had consented to it. In love to his daughter he was willing to provide for her, and incidentally for her husband, but, in justice to his other children, he could not yield the demand made, and he had never promised any such sum. The judge in dismissing the suit made some very caustic remarks on the mercenary nature of the claim. He reminded the plaintiff that men who marry from sordid motives are usually disappointed, and he inflicted the disappointment very willingly in this case by dismissing the suit. It is to be feared that sordid motives are frequently the cause of men uniting themselves with the Church. Such men forget that they are dealing with One who reads all hearts, and that their union will bring them no eternal advantage. (Ezek. 33: 31.)

An Engineer's Caution in Testing a Foundation before beginning to build, was shown in the report issued last week respecting the new Peekskill Suspension Bridge. Before commencing the erection of the east tower, the chief engineer not only examined the rock on which it is to be built, but sent divers down to see if there were any washouts or cavities made under it by the action of the river. They reported that there were none, but the engineer was not yet entirely satisfied. He set a diamond drill at work and bored a hole in the rock, taking out a core of more than a hundred feet. The work, which occupied twelve days, resulted in finding for the entire depth an exceedingly hard, amorphous, and metamorphic granite, interspersed with quartz and feldspar, and with some iron showing in it. There were no wide seams or fissures, the rock being compact and solid for the whole distance. The work can now be commenced and carried through with confidence, and those who in after years will cross the river by that bridge will have no fear of collapse. It is so with those who, having built on Christ, the sure foundation, approach the dark river of death. None who have trusted in Him need be dismayed. (Matt. 7: 24, 25.)

A Daughter Disowned by Her Family Died in St. Paul, Minn., on January 5. Her story came to light during the last few days of her life. She was the youngest child of a wealthy banker in Toronto, Canada, and was beloved and indulged to an extraordinary degree. All that love and riches could do to make her life enjoyable was freely lavished upon her. About three years ago she met a man in society, whom she grew to love passionately, and who made her an offer of marriage. Her parents disliked and distrusted him, and earnestly warned her against him. But the girl was infatuated, and married him in spite of their opposition. They cast her off altogether. The husband had hoped for a reconciliation, with all the advantages that connection with so wealthy a father-in-law involved. When it was clear that the quarrel with the family would never be arranged, he grew indifferent to his wife, neglected, and finally deserted her. In her desolate condition, a married sister in the West offered a refuge to her and her babe. The deserted wife gratefully accepted, but in a short time the sister was left a widow, and destitute. The two women tried to earn a livelihood; but they had not been reared to work, and gradually sank into dire poverty, and were in danger of starvation. The younger, under the hardship and exposure, became ill, fell into consumption, and then application to a charitable society for help brought out the story. Her parents were notified, but they gave no assistance, and the woman died in utter poverty. She must have bitterly repented her perversity. Had she allowed herself to be guided by her parents, instead of having her own way, all that misery might have been spared her. The time is coming when God's children will see that in trusting Him and yielding to Him their own will, even when it costs a struggle, they are preserved from evil. (1 Peter 1: 6, 7.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Seven Christian Endeavor Societies have recently been organized in Foochow, China, and the vicinity.

The Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections in New York amounted to $38,777.50. A few more sums have yet to be received.

Christian readers in New York are reminded that a Daily Prayer-Meeting is held at noon at 281 Greenwich Street. Many recent meetings have been much blessed.

The net gain of new churches in the United States during the year 1888 was 6,434; the increase in the number of ministers was 4,505, while the increase in church members was 774,861.

A man who kept a liquor saloon in Raleigh, N. C., went to hear Sam Jones in Durham, was convicted and converted, and at once telegraphed to Raleigh: "Close up my saloon; I am done with the business."

Rev. Thomas Harrison's work in the Beekman Hill Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, is being much blessed. Large numbers have already made a profession of faith, and every service is densely crowded.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has commenced a series of services in Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle, Brooklyn. Much success, especially among the younger people, has attended them. Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Love have charge of the singing.

Any reader having religious papers or tracts to spare may have them distributed among the fifteen hundred convicts in the Penitentiary of North Carolina by sending them to Mr. John T. Pullen, Raleigh, N. C., who is a teacher in the Penitentiary.

The thirty-sixth anniversary of the New York Young Men's Christian Association will be held in Association Hall, January 28. Addresses are to be delivered by the Rev. Dr. David H. Greer, of St. Bartholomew's Church, and Major-General O. O. Howard.

The third annual convention of the Young People's Christian Association will be held to-morrow (Thursday) in the Madison Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, corner of 60th Street, at 3 and 8 o'clock. Rev. John Hall, D. D., and Rev. Dr. C. P. Masden, will speak.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has commenced work in the Arch Street Church, Philadelphia, and expects to labor in the city all next month. Thirteen churches have united in the invitation to him, and will hold union meetings. Preliminary meetings are being held in several churches.

The Bowery Branch of the New York Y. M. C. A. is about to open a free lodging house for destitute men and boys. The old building, recently vacated by the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank, at the corner of Broome Street and the Bowery, has been purchased for the purpose at a cost of $85,600.

An important conference of students was held in New York, last week, to consult and organize work for Home and Foreign Missions. Meetings were held in Calvary Church, and in the Church of the Holy Communion. Bishop Potter, Dean Hoffman, Dr. Kirkly, and other eminent clergymen took part.

The death of the Rev. Henry J. Van Lennep, D. D., the veteran missionary to Turkey, is announced. He was a native of Smyrna, Asia Minor, and was seventy-four years of age. He was educated at Amherst and Andover, and was ordained as a missionary in 1839. He was one of the most accomplished Oriental scholars in the world.

The Tenth Anniversary of Michael Dunn's Institution for ex-convicts was celebrated on January 13. Forty convicts are now in the Home. Over 1,100 have been received since the Home was established, and work has been found for them all. The profits of the work done in the Home last year by the convicts temporarily staying there amounted to $2,500.

THE CURE OF DOUBTS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Then saith he to Thomas, Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing." John 20: 27.

A Test that Should not Have Been Required—Conviction Immediate—How the Doubts were Satisfied—I. Crave no Signs—Dishonoring to the Word—Unreasonable—Presumptuous—Damaging and Perilous—II. Turn to Christ's Wounds—Tokens of His Love—Marks of Identity—III. Seek Helps for Faith—Study the Story—The Wonderful Realization—In Times of Distress—Of Temptation—In Difficult Duties.

AMONG us at this day we have many persons who are like Thomas—dubious, demanding signs and tokens; suspicious, and oftentimes sad. I am not sure that there is not a slight touch of Thomas in most of us. There are times and seasons when the strong man fails, and when the firm believer has to pause awhile, and say, "Is it so?" It may be that our meditation upon the text before us may be of service to those who are touched with the malady which afflicted Thomas.

Notice, before we proceed to our subject in full, that Thomas asked of our Lord what he ought not to have asked. He wanted to put our risen Lord to Tests Which Were Scarcely Reverent to His sacred person. Admire his Master's patience with him. He does not say, "If he does not choose to believe, he may continue to suffer for his unbelief." But no; He fixes His eye upon the doubter, and addresses Himself specially to him; yet not in words of reproach or anger. Jesus could bear with Thomas, though Thomas had been a long time with Him, and had not known Him. To put his finger into the print of the nails, and thrust his hand into His side, was much more than any disciple had a right to ask of his divine Master; and yet see the condescension of Jesus! Rather than Thomas should suffer from unbelief, Christ will let him take great liberties.

Observe that Thomas was at once convinced. He said: "My Lord, and my God." This shows our Master's wisdom, that He indulged him with such familiarity, because He knew that, though the demand was presumptuous, yet the act would work for his good. Our Lord sometimes wisely refuses, saying, "Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended"; but at other times, He wisely grants, because, though it be too much to ask yet He thinks it wise to give.

I. The first head of my discourse shall be this:

Crave no Signs.

If such signs be possible, crave them not. If there be dreams, visions, voices, ask not for them. Crave not wonders, first, because it is dishonoring to the sacred Word to ask for them. You believe this Bible to be an inspired volume—the Book of God. The apostle Peter calls it "A more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed." Are you not satisfied with that? When a person, in whose veracity you have the utmost confidence, bears testimony to this or that, if you straightway reply, "I would be glad of further evidence," you are slighting your friend, and casting unjust suspicion upon him. Will you cast suspicion upon the Holy Ghost, who, by this word, bears witness unto Christ? Oh, no! let us be content with His witness. Let us not wish to see, but remain satisfied to believe.

Crave no signs, because it is unreasonable that we should desire more than we have already. The testimony of the Lord Jesus Christ, contained in the Word, should alone suffice us. Besides that, we have the testimony of saints and martyrs, who have gone before us, dying triumphant in the faith. We have the testimony of many still among us, who tell us that these things are so. In part, we have the testimony of our own conscience, of our own conversion, of our own after-experience, and this is convincing testimony. Let us be satisfied with it. Thomas ought to have been content with the testimony of Mary Magdalene, and the other disciples, but he was not. We ought to trust our brethren's word. Let us not be unreasonable in craving after proofs when already proofs are afforded us without stint.

Crave no signs, because it may be you will be presumptuous in so doing. Who are you, to set God a sign? What is it He is to do before you will believe in Him? Suppose He does not choose to do it, are you therefore arrogantly to say, "I refuse to believe unless the Lord will do my bidding"? It is presumption which dares to ask of God anything more than the testimony of Himself which He chooses to grant us

In His Word.

It is, moreover, damaging to ourselves to crave signs. Jesus says, "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Thomas had his sign, and he believed; and so far so good, but he missed a blessing peculiar to those who have not seen, and yet have believed. Do not, therefore, rob yourselves of the special favor which lights on those who, with no evidence but the witness of the Spirit of God, are prepared at once to believe in the Lord Jesus unto eternal life.

Again, crave no signs, for this craving is highly perilous. Translated according to many, and I think translated correctly, our Saviour said, "Reach hither thy finger, and put it into the print of the nails; and become not faithless, but believing," intending to indicate that Thomas, by degrees, would become faithless. His faith had grown to be so little that, if he continued insisting upon this and that, as a sign or evidence, that faith of his would get down to the very lowest; yea, he would have no faith left. "Become not faithless, but believing." Dear friends, if you began to seek signs, do you know what would happen? Why, you would want more; and when you had these, you would demand still more. Those who live by their feelings, judge of the truth of God by their own condition. When they have happy feelings, then they believe; but if their spirits sink, if the weather happens to be a little damp, or if their constitution happens to be a little disordered, down go their spirits, and, straightway, down goes their faith. He that lives by a faith which does not rest on feeling, but is built upon the Word of the Lord, will remain fixed and steadfast as the mount of God; but he that craves for this thing and that thing, as a token for good at the hand of the Lord, stands in danger of perishing from want of faith. He shall not perish, if he has even a grain of living faith, for God will deliver him from the temptation; but the temptation is a very trying one to faith.

If You Were to See Them,

Crave, therefore, no sign. If you read a story of a person who saw a vision, or if you hear another declare that a voice spake to him—believe those things, or not, as you like; but do not desire them for yourself. These wonders may, or may not, be freaks of the imagination: I will not judge; but we must not rely upon them, for we are not to walk by sight, but by faith. Rely not upon anything that can be seen of the eyes, or heard of the ears; but simply trust Him whom we know to be the Christ of God, the Rock of our salvation.

II. Secondly, when you want comfort,Turn to the Wounds of Your Lord.

You see what Thomas did. He wanted faith, and he looked for it to Jesus wounded. He says nothing about Christ's head crowned with glory. He does not say that he must see Him "girt about the paps with a golden girdle." Thomas, even in his unbelief, is wise; he turns to his Lord's wounds for comfort. Whenever your unbelief prevails, follow in this respect the conduct of Thomas, and turn your eyes straightway to the wounds of Jesus. These are the founts of never-failing consolation, from which, if a man doth once drink, he shall forget his misery, and remember his sorrow no more. Turn to the Lord's wounds; and if you do, what will you see?

First, you will see the tokens of your Master's love. O Lord Jesus, what are these wounds in thy side, and in thy hands? He answers, "These I endured when suffering for thee." There is no restorative for a sinking faith like a sight of the wounded Saviour. Look, soul, and live by the proofs of His death! Come and put thy finger, by faith, into the print of the nails, and these wounds shall heal thee of unbelief. The wounds of our Lord are the tokens of His love. They are also the seals of His death, especially that wound in His side. He must have died; for "one of the soldiers, with a spear, pierced his side, and forthwith came there out blood and water. And he that saw it bare witness." This is our comfort, for if He died in our stead, then we shall not die for our sins; our transgression is put away, and our iniquity is pardoned. If the sacrifice had never been slain, we might despair; but since the spear-wound proves that the great Sacrifice really died, despair is slain, hope revives, and confidence rejoices.

The wounds of Jesus, next, are the marks of identity. By these we identify His blessed person after His resurrection. The very Christ that died has risen again.

There is no Illusion:

there could be no mistake. It is not somebody else foisted upon us in His place; but Jesus who died has left the dead, for there are the marks of the crucifixion in His hands and in His feet, and there is the spear-thrust still. It is Jesus; this same Jesus. This is a matter of great comfort to a Christian—this indisputably proven doctrine of the resurrection of our Lord. It is the keystone of the gospel arch. Take that away, or doubt it, and there remains nothing to console you. But because Jesus died and in the self-same person rose again, and ever lives, therefore does our heart sweetly rest, believing that "them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him;" and also that the whole of the work of Jesus is true, is completed, and is accepted of God.

Once again, these wounds may comfort us, because in heaven they are, before God and the holy angels, the perpetual ensigns of His finished work. That passion of His can never be repeated, and never needs to be: "After He had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, He sat down on the right hand of God." But the memorials are always being presented before the infinite mind of God. Those memorials are, in part, the wounds in our Lord's blessed person. Glorified spirits can never cease to sing, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain"; for every time they gaze upon Him, they perceive His scars. How resplendent shine the nail-prints! No jewels that ever gemmed a king can look one-half so lustrous as these. Though He be God over all, blessed for ever, yet to us, at least, His brightest splendor comes from His death.

My hearer, whensoever thy soul is clouded, turn thou to these wounds, which shine like a constellation of five bright stars. Look not to thine own wounds, nor to thine own pains, or sins or prayers or tears; but remember that "with His stripes we are healed." Gaze, then; intently gaze upon thy Redeemer's wounds, if thou wouldst find comfort.

III. This brings me to my third point: whenever faith is staggered at all,

Seek Helps for Your Faith.

Though we cannot literally put our finger into the print of the nails, and may not wish to do so, yet let us use such modes of recognition as we do possess. Let us put these to their utmost use; and we shall no longer desire to put our hand into the Saviour's side. We shall be perfectly satisfied without that. Ye that are troubled with doubts and fears, I give you these recommendations.

First, if you would have your faith made vivid and strong, study much the story of your Saviour's death. Read it: read it: read it: "Tolle: lege," said the voice to Augustine, "Take it: read it." So say I. Take the four evangelists; take the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah: take the twenty-second psalm; take all other parts of Scripture that relate to our suffering Substitute, and read them by day and by night, till you familiarize yourself with the whole story of His griefs and sin-bearing. Keep your mind intently fixed upon it; not sometimes, but continually. Crux lux: the cross is light. Thou shalt see it by its own light. The study of the narrative, if thou pray the Holy Ghost to enlighten thee, will beget faith in thee; and thou wilt, by its means, be very greatly helped, till at last thou wilt say, "I cannot doubt. The truth of the atonement is impressed upon my memory, my heart, my understanding."

The Record Has Convinced Me."

Next, if this suffice not, frequently contemplate the sufferings of Jesus. I mean by that, when you have read the story, sit down and try and picture it. Let your mind conceive it as passing before you. Put yourself into the position of the apostles who saw Him die. No employment will so greatly strengthen faith, and certainly none will be more enjoyable! An hour would be grandly spent if occupied in turning over each little detail, item, and incident in the marvellous death by which you are redeemed from death and hell. You will be surprised to find how this familiarizing of yourself with it, by the help of the Holy Spirit, will make it as vivid to you as if you saw it; and it will have a better effect upon your mind than the sight of it would have done; for, probably, the actual sight would have passed away from your mind, and have been forgotten, while the contemplation of the sorrowful scene will sink deep into your soul, and leave eternal lines!

What next? Why, dear friends, the Lord has a way of giving His people wonderful realizations. I hope I shall not say anything incorrect when I remark that there are times with us when the Lord is present with us; and we are strongly impressed with that fact, and, therefore, we act under a sense of that presence as if the divine glory were actually visible. Do you know what it is to write a letter to a friend, feeling as if the Lord Jesus were looking over your shoulder? I know what it is at times to stand here and preach, and feel my Lord so near me that, if I had literally seen Him, it would not have surprised me. Have you never, in the watches of the night, lain quiet, when there was no sound but the ticking of the watch, and thought of your Lord till, though you knew there was no form before you, you were just as

as if you could see His sorrowful countenance? In quiet places, all alone—you scarcely like to tell the story—in the lone wood, and in the upper chamber—you have said, "If He spake, I should not be more certain of His presence; and if He smiled upon me, I should not be surer of His love." These realizations have sometimes been so joyfully overwhelming that for years you have been lifted by them beyond all power of doubt. The holy summer days banish the frosts of the soul. Whenever a doubt is suggested to me about the existence of my Lord and Master, I feel that I can laugh the tempter to scorn, for I have seen Him, and spoken with Him. Not with these eyes, but with the eyes of my inner life, I have beheld my Lord, and communed with Him. Wonder not that I am not among the crew of the black, piratical ship of "Modern Thought."

Nor is it merely in seasons of enjoyment that we get these helps, but in times of deep distress. Prostrate with pain, unable to enjoy any comfort, unable even to sleep, I have seen the soul of the believer as happy as if all sounds were marriage peals. Some of us know what it is to be right gleesome, glad, and joyous in hours of fierce trial, because Christ has been so near. In times of losses and bereavements, when the sorrow stung you to the quick, and you thought, before it came, that you never could bear it, yet have you been so sustained by a sight of the sacred head once wounded, and by fellowship with Him in His sufferings, that you have said, "What are my griefs compared with his?"

If you have been helped in this way, it will have all the effect upon you that ever could have come of putting your finger into the print of the nails. If, perchance, you have been given up to die, and have, mentally, gone through the whole process of dying, expecting soon to stand before the bar of God, and have been happy, and even exultant, then you could not doubt the reality of a religion that bore you up above the surging billows. Now that you are again restored to life for a little longer time, the recollection of your buoyant spirits, in what you thought your dying hours, will answer all the purpose to you, I think, of putting your finger into the nail-prints.

Sometimes the strengthening influence may be afforded under the stress of temptation. If ever, young man, you have had a strong temptation hurling itself against you, and your feet have almost gone—ay, let me not say "young man"; but if ever a man or a woman of any age has had to cry out, "God, help me; how shall I escape out of this?" and you have turned your eyes, and seen your Lord, and beheld His wounds; and if you have felt at that moment that the temptation had lost all power, you have had a seal from the Lord, and your faith has been confirmed. If at the sight of your Lord you have exclaimed, in presence of the temptation, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" after that, you have had the best proof of your Redeemer's power to save. What better or more practical proof could you desire?

In these times, when the foundations of our faith are constantly being undermined, one is sometimes driven to say to himself,

"Suppose it is Not True."

As I stood, the other night, beneath the sky, and watched the stars, I felt my heart going up to the great Maker with all the love that I was capable of. I said to myself, "What made me love God as I know I do? What made me feel an anxiety to be like him in purity? Whatever made me long to obey my God cannot be a lie." I know that it was the love of Jesus for me that changed my heart, and made me, though once careless and indifferent to Him, now to pant with strong desires to honor Him. What has done this? Not a lie, surely. A truth, then, has done it. I know it by its fruits.

If this Bible were to turn out untrue, and if I died and went before my Maker, could I not say to Him, "I believed great things of thee, great God; if it be not so, yet did I honor thee by the faith I had concerning thy wondrous goodness, and thy power to forgive"? and I would cast myself upon His mercy without fear. But we do not entertain such doubts; for those dear wounds continually prove the truth of the gospel, and the truth of our salvation by it. Incarnate Deity is a thought that was never invented by poet's mind, nor reasoned out by philosopher's skill. Incarnate Deity, the notion of the God that lived and bled and died in human form, instead of guilty man, it is itself

Its Own Best Witness.

The wounds are the infallible witness of the gospel of Christ. Have you not felt those wounds very powerful to you in the form of assistance in times of duty? You said, "I cannot do it, it is too hard for me!" You looked to Jesus wounded, and you could do anything. A sight of the bleeding Christ has often filled us with enthusiasm, and so with power: it has rendered us mighty with the omnipotence of God. Look at the Church of Christ in all ages. Kings and princes did not know what to do with her. They vowed that they would destroy her. Their persecuting edicts went forth, and they put to death thousands upon thousands of the followers of Christ. But what happened? The death of Jesus made men willing to die for Him. No pain, no torture, could keep back the believing host. They loved Jesus so that, though their leaders fell by bloody deaths, another rank came on, and yet another, and another, till despots saw that neither dungeon nor rack nor fire could stop the march of the army of Christ. It is so now. Christ's wounds pour life into the Church by transfusion: the life-blood of the Church of God is from Jesus' wounds. Let us know its power and feel it working within us to will and to do of His good pleasure.

And as for those who do not trust Him, what shall I say? The Lord help you to do so at once; for as long as you do not trust Him, you are under an awful curse, for it is written, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be Anathema Maranatha"—cursed at the coming of the Lord. May it not be so with you! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THREE STUDENTS.*

IN the class of 1840, of which I was a member, were two ministers' sons, of fine minds, but neither of them Christians. During revival services near this edifice, one of them was converted; but the other held aloof. Under an urgent appeal from his friend, he had, however, been touched. He did not quench the Spirit. He became finally a minister, and settled at New Rochelle. In the same class was a third member, an avowed infidel. After graduation he banded with others, even worse than himself, to go by sea to New Orleans, and thence overland into Texas, there to form a predatory band for the commission of all kinds of iniquity. They did not all reach New Orleans. A part went on, but were attacked by disease. This student buried the last one, and was left alone. From Galveston he worked his way home, sick, diseased, and ragged, to his mother's door. He got a little school at New Rochelle, but was a gambler and misanthrope, resisting long all his classmate's advances and appeals. Touched at length by them, he did not quench the Spirit. He began a higher, a Christian life; and these three students of this college are now all ministers of Christ.

A Clerk Watched.

Some years since a trio of gentlemen, members of a large mercantile firm, came into the office of the writer, and, under injunctions of profound secrecy, desired the favor of using the window for a few days. The privilege was readily granted, and one of the number was at once installed behind a curtain, where, with a powerful glass, he could rigidly scrutinize every movement of a certain clerk in a large building across the way. The young man, all unconscious of the vigilant eye constantly upon him, was absorbed in his duties making entries and receiving money; and whatever consciousness of innocence or guilt was carried about with him, the suspicion of a rigid watch upon his actions—every movement closely scanned and weighed by his employers—doubtless had never entered his mind. The surveillance was continued nearly a week, when it was abruptly terminated, and the result, whether in discovery of wrong, or establishing innocence, I never learned. The incident made a profound impression upon me, suggesting with thrilling distinctness the solemn truth which men are so prone to forget, "Thou, God, seest me!" and enabling me as never before to realize how open before Him are the hearts and ways of men, their desires, volitions, actions; and that at last He shall bring every work into judgment, whether it be good or whether it be evil.

A Discouraged Minister

had the following strange dream: He thought he was standing on the top of a great granite rock, trying to break it with a pickaxe. Hour after hour he worked on, with no result. At last he said, "It is useless; I will stop." Suddenly a man stood by him and asked, "Were you not allotted this task? and, if so, why are you going to abandon it?" He answered, "My work is vain; I can make no impression on the granite." Then the stranger solemnly said: "That is nothing to you; your duty is to pick, whether the rock yield or no. The work is yours, the results are in other hands; work on." In his dream he saw himself setting anew to his labor, and at his first blow the rock flew into hundreds of pieces. This was only a dream, but it proved a valuable and never forgotten lesson to the minister, and a means of comfort and cheer to his soul.

ELIJAH W. HALFORD.

Private Secretary of the President-elect.

MR. HALFORD, who is to occupy the much-coveted and responsible position of Private Secretary, is at present editor of the Indianapolis Journal. He is an Englishman, about forty-five years of age. His father came to this country when Elijah was a child, so that his education was distinctively American. It was obtained in the common schools of Indianapolis, in which city the greater part of his life has been spent. His first occupation after leaving school was that of a compositor, but he soon became a reporter on the Journal, and eventually its managing editor. For about two years he was managing editor of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, and he also was for about a year employed on the Indianapolis News, but he returned to his first love and became the editor of the Journal. He has for several years served his party in Indiana getting up platforms, and doing similar work requiring a ready and clever pen.

In personal appearance Mr. Halford is a middle-aged gentleman, slender, and of medium stature; his hair is turning gray; he looks straightforward and honest, as he is. Mr. Halford is a lay preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and exemplary in all the relations of life. A wife and daughter take care of the Christian home maintained by his industry.

A TRAGEDY ON AN ISLAND.

(See Illustration.)

It was a gala day in the little fishing village by the sea. There was a double wedding in the old church. Mary Lewis and Hannah Nottage, the two belles of the village, and fast friends, were married at the same time to their respective lovers, who like themselves had been born and had grown up in the little isolated community. All the village turned out that morning at an early hour to witness the ceremony. After it was performed and congratulations tendered, the two young couples went to the Nottage home for a wedding breakfast, and then went off by themselves in the best boat in the village to spend the day on the cliffs at a favorite island resort some ten miles away, meaning to return in the evening for a reception and dance in the large barn placed at their disposal by the squire. All the villagers who could spare the time, were busy during the afternoon hanging festoons of evergreens from the big beams of the barn, and covering its walls with such bright-colored materials as the village could furnish. It looked fit for the reception long before sunset, and every one hurried through the evening meal, donned Sunday attire, and in the twilight went from all parts of the village toward the barn.

The young couples and the ceremony of the morning formed the general topic of conversation in the various groups of villagers. "Guess Will is glad now he did not sign the parson's temperance pledge," said one. "He'd have missed his glass to-night."

"That's so," was the reply, "and it would have looked queer to have a bridegroom drinking water at such a time."

"Will wouldn't have cared for that," said another of the group. "He wanted to sign when the parson asked him, and he will sign to-morrow, you'll see. He'd have done it then if David hadn't interfered. If David and he hadn't been going to be married at the same time and Will hadn't hated to spoil fun, he'd have done it. Hannah wanted him to wait too, and that settled it."

"Well, perhaps David will sign, too; it won't do him any harm."

"I hope so. I guess the parson was afraid they'd overdo it to-night, and that made him anxious to get it done yesterday. But he was asking a little too much."

There was something wrong at the barn. Anxious faces were looking out, and each group as it arrived learned that the four principal persons had not arrived. Neither were they at their homes, for their friends were among the guests anxiously looking for them. The young couples were blamed for their imprudence, for the stretch of sea between the village and the island was not just the kind for rowing over in the dark, and besides, the weather was ugly. Anxiety deepened as time passed and they did not arrive. At last, it grew so late that it was evident there would be no dance that night. The brides and bridegrooms must be staying on the island for the night, for the weather was now so rough that they would never venture to cross in their light rowboat. The villagers separated reluctantly, and more than one heart was heavy with foreboding of some disaster.

In the gray of the morning, quite a crowd gathered on the shore, looking anxiously in the direction of the island for some sign of the missing wedding-party. They did not have to look long. The boat was seen slowly approaching. But only one figure was in it, and that a woman. As it drew nearer the woman was recognized as Hannah Nottage, the bride of the Will who had been persuaded, as the villagers said, not to sign the pledge until after the ceremony. The crowd increased before the boat reached the beach, as the news of its coming passed from mouth to mouth. The vicar and his wife were there, and the fathers and mothers of the brides, and all the villagers who could leave their work. They shouted their inquiries to Hannah, but she rowed on, and did not answer. When the boat was so close that a fisherman waded in and pulled it up on the beach, Hannah shipped her oars and turned her head. Her face was then seen to be ghastly pale.

"Will is dead," was all she could say. Then in a moment she added: "David is hurt badly. Somebody must go for him and Mary. We've been all night on the cliff. One of you come back with me for Will. We could not lift him into the boat. Oh, I am sure he is dead!"

The squire, who was among the crowd, lifted both hands in horror, and on every face there was distress, while the girl's terrible calmness seemed worse to them than hysterics.

Before night, all the village knew what had occurred. The dead body of poor Will was brought home, and David, with a broken leg and arm, was lying under the doctor's hands in his widowed mother's house. The two brides, one of them now a widow, would not say much, but eventually it was learned that David had taken a supply of liquor with him in the boat, resolved that his triumph over Will's inclination to sign the pledge the previous day should be made the most of. Both he and Will must have drunk freely, and in some skylarking between them Will had fallen over the cliff, and David, in trying to descend to his relief, had fallen, too. The two helpless girls made their way down, only to find Will lifeless and David unable to move. They had to stay all night, listening to the winds and waves and David's moans, and in the morning poor Hannah made her solitary voyage to get help.

A cloud of sorrow seemed to rest on every home, and every heart echoed the moan of the poor young widow. "Oh! if we had only let him sign the pledge when the parson wanted him, this would never have happened."

THE GREENLAND EXPLORATION PARTY.

A REMARKABLE feat of exploration has recently been achieved by the party of explorers whose portraits are given in the accompanying illustration. They have succeeded in crossing Greenland on snow-shoes, from its eastern to its western shores. The perilous nature of the undertaking may be realized from the fact that the country has been well described as a mass of rocks intermingled with huge blocks of ice. It extends from the Arctic circle, like a tongue, in a southerly direction, between the northeastern shores of Canada and the Continent of Europe. It was formerly believed to be a part of the American Continent, but recent explorers are convinced that it is an island, the northern shores of which are bound up in the ice of the Arctic Ocean nearly the whole of the year.

The Norwegian explorers sailed on the whaler Jason to the ice-rim, outside the Sermilik fjord, where they arrived on July 17. Thence they made their way on foot to the north of Cape Farewell, where, after twelve days' travelling on the ice, they trod on the land. They followed a northerly course as far as Uminik, and from that point commenced their arduous task of crossing the country to its western shore. This was on August 15. They had some four hundred miles of the roughest country in the world to traverse, and their journey must have been perilous and arduous in the extreme. During several weeks the party were at an altitude of nine thousand feet, with the thermometer from forty to fifty degrees below zero (centigrade). It was not until near the end of September that they reached the west coast, at a point a little north of Godthaab. During part of the journey they were delayed by loose new-fallen snow, which made walking, even on snow-shoes, very laborious.

They made a difficult descent over jagged ice to the sea, and then set about the construction of a boat with bamboo reeds, willow branches, and a portion of their tent. In this frail craft two of the party paddled to Godthaab, hoping there to find a steamer. But the last steamer had left for the winter. Hearing, however, that the Fox was at the cryolite mines, 300 miles distant, two native messengers were hired, who carried letters for her to take to Norway, and a message asking her captain to wait the arrival of the party of explorers. He was unable, however, to comply, as he feared that his vessel would be frozen in. He, therefore, sailed without them, bringing only their letters in which the success of the expedition was announced. It will not be until the spring that the explorers will have an opportunity of returning to Norway.

The leader of the expedition is Dr. Frithiof Nansen, for many years Curator of the Museum at Bergen, and a noted athlete. He was the champion snow-shoe runner at Christiania, and among his exploits was the ascent of the Norwegian mountains, which he accomplished on snow-shoes, dragging a sleigh after him, and sleeping in a bag on the snow. On the Greenland expedition the food supply consisted of dried beef, bread, flour, and chocolate. A remarkable feature of the supplies was the total absence of alcoholic stimulant in any form. Dr. Nansen is a highly accomplished man. He has won a high reputation among physiologists by a work on nerve centres containing some ingenious and original theories. Besides his own language, he speaks fluently German, French, and English, and is well read in history and general literature. The story of his adventurous journey is awaited with much interest, and is likely to add considerably to our knowledge of a land of which at present little is known.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Trials of Faith.

ONE day, I remember, my husband received a letter from an infidel gentleman in Lausanne, a neighboring city, requesting him to come and see him, that they might talk together over Mormonism, for he had heard of us and of our doctrine; and my husband resolved to visit him before our money was all gone. When Mr. Stenhouse reached Lausanne, he visited first a Protestant minister, with whom he had some slight acquaintance and who was also interested in Mormonism, and told him that he was going to call upon the Gouverneur de l'Hôpital. The minister was greatly opposed to my husband visiting such a man. "He is a socialist," he said, "a revolutionist; he fought at the barricades; he is a mauvais sujet (bad subject), and not a fit person to be spoken to about religion."

This only increased the interest which Mr. Stenhouse felt in the governor, and made him more than ever determined to see him; and he did see him, although the good minister had represented him aussi noir que le diable (as black as the devil). So they met; and my husband began the work for which he had come. They had long talks together, and my husband—as did the elders ever in such cases—spoke to the governor of redemption through Christ, and baptism for the remission of sins.

Faith is not an act of the will. Like the unseen wind, it comes, and we see the power thereof, but know not whence it proceeds. Thus at first the unbelieving governor found it; he might find himself no match for the arguments of his opponent, but he could not force his heart to believe, and he was by no means a willing convert. My husband, however, remained with him; and before he left, the governor had been baptized into the Church. Our new convert proved to be a most excellent and worthy man, notwithstanding his former infidelity, and he was subsequently a great aid to us in our mission. We felt satisfied that the expenses of that journey had been well spent, if only on his account, although a few francs at that time could ill be spared.

But our circumstances seemed to be getting worse and worse, and my health began to fail. For several months neither of us had had sufficient nourishment, and my anxieties increased my physical weakness. I was dispirited, yet I feared to complain, or even to let my husband know what I felt. At length I could not leave my bed. I well remember the solemn silence that reigned in our home one day. I had risen from my bed, weak, and oh! so faint-hearted that I had scarcely any desire to live; and I was sitting with my little daughter in my arms. She had cried herself to sleep, cold and hungry, and, much as I loved her—nay, idolized her—I confess that for an instant I harbored in my soul the impious, the unnatural, wish that rather than see my darling awake again to cold and hunger, she might sleep her sweet young life away. For me to yield to such a thought—to wish my child to wake no more! I, who would have given gladly the last drop of my life-blood to save her! For me to look upon her innocent little face with such a thought! I can hardly now believe that such a thing was possible, even for a moment. But I was desperate and bold and cowardly—all at the same time; or my heart was humiliated by poverty, and my faith was rousing bitter thoughts in me.

My husband was pacing the room. I knew too well all that was passing in his mind, although we had long been silent. At length I said to him, "Take courage, dear, for we are the servants of the Great God, and surely He will find a means of escape for us. We are sent here; we came because the Lord wanted us to come, and surely He will provide for us!" He turned to me in reply, and said, kindly, "We can at least have some water;" and he went for some water; and then, with as reverential feeling in his soul as ever inspired a grace before dinner, he blessed it, and we drank.

We had scarcely done so when the mail courier brought a letter. Governor Stoudeman, with a feeling of delicacy, had hesitated, when my husband visited him at Lausanne, to offer him any assistance; but, he said in his letter, he had been "impressed" to do so, and hoped that we should not be offended. As the letter was opened, a piece of gold fell upon the table. We could hardly believe that God had so soon answered our prayers, and sent us relief; and our emotions of gratitude for this timely aid found expression in tears.

All this time our landlady knew nothing of our distress; she was as ignorant of our situation as if she had never seen us. So long as I was able to walk about, I used at regular hours to go to the kitchen, get the cooking utensils, and go through the routine of cooking, as if we had a well-filled larder all the time. I set the table with punctilious care, and the good old widow never suspected but that we had plenty. Thus, supposing that we wanted nothing, she and her children were more than ordinarily kind to us, and to our little girl, who was now old enough to toddle round, and go from room to room. Very often they would get her into their room at meal-time, and give her little things to please her; and while they felt honored in being permitted to do so, we were silently thankful for her sake, for her sufferings were more than we could endure.

The temporary aid from Lausanne was very welcome to us, though it only served to make us feel more keenly our dependent position. I might relate stories, alas, too true! of cold and want; of days, and even almost an entire week, passed at one time without food—stories which for painful detail would eclipse romance. It was a weary waiting for Providence! Such things are better forgotten. And yet I feel that in after years my temper was more subdued, and my mind more patient under affliction, than it would have been had I not experienced this discipline.

People who have heard, with a sneer, of Mormon missionaries and their work, would perhaps have realized that faith may be sincere, although mistaken, if they could have seen us at that time. The first teachers of a doctrine, whether it be good or evil, if only it stems the current opinions of the hour, have ever found that at the end of a rocky way there was waiting for them a crown of thorns. Many a time since then I have felt the weight of anxious care in providing for my family; the trial of our faith has not been light, or seldom repeated; but those days of trouble in Switzerland were, I think, the darkest I ever experienced. We realized literally, the necessity of trusting to God's daily mercies for our daily bread; and the assurance that the Lord would provide was our only hope. To say that we practiced the strictest economy, would be to give but a faint idea of the way in which we had to consider and contrive, in order to exist at all.

For years we kept the "Word of Wisdom"—a "Revelation of Joseph Smith"—which enjoined abstinence from wine, coffee, tea, or, in fact, warm drinks of any kind; and trifling as such self-denial may at first appear, it was not really so when other privations were added thereto. For months at a time we existed—for I dare not say lived—without what are considered, even by the poorest, the most common necessities. I can even recall to mind one trying week in Switzerland, when, for the whole seven long days, we had less than a pint of corn-flour to live upon, and that was chiefly reserved for our poor child. As I look back to those dark, painful times I feel that it was by little short of a miracle that our lives were spared. Our faith alone saved us.

Very soon after this we were notified that the Apostle Snow was on his way to Switzerland, and that we might shortly expect him. This to me was joyful news, for he had relieved me of my trouble once before, and I almost looked upon him as my good angel. He came, and remained with us a few days; and before he left instructed Mr. Stenhouse to repair to England, to raise funds to aid the mission. He also gave me a few pounds to procure what I needed for an event which I expected shortly to take place.

This kindness on his part brought to my mind such a sense of relief, and so renewed my energy, that I felt ready for my missionary labors again.

When my second child was about two months old, I went to Lausanne to reside, while my husband was absent in England. Apartments were engaged for me, at the house of a gentleman who had recently been baptized. I was made very comfortable there, and for the first time since my husband was sent on a mission, I experienced a feeling of repose, so that I now had some hopes of regaining mental and physical strength. No provision had been made by the Saints for my support; but even without that, I thought, living among those who were happy, and one with us in the faith, I should myself find more tranquillity of mind.

Madame and Monsieur Balif, in whose house I resided, were persons of good social position. The husband was one of nature's gentlemen, and as good a man as I ever knew. He received the Mormonism taught by Mr. Stenhouse with all his heart, and never seemed weary of showing his gratitude by his good deeds. Madame Balif did not at once join the Church, and probably never would have done so but for the love which she bore to her husband. She was not, however, hostile to the new faith, as some other wives were, and she did all that she could to render pleasant my stay with them, and tried to make me forget what I had suffered in Geneva.

Madame Balif was a high-spirited, impulsive woman, and devotedly attached to her husband; I never saw a woman more so. She impressed me as being one of the happiest of wives; he one of the best of husbands. After I had lived in the house a few weeks, she was baptized; but she never was satisfied with Mormonism. Poor, dear lady! How often have I bitterly regretted that I was instrumental in leading her into the Mormon Church, in which, as (years later, in Utah) she told me, she endured such cruel humiliation and martyrdom. I knew well indeed then, by experience, what all that meant.

While I lived with them, it was agreed that I should pay for my apartments monthly; but after I had paid for the first month, Monsieur Balif told me that I should do so no more. And knowing that he meant it as an expression of kindness and gratitude on his part, I felt relieved of all anxiety on that account. All that I had, even then, for the support of myself and my two little ones was about five francs (about $1) a week; but my wants were studiously few, for I had taught myself to require nothing but what was absolutely necessary to keep me alive.

During Mr. Stenhouse's absence, the meetings were held in my parlor; and as the brethren who had joined the Church had not previously been religious men, though they were persons of the best moral character, they were very diffident about conducting the meetings, and for a time could not think of praying before others. It devolved upon me—of sheer necessity, for I disliked prominence as much as they did—to lead the singing, to pray, to preach—in fact, to do everything. Had I not done so, they would have sat looking at each other, for they were all too timid to speak. I encouraged them in every way to try, and finally we managed to get along very well. A "good spirit" prevailed; and we were like a little band of brothers and sisters.

The only person, now, who gave me any anxiety was Madame Balif, who was very weak in the faith. Her doubts and fears troubled me much, for I had conceived a very great regard for her. I feared that with a heart so proud and rebellious as hers, she would never get salvation, and I trembled for her happiness. How slight a hold the new faith had taken of her mind, I was forcibly reminded by an incident which was at the time a very great trial to me.

My little daughter fell ill with intermittent fever, and I dared not call in a physician; it would not do for me, a missionary's wife, to show lack of faith. Such was our zeal in those days. But now, as I have stated, even the most orthodox Mormons, including Brigham Young, do not think of relying upon God and the ordinances of the Church, as they did in former years, but call in the best physician they can get. I was much troubled about my little girl, for she was evidently failing fast. She had been "administered to" by one of the native elders, who had anointed her with oil, and prayed over her; but yet she did not get better. Madame Balif, in the midst of my affliction, taunted me about the child not recovering, and asked where was the power of God, of which I had talked so much: "Now," she said, "if you could get that child healed, it would be some proof to my mind that the power you speak of is still in the Mormon Church."

I felt ashamed that I had not exercised more faith. I was certain that the gift of healing was in the Church, and I believed it was my own fault that the child was not even now well. In my zeal I replied rather warmly, "My child will be healed, and you shall see it." But I had no sooner uttered these words than I began to fear I had promised too much.

I determined, however, that nothing on my part should be left undone. I sent for Governor Stoudeman, our new convert, as he was the president of the branch and an elder. I told him that this child must be healed by the power of God. We had not witnessed any manifestation of the healing power among the Saints in Switzerland up to that time; and I earnestly desired that now, for the first time, this gift might be proved among us, for the sake of the Church as well as for my own. So I told the governor that it was his duty, as well as mine, to fast and pray that the Lord might grant us this blessing, that it might be a testimony that it was His work, and that we were His servants. He became as enthusiastic as I was myself, and we fasted and prayed for nearly two days. At the end of that time he came to see me, and by the bedside we knelt and prayed; and he laid his hands upon the child, and blessed her in the name of the Lord.

That night the child was very low; and though I strove to show my faith, I dreaded that she would have her usual attack of fever about midnight. After the departure of the elder, Madame Balif came into the room, and said, "Your child is very ill; if your God cannot help her, why do not you send for a physician?" This appeared to me so profane, and such an insult to my God and faith, that I replied indignantly, "Madame, she will and shall be healed this very night; for I know that power is in the Church. The reason why the child was not healed before is because I have not been earnest enough in seeking the Lord."

When I was left alone I sat down by the bedside, trembling lest I had been too rash in declaring that the child would be healed that same night. Much and fondly as I loved my little treasure, I confess that I suffered more at the thought of God's name suffering reproach than I did from fear of my darling's death; and I tried earnestly to banish my doubts, with the remembrance that all things are possible to them that believe. Kneeling there in the dark and lonesome midnight, I poured out my soul fervently to God, beseeching Him, for His Kingdom's sake, and for the glory of His great name, to answer, and not to suffer my unworthiness to stand in the way. I watched hour after hour beside my darling's bed, and the child slept on peacefully, without any symptoms of returning fever; and oh! how anxiously I waited for her awaking.

At last, worn out with fatigue and watching, I laid myself down on the bed beside her, and soon fell asleep; and when I awoke it was daylight, and my little one was peacefully sleeping on still—the fever had left her. No tongue could tell the gratitude which filled my heart; I could only weep tears of joy, and sing aloud my praise to God.

Madame Balif entered the room early in the morning to see what kind of a night we had passed. Then I drew her to the bedside, and told her how tranquilly the child had slept all night, and showed her how much better she looked, and asked her if she did not see in all this the providence of God. But she simply said, "Ah, well! I suppose the disease had run its course." This grieved me, for I had trusted that such a direct answer to my prayers would have helped to increase her faith in our religion; but Mormonism had not touched her heart; and I believe it is much more the devotion of the heart than it is the mental acquiescence in doctrine which gives us the power to hope, and endure, and believe.

When, by-and-bye, my little Clara awoke, she was evidently very much better, and not only free from the fever, but bright and cheerful, like her former self; and she never relapsed. In the course of a week she was running about as well as ever, and the Saints were greatly confirmed in their faith.

THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for February 3, Mark 4: 1-20. Golden Text, Mark 4: 23.

Christ's Friends Concerned About His Physical Wants—Should the Body be Neglected in Spiritual Work?—A Safe Rule—Jesus Not an Ascetic—The Sermon From the Ship—Illustrations from Common Things—How to Get the Best Explanation—Jesus Still Ready to Teach—What was Sown—The Soils of Modern Times—The Proof of Good Ground.

It was a Sabbath day (Matt. 12: 1; 13: 1); Jesus had already been teaching many things; He had taught the true law of the Sabbath (Matt. 12: 1-6; Mark 3: 1-5), had healed the man with the withered hand, and cast out the blind and dumb demon. (Matt. 12: 10, 22.) He had also warned the scribes who had come down from Jerusalem on a commission to investigate His work, that their imputing His work of casting out devils to an unclean spirit, was the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and that whoso committeth it "hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation." (Mark 3: 28-30.) After this His friends, who had before sought to interfere with Him, because, in His work among the multitude, He had not been able even to eat bread, had made a second attempt to care for His bodily needs, and He had taken occasion to teach the great lesson, "Whoever shall do the will of God, the same is My brother, and sister, and mother."

"And He began again to teach by the seaside." Probably He had gone home with His mother and friends, and had taken some refreshment, and set to work again. How far are we

To Care for Our Bodies?

Are we to go on with the work continuously, and leave eating and sleeping to chance; or are we to take care of the bodies with which God has entrusted us, and make it a rule at all times to let no work interfere with our regular meal-times and hours of sleep? Oh, how many Christian workers are puzzled by these questions! The enemy has succeeded in breaking them down through neglecting the body, and he tries, on the other hand, to make them slaves to the care of their bodies. What, then, is the solution? Surely this; our body "is the temple of the Holy Ghost," who alone has the right to dispose of it. It is not for us to make a system either of caring for or neglecting our bodies; but rather, should we yield them up to the disposal and the care of God. When Jesus was driven into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil, He could trust His Father to feed Him with the Word; and now He could trust for strength to teach the multitude until the moment when His Father would have Him seek refreshment. Jesus was not an ascetic; it was the exception, and not the rule, with Him to neglect His body; and in things physical as well as spiritual, He settled all with His Father, and did always those things which pleased Him. (John 8: 29.)

As soon as He resumed His teaching on the Sabbath day, when He could get the ear of so many more than on week days, "there was gathered unto Him a great multitude, so that He entered into a ship, and sat in the sea." It was not eloquent language, powerful declamation, or anything which constitutes grand oratory, which was to be found in the words of Jesus, and yet

"Never Man Spake Like this Man!"

(John 7: 46.) It was the Master's hand touching His own workmanship. His words always touched a chord in every receptive heart, and always awakened opposition in those who would not have to do with God: under His words no one could remain neutral. His teaching was so personal, and so touched the real life and the real needs of His hearers, that multitudes thronged to hear, and to come under its power. He had been passing through the corn-fields, and instead of seeking for illustrations in bygone history, or recondite science, He drew His parallels from the present hour, and told a little true story of the corn-field. "Behold, there went out a sower to sow." Who is the sower? "He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man." (Matt. 13: 37.) He told of how the sower sowed on various soils—the wayside, the stony ground, among thorns, and, finally, on the good ground—and, without explaining His meaning to them, He left them, with the words, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

There were some who had ears to hear, "and when He was alone," these still lingered about Him with the twelve, and "asked of Him the parable." It is safer than any commentary, and within the reach of the most uneducated believer, to do as these disciples did.

They Asked Jesus

to make His meaning plain. Oh, how many aching brains might be spared, how much bitter controversy avoided, if every child of God asked Jesus Himself to explain what he does not understand of His truth! "Who teacheth like Him?" (Job 36: 22.) Jesus' mission was a reassuring one; He said, "Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God, but unto them which are without, all these things are done in parables: that seeing, they may see, and not perceive; and hearing, they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them." But none need remain without; the call to every man is "Come," from God the Father (Isa. 1: 18; 55: 1), from God the Son (Matt. 11: 28; Luke 14: 17), from God the Holy Ghost (Heb. 3: 7; Rev. 22: 17). And He said unto them, "Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?" If we do not know what concerns our entrance into the kingdom, how shall we know the things of the kingdom? If we know nothing about being born again and reconciled to God, how can we know anything about the Christian life which is thus begun?

Jesus said, "The Sower soweth the word." Anything else which is sown does not come from the great Sower. In many a congregation, in many a family, in many a social circle, seed is being sown, and it may be said, "An enemy hath done this." (Matt. 13: 28.) But the Sower soweth only the word. "And these are they by the wayside where the word is sown; but when they have heard, Satan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts." These are the people who leave themselves open to any impression, good or bad. If a revival is going on, they will be there; and if a famous actor comes to the theatre, they will be there; the way through their hearts is trodden by so many feet that nothing makes a lasting impression; they are "past feeling." (Eph. 4: 19.) "And these are they which are sown on who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness." It is so easy, "without money and without price," nothing to pay—this just suits them; they are willing to get all the joy they can, all the relief they can, from the knowledge of sin forgiven; they exult in their own feelings, and it looks like a true and real conversion. But this song is not the "new song" of him who knows he has come up out of the "horrible pit and the miry clay," it is not "praise unto our God" (Ps. 40: 1-3); it is a joy in its own advantage, and not in being right with God. "These have no root in themselves;" self has not given place to God, the empire of the being has not changed hands, they "endure but for a time; afterward, when affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended." Oh, how many conversions are like these! As long as they are in a perpetual excitement, singing hymns and meeting friends, appreciated and noticed, their joy in salvation seems to last; but when some Christian says a hard word, or some other Christian does not take as much notice of them as formerly, or a brother or sister, husband or wife, begins to oppose them, the rootless plant "withers away." There was nothing in the soul to take hold of—the will was still hard as a stone, resisting the pressure of the plant; and the seed, which began to grow, withers. This is not a true conversion, but it is a kind with which all evangelists are familiar, and none can tell until the testing-time which are the lasting, true conversions, and which these temporary ones. "And these are they which are such as hear the word, and the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful." A real conversion, but a divided heart! a real work of God, but the ground always disputed by self-care and self-interest. Like Lot, they are worldly; or, like Jacob, they are anxious; and the world around sees more of the thorns where the word is sown, than of the precious Word of God which is sown amongst them. These are no credit to the great Sower; these are the stumbling-block of earnest seekers, the excuse of infidels, the grief of the true children of God; they are not happy, and they make other people miserable; they are not holy, and they do all they can to make other people think they cannot be holy either; but they form the grindstone which sharpens God's faithful children. "And these are they which are sown on such as hear the word, and receive it, and bring forth fruit, some thirty-fold, some sixty, and some an hundred." The good ground has been ploughed, and has yielded to the plough; has been harrowed, and has yielded to the harrow; there has been a giving up to the purposes and plans of God. "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" (Acts 9: 6.) This was a proof that Saul of Tarsus was good soil. "And he left all, rose up, and followed Him" (Luke 5: 28); this showed that Levi, the publican, was good ground. The good-ground conversions always bear fruit; such Christians leave their mark wherever they go. If they enter a house, the people within are the better for them; if they speak or write for Jesus, something comes of it; if they pray, they have the answers to record. Why? Because God can have His way with them, and manifest His life in them. True, the fruit may be thirty-fold (never less), sixty-fold, or an hundred-fold, but fruit there always will be, to the glory of their God.

LILLA M. ALEXANDER.

Secure is that soul in the midst of affliction,
Who sees in each sorrow the hand of his God,
And knowing all things for his good, work together,
Unquestioning bows 'neath each stroke of the rod:
Oh! blest is that heart that when tossed by the tempest,
Can cling to this hope as a bird to its nest,
And say, with a faith by each trial made stronger,
"The Dear Father knows—it is all for the best."

Each blossom of hope in our lives may be blighted,
Swept by adversity's pitiless blast;—
Clouds of misfortune o'ershadow our pathway,
Friends of a lifetime prove false at the last;—
The heart may be sad, and the way may be lonely,
And rough be the path by the weary feet press'd,
Yet faith pleadeth ever, Oh! fail not to trust Him,
"The Dear Father knows—it is all for the best."

The seed, that with weeping, we sowed for the Master,
Unquickened, may lie where it fell by the way;—
Prayers that were wrung from our heart's deepest anguish,
Unanswered remain, though we cease not to pray;
The Father may hide for a moment His presence,
And the soul by its doubts, and its fears be distress'd,
But faith whispers low, "Though He slay thee, yet trust Him,"
"The Dear Father knows—it is all for the best."

These light afflictions, which but for a moment,
The Father hath sent us His promise to seal,
Are naught to the weight of the glory eternal,
And far more exceeding, which God shall reveal:
Some day we shall know why the crosses were given,
For the angels will summon us home to our rest,
Where with faith lost in sight, and with vision grown clearer,
We shall see as God sees, and shall know it was best.

TO SOLICITORS OF EVERY KIND,

AND TO ALL INTELLIGENT PEOPLE WHOSE TIME IS EITHER PARTIALLY OR WHOLLY UNOCCUPIED.

Owing to the large number of worthless books put upon the market by unscrupulous publishers, who try to force their sale in the most disagreeable way, there has naturally arisen in the minds of some people a prejudice against book agents.
In this business, as in all others, everything depends upon the character of the agent and the nature of the work offered for sale. The works that we publish are known the world over, and the names of a few of our great authors will show the quality of our publications: Mark Twain,
General U. S. Grant, General P. H. Sheridan,
Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Mrs. E. B. Custer,
Hon. (Sunset) Cox, Edmund Clarence Stedman, and many other equally distinguished men and women publish their works through our house, and we offer them for sale on the subscription plan. There could be no more honorable and lawful calling than introducing books of this nature to the public, books that interest, educate, and improve everyone into whose hands they come.
Such men as George Washington, J. G. Blaine, Jay Gould, R. B. Hayes, Prince Bismarck, and hundreds of other celebrated men were at one period of their lives book agents.

SUNDAYS, BRIGHT OR DOLEFUL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, January 13, 1889.

THERE is an element of gloom striking through all false religions. Paganism is a brood of horrors. The god of Confucius frowned upon its victims with blind fate. Mohammedanism promises nothing to those exhausted with sin in this world but an eternity of the same passion-indulgences. But God intended that our religion should have the grand characteristic of cheerfulness. St. Paul struck the key-note when he said: "Rejoice evermore, and again I say, rejoice." This religion has no spikes for the feet; it has no hooks for the shoulder; it has no long pilgrimages to take; it has no funeral-pyres upon which to leap; it has no Juggernauts before which to fall.

Its Good Cheer

is symbolized in the Bible by the brightness of waters, and the redolence of lilies, and the sweetness of music, and the hilarities of a banquet. A choir of seraphim chanted at its induction, and pealing trumpet, and waving palm, and flapping wing of archangel are to celebrate its triumphs. It began its chief mission with the shout: "Glory to God in the highest!" and it will close its earthly mission with the ascription: "Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!"

But men have said that our religion is not cheerful, because we have such a doleful Sabbath. They say: "You can have your religious assemblages, and your long faces, and your sniffling cant, and your psalm-books, and your Bibles: give us the Sunday excursion, and the horse-race, and the convivial laughter. We have so much joy that we want to spread it all over the seven days of the week, and you shall not have one of our days of worldly satisfaction for religious dolefulness." I want to show these men—if there are any such in the house this morning—that they are under a great delusion, and that God intended the fifty-two Sundays of the year to be hung up like bells in a tower, beating a perpetual chime of joy and glory and salvation and heaven; for I want you to carry out the idea of the text, "and call the Sabbath a delight."

I remark, in the first place, we are to find in this day the joy of Healthy Repose.

In this democratic country we all have to work—some with hand, some with brain, some with foot. If there is in all this house a hand that has not, during the past year, been stretched forth to some kind of toil, let it be lifted. Not one, not one. You sell the goods. You teach the school. You doctor in the sick-room. You practice at the bar. You edit a newspaper. You tan the hides. You preach the gospel. You mend the shoes. You sit at the shuttle. You carry the hod of bricks up the ladder on the wall. And the one occupation is as honorable as the other, provided God calls you to it. I care not what you do, if you only do it well. But when Saturday night comes, you are jaded and worn. The hand cannot so skilfully manufacture; the eye cannot see as well; the brain is not so clear; the judgment is not so well balanced.

A prominent manufacturer told me that he could see a difference between the goods which went out of his establishment on Saturday from the goods that went out on Monday. He said:

"They were very different indeed. Those that were made in the former part of the week, because of the rest that had been previously given, were better than those that were made in the latter part of the week, when the men were tired out." The Sabbath comes, and it bathes the soreness from the limbs, quiets the agitated brain, and puts out the fires of anxiety that have been burning all the week. Our bodies are seven-day clocks, and unless on the seventh day they are wound up, they run down into the grave. The Sabbath was

into it we are to gather the resources upon which we are to draw all the week. That man who breaks the Sabbath robs his own nerve, his own muscle, his own brain, his own bones. He dips up the wine of his own life, and throws it away. He who breaks the Lord's day gives a mortgage to disease and death upon his entire physical estate, and at the most unexpected moment that mortgage will be foreclosed, and the soul ejected from the premises. Every gland and pore and cell and finger-nail demands the seventh day for repose. The respiration of the lungs, the throb of the pulse in the wrist, the motion of the bone in its socket declare: "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

There are thousands of men who have had their lives dashed out against the golden gates of the Sabbath. A prominent London merchant testifies that thirty years ago he went to London. He says: "I have during that time watched minutely, and I have noticed that the men who went to business on the Lord's day, or opened their counting-houses, have, without a single exception, come to failure." A prominent Christian merchant in Boston says: "I find it doesn't pay to work on Sunday. When I was a boy I noticed, out on Long Wharf, there were merchants who loaded their vessels on the Sabbath day, keeping their men busy from morning till night; and it is my observation that they themselves came to nothing—these merchants—and their children came to nothing. It doesn't pay," he says, "to work on the Sabbath."

I appeal to your observation. Where are the men who twenty years ago were Sabbath-breakers, and who have been Sabbath-breakers ever since? Without a single exception, you will tell me, they have come either to financial or to moral beggary. I defy you to point out a single exception, and you can take the whole world for your field. It has either been a financial or in every instance. Six hundred and forty physicians in London petition Parliament, saying: "We must have the Sabbath obeyed. We cannot have health in this city and in this nation unless the Sabbath is observed." Those in our own country have given evidence on the same side. The man who takes down the shutters of his store on the Sabbath takes down the curse of Almighty God. That farmer who cultures his ground on the Sabbath day raises a crop of neuralgia, and of consumption, and of death.

A farmer said: "I defy your Christian Sabbath. I will raise a Sunday crop." So he went to work and plowed the ground on Sunday, and harrowed it on Sunday, and he planted corn on Sunday, and he reaped the corn on Sunday, and he gathered it into the barn on Sunday. "There," he says, "I have proved to you that all this idea about a fatality accompanying Sabbath work is a perfect sham. My corn is garnered, and all is well." But before many weeks passed the Lord God struck that barn with His lightnings, and away went the Sunday crop.

Sabbath-Keeping Pays.

During the last war, it was found out that those public works which paused on the seventh day turned out more war material than those which worked all the seven days. Mr. Bagnall, a prominent iron merchant, gives this testimony: "I find we have fewer accidents in our establishment and fewer interruptions, now we observe the Lord's day; and at the close of the year, now that we keep the Sabbath, I find we turn out more iron and have larger profits than any year when we worked all the seven days." The fact is, Sabbath-made ropes will break, and Sabbath-made shoes will leak, and Sabbath-made coats will rip, and Sabbath-made muskets will miss fire, and Sabbath occupations will be blasted. A gentleman said: "I invented a shuttle on the Lord's day. I was very busy, so I made the model of that new shuttle on the Lord's day. So very busy was I during the week that I had to occupy many Sabbaths. It was a great success. I enlarged my buildings; I built new factories, and made hundreds of thousands of dollars; but I have to tell you that all the result of that work on the Sabbath has been, to me, ruin. I enlarged my buildings, I made a great many thousands of dollars, but I have lost all, and I charge it to the fact of that Sunday shuttle." I will place in two companies the men in this community who break the Sabbath and the men who keep it, and then I ask you who are the best friends of society?

Sabbath in the Household.

I suppose that the mere philosopher would say that the Sabbath light comes in a wave current, just like any other light; but it does not seem so to me. It seems as if it touched the eyelids more gently, and threw a brighter glow on the mantel ornaments, and cast a better cheerfulness on the faces of the children, and threw a supernatural glory over the old family Bible. Hail! Sabbath light! We rejoice in it. Rest comes in through the window, or it leaps up from the fire, or it rolls out in the old arm-chair, or it catches up the body into ecstasy, and swings open before the soul the twelve gates which are twelve pearls. The bar of the unopened warehouse, the hinges of the unfastened store window, the quiet of the commercial warehouse seem to say: "This is the day the Lord hath made." Rest for the sewing-woman, with weary hands, and aching side, and sick heart. Rest for the overtaken workman in the mine, or out on the wall, or in the sweltering factory. Hang up the plane, drop the adze, slip the band from the wheel, put out the fire. Rest for the body, for the mind, and for the soul.

"Welcome, sweet day of rest,
That saw the Lord arise;
Welcome to this reviving breast,
And these rejoicing eyes."

Again I remark, we ought to have in the Sabbath the joy of

Domestic Reunion

and consecration. There are some very good parents who have the faculty of making the Sabbath a great gloom. Their children run up against the wall of parental lugubriousness on that day. They are sorry when Sunday comes, and glad when it goes away. They think of everything bad on that day. It is the worst day to them, really, in all the week. There are persons who, because they were brought up in Christian families where there were wrong notions about the Sabbath, have gone out into dissipation and will be lost. A man said to me: "I have a perfect disgust for the Sabbath-day. I never saw my father smile on Sunday. It was such a dreadful day to me when I was a boy, I never got over it, and never will." Those parents did not "call the Sabbath a delight," they made it a gloom. But there are houses represented here this morning where the children say through the week: "I wonder when Sunday will come!" They are anxious to have it come. I hear their hosanna in the house; I hear their hosanna in the school. God intended the Sabbath to be especially

A Day for the Father.

The mother is home all the week. Sabbath day comes, and God says to the father, who has been busy from Monday morning to Saturday night at the store, or away from home: "This is your day. See what you can do in this little flock in preparing them for heaven. This day I set apart for you." You know very well that there are many parents who are mere sutlers of the household; they provide the food and raiment; once in a while, perhaps, they hear the child read a line or two in the new primer; or if there be a case of especial discipline, and the mother cannot manage it, the child is brought up in the court-martial of the father's discipline and punished. That is all there is of it. No scrutiny of that child's immortal interests, no realization of the fact that the child will soon go out in a world where there are gigantic and overwhelming temptations that have swamped millions.

But in some households it is not that way; the home, beautiful on ordinary days, is more beautiful now that the Sabbath has dawned. There is more joy in the "good-morning," there is more tenderness in the morning prayer. The father looks at the child, and the child looks at the father. The little one dares now to ask questions without any fear of being answered: "Don't bother me—I must be off to the store." Now the father looks at the child, and he sees not merely the blue eyes, the arched brow, the long lashes, the sweet lip. He sees in that child a long line of earthly destinies; he sees in that child an immeasurable eternity. As he touches that child, he says: "I wonder what will be the destiny of this little one?" And while this Christian father is thinking and praying, the sweet promise flows through his soul: "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." And he feels a joy, not like that which sounds in the dance, or is wafted from the froth of the wine-cup, or that which is like the "crackling of thorns under a pot," but the joy of domestic reunion and consecration.

Eleven Families.

I have some statistics that I would like to give you. A great many people, you know, say there is nothing in the Christian discipline of a household. In New Hampshire there were two neighborhoods—the one of six families, the other of five families. The six families disregarded the Sabbath. In time, five of these families were broken up by the separation of husbands and wives; the other by the father becoming a thief. Eight or nine of the parents became drunkards, one committed suicide, and all came to penury. Of some forty or fifty descendants, about twenty are known to be drunkards and gamblers and dissolute. Four or five have been in State-prison. One fell in a duel. Some are in the almshouse. Only one became a Christian, and he, after first having been outrageously dissipated. The other five families that regarded the Sabbath were all prospered. Eight or ten of the children are consistent members of the Church. Some of them became officers in the Church; one is a minister of the gospel; one is a missionary to China. No poverty among any of them. The homestead is now in the hands of the third generation. Those who have died have died in the peace of the gospel. Oh, is there nothing in a household that remembers God's holy day? Can it be possible that those who disregard this holy commandment can be prospered for this life, or have any good hope of the life that is to come?

Again, we ought to have in the Sabbath the Christian Assemblage.

Where are all those people going on the Sabbath? You see them moving up and down the street. Is it a festal day? people might ask. Has there been some public edict commanding the people to come forth? No, they are only worshippers of God, who are going to their places of religious service. In what delicate scale shall I weigh the joy of Christian convocation? It gives brightness to the eye, and a flush to the cheek, and a pressure to the hand, and a thrill to the heart. You see the aged man tottering along on his staff through the aisle. You see the little child led by the hand of its mother. You look around and rejoice that this is God's day, and this the communion of saints.

I look upon the Church of God as one vast hosanna. Joy dripping from the baptismal font, joy glowing in the sacramental cup, joy warbling in the anthem, joy beating against the gate of Heaven with a hallelujah like the voice of mighty thunderings. "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion." It is the day and the place where Christ reviews

His troops, bringing them out in companies and regiments and battalions, riding along the line, examining the battle-torn flags of past combat, and cheering them on to future victories. Oh, the joy of Christian assemblage!

I remark also, we have in this day the joy of Eternal Sabbathism.

I do not believe it possible for any Christian to spend the Lord's day here without thinking of Heaven. There is something in the gathering of people in church on earth to make one think of the rapt assemblage of the skies. There is something in the song of the Christian Church to make one think of the song of the elders before the throne, the harpists and the trumpeters of God accompanying the harmony. The light of a better Sabbath gilds the top of this, and earth and heaven come within speaking-distance of each other, the song of triumph waving backward and forward, now tossed up by the Church of earth, now sent back by the Church of heaven.

"Day of all the week the best,
Emblem of eternal rest."

The Christian man stands radiant in its light. His bereft heart rejoices at the thought of a country where there is neither a coffin nor grave; his weary body glows at the idea of a land where there are no burdens to carry, and no exhaustive journeys to take. He eats the grapes of Eshcol. He stands upon the mountain-top, and looks off upon the promised land.

Two Treasures to Protect.

With what revulsion, and with what pity we must look out on that large class of persons in our day who would throw discredit upon the Lord's day. There are two things which Christian people ought never to give up; the one is the Bible, the other is the Sabbath. Take away one, and you take both. Take either, and farewell to Christianity in this country, farewell to our civil and religious liberties. When they go, all go. He who has ever spent Sunday in Paris, or Antwerp, or Rome, if he be an intelligent Christian, will pray God that the day will never come when the Sabbath of continental Europe shall put its foot upon our shores. I had a friend in Syracuse who lived to be one hundred years of age. He said to me in his ninety-ninth year: "I went across the mountains in the early history of this country. Sabbath morning came. We were beyond the reach of civilization. My comrades were all going out for an excursion. I said: 'No, I won't go; it is Sunday.' Why, they laughed. They said: 'We haven't any Sunday here.' 'Oh, yes,' I said, 'you have. I brought it with me over the mountains.'"

There are two or three ways in which we can war against Sabbath-breaking usages in this day; and the first thing is to get our children right upon this subject, and teach them that the Sabbath day is the holiest of all the days, and the best and the gladdest. Unless you teach your child under the paternal roof to keep the Lord's day, there are nine hundred and ninety chances out of a thousand it will never learn to keep the Sabbath. You may think to shirk responsibility in the matter, and send your child to the Sabbath-school and the house of God; that will not relieve the matter. I want to tell you, in the name of Christ, that will be more potential than any instruction they get elsewhere; and if you disregard the Lord's day yourself, or in any wise throw contempt upon it, you are blasting your children with an infinite curse. It is a rough truth, I know, told in a rough way; but it is God's truth, nevertheless. Your child may go on to seventy or eighty years of age, but that child will never get over the awful disadvantage of having had a Sabbath-breaking father or a Sabbath-breaking mother. It is the joy of many of us that we can look back to an early home where God was honored, and when the Sabbath came it was a day of great consecration and joy. We remember the old faces around the table that Sabbath morning. Our hearts melt when we think of those blessed associations, and we may have been off, and committed many indiscretions, and done many wrong things; but the day will never come when we forget the early home in which God's day was regarded, and father and mother told us to keep holy the Sabbath.

There is another way in which we can war against the Sabbath-breaking usages of the country at this time, and that is by making our houses of worship attractive, and the religious services inspiring. I plead not for a gorgeous audience-chamber; I plead not for groined rafters or magnificent fresco; but I do plead for comfortable churches, home-like churches.

Make the Church Welcome to all, however poorly clad they may be, or whatever may have been their past history; for I think the Church of God is not so much made for you who could have churches in your own house, but for the vast population of our great cities, who are treading on toward death, with no voice of mercy to arrest them. Ah! when the prodigal comes into the church, do not stare at him as though he had no right to come. Sometimes a man wakes up from his sin, and he says: "I'll go to the house of God." Perhaps he comes from one motive, perhaps from another. He finds the church dark and the Christian people frigid (and there are no people on earth who can be more frigid than Christian people when they try), and the music is dull, and he never comes again. Suppose one of these men enters the church. As he comes in he hears a song which his mother sang when he was a boy; he remembers it. He sits down, and some one hands him a book, open at "Jerusalem, my happy home,

Name ever dear to me."

"Yes," he says, "I have heard that many times." He sees cheerful Christian people there, every man's face a psalm of thanksgiving to God. He says: "Do you have this so every Sunday? I have heard that the house of God was a doleful place. I have really enjoyed myself!" The next Sabbath the man is again in the same place. Tears of repentance start down his cheek; he begins to pray; and when the communion-table is spread, he sits at it, and some one reaches over and says: "I am surprised to find you here! I thought you didn't believe in such things." "Ah!" he says, "I have been captured. I came in one day, and I found you were all so loving and cheerful here that I concluded I would come among you. Ah! you can't drive men out of their sins, but you can coax them—you can charm them out."

I would to God that we could all come to a higher appreciation of this Sabbath heritage! We cannot count the treasures of one Christian Sabbath. It spreads out over us the two wings of the archangel of mercy. Oh, blessed Sabbath! They scoff a great deal about and there is a wonderful amount of wit expended upon that subject now—the Sabbaths they used to have in New England. I never lived in New England, but I would rather trust the old Puritanic Sabbath, with all its faults, than this modern Sabbath, which is fast becoming no Sabbath at all. If our modern Sabbatism shall produce as stalwart Christian character as the old New England Puritanic Sabbatism, I shall be satisfied, and I shall be surprised.

Oh, blessed day! blessed day! I should like to die some Sabbath morning when the air is full of church music and the bells are ringing. Leaving my home group with a dying blessing, I should like to look off upon some Christian assemblage chanting the praises of God as I went up to join the thousands of thousands standing around the throne of Jesus. Hark! I hear the bell of the old kirk on the hill-side of heaven. It is a wedding-bell, for behold, the Bridegroom cometh! It is a victor's bell, for we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us.

"Oh when, thou city of my God,
Shall I thy courts ascend?
Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths have no end."

PROPERTY CONSECRATED.

A CONVERT in Western Turkey has literally borne the test which Jesus applied to the rich young man (Luke 18:22). Mr. Tracy, of Marsovan, in Western Turkey, writing to the Missionary Herald, says: "Three Sundays ago I called on one of our leading brethren. I found him sick, after returning from a journey. Let me tell you, in substance, what he said. 'For the last two or three days I have been looking at that picture on the wall opposite (Christ preaching to the people on the mountain). It is a very sweet picture to me. As I looked at it, Christ seemed to say to me: "Will you sell all you have and give it to the poor, and come and follow me?" The question disturbed me terribly. I could not say yes. He kept looking at me and asking me the same question. My soul was thrown into tumult. I said: "How can I sell all and give it away? This house cost me — pounds. I shall have to sell it for half that sum, and that I must give away. How can I part with my store, and all I have got with such hard labor, and distribute the whole avails to the poor?" Long did my heart rebel and struggle against the demand. At last, terrible as it was, I came to the point where I said, "Yea, Lord, I will do as thou requirest." I put up my house at auction; it went at half its value. I put up my store; it went likewise. I distributed all. I took my wife and children out into the street. We went down into a humble quarter and entered a poor tenement. We sat down in a mean room. When we were seated, Jesus came in and said: "Peace. Hast thou done as I bade thee?" I replied, "Yea, Lord, I have given all." Then He said, "To-day is salvation come to this house."

A MISSIONARY BUILDER.

In a sketch of the work of the Rev. John Jones on the island of Masé, one of the Loyalty group in the South Pacific, it is stated that the natives of the island were ferocious cannibals, whose dwellings were miserable huts, and a more rude or barbarous race could scarcely be conceived. On going there Mr. Jones at once constituted himself the friend and helper as well as the religious teacher of the people, while they were interested and attracted by the new way of living, and the various conveniences of civilization introduced by the missionary. They saw the missionary build for himself a better house than they had ever seen before; under his superintendence some of them had assisted him in the building of it, and soon they desired "improved dwellings" for themselves, and set to work to rear them. The door and the window, and the lock and the key were indeed to them works of art; but with the help of the missionary, who supplied them with the latter and directed them in the construction of the former, they soon attained to respectable cottage homes. The mission station was the centre of all operations.

A TOUR IN JAPAN.

In a letter from the Rev. T. S. Tyng to the Spirit of Missions, that missionary gives an interesting account of a tour he took in November last to outlying districts around his station in Japan. Three young men had preceded him to Fukui, and wrote him encouraging reports of the field. They had met a judge of the provincial court, who had for some time been reading the Bible daily, but had found himself unable to understand clearly, unless "some one should guide him." "He gathered together at his own house," says Mr. Tyng, "some twenty-four of the judges and officers of the court, to hear what our young men had to say. Nothing, of course, but genuine interest in the subject of which they spoke would have led men of this standing to come together to listen to the teaching of young men of twenty-two or twenty-three, whose very names they had never heard before. Naturally, therefore, I pressed on to visit the place as soon as possible.

"Arrived at Takebu after thirteen hours on the road, I found that the preaching would not begin until the following night. When that time came we found, in spite of rain, an audience of 120 or 130 to hear us at the theatre. It was evident from their appearance that they were among the most intelligent people of the place, and they listened with a great deal of attention to addresses which, as far as my Japanese helpers were concerned, were well worth listening to. The second night the audience was larger, and equally attentive. How the work will develop further we cannot yet say. Some people of large influence in the place are disposed to help us, but for the most part privately, because they 'fear the people.' Yechizen is the chief remaining stronghold of Buddhism in Japan. That religion is decaying rapidly indeed, and the money raised by the priests in this region is said to have fallen off one-half in the last two or three years; but it is still strong enough to make men who are anxious for popularity careful how they openly oppose it.

"At Fukui we had preaching for two nights in a large vacant house, being unable to get the theatre. It was crowded to overflowing by intelligent and attentive listeners, who were, I think, much impressed by what they heard. Arrangements have been made to open a preaching-place at once in Fukui, the judge whom I mentioned becoming responsible for the rent."

A SERVICE BY CANDLE-LIGHT.

IN the Bijou Theatre, a variety resort in the slums of Seattle, W. T., surrounded by saloons and gambling-dens, Major Hilton is conducting Gospel services which threaten disaster to the iniquitous interests of the locality. On the second night of the meetings the enemies of the work got the gas light cut off. Candles were procured, and it was a novel sight to see scattered through the large audience many people holding in one hand a lighted candle and in the other hand a Gospel Hymn-book, heartily engaging in the service. Major Hilton remarked that it reminded him of the poor woman who, on calling for a pound of candles at the store during the late war, was told they had advanced in price two cents per pound. Asking for a reason for the advanced price, she was told it was "owing to the war." "What!" she exclaimed, "are they fighting by candle-light?"

The fight with the enemy of souls by candle-light on the night referred to in Seattle resulted in fourteen men turning from the service of Satan unto the testimonies of the Lord, and the work is still going on with increasing interest. (1 Peter 2: 9.)

FIVE YEARS IN BED.

A LETTER is published by Mrs. M. Baxter in her monthly magazine, Thy Healer, from Captain Goring, who writes from Coburg, in Germany, the following account of the healing of a girl nineteen years of age, who had passed five years in bed, suffering from curvature of the spine:

"We are rejoicing over a dear girl who was for five years a helpless invalid. At the age of nine she was taken ill, and after many doctors had tried their skill and remedies, she was sent to the Children's Hospital. There they tried their best, but in vain. She came home, and in a little while went back, with no better result. She then was taken to the Alfred Hospital, where Drs. Cooke, Backhouse, and others tried their utmost to relieve and cure the girl, but failed. After some months she was given up by the doctors as incurable. Again she came home and had other physicians attending her. After a time she went to the Homœopathic Hospital, with no better results. She was then sent to the Incurable Hospital, where she lay for two years and a half. Two months ago she came home, and there upon her bed she lay waiting for the coming of her Lord.

"Last Friday, I went to see her; I had been before (her brother is a soldier), and had often chatted with her. While on my knees this time talking about Jesus, she looked in my face and said, 'Why doesn't the Lord heal me?' He heals others.' You will be sure that my heart beat with joy to hear her speak like that. I then showed clearly from God's Word that Jesus was waiting and willing to heal; also showing there need be no 'ifs' about it, for when the leper said to Jesus, 'If Thou wilt Thou canst,' the Lord once and for all showed unmistakably His will by saying, 'I will, be thou clean.' I then left her a copy of Thy Healer, which I had with me, to read. We went home with a bright ray of hope in our hearts that God was going to raise her up. We prayed through all the week, and on Wednesday night her sister and Brother Ross were at my place and told us that she had bidden her sister get her clothes made, because the Lord was going to heal her. Her sister, who had been praying and believing, set to work; they were quite sure it would be done. I sent her more copies of Thy Healer, also a pamphlet that Mrs. Harvey had sent me. We also promised that we would call the next day. The next day (yesterday) we went to visit a soldier, and while there we heard the blessed news that our dear sister had got up and was sitting in a chair, healed. We went over, and as we entered the room she cried out, 'You see the Lord has healed me,' and with tears of joy and a heart full of glory we praised the Lord. During the morning she had been reading the testimonies in the books. They strengthened her faith, and at 1:30 P. M. she cried out for her clothes; she was going to get up. The Lord had healed her! The doctors called it 'curvature of the spine,' and though they tried all the energy and skill at their command, they failed. Now the girl is talking of how she will work for the Lord."

JEWISH CONVERTS IN NEW YORK.

THE seventh annual report of the Rev. Jacob Freshman's work among the Jews of New York City shows healthy and encouraging progress. As he and his good wife are laboring without salary in faith, they have, as other kindred workers, been called to pass through hardships, but their faith has not wavered. Gifts for the work have been used strictly for the work, and only personal gifts have been applied to their personal needs. Of the $25,000 owing on the church, $15,000 have been paid, and Mr. Freshman has no doubt about the balance being cleared. One young Hebrew, converted at the mission, is now an ordained preacher among the Methodists. The name of a second, who was converted while the services were held in Cooper Union, was in the list of graduates at the Union Theological Seminary last year, and he goes as pastor of a Presbyterian church in Pennsylvania. A third will finish his course in the United Presbyterian Seminary in the spring. A fourth is at the Reformed-Episcopal Seminary in Philadelphia, and Bishop Nicholson and Dr. Hoffman speak of him in high terms. Another is at Drew Seminary. The list might be extended, but these instances show the useful and unsectarian nature of Mr. Freshman's work.

At a recent meeting in the church, an opportunity was given to new converts to speak. A newly baptized brother was so deeply affected he could hardly command language to express himself. He said: "I have not words to tell you what I feel and know of this salvation, but the Lord never had a man who will serve Him better. I intend, by His help, to prepare to preach the Gospel." He then addressed his Hebrew brethren in German.

A brother said: "When I first embraced Christianity, it was with a purely intellectual faith. It did not influence my life. But two years ago, the truth touched my heart, and now I believe with both head and heart."

A Hebrew sister testified: "For one, I can say I never became a Christian for gold. I came here a stranger, heard of Jesus, and believed in Him. Three weeks ago, I asked your prayers for an infidel Jew, and now he is willing to listen to the truth. I ask you to continue your prayers for the conversion of my parents and my brothers and sisters."

A brother who is helping in the mission work expressed his earnest intention to ever hold aloft the banner of King Jesus. He had been in a house where there were twelve Jews, and had boldly confessed Christ before them. He was roughly treated, spit upon, and abused. All this he bore patiently because he remembered that his Lord and Master had been so treated.

Freewill offerings to aid Mr. Freshman in his work may be addressed to him at 17 St. Mark's Place, New York.

THE SECOND ADVENT.

By D. L. Moody.*

A Neglected Doctrine—Satan Responsible—Its Separating Influence—Christ Will Surely Return—As He Went—Injunctions to Watch—Death not Intended—Three Great Facts Predicted—Two Fulfilled—The World to Grow Worse—Representative Translations—The Redeemed Dead to Return—Texts to Study.

IN II Timothy 3: 16 Paul declares: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness"; but there are some people who tell us, when we take up prophecy, that it is all very well to be believed, but that there is no use in one trying to understand it; these future events are things that the Church does not agree about, and it is better to let them alone, and deal only with those prophecies which have already been fulfilled. But Paul doesn't talk that way; he says: "All Scripture is profitable for doctrine." If these people are right, he ought to have said, "Some Scripture is profitable; but you can't understand the prophecies, so you had better let them alone." If God didn't mean to have us study the prophecies, He wouldn't have put them into the Bible.

I don't want to teach anything dogmatically, on my own authority; but to my mind this precious doctrine—for such I must call it—of the return of the Lord to this earth is taught in the New Testament as clearly as any other doctrine in it; yet I was in the Church fifteen or sixteen years before I ever heard a sermon on it. Now, I can see the reason for this; the devil does not want us to see this truth, for nothing would wake up the Church so much.

The moment a man takes hold of the truth that Jesus Christ is Coming Back again to receive His followers to Himself, this world loses its hold upon him. Gas stocks and water stocks and stocks in banks and railroads are of very much less consequence to him then. His heart is free, and he looks for the blessed appearing of his Lord, who, at His coming, will take him into His blessed Kingdom.

But how is He going to come? We are told how He is going to come. When those disciples stood looking up into heaven at the time of His ascension, there appeared two angels, who said unto them (Acts 1: 11): "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into Heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as you have seen Him go into heaven." How did He go up? He took His flesh and bones up with Him. "Look at me; handle me; a spirit has not flesh and bones as ye see me have. I am the identical one whom they crucified and laid in the grave. Now I am risen from the dead and am going up to heaven." He is gone, say the angels, but He will come again just as He went. An angel was sent to announce His birth of the Virgin; angels sang of His advent in Bethlehem; an angel told the women of His resurrection; and two angels told the disciples of His coming again. It is the same testimony in all these cases.

In Matt. 24 we find that He is to come unexpectedly and suddenly. In the twenty-seventh verse we have these words, "For as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth unto the west, even so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." And again in the forty-fourth verse, "Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

Some people say that means death; but the Word of God does not say it means death. Death is our enemy, but our Lord hath the keys of death; He has conquered death, hell, and the grave, and at any moment He may come and destroy our last enemy for us; so the proper state for a believer in Christ is waiting and watching for our Lord's return. In the last chapter of John there is a text that seems to settle this matter. Peter asks the question about John, "Lord, what shall this man do?" Jesus said unto him, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me. Then went this saying abroad among the brethren that that disciple should not die." They did not think that the coming of the Lord meant death; there was a great difference between these two things in their minds.

To Set Us Free From Death,

There is another mistake, as you will find if you read your Bibles carefully. Some people think that at the coming of Christ everything is to be all done up in a few minutes; but I do not so understand it. The first thing He is to do is to take His Church out of the world. He calls the Church His bride, and He says He is going to prepare a place for her. We may judge, says one, what a glorious place it will be from the length of time He is in preparing it, and when the place is ready He will come and take the Church to Himself. There was a time when I used to mourn that I should not be but now I expect to be in the millennium. Dean Alford says—and almost everybody bows to him in the matter of interpretation—that he must insist that this coming of Christ to take His Church to Himself in the clouds, is not the same event as His coming to judge the world at the last day. The deliverance of the Church is one thing, judgment is another. Now, I can't see any place in the Bible where it tells me to wait for signs of the coming of the millennium, as the return of the Jews and such like; but it tells me to look for the coming of the Lord; to watch for it; to be ready at midnight to meet Him, like those five wise virgins. The trump of God may be sounded, for anything we know, before I finish this sermon—at any rate, we are told that He will come, and at an hour when many look not for Him.

Read the first Epistle to the Thessalonians. Paul has something to say about this same thing in every chapter; indeed, I have thought this Epistle might be called

The Gospel of Christ's Coming Again.

There are three great facts foretold in the Word of God; first, that Christ should come; that has been fulfilled. Second, that the Holy Ghost should come; that was fulfilled at Pentecost, and the Church is able to testify to it by its experience of His saving grace. Third, the return of our Lord again from Heaven—for this we are told to watch and wait "till He come." Look at that account of the last hours of Christ with His disciples. What does Christ say to them? "If I go away I will send death after you to bring you to Me; I will send an angel after you?" Not at all. He says: "I will come again and receive you unto Myself." If my wife were in a foreign country, and I had a beautiful mansion all ready for her, she would a good deal rather I should come and bring her to it, than to have me send some one else to bring her. So the Church is the Lamb's wife. He has prepared a mansion for His bride, and He promises for our joy and comfort that He will come Himself, and bring us to the place He has been all this while preparing.

It is perfectly safe to take the Word of God just as we find it. If He tells us to watch, then watch! If He tells us to pray, then pray! If He tells us He will come again, wait for Him! Let the Church bow to the Word of God, rather than try to find out how these things can be. "Behold, I come quickly," said Christ. "Even so come, Lord Jesus!" should be the prayer of the church.

Take the account of the words of Christ at the communion-table. It seems to me the devil has covered up the most precious thing. "For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show forth the Lord's death Till He Come."

But most people seem to think that the Lord's table is the place for self-examination and repentance, and making good resolutions. Not at all; you spoil it that way; it is to show forth the Lord's death, and we are to keep it up till He comes.

Some people say, "I believe Christ will come on the other side of the millennium." Where do you get it? I can't find it. The Word of God nowhere tells me to watch and wait for the coming of the millennium, but for the coming of the Lord. I don't find any place where God says the world is to grow better and better, and that Christ is to have a spiritual reign on earth of a thousand years. I find that the world is to grow worse and worse, and that at length there is going to be a separation. "Two women grinding at a mill; one taken and the other left. Two men in one bed; one taken and the other left." The Church is to be translated out of the world, and of this we have two examples already, two representatives, as we might say, in Christ's Kingdom, of what is to be done for all His true believers. Enoch is the representative of the first dispensation, Elijah of the second, and as a representative of the third dispensation we have the Saviour Himself, who is entered into the heavens for us, and become the first-fruits of them that slept. We are not to wait for the great white throne judgment, but the glorified Church is set on the throne with Christ, and to help to judge the world.

"Behold I come quickly," said Christ to John, and the last prayer in the Bible is, "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Were the early Christians disappointed then? No; no man is disappointed who obeys the voice of God. The world waited for the first coming of the Lord, waited for 4,000 years, and then He came. He was here only thirty-three years, and then He went away. But He left us a promise that He would come again; and as the world watched and waited for His first coming, and did not watch in vain, so now, to them who wait for His appearing, shall He appear a second time unto their salvation. Now, let the question go round, "Am I ready to meet the Lord if He comes?" "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

There is another thought I want to call your attention to, and that is, Christ will bring

when He comes. All who have died in the Lord are to be with Him when He descends from His Father's throne (Rev. 3: 21) into the air. 1 Thess 4: 16, 17. A brief interval of time ensues between this meeting of all His saints in the air and His coming with all His saints to execute judgment upon the ungodly, to chain Satan in the bottomless pit for the thousand years, and to establish the millennial reign in great power and glory. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death has no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years." (Rev. 20: 6.)

Now, I want to give you some texts to study: When we eat the Lord's supper we show forth His death until He come. (1 Cor. 11: 26.)

We are using our talent, until He come. (Luke 19: 13.)

We are fighting the good fight of faith, until He come. (1 Tim. 6: 12-14.)

We are enduring tribulation, until He come. (2 Thess 1: 7.)

We are to be patient, until He come. (James 5: 8.)

We wait for the crown of righteousness, until He come. (2 Tim. 4: 8.)

We wait for the crown of glory, until He come. (1 Pet. 5: 4.)

We wait for reunion with departed friends, until He come. (1 Thess 4: 13-18.)

We wait for Satan to be bound, until He come. (Rev. 20: 3.)

WILL subscribers please understand that the fact of their continuing to receive the paper regularly through the mail is an intimation that their renewals have been received and credited to them on our books? It is not our custom to send receipts, the date on the label always being changed as soon after receipt of money as possible, to show the time the paper is paid to. Some subscribers who have renewed for 1889 may notice that the date on the address label has not yet been changed. This is unavoidable, owing to the large number of changes to be made; but it is being rectified as rapidly as possible. Any subscriber having renewed, and receiving a notice of expiry, may conclude it was mailed before his subscription was entered on the list, and need, therefore, pay no attention to the letter.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Bill for the Incorporation of the Nicaragua Canal Company passed the House on January 4, and was sent to the Senate, for that body to consider the changes that have been made in it in the House. The real motives for the opposition the project has encountered, could be inferred from the fact that the leaders of the opposition who have succeeded in getting amendments passed, actually voted on the final division against the bill, with their own amendments in it. It will, therefore, depend largely on the Speaker's choice of members for the conference committee whether the safety of the bill is secured. As it now stands, the United States will have the power to regulate tolls, but the clause authorizing the United States to acquire the canal by paying its cost and five per cent. interest, was not carried. On January 7 the Senate passed the joint resolution requesting the President to notify foreign Governments that any connection on their part with a project for piercing the Isthmus would be regarded by the United States with serious concern and disapproval. Attempts were made to have the resolution worded more courteously, but they failed; and, finally, the resolution passed, with only three dissentient votes—those of Senators Blackburn, Vance, and Hampton.

Important Changes in the System of Voting for Representatives in Congress are contemplated in a bill introduced in the Senate on January 8 by Senator Sherman. The bill requires the President to appoint, with the approval of the Senate, five qualified voters in each State, to be known as the Board of State Canvassers, and three voters in each Congressional district, to serve as an Electoral Board. The Electoral Board of each Congressional district shall appoint a Registrar and three judges (not all of the same political party) for each election district or precinct, to hold office for six years, and the Board may also increase the number of election precincts at its discretion. It is also directed to appoint three Commissioners of Election for each county or corresponding political division, whose duty it shall be to meet after the election, and count the votes. The Registrars are to attend to the registration before the election, and they are to have power to strike from the books the names of any person known to be dead, or disqualified by reason of conviction in court. If complaints of informalities or irregularities are made, the Board may examine the judges and amend the returns. The Electoral Board must send the returns to the State Canvassers, who may also hear complaints, and correct the returns, and who are to finally certify the result of the election. The bill also provides that any State Legislature may direct the election of Presidential Electors, to be conducted by the same machinery, and in that case the expense will be borne by the Federal Treasury. It will be seen from this brief summary of this long and complicated measure that a momentous change of principle is proposed. The bill transfers the management of the elections from the States to the Federal Government.

A Wrong to the Indians and a Source of danger to the country would be removed if Congress would settle the question of settlers' rights on the Round Valley reservation in California, by passing the bill now before it. The bill provides for the reimbursement of white settlers on the reservation, of money and labor laid out in permanent improvements on the lands before the reserve was established. At present these men remain, using the law courts to prevent the military ejecting them, and thus defying an executive order. Their presence is also exasperating to the Indians, and constitutes a trespass, which General O. O. Howard recently described as "extraordinary and disgraceful," adding that "the iniquity perpetrated upon this reservation is so glaring, so public, that it is demoralizing in its effects upon a large community." It must be said, however, that the trespassers have in many cases a just claim against the Government, which cannot be met without special legislation. With its customary disregard of public interests, Congress has kept this bill pending for a year, and still appears disinclined to deal with it.

A Grave Charge Against the Managers of the Republican party was made last week by the Voice, the leading organ of the Prohibition party. The proprietors of that journal had collected, during the recent Presidential campaign, at considerable expense and labor, the names of the leading Prohibitionists and temperance people throughout the country. They had, however, in their employ two unscrupulous men, who have now confessed that they stole proof-sheets containing these names, and other sheets containing the names of subscribers to the Voice. These were taken to the Republican Headquarters in New York and offered for sale. The two men state that Chairman Quay, Vice-Chairman Clarkson, and Mr. Dudley examined the stolen goods and purchased them on behalf of the National Committee, knowing them to be stolen. It is known that they were used, because the men whose names were on the lists received Republican campaign documents from headquarters, as they would not have done but for the theft. The Prohibition National Committee will consider what step to take, but it may be hoped that so serious a matter will not be allowed to rest. Neither can men of the standing of Quay, Clarkson, and Dudley afford to stand in the light of receivers of stolen property; and if the Prohibition committee decides against prosecution, the accused men should take steps to vindicate themselves if they are not guilty.

A Destructive Tornado Swept Through Pennsylvania on January 9, causing serious loss of life and property. The city of Reading was the greatest sufferer. About half-past 4 in the afternoon a telegram from Altoona notified Reading that a terrific storm had passed through that city, and was travelling eastward with frightful velocity. Half an hour later telegrams from Harrisburg announced the arrival of the storm there, and a quarter of an hour later it fell upon Reading with increased fury. The storm first struck the large one-story paint-shops of the Pennsylvania and Reading Company on the western side. A number of men were at work when the place was wrecked. A fire broke out immediately, in which at least five men were burned to death. From there the tornado took a path probably 100 yards wide, unroofing houses, tearing down chimneys and window-shutters and finally struck the silk-mill with tremendous force, and the large building collapsed instantly, and sank into one mass of ruins. At least 200 operatives, principally girls, went down with the wreck. All occurred in the brief space of about two minutes. How any of the inmates escaped is a mystery. A large number did manage to crawl out with comparatively slight injuries, but twenty-three dead bodies have been recovered, and many girls are still missing. In Pittsburg sixteen persons were killed by falling buildings, and other cities also report fatalities and damage. The edge of the storm also caught Brooklyn, N. Y., overturning a gasometer and doing other damage.

The Deposition of King Mwanga, the Blood-thirsty young savage who ordered the murder of Bishop Hannington, is reported in a telegram from Zanzibar, received on January 11. Unhappily the report also contains the announcement of the murder of native Christians by the Mohammedans. The deposition of the King appears to have originated in an attempt on his part to destroy his entire body-guard; his intention being to abandon them on an island in the Victoria Nyanza, where they would starve to death. The guards, who had been forewarned of the King's intentions, refused to enter the canoes which were to convey them to the island, and, returning to the capital, made an attack on Mwanga's palace. The King fled to escape the fury of the guards, and his brother, Kiwewa, was enthroned in his stead. Kiwewa appointed Christians to the principal offices. This enraged the Arabs, who murdered many of the Christian officials and replaced them by Mohammedans. The dispatch says that the Arabs burned the English and French mission stations, and killed many of the converts to Christianity. Many letters for Emin Bey and Henry M. Stanley were destroyed by the burning of the missionary stations. The missionaries have reached Usamboco in safety. The Msalala dépôt is safe. Mwanga is a prisoner at Magu. He has appealed to the English missionaries for assistance. The Arabs have written to Missionary Mackay, exulting in their triumph and prophesying the extinction of all the mission stations in Central Africa in revenge for England's anti-slavery policy. They have proclaimed Uganda a Mohammedan kingdom.

The Death of Signor Gavazzi, the Famous Anti-Papal orator, was announced on January 11. He was in his eightieth year. He first came into prominence when, as an Italian monk, he denounced the corruption in the papal court of Gregory XVI., for which he was thrown into prison and kept there until the death of the Pope. He took an active part in the revolution of 1848, when he had charge of the hospital service, and did much valuable work. He was with Garibaldi in the Neapolitan campaign of 1860. But it was after his conversion to Protestantism that Gavazzi's fame became world-wide. He commenced a tour of Europe, lecturing everywhere against the Papacy, exposing its errors, its wickedness and corruption. His eloquence was marvellous. As an orator he held his audiences spell-bound and kindled them into enthusiasm. His orations were intensely patriotic, and he more than any one else had the merit of enlisting European sympathy in the cause of Italian unity. He paid several visits to the United States, and was well received here on each occasion.

The Uncalled-for Intervention of Germany in the affairs of Samoa has had the result, so far, which European nations are becoming accustomed to when they meddle in affairs of distant peoples. In endeavoring to force an unpopular ruler on Samoa, the Germans have met with a reverse. They have had a skirmish with Mataafa's followers, whom the Germans call "rebels." It appears that the German gunboats sent a party of men ashore to demand indemnity for insults to the German flag, and also the disarming of the insurgents. While the party were on their way to the Vailele plantation they were suddenly attacked by "the rebels," led by an American named Klein. The gunboats then landed more men, who succeeded in repelling the natives and destroying some of their villages. One German lieutenant and fifteen men were killed, and two lieutenants and thirty-six men were wounded. Other accounts state that the Germans retired to Vailele, and held it against the greatest odds until reinforced. Mataafa's loss was ten killed and thirty wounded.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal were received last week to the amount of $13.50. They were from: S. P. A., $5; London, Ont., Can., $1; Poughkeepsie, N. Y., $1; Providence, R. I., $1; N. Y. City, $1; Burlington Junction, Mo., $1; Brooklyn, N. Y., $1; Vassalboro, Me., $1; Franklin Park, N. Y., $1.50.

The Railroad Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association appears likely to aid in solving the Labor Question, in addition to doing its specific work for the spiritual benefit of the men. At the anniversary held on January 8, in the rooms of the Association in New York, Messrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Chauncey M. Depew, Austin Corbin, and other railroad magnates testified to the help the Association had been in bringing employers and employed into closer touch and sympathy, with mutual benefit. Mr. Vanderbilt was especially enthusiastic, and spoke in congratulatory terms of the extension of the movement. He said that during the year branches had been established in six new points in the country, making a total of ninety-three principal railroad points where branches are now in active operation, in addition to which branches are about to be established at two more places, and two railroad companies are considering the proposition to establish the work along their lines. There are over 5,000 in daily attendance at all the railroad branch associations in the country, a large increase upon the statistics of the previous year.

The Exclusion From Calvary Cemetery of the body of one of Dr. McGlynn's friends appears to be legal. A civil suit was tried in New York last week, to compel the trustees of the cemetery to allow the interment of a man who died suddenly at one of the excommunicated priest's meetings. He owned a lot in Calvary Cemetery, but when the family took his body there for interment, the authorities would not permit it to be brought inside the grounds. It was, therefore, temporarily deposited in a vault at Greenwood, until the court was appealed to on the question. Judge Beach, of the Supreme Court, last week handed down his decision, dismissing the appeal. He said that any person purchasing a lot in a denominational cemetery, did so with the tacit understanding that it was for the burial of persons in communion with the Church with which the cemetery is identified. Also, that the authorities of the Church, and not a civil court, are competent to decide whether the person died in communion with the Church. He therefore declined to interfere in the case. This decision concerns all the owners of lots in denominational cemeteries. Happily, it applies only to the body. Though that may be excluded from the resting-place purchased for it, no Church authority can exclude the soul that has trusted in Jesus from the mansion He has prepared. (John 14:2.)

A Nobleman Hungry and in Rags Was found in Philadelphia on January 5. He came to this country in 1887, from Germany, where his father and family still live on the ancestral estate at Eichelz, near the town of Brechelshof. When he was twenty-five years old he wanted to enter the army, or to have a university education, but both were refused him. His father wished him to live at home and superintend the estates, which are of considerable extent. The young man was resolute, and his father equally determined. Finally there was a bitter quarrel, in which angry words were used on both sides. The son, feeling himself humiliated, left his home and came to America. He succeeded in obtaining employment in New York, and for a few weeks did well. He lost his position, however, through sickness, but obtained another in Washington, D. C., which he also lost for the same cause. Recovering, he took the first place available, which was that of a coachman, in Baltimore, Md. Again he was prostrated by sickness, and was so long regaining strength that all his money was exhausted, and every article of value he possessed was disposed of. He went to Philadelphia in utter destitution to look for work. There he was recognized by a lady who held a large sum of money which had been sent to her by his family for his use, if she could find him. The man was soon fed and clothed, and went to Washington with her. He said that he would not have accepted his father's money if he had not been driven to do so by want. That is the case of many who have wandered away from God. Only when convinced of their own inability to save themselves will they accept the salvation God has provided. (Isa. 26:16.)

The Sudden Reappearance of a Supposed dead man has astonished the citizens of Elberton, Ga. On the night of the Presidential election of 1876, a colored man was seized by a band of white men and told to prepare for death. They bound him, and started off several miles to Broad River, which at Hillyer's Bluff is deep and swift. So far as the public knew, the colored man had been thrown into the river. His people mourned him as dead, and his pastor preached a funeral sermon for him. The truth now appears to be that when the party reached the bluff the negro was in such absolute terror that some of the party took pity on him and worked for his rescue. It was finally agreed that if he would leave the country at once and forever, concealing his identity wherever he went, he would be permitted to go. To these terms he quickly assented. He was taken across the river and set at liberty. He went from there to Athens, where he settled and prospered, concealing his identity, and never going near the place where he would have been recognized. He has now revealed himself, and there is much surprise that he could have remained unknown for twelve years. Though those who, through Christ, are saved from eternal death are not required to conceal their identity, He expects that they shall quit their old lives and live a life separate from the world, with new aims, hopes, and joys. (II Cor. 6:17.)

An Italian's Unsuccessful Appeal to the police for the possession of a wife, is reported from Fall River, Mass. On January 9 an excited man, speaking broken English, rushed wildly into the police station and demanded that the marshal help him to recover his wife. Some time was required to get the man calm enough to give an intelligible account of his trouble. It was eventually found that he came from Providence to search for his wife, who had been seen at Fall River. He had found the locality in which she was living, and wanted the marshal to send a policeman with him, to compel her to return with him. "Have you any proof that she is your wife?" asked the marshal. The Italian said he had, and produced a paper, which, on being examined, proved to be a marriage license, issued two years ago by the city clerk of Providence, for which the Italian had paid fifty cents. The man had never married the woman, and appeared to have taken no steps toward marriage beyond procuring the license, until the woman was courted and married by another man. Then he asserted his claim, supposing that the license constituted a marriage. There is reason to fear that many persons are making a similar mistake in spiritual matters. Those who imagine that baptism and church membership constitute them members of Christ's bride, though they have not been born again, are under a grievous delusion. (Matt. 7:21-23.)

An Attempt to Save a Newborn Babe from a bull-dog involved a physician in Boston in severe injuries recently. The doctor told his story in the Supreme Court on January 10, when he sued the mother of the babe, who is also the owner of the dog, for compensation. It appears that the doctor laid the babe on the bed, after its birth, while he performed some offices for the mother. As he did so, a large bull-dog sprang from a corner of the room and attempted to seize the child. The doctor snatched up the child and placed it in the arms of a nurse. The animal sprang at the woman and tried to tear the child from her, but the doctor dragged him off and pushed the woman out of the room. Then the savage animal attacked him, biting him severely in the arm and leg. The doctor was overpowered for a minute and fell to the floor, but, recovering himself, he fought the dog, rolling over and over with him in a life and death struggle. Eventually he obtained a firm grasp of the beast's throat and with a supreme effort flung him through the window. The astonishing feature of the case is that the mother should have had so ferocious an animal in proximity to her helpless offspring, and that the man who saved her child at the risk of his life should have had to sue her for compensation. Though few parents would be so heedless of their children's safety, there are many who expose them to the attacks of the great enemy of souls and are similarly ungrateful toward Him who died to rescue the whole human race, including their "darling, from the power of the dog." (Ps. 22:20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has begun meetings in Keene, N. H. Dr. Pentecost has been conducting a series of meetings in Kelvinside, Glasgow.

The Chicago Theological Seminary began the new year with a gift of $350,000.

Major Whittle, aided by his son, has had a most successful term of gospel effort at Ballymena, Ireland.

A correspondent in Croton, Mich., desires us to call the attention of evangelists to that town. A cordial welcome and a promising field of labor, he says, may be found there.

The Rev. Thos. Harrison is conducting meetings in the Beekman Hill Methodist Church, East Fiftieth Street, New York. The church is crowded at every meeting, and much good is being done.

A new and commodious building, known as "The Christian Institute," has been dedicated in Toronto. It was erected by William Gooderham, Esq., and is intended to be a home for Bible study.

Letters from Jerusalem state that the welcome rain has come, and the long drought, which had produced a water famine, is now over. There have been snow-storms there, and the cold is unprecedented.

The pastors of the Evangelical German churches of this city have formed a German Evangelical Alliance "to maintain and defend the civil and religious liberty of this country wherever it seems to be in danger."

Mr. Ira D. Sankey has made an evangelistic tour through the midland counties of England. At Hemel Hempstead, an immense concourse of people assembled, and at other places his meetings were crowded. He is now on his way back to America.

Mr. D. L. Moody began his labors in San Francisco, Cal., December 30. He is accompanied by a band of gospel singers. A tabernacle has been built, capable of seating five thousand people, with inquiry-rooms and every facility for carrying on a successful work.

Messrs. Crossley and Hunter are meeting with remarkable success in their Canadian work. At Brandon fully five hundred persons made a confession of faith as the result of their meetings. Among the congregations were families who had come forty miles to attend.

The students in the Yale Theological Seminary are engaging in active evangelistic work in co-operation with City Missionary Mossman. They have thoroughly canvassed New Haven from house to house for an organized effort. Messrs. Stagg and Corbin, the noted base-ball players, lead in the movement.

An evangelist of the Methodist Protestant Church, who has labored in Washington, D. C., and many places in Pennsylvania, is now in New York, and will be glad to help in evangelistic work in any city of the State during the next few months. Address, J. P., care of Rev. John Dooley, Broome Street Tabernacle, New York.

Subscriptions for the erection of the Adoniram Judson Memorial Church in New York have flowed in freely since the project was started. Dr. Edward Judson proposes to erect the church in Thompson Street, near Washington Square, a neglected quarter of the city. He proposes to make it a mission church, with home comforts for needy persons.

"Gipsy Smith," an English evangelist, formerly in the Salvation Army, is about to pay a visit to this country for an evangelistic tour. He holds letters of recommendation from the Revs. C. Garrett, H. J. Pope, S. F. Collier, and other Methodist ministers, and Dr. J. O. Keen, President of the Bible Christian Conference. Letters for him may be addressed to this office.

Volume XI., of the Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1888, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price, $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885, and 1887 are also for sale. We can also furnish complete volumes for 1884, 1885, and 1888, unbound, price $1.50, including postage.

EYES RIGHT!

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee." Prov. 4:25.

Directions for Keeping the Members of the Body—Persons Living as if in Sleep—Others Staring Around—Have a Way, and Let it be Straight—I. Let Christ be Your Way—Seek to Have Him—To Know Him—To Obey Him—To be Like Him—To Win Souls for Him—II. Set Your Eyes on Him—To Know the Way of Life—Avoid Retrospection—And Introspection—And Much Circumspection—Looking with the Eyelids—III. Look to Christ Alone—Not to Secondary Aims—Look Till Faith Comes.

THESE words occur in a passage wherein the wise man exhorts us to take care of all parts of our nature, which he indicates by members of the body. "Keep thy heart," says he, "with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life. Put away from thee a froward mouth, and perverse lips put far from thee. Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee. Ponder the path of thy feet, and let all thy ways be established. Turn not to the right hand nor to the left: remove thy foot from evil." It is clear that every part of our nature needs to be carefully watched, lest in any way it should become the cause of sin. Any one member or faculty is readily able to defile all the rest, and, therefore, with care. We have selected for our meditation the verse which deals with the eye. These windows of light need to be watched in their incomings, lest that which we take into our soul should be darkness rather than light; and they need to be watched in their outgoing, lest the glances of the eye should be full of iniquity, or should suggest foolish thoughts. Hence, the wise man advises, "Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee." Have eyes, and use them. Using them, take care to use them honestly.

Some persons are always as if they were asleep. They go through the world mooning about, seeing nothing, or seeing men as if they were trees, with a sight which is not sight, but blindness hidden. The shadows of this transient life impress them, and that is all: they have never awakened yet to the true life and its solemn realities. They have never seen anything in very truth; for and of faith they have none. That which is apart from faith is not visible to the soul, however clear it may be to the eye. We have thousands around us who need to be startled out of that slumber in which they see the fabrics of their dreams, and the unsubstantial fancies of the hour. They say, "We see;" but scales are on their eyes.

Many others are somewhat awake mentally, but they are not looking right on, neither do their eyelids look straight before them. They are staring about them, star-gazing, wondering what will be seen next: always ready, like the Athenians, to hear and see some new thing. They have never yet discovered that this life is a preface to a life of diviner mould. They do not regard the present as the lowly porch of the glorious edifice of the future. They have not thought that time is but a thing of small account, save that it is linked with the endless ages; and so they seek after this, and then after that, and then after the other; and always after that which is too poor, too trifling, to be the object of a mind capable of fellowship with God. To beings who lead such purposeless lives we would address the words of the wise man, "Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee." Have something to do, and do it. Have something to live for, and live for it. Get to know the right way, and, knowing the right way, keep to it with full purpose of heart and concentration of faculty.

If a man is to let his eyes look right on, and his eyelids straight before him, then he is to have a way, and that way is

and in that straight way he is to persevere. You cannot see to the end of a crooked way. You can only see a small part of a way that twists and winds. Choose, then, a direct path which has an end which you dare think of and look upon. Some men's lives are such that they dare not think of what the end of them must be. They would not long pursue their present track if they were forced to gaze into that dread abyss, which is the only possible close of an evil course. The way of transgressors is hard in itself, but it is hardest of all when we behold their dreadful end.

Every wise man will conclude that the best way for a man is the way which God has made for him. He that made us knows what He made us for, and He knows by what means we may best arrive at that end. According to divine teaching, as gracious as it is certain, we learn that the way of eternal life is Jesus Christ. Christ himself says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life"; and he that would pursue life after a right fashion must look to Jesus, and must continue looking unto Jesus, not only as the author, but as the finisher of his faith. It shall be to him a golden rule of life, when he has chosen Christ to be his way, to let his eyes look right on, and his eyelids straight before him. He need not be afraid to contemplate the end of that way, for the end of the way of Christ is life and glory with Christ for ever. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is."

A friend said to me the other day, "How happy are we to know that whatever happens to us in this life it is well!" "Yes," I added, "and to know that if this life ends, it is equally well, or better." With all my heart I invite any who have never yet begun to live after a right fashion, to take Christ to be the way of life to them; and then I entreat them to let their eyes look straight on, and their eyelids straight before them, and to follow Jesus without giving a glance either to the right hand or to the left, till it shall be said of them, even in glory, "These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth."

I shall make my earnest appeals to the heart and conscience by beginning with this first exhortation;

Let Christ be Your Way.

If Christ be your way, you will begin first to seek to have Christ. "How shall I have Him?" says one. Dost thou desire Him? Wilt thou accept Him? He is thine. The act of accepting Christ secures Christ to us; for the Father freely gives Him to all who freely accept Him. Some are troubled through ignorant and unbelieving fears, and are saying, "I wish I could lay hold on Jesus! I wish I knew that Christ was mine!" Art thou willing to have Him? Who made thee willing? Dost thou desire Him? Who made thee desire Him? Who but the Spirit of the Lord? Wilt thou now take Jesus to be thy Saviour, to save thee from thy sin? Then depend on it, He is thine. Let your eyes look right on, and your eyelids straight before you, till you find Him. Look nowhere else but to Him and after Him. Shut yourself up in your room; determine not to come out again until you have Him, and it shall not be long before you find Him. Concentrating all your gaze upon the Crucified, light shall come from Him, causing the scales to fall from your eyes, and you shall see Him, even you that could not see; and you shall cry in delight, "He is mine, He is mine." Remember how David said to his son, "If thou seek Him, He will be found of Thee."

When you have Christ, the next business of your life must be to know Christ. Seek to know more of Him, to know Him better, to know Him more practically, to know Him more assuredly. "That I may know Him," said the apostle, after he had been a believer in Him for fifteen years. That same man of God speaks of "the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge," even his knowledge, which was of the fullest sort; so that he meant to go on learning more and more of Christ, and he did not count himself to have attained. Christian men and women, you do not know your great Master yet. Here have some of us been nearly forty years in His service, and yet we could not describe Him to our own satisfaction. In this matter let your eyes look right on, and your eyelids straight before you.

When you come to know somewhat of what He is, then go on

To Obey Christ.

Is there anything that He has bidden you do? Do it. Some Christians have never yet been baptized: how will they answer for wilful neglect of a known duty? Others have been Christians for years, and yet have never communed at the Lord's table. Jesus said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." Do they keep His commandments? It was His dying request, "This do in remembrance of me," and yet they will not fulfil it. Even such a tender request they slight, as though it were of no importance whatever, as if their Lord was a mere nobody whose wishes might well be overlooked. What shall I say of many of the biddings of our holy gospel, many of those sweet precepts which are to be used in the family, and in the business, and in the field? What forgetfulness there is of them! What said the blessed Virgin to those who were at the feast? Note the words, "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." It was well spoken of the favored mother, and it remains as a golden precept for us all—"Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." Make no reserve, exercise no choice, but obey His command. When you know what He commands, do not hesitate, question, or try to avoid it, but, "do it": do it at once, do it heartily, do it cheerfully, do it to the full.

That being attended to, remember, if Christ be your way, you have further to not only to do as He did, but to be as He was, for "as He was, so are we in this world." What a man does is important, but what a man is is all-important. The ring of the metal is something, but if its ring could be imitated by a base coin, it would be nothing. It is, after all, the substance of the metal that decides its value. "As we have born the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly"; and we must begin to bear that heavenly image even now. This, therefore, we must aim at, though as yet we have not attained it. Here is something to be thought of very carefully, and I charge you, by the Holy Ghost, let your eyes look right on, and your eyelids straight before you, that you may be transformed from glory to glory into the image of the Lord. God grant that it may be so with every one of us!

Now, supposing that we have attended to all this, if Christ is our way, and our model, there is something more, namely, that we seek to glorify Christ, and labor to win others to Him. Here is a grand Field for all Our Energies.

Are not some of you indifferent as to whether your fellow-men are lost or saved? Have not some of you, in your families, come to this pass—that you see your brother an infidel, your sister frivolous, your parents godless, and yet it does not fret you? I think that if I had a godless relative, it would break my night's rest, not now and then, but always. A brother, a father, a child, unsaved! What mean ye by taking your ease? We need men and women who live to convert others to Christ. The minister had better quit his pulpit if it be not his one burning desire to bring hearts to Jesus' feet. If a divine impulse be not upon him, driving him to seek the souls of men, let him go elsewhere with his windy periods. Professors have little right to be in Christ's Church, unless they are passionately in earnest to increase His kingdom by the salvation of their fellow-men. O my brothers and sisters, on whom is the blood-mark of redemption, I charge you concerning this matter to "let your eyes look right on, and let your eyelids look straight before you"!

II. Following the text again, only working it a little differently, the second exhortation is,

Set Your Eyes on Him

as your way. First, that you may know the way of life, let your eyes be fixed on Him. Soul, art thou in the dark? Kneel down and pray, and look Christ-ward. Saint, art thou bewildered? Go by the way of the Cross, the way of the Crucified, for that is the true and sure path. Sinner, art thou burdened? Wouldst thou be rid of thy burden? Run Christward. Any direction given thee to go anywhere else will misdirect thee. I say not to anyone I meet to-night, "Go to the wicket-gate." Neither will I bid you look to any light within, and run that way. My only direction is, "Go to Jesus!" "To Christ!" "To Christ!" "To Christ!" That is the sole inscription upon every finger-post of the road to heaven. Keep to the King's highway.

Look alone to Jesus, and do this to keep your spirits up. Some men's eyes do not look right on, and their eyelids do not look straight before them, for upon that part of the road which they have traversed, and grow content with that which they have already attained. They live in retrospection. When you begin to look back at what you have done, and rub your hands, and say with self-satisfaction, "I remember when I did right well," wisdom warns you that this is not the right kind of look. What have you to look back upon? Poor, weak creature! Forget that which is behind, and press forward to something better and higher.

Some spend much of their time in what is called introspection. Now introspection, like retrospection, is a useful thing in a measure; but it can readily be overdone, and then it breeds morbid emotions, and creates despair. Some are always looking into their own feelings. A healthy man hardly knows whether he has a stomach or a liver; it is your sickly man who grows more sickly by the study of his inward complaints. Too many wound themselves by Studying Themselves.

Every morning they think of what they should feel: all day long they dwell upon what they are not feeling; and at night they make diligent search for what they have been feeling. It looks to me like shutting up your shop, and then living in the counting-house, taking account of what is not sold. Small profits will be made in this way. I remember Mr. Moody saying that a looking-glass was a capital thing to show you the spots on your face; but you could not wash in a looking-glass. You want something very different when you would make your face clean. So let your eyes look right on. Forget yourself, and think only of Christ.

Some not only unduly practice retrospection and introspection, but they carry much too far a sort of circumspection. They look all around them: they look upon their past, and their present, and their fears, and their doubts, and from all these things they judge their condition, and decide their state of mind. You recollect Peter. He cried to his Lord, "Bid me come unto Thee on the water." He receives permission. Down the side of the boat goes Peter. To his intense surprise he is standing on a wave. Peter had never done such a thing before in his life as walk on the water. He might have kept on standing on the wave, and he might have walked all the way to Jesus, if he had kept his eyes on his Master until he reached Him. The waters would have borne him up as well as a granite pavement; but Peter began to look at the billows, and he listened to the howling of the wind, and then to the beating of his own heart; and down he went; and then he had to cry to his Master. "Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee": thou canst walk the waters all the way to the golden shore, if thou canst but stop thine eyes to all things else.

Surely I may use the text as an illustration of that closing of the eyes. "Let thine eyes look right on." "I understand that," says one, "for I trust. But you cannot Look With Your Eyelids."

What can that mean? Remember that you can shut your eyes with your eyelids to a great many things, and so cease to see them; and in the matter of faith-sight a great many things are best not seen. So, when you would otherwise see the danger, and all the difficulties and the doubts, do not look with your eyes, but look with your eyelids. Not to look at the difficulties at all is all the look they deserve. Let your eyelids shut out the view which would create distrust. Do not see, do not feel, "only believe." Draw down the blinds, and see nothing, know nothing, believe nothing, but the living word of the living Saviour. "Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee."

III. But my time has almost expired, and I have only to lay emphasis on one more matter. Let your eyes distinctly and directly

Look to Christ Alone.

I have gone over this before, but I need to hammer at it again, in order to clench the nail. Look not to any human guide, but look to Christ Jesus alone. We have no faith in priests; but it is a very easy thing to fix your faith upon a minister, and hear what he says, and believe it because he says it. I charge you, believe nothing that I tell you if it cannot be supported by the Word of God. I am content to stand or to fall by this: "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, there is no light in them." I will quote the authority of no other book, whoever may have composed it; no ancient book, let it belong even to the earliest days of the Church. This one inspired volume is the text-book of our religion. Follow Holy Scripture, and you have an infallible chart. Our Lord Jesus Christ is the one apostle and high priest of our profession; follow Him.

Again, look not to any secondary aims. Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness. In seeking Christ, make no bargain with gain or reputation; be content to lose all gold and all honor if you may but win Christ. To follow religion for pelf would be a mean act of hypocrisy, and to leave it for the same reason is equally vile. Let your eyes be fixed on following your Lord, and as to any worldly consequences, bring your eyelids into use, keep them fast closed, and go right on in implicit obedience to your Lord.

And, lastly, take care that you continue gazing upon Christ until you have faith in Him. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Go on hearing the Word of God till faith come thereby. Do you ask me

How Faith Comes?

It is the gift of God, but it usually comes in a certain way. Thinking of Jesus, and meditating upon Jesus, will breed faith in Jesus. I was struck with what one said the other day of a certain preacher. The hearer was in deep concern of soul, and the minister preached a very pretty sermon indeed, decorated abundantly with word-painting. I scarcely know any brother who can paint so daintily as this good minister can; but this poor soul, under a sense of sin, said, "There was too much landscape, sir. I did not want landscape; I wanted salvation." Dear friend, never crave word-painting when you attend a sermon; but crave Christ. You must have Christ to be your own by faith, or you are a lost man. When I was seeking the Saviour I remember hearing a very good doctrinal sermon; but when it was over I longed to tell the minister that there was a poor lad there who wanted to know how he could be saved. How I wished he had given half a minute to that subject!

I am not here to give you intellectual treats: my eyes look right on to your salvation. Oh that yours may look that way! Go after Christ, dear friend. Seek after Christ with your whole heart and soul. Feel that the one thing you must have is to be reconciled to God by the death of His Son. Keep on with that cry, "None but Christ; none but Christ." Then you will soon find Him. "Let your eyes look right on, and let your eyelids look straight before you," and you shall see the Lord of grace appearing to you through the mist and through the cloud, that self-same Saviour who stands in the midst of us even now, and cries, "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE VICAR'S IDEA OF AN ANGEL.*

A CHILD said to him one day, "Please, Mr. Hawker, did you ever see an angel?" "Margaret," said the vicar, solemnly, as he took one of the child's hands in his palm, "there came to this door, one day, a poor man. He was in rags. Whence he came I know not. We gave him bread. There was something mysterious, wonderful, unearthly, in his face. And I watched him as he went away. Look, Margaret! do you see that hill all gold and crimson with gorse and heather? He went that way. I saw him go up through the gold and crimson, up, still upwards, to where the blue sky seems to touch the top of the hill, and there I lost sight of him all at once. I saw him no more; but I thought of the words, 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.'"

A Plea For a Captain.

In 1853 a vessel laden with copper-ore was wrecked in the bay below Morwenstow church. The ore was recovered and carried up the cliff on the backs of donkeys; but it was a tedious process and occupied two or three months. . . . All that time the agent for the firm which owned the vessel lived in the vicarage and was entertained royally. When everything had been recovered and he was about to depart, he thanked the vicar for his great kindness, and begged to know, on behalf of the firm, if there was anything he could do, or give him, which would be acceptable as some recognition of his kindness.

"No," answered the vicar, "Nothing; God will repay me."

The agent again, and in more forcible terms, assured him that the firm would not be happy unless they could make him some acknowledgment for his services and hospitality out of the common way.

"Then I will ask one thing," said the vicar: "Give the captain another ship."

The agent hesitated, and then said that what he asked was an impossibility. The firm had no ships which were not already provided with captains. They could not in justice displace one of them to install in his room the captain of the wrecked ship.

"Never mind," said Mr. Hawker; "this is the only thing I ask of you, and this is refused me."

A few days afterward, the agent came to inform him that the firm purposed laying the keel of a new vessel, and that the captain for whom he pleaded should be appointed to her.

The ship was built, and was named Morwenstow. She now sails to and fro along the coast, and whenever she passes Morwenstow, runs up a flag, as a mark of deference to the spot whence she derives her name.

A Speaker Confused.

Archdeacon, afterward Bishop, Wilberforce came to Morwenstow to advocate the cause of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and met Mr. Hawker. "Look here," said the archdeacon, "I have to speak at the meeting at Stratton to-night, and I am told that there is a certain Mr. Knight who will be on the platform and is a wearyful speaker. I have not much time to spare. Is it possible, by a hint, to reduce him to reasonable limits?"

"Not in the least," said the vicar; "he is impervious to hints."

"Can he not be prevented from rising to address the meeting?"

"That is impossible: he is irrepressible."

"Then what is to be done?" asked the archdeacon, blankly.

"Leave him to me: he will not trouble you."

At the meeting a crowd gathered to hear the famous archdeacon. Mr. Knight was on the platform, waiting his opportunity to rise. "O Knight," whispered Mr. Hawker, who was in the chair, "I have left my watch at home; will you lend me yours for timing the speeches?"

With some hesitation Mr. Knight pulled his gold watch, with bunch of seals attached, from his fob and gave it to the vicar. Presently Mr. Knight was on his feet to make a speech. Now, the old gentleman was accustomed, when addressing a public audience, to swing his bunch of seals round and round in his left hand. Directly he began his oration, his hand went instinctively to his fob in quest of the bunch; it was not there. He stammered, and felt again, floundered in his speech, and, after a few feeble efforts to recover himself and find his bunch of seals, sat down red, perspiring, and angry.

MR. RUSSELL B. HARRISON, Son of the President-Elect.

MONTANA naturally does not join the clamor for recognition in the coming President's political family which is now being raised from many States. There are so many claims stronger than hers that she does not look for recognition. She has, however, a friend in one of her prominent citizens, whom nature has placed very much nearer to the President-elect than members of his Cabinet will be. His son, Russell B. Harrison, is one of the best known citizens of Helena, and an enthusiastic believer in the excellence and future prosperity of the Territory.

It is about ten years since Mr. Harrison settled in Montana. He has worked his way up to be chief of a large stock-farm, and is reputed to be one of the wealthiest men in his section. He is no stranger to Washington society. During his father's term as Senator, young Mr. Harrison, with his sister (whose portrait appeared in this journal on December 13), took an active part in the social gatherings in the Harrison home, and formed friendships which will now, doubtless, be renewed with mutual pleasure. One result of much importance personally to the young man, had its origin in that period. He became acquainted with Miss Saunders, daughter of Alvin Saunders, Senator from Nebraska. This acquaintance developed into a love affair, and Miss Saunders is now Mrs. Russell B. Harrison. It is expected that she, with her husband's sister, Mrs. McKee, will aid "the First Lady of the Land" in making the White House receptions attractive.

NATIVE STUDENTS AT DELHI.

(See Illustration.)

THE growing conviction, which experience confirms, that Christian work in heathen lands can have no more successful aid than that of native converts, is being practically tested in India. The Baptist Missionary Society has established a Missionary Training Institute in the ancient city of Delhi, and is encouraged by its success. On this page is an engraving from a photograph of the young men who, having been converted to Christianity, are now being trained for Christian work among their countrymen. The Rev. Stephen S. Thomas adds to the value of the picture by the following sketch of the principal characters in the group: "I will not attempt to describe each man, but I would like to single out the three whom the Conference will be asked to accept this year as evangelists, and also our mission doctor.

"Saul David, the doctor, stands in the centre of the back row. Despite his somewhat ferocious countenance, he is a really good fellow, doing a good work. He was brought up in our school, afterwards studied at the Agra Medical School, and, since then, in addition to his dispensary work, has read in the training classes with a view to becoming a more efficient preacher. He is an active deacon of the church.

"Silas, a deacon's son, was a school teacher, but was rightly thought by Mr. Guyton to be capable of undertaking evangelistic work.

"Masih Charan comes of a steady, solid—some would say stolid—Christian family, the best known member of which is Ibrahim, pastor of Sabzi Mandi. The influence of such a family is extremely valuable amongst a people who are by nature so unstable. Masih Charan has all the family characteristics. He has done well in his examinations, not because he is brilliant, but because he is plodding.

"Lal Mahammad, as his name suggests, is a convert from Mohammedanism, sent here by Mr. Price from Danapur. He is undoubtedly the cleverest, ablest, and best educated student we have, and, therefore, the one of the three about whom I have the greatest hopes and greatest fears. His sermons are often extremely good, though his language is sometimes too fine for our poor people to understand. These brethren preach in turn on Sunday evenings, and, until lately, when through extra pressure of work I have had no time for preparation, I have regularly taken them to bazaar preaching, and some who heard have been saved."

LOTTIE MOWATT'S REFUGE.

AT the window of a hotel in the outskirts of a large city, a lady of some three-and-twenty years stood one cold winter afternoon, watching the descending snow-flakes. The hotel stood near a large park, across one corner of which the lady could see the chimneys of the grand old mansion of Colonel Mowatt.

"Now I am here," she said, in soliloquy, "I am no nearer the old, real home than I was before. It is no home for me. I do not know what to do." After a few moments of consideration, she said, "Yes, that is best; I will send to Grace." She sat down and wrote a short note, which she dispatched by a messenger.

Grace Vernon lived about a mile from the hotel, but the messenger had to retrace his steps, for Grace was at Colonel Mowatt's house, one of a large party celebrating the coming of age of the Colonel's son. Grace's lover was there, too; a young Scotchman, named Alec Campbell, who during his American tour had been fascinated by Grace's beauty, and on closer acquaintance loved her for the beauty and depth of her Christian character.

It was a curious coincidence that, on that day of all others, the letter which the messenger bore to Grace Vernon should have found her at Col. Mowatt's house. She had once been a frequent guest there, but until that day she had not entered it for three years. She and the Colonel had quarrelled, and words had been spoken on both sides that it was difficult to forgive or forget. Every one knew the cause. Charlotte Mowatt, the Colonel's only daughter and Grace Vernon's dearest friend, had brought disgrace on the family name, and while scandal was busy with her sin, and the Colonel in mortification and anger struck her name out of the record in the family Bible and declared that he no longer regarded her as his daughter, Grace Vernon had remained true to her friend, and had dared to tell the Colonel himself that, instead of shutting his doors against her, he ought to follow and reclaim her. Other people had thought Grace in the wrong. Alec Campbell, however, with a lover's partiality, declared, when he heard the story, as he did that very day, from another of Col. Mowatt's guests, that Grace was right, and the world would be better if the erring had more of such faithful friends.

He was chatting with some of his male friends near a window, when, to his amazement, he saw Grace walk quickly past through the snow, with no umbrella, and a set look of determination on her face. In a moment he encased himself in his overcoat, and snatching up his Glengarry cap and an umbrella, was striding rapidly after her.

"Why are you leaving us, Grace?" he asked as he overtook her and held the umbrella over her. "What has happened?"

"It is too long a story to tell you now. I will tell you some other time," Grace said, hurrying on. "Please do not come with me."

"I cannot allow you to walk alone on such a day as this. I will not be inquisitive, but I must come with you."

Grace silently acquiesced, but she walked steadily on, her thoughts apparently rendering her oblivious of his presence. Alec bore it as long as he could, speculating, as he walked, on the cause of the girl's strange demeanor. At last he said: "Forgive me for speaking of it. I have heard Miss Mowatt's story. Has your present business anything to do with it?"

"It has," said Grace, curtly. "Lottie was my dearest friend, and though every one in the world spoke ill of her, I would love her still in spite of her sin and shame."

"You will hear no reproach from my lips," said Alec; "I think you acted nobly and like a true Christian in that matter."

Grace made no reply in words, but she took one of her hands from the pocket of her ulster, and put it gently on Alec's arm. After a minute she said: "I am going to her." She referred to a scrap of paper in her pocket, and looked around. She said: "There is the place, that hotel. Lottie is there. She sent a boy just now with a note telling me of her being there, and begging me to come to her at once."

"Go you to her room, then," said Alec; "I will wait for you in the lobby."

He waited two hours, and then Grace came back. "I can do nothing," she said. "Lottie is in deep sorrow and remorse, but she will not go home unless she is assured of a welcome, and I know her father would not receive her."

"Would she allow me to see her?" asked Alec. "I do not know, and I do not see that you could do any good; but I will ask her, if you like."

"Do so, please; I wish to see her." Grace returned, and came back with permission for Alec to visit the wanderer. He entered the room, and greeted the lady respectfully.

"I suppose Grace has told you who I am, Miss Mowatt," he said. "I know your story and your present difficulty. I would not have intruded, but that perhaps I, of all men, may be best able to solve it. Grace has made me happy by promising to marry me in a few weeks, and we are going to our home in Scotland. Will you allow me, in her name, to offer you a share of it?"

"Ah, sir, you do not know me, or the life I have been living, or you would not make such an offer."

"Excuse me, madam, it is because I do know, and because, speaking with all humility, I am a follower of Jesus, that I make that offer, and most earnestly beg you to accept it. It is too sudden for you to decide at once, perhaps, but I am going to leave you and Grace alone together now; and I think, when she has talked to you, you will decide as I wish."

"Alec," said Grace, "I love you. You could not have done anything that could have given me half the pleasure."

When Grace once more rejoined her lover it was all arranged. The repentant sinner, spurned from the home she had disgraced, was rescued by the two young people whom the life and teachings of Christ had led to pity the fallen. Lottie is now the honored wife of a Scottish lawyer, who knows her early history, and who, like his friends, the Campbells, has no stones to throw at those who, under fierce temptation, fall in life's slippery ways. Happily, Lottie was more fortunate than many who sin as she sinned; at the crisis of her life she found friends who endeavored to follow their Master in loving the sinner while hating the sin. She too, loves much, because she was forgiven much.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

Straits in the Home.

IT was not the expectation of the Mormon Apostles that the missionaries would do much in Roman Catholic Italy. The same causes were in operation there as affected the work in France. Few, if any, really good Roman Catholics have ever joined the Saints. The Irish mission was never successful, and the same may be said of the French and Italian missions. In France and Italy by far the greater part of the people might be classed under two heads—Roman Catholics and infidels. The first had already an infallible guide in which they trusted; and as for the infidels, they ridiculed the idea of any guide at all. Both classes were utterly devoid of that acquaintance with Scripture of which the Mormon missionaries understood so well how to take advantage, and which rendered those so susceptible to influence who took the Bible as their basis.

The missionaries in Italy soon experienced the difficulties presented by these facts. After their arrival in Genoa, Mr. Stenhouse was directed to carry the Gospel to the Waldenses—those brave old Protestants of the dark ages, who so manfully suffered, even unto death, for conscience' sake; and some time after he had begun his labors among them, the Apostle Snow joined him. Whatever they might believe or teach theoretically, there can be no doubt that the American Apostles were largely endowed with the "organ" of caution. Preaching without purse or scrip among people who either detest you as a heretic or else regard you with profound indifference is not a pleasant task, and the Mormon Apostles very prudently "took up" liberal collections in England before they started. Had it not been for this common sense proceeding, I am at a loss to say what would have become of the missionaries in Italy; and as it was, their lot was not a very enviable one.

Besides the scarcity of money, the other great difficulty experienced by the missionaries was learning the language of their destined converts.

For many years it was supposed among the Saints that the "gift of tongues" would be all-sufficient for this purpose. The two distinguished Apostles, Orson and Parley P. Pratt, whose writings do so much for Mormonism, had both of them eloquently discussed the subject in print; but the missionaries soon discovered that for practical purposes the "gift" was not of much service; and the two Pratts themselves afterwards experienced—the one in South America, and the other in Austria—the fallacy of their theories. Without the "gift" in any shape the work in Italy was necessarily very slow, and an elder who could speak a little French was sent out from London to assist them. They had at last come to the conclusion that if the Lord would not bestow the "gift" upon them, they must try to acquire it.

The Apostle Snow now thought of sending the Gospel to the Swiss, and Mr. Stenhouse was selected for the work. But before he went it was determined that the Church in Italy should be "organized," and about a week later I received a long account of how this was done. I heard how, one pleasant November morning, the Apostle Snow, Elders Stenhouse and Woodward, together with several Waldenses whom they had converted, ascended the mountain-side contiguous to La Tour, and overlooking the fertile valley of Pinerello. There they sang praises and prayed. They christened the place "Mount Brigham"; and the stone upon which the three elders stood and offered up a written prayer they named "The Rock of Prophecy"; and there they organized the church, dedicating the soil of Italy to the Lord. Moreover, then and there my husband was solemnly consecrated a "High Priest after the Order of the Son of God."

All this I heard, and much more; and in confiding faith that this was indeed a great and glorious work, I rejoiced that I had been accounted worthy to suffer patiently at home, if only my husband might successfully fulfil his task abroad. After that I heard that he had left Italy, and had arrived in Geneva, believing that he would be more successful among the Swiss than the Italians.

A few days after the arrival of the missionary in Geneva, an event occurred which interested my own self personally—my little Clara was born. Very happy was I when I looked upon her tiny little face for the first time, and kissed her for being the prettiest baby in the world; very happy was I when I folded her in my arms, and talked to her as if she could understand all that I said; very happy indeed, as I looked at her again and again, and marvelled whether she could be, indeed and certainly, my own baby girl. It seemed as if baby's papa would never come back again, but I had a companion, now, in my child; and weak and weary as I was, with new responsibilities, and less power to help myself, I found comfort in my new care, and realized the truth of the old Scotch song: "Muckle lichter is the load, When luvie bears up the creel." I was not now alone. Then, too, came round to see me, Mary Burton. She was as fond of and tender to me as ever, and tripped quietly about the room, and tried to wait upon me, and sat by the bed, playing with baby, calling her all the pretty things she could think of; and I felt that her presence brought new light to my room. She brought another letter from my husband, and I found that he was now acquiring for himself the "gift" of the French tongue, unable to do much else, as he and everybody didn't understand each other. He could not yet talk to the French-speaking Genevese, and the English-speaking residents would not listen to him; they had only heard of Mormonism as a clumsy fraud, and looked upon the prophet Joseph Smith as an impostor. So, for a whole winter, he sat shut up in his room, poring over a French grammar, and deploring his hard fate in being denied the gift of tongues.

In the spring of the new year I received a distinguished visitor, who kindly interested himself in my welfare. The Apostle, Lorenzo Snow, left Piedmont for England, and passed through Geneva en route. On his way to London he called upon me at Southampton, and expressed much sympathy for me. He noticed the change in my appearance, and immediately sent for Mr. Stenhouse to return to England. He acted very kindly to me at that time; did all that he could to assist me, and said that he never again would ask any man to make such a sacrifice. I fully appreciated all his kindness; but much as I wanted to, I did not venture to ask him about the truth or falsity of those terrible suggestions which I had heard whispered.

My husband, having been sent for by Apostle Lorenzo Snow, hastened home, coming by way of Calais, in order to meet his president and receive his instructions. The Apostle showed much sympathy for him, and very early in the morning accompanied him some miles to the railway station; but he never once mentioned how I had been situated in Southampton until he left him, and then he exacted from him a promise not to open his lips, whatever he might learn. I need not say that I was happy to see my husband once again, and to present to him his little daughter, who was now five months old. He was, of course, soon busy in visiting the Saints, and he received from them many tokens of attachment.

In the beginning of June a Central Conference of the branches of the Church in Britain was held in London. The apostles and missionaries were present, and my husband and I were also there. We had speeches and prayers. The business of the Conference occupied but very few minutes, for no measure was questioned. Among the Mormons there are no opinions, no discussions. The presiding head has made out his programme before he comes to the Conference; he knows what he wants to do, and no one ever questions him. He may, perhaps, for form's sake invite the brethren to speak on any point he introduces; but when he has furnished the clue to his wishes, the elders who speak only spend their time in arguments in its favor.

At the Conference of which I speak the reports of the native elders were very cheering to us. Throughout England and Wales they had been most successful in adding members to the Church. Mormonism was then most successfully preached in Britain. There were more Mormons there than in all Utah Territory: there were fifty Conferences, with over seven hundred organized "branches," and more than six thousand men ordained to the priesthood. That peculiar influence which the Mormons call "the Spirit," of which I have spoken elsewhere, was spoken of by the Elders as being a common experience everywhere.

During all that Conference I listened carefully for a word from the lips of any of the speakers which might indicate in any way that polygamy was part of the Mormon faith; but not a whisper, not a hint, was uttered. I naturally concluded that the Elders, whose doubtful expressions at Southampton had so troubled my mind, were misinformed or unsafe men. Still, I could not altogether banish my apprehension of coming evil; but so bound to secrecy were those who did know of polygamy being practiced in Utah, that there was not one who would admit it; and even my own husband's lips were sealed to me. He did not deny it, but he would not talk about it, and did everything he could to banish the thought from my mind.

At that Conference the Apostle Snow spoke very strongly of the way in which I had been neglected; and it was arranged that Elder Stenhouse should return to Switzerland, and that I should accompany him. My knowledge of French was expected to be very serviceable. We now made preparations for an early departure, and prepared to leave our friends. To the reader it may seem strange for a man, his wife and babe, to be sent out in this way on a mission without any proper arrangement for their maintenance; but to my mind, at the time, it seemed to me not only perfectly proper, but altogether in accordance with God's word and commandment.

My young friend, Mary Burton, came round to bid me good-bye; and the poor girl wept, and I wept with her, and we kissed one another tenderly as our tears mingled. We had become very dear to each other, and the thought of separation for years, or perhaps forever, was very painful to us. She hung about my neck at the last moment, kissing me, and begging me not to forget to write to her very, very often; and this I gladly promised her, asking the same in return. Then with a fond embrace we parted, and it was years before I saw her dear face again. Thus it was that we three—my husband, my babe, and myself—set forth on our pilgrimage to convert the Swiss.

It was with no ordinary feelings that I entered the ancient city of Geneva. I was not ignorant of its history, and the struggles of its inhabitants for civil and religious liberty. It had been the refuge for the English Protestants during the fiery days of Queen Mary; just as in the time of the French Revolution it was the refuge of infidel and Papist, royalist and republican alike. There Calvin lived in gloomy austerity, battling with Rome; there Servetus, the Unitarian, was condemned to be roasted alive as a heretic; and there we expected, in our own humble way, to be able to testify, by our suffering and patience, to what we firmly believed was the truth.

In free countries like England and the United States—free from the surveillance of a military police, it is easy, if he wishes it, for the missionary to mount a chair at a street corner, or hold forth under a tree; and such has often been done. But all over continental Europe there is hardly a place where this would be possible. In the various grand duchies, kingdoms, and empires, paternal governments look too closely after the morals and religion of their subjects; while under the ephemeral republics, as long as they happen to last, there is often to be found, under the name of liberty, a despotism more despotic than under the rule of royalty. It is the colporteur, the man of books and tracts, who makes the converts there; and in this slow way we soon found that we were destined to proceed.

During my husband's former stay in Geneva he had had neither Mormon books nor Mormon papers, with the exception of a paper published at Boulogne, containing a letter by the Apostle Taylor in French and English. This single copy he lent to a Genevese to read, and never saw it again; and yet in a short time, even before he could properly speak French, he converted and baptized two men in the Rhone, one of whom is to-day a devoted Mormon in southern Utah.

His first attack was upon a shoemaker, whom he visited for the purpose of repairs. While the shoemaker worked, Elder Stenhouse talked; and as the English are all reputed wealthy on the Continent, the friendly overtures of the Mormon missionary were graciously received. As they grew intimate, Elder Stenhouse would sit down on the bench beside the man as he worked, and taking from his pocket a French Testament, which he always carried about with him, would try to read it aloud—the good-natured shoemaker undertaking to correct his pronunciation. In this way he kept his auditor's attention constantly fixed upon certain passages, more especially those which spoke of baptism for the remission of sins, and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. So persistent was he that at last the shoemaker's curiosity was awakened, and finally he was baptized; but not long after a small pamphlet upon the mission of Joseph Smith fell into his hands, and made shipwreck of his faith.

With his second convert he was much more successful. This time it was his landlord who was to be the subject of attack. He was a tailor, and, fortunately for the missionary, somewhat talkative. The same arrangement was made about reading and correction, and with a like result—the tailor was baptized. Just at this time came the Apostle Snow's letter, telling my husband to return to England: and as he might not leave the country without a representative, he ordained the tailor a priest in the Mormon Church. When we arrived in Geneva, Monsieur le tailleur was all that constituted the Church of Latter-day Saints in Switzerland.

Soon a few personal friends began to gather, to hear the English missionary tell about the new religion; and my husband being very much in earnest, interest before long began to be excited. I remember well our first meetings among the Swiss—half-a-dozen people sitting round a table with open Bibles before them, passages from which Mr. Stenhouse was trying in very bad French to make them understand. I pitied him very much, but those who were present made as if they did not notice his embarrassment, and listened with marked attention. Among the Mormons it is a woman's duty to keep silence; I therefore remained a listener only. But at the close of the service—for such it was regarded—when I might speak, my missionary labors began; I was aroused to an earnest eloquence, and our parting was longer than our meeting.

The warmth with which the few who were present responded to our efforts satisfied me that they had come under the same mysterious influence which I had observed in England. I was then convinced that Mormonism could awaken the Christian soul more to a realization of what it already possessed, than impart to it any moral or religious qualities. Mormonism of itself never made Christians, but Christianity built up Mormonism. It was an awakening to the teachings of Christ and His apostles that begat confidence in the mission of the Mormon.

Although we observed the very strictest economy, it did not take long for us to exhaust what little money we brought from England. This placed us in a very awkward position. It is inconvenient enough to be without money in one's own country, where one understands and is understood by everybody; but to be in a strange land, especially in a country like Switzerland, where every Englishman is supposed to be a "milor" and the bounteous dispenser of unlimited wealth, it is more than inconvenient. We left our first quarters, where we had so many visitors, and rented a room from a widow, who fortunately was not inquisitive. She had a family of children to support; and as we paid our rent monthly in advance, she had no occasion to know whether or not we kept a bank account; and we were thankful that it was so, for, had it been so ordained, we could there have starved to death without attracting the notice of any one. A nice thing to be thankful for!

We were not hopeless, though we were heavy-hearted; but we had expected trial, and could not complain, for we knew that thus it would probably be.

(To be continued.)

FORGIVENESS AND HEALING.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for January 27, Mark 2: 1-17; Golden Text, Ps. 103: 3.

A Connection not Generally Realized—The Commission to the Disciples—Sickness as Punishment Under the Old Dispensation—Second Causes Operative—How to Approach God for Healing—Christ's Arrival in Capernaum—His Previous Visit Assuring Welcome—Only One Centre of Attraction—The Paralytic Patient—The Spiritual Preceding the Physical—Sickness a Channel of Blessing—Responsive Faith.

"BLESS the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me bless His holy name! Bless the Lord, O my soul; and forget not all His benefits! who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases." Thank God, this is the blessed experience of thousands of people who have been forgiven their sins, and healed of their bodily diseases, by faith in Christ alone; and this in all parts of the known world. God's work in soul and body, the connection between forgiveness and healing, is closer than many have, as yet, discovered. John the Baptist, the preacher of repentance, never taught healing; his work was to wound, but the Lamb of God who "taketh away the sin of the world," healeth also "all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people," for He came as the Healer. When He sent out His disciples to preach, He always commissioned them to "cast out devils," and to "heal the sick" (Matt. 10: 1, 5-8; Mark 3: 14, 15; 6: 7-13; 16: 15-18; Luke 9: 1, 2; 10: 8, 9), so making their mission to touch soul and body together, and thus bearing witness that may benefit from His redemptive work. It is abundantly shewn in the Old Testament how sickness, as well as war, pestilence, famine, vexation, and rebuke, was used by God as a punishment for sin, was the curse of the broken law (Deut. 28: 15-63), and, as such, was not to be looked upon as depending upon outward conditions, so much as upon the direct voice of God to His disobedient children. No doubt then, as now, there were second causes operative in sickness: bad drains, infection, chills, bad food, overwork, anxiety, etc., etc.; but some of these very causes might include, or have to do with, the disobedience which God was aiming at. Sickness, above and beyond all other dealings of God, is connected with the failure to hear His voice, and to obey it. (Ex. 15: 26; 23: 20-25; Deut. 7: 12-15; Job 33: 14-33.) God is the first cause in everything, He is above and supreme over all other rule—natural law, circumstances, all else—and no sickness can overtake us without His permission. He holdeth our soul in life, and He Holdeth Our Body in Health.

The Whole of Our Being

There are many who hear of God's power to heal, and who are ready enough to avail themselves of a cure which is not painful, which costs nothing, and which is to be had for the asking; but we cannot command the power of God, as we would the skill of a physician, in consideration of such and such a fee; we cannot subject His Almightyness to suit our purpose, or to gain our end. If we come to God, it must be as creatures to a Creator, as subjects to a King, as children to a Father, and not as patrons to a professional. We come, not to command, but to submit.

Jesus again "entered into Capernaum after some days; and it was noised that He was in the house." Such a presence "could not be hid." And yet He had no "form or comeliness" for a worldly eye. But where He was, there were light and blessing, healing and comfort. His last stay in Capernaum had been marked by the flight of unclean spirits, by the opening of blind eyes, by the setting free of sufferers from the diseases from which they suffered. It was, then, no wonder that on this, His second visit, His coming was announced from mouth to mouth along every street, and in almost every house. Here was Peter's wife's mother, a joyous witness of His power; there, the man who had been delivered from the unclean spirit; here, a formerly lame man, running now to meet Him; a once deaf one, drinking in His every word; a once palsied one, walking with firm tread; one who had been crippled with chronic rheumatism, now elastic and graceful in every movement; and the Author of their healing, who had with it taught them the way of pardon and of holiness, was come again. No newly devised advertisement could so effectually gather the people.

"Straightway many were gathered together, insomuch that there was no room to receive them; no, not so much as about the door; and He preached the word unto them." No sitting room, no standing room, and Jesus the centre of attraction. Would that it were so now! There are such who think that people cannot be attracted to hear of Jesus without music, entertainments, etc. Here was Jesus Himself preaching His own Word. This was all, but this was enough. If we could only show Him as He is to the people, and give His Word with His presence and power manifested in us, there would be a more potent attraction for really needy and thirsty souls than all the outward attractions which a worldly church has to offer. What lost man wants is a real living Christ, the God-man, ready and able to put him right where he is wrong in spirit, soul, and body. How many preachers leave their hearers where they find them, and nothing comes of their discourses! but there are those who lift up Jesus when they preach, and the Holy Spirit who speaks through them comes with power upon the souls of the people. As in a lightning-flash they see themselves as they are, and despair stares them in the face. "How shall man be just with God?" And then they see Jesus to be the one all-sufficient supply for pardon, holiness, usefulness, heaven.

While Jesus was speaking to the people, and they were drinking in the truth from Him who spake as never man spake (John 7: 46), some kind neighbors approached the house, carrying a man afflicted with paralysis, so heavy and so helpless that it took four of them to carry him on his bed—a kind of mat they used for sleeping on. The throng within and outside the house were so wedged together that a single person would have had difficulty to get near, much more such a turnout as this. But they had started out to get at Jesus, and no difficulty would hinder them. This is the right spirit; no one who ever set out to find Him, and who sought Him alone, was ever disappointed. They thought of

to get near to Him. Doors and windows were all blocked, so they uncovered the flat roof of the house—on which, in the East, they generally plant a garden—and they let the sick man down at the feet of Jesus. Fear for their heads made the people find room, and the sick man and the great Healer were brought together. Jesus saw him; but He saw what others did not—He saw the faith of the four kind men who had brought him; but instead of healing his body, Jesus immediately dealt with his soul, and said, "When He saw their faith, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee." Perhaps they were disappointed; they may have set their hearts on seeing him immediately healed; but he was not disappointed. The burden of paralyzed and helpless limbs is bad enough; but the burden of a lost, powerless, unforgiven soul is far greater, and now life from the dead entered into the man's soul. The healing had begun, but it began in the soul instead of in the body. It was no accident that that man was paralyzed. God does not willingly grieve nor afflict His creatures, but how many a poor lost soul has first heard His voice on a sick-bed, when, taken from business, pleasure, or family cares, there was

and of eternity. "I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that Thou in very faithfulness hast afflicted me." (Ps. 119: 75.) There were in that company some who had entered that house with no idea of learning anything from Jesus. They were the teachers of the day, and were most unwilling that any should rival them. Looking on Jesus as a rival, they were filled with opposition to Him. They said nothing, but Jesus read their hearts, saying: "Why doth this Man thus speak blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God only?" and He answered them, "Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk." These men were unaccustomed to divine thought-reading; they knew doctrinally the God of the Jews, but the searching of His all-seeing eye into the thoughts and intents of the heart, and their being spoken out thus publicly, was a novelty to them. They had not expected that this wonderful Teacher would have thus driven them into a corner. He continued, "But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins (He saith to the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, Arise, take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house." The healing of Jesus began in the sick man's soul, where no eye but the eye of God could see it. His sins were forgiven out of pure grace, but now the Lord calls for an act of faith. The man was still as helpless as ever; he lay there pressed in by the throng; and in such circumstances came the command, "Arise, and take up thy bed." But he had already tested the power of Jesus' word, and he knew what the scribes could not perceive, that his sins were forgiven, and his soul was passed from death unto life. Thus he knew that Jesus was not mocking him; and in the faith which was newly born within his soul he met of the word of Jesus, and, in its strength, arose, rolled up his bed, and shouldered it, pushed his way out of the crowd, and went on his healed limbs to his own house. Jesus had conquered. He had proved to the scribes His power to forgive sins. He had shown to the sick man and to the multitude how intimately the welfare of soul and body are connected in God's economy. He had made the man's obedience to His word an opportunity for him to bear testimony to Jesus, in whom he had believed. And He had borne witness that His healing is no captious thing. He has a plan in His working, for the blessing of souls. He permits sickness and other trials for the blessing of souls as well as bodies; He heals those who trust in Him. He will never heal the body at the expense of the soul, for "He doeth all things well." His healing is radical, it touches the whole being; it is not simply a cheap and convenient way of cure. The people who thronged the house were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, "We never saw it on this fashion."

The Creative Power

NOTICE TO READERS OF THY HEALER.

On January 1 the size of Thy Healer was reduced to 20 pp, and the price changed from 75 cents to 50 cents. Those whose subscriptions run into 1889 will have their time extended, to credit for the difference in size and price. It is hoped that by reducing the price the circulation will be extended, otherwise it will be a considerable loss. Will not those who have found blessing through its pages recommend it to others?

Though dark the night,
And billows near me roar,
My path is light,
For Jesus goes before.

His "Peace be still!"
Calms all my troubled sea;
I fear no ill,
For Jesus walks with me.

Up stony steeps,
'Neath dark temptation's thrall,
My steps He keeps,
And I shall never fall.

Soon shall Heaven's light
Dispel earth's shadows dim,
Close earth's long night,
And I am safe with Him!

A NEW INVENTION.

PLEASANT, CONVENIENT and EFFICACIOUS.

The Pall Mall Electric Association of London and New York now introduces to the American public a new invention in Plasters. For three years this remarkable Plaster has been used largely in private practice. Its cures have been so wonderful and so quick that, yielding to the urgent solicitations of prominent physicians, it is now made public. It combines Electro-Magnetism with all the best qualities of standard porous and other Plasters, and is a really wonderful remedy.

CURING

Colds, Coughs and Chest Pains, Nervous, Muscular and Neuralgia Pains, Stomach, Kidney and Liver Pains, Dyspeptic, Menstrual and other Pains, Rheumatism, Gout and Inflammation, IN ONE to THREE HOURS.

We unhesitatingly guarantee that it will produce most astonishing results, effecting rapid cures where medicine and all other treatments fail. If not entirely satisfactory, the price will cheerfully be refunded. There is no shock, but a pleasant, genial glow. It cannot injure, but will always do good.

Accept no substitute. If you cannot obtain it promptly at your druggist's, remit price, 25cts. to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, and it will be mailed, post-paid. 5 sent for $1.00.

For Family Use.

QUEEN ISABELLA OF SPAIN—COLUMBUS SIGHTING LAND—THE CATHEDRAL OF BURGOS.

QUEEN ISABELLA.

The Patroness of Columbus.

The Bond Between America and Spain—Its Influence on Both—The Queen's Life and Character—Her Self-Sacrificing Aid to Columbus—The Expedition and its Results—Intolerance in Spain—The Work of the Inquisition—The Reform Movement Surviving—Its Recent Development—Corresponding Movement in Spanish America—What the Struggle Means.

As the historian of European nations finds, in tracing back to its source the history of any nation of the Roman earth, in the conquest and dominance of that nation by the all conquering people the great landmark at which the vague and legendary give place to the exact and comprehensible, so in the history of America we are brought at the outset to the grand old Spanish nation, and more particularly to the august lady who nearly four centuries ago occupied the Spanish throne, and whose portrait appears on the preceding page. That she alone of the potentates of Europe should have listened to Columbus, and, when others treated him as a fanatical dreamer, have placed at his disposal the money and ships which he needed to put his dreams to the test, is a fact that America will never forget. Still more should the fact be remembered that Isabella, apart from her ambition to add new realms to her crown, was moved mainly by the desire to extend the knowledge of Christ to unknown lands. To her the expedition of Columbus was a missionary fleet which was to win a whole continent to the kingdom of Christ on earth. She succeeded better than she knew. America has outgrown her ideas, not only in civil government, but in religious light and liberty, and in its turn has exercised a momentous influence on Spain, an influence which, having made itself felt on political and social life, is permeating religious thought and feeling which have so long been repressed by the superstitions of the Papacy. Thus the effort on the one side to rescue from barbarism and heathenism the unknown continent, and the reflex desire on the other side to aid in the rescue of a nation from the darkness of superstition, unite America and Spain in a holy bond, higher, purer, and nobler than the great queen ever conceived.

The Queen's Life

was not one of that vacuous indolence and luxurious vapidity which often characterized the denizens of royal palaces. It was a life of intense spiritual vigor, grievously misdirected, especially in her later years, but conscientious and sincere, impelling her to sacrifices and efforts that only noble souls could have undertaken. She was born on April 22, 1451, at Madrigal. Her father was John II. of Castile. Her mother was the granddaughter of John I., King of Portugal, and thus a descendant of the famous John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, in England. On the death of her father in 1454, the little three-year-old girl was removed by her mother from the court, that she might grow up untainted by the vice and impurity which ran riot under the rule of her brother, Henry IV. At Arevalo the child was strictly secluded, and her education under the care of the priests was carefully conducted on virtuous principles, but probably with the narrowness and intolerance which commonly characterize such training and which afterward bore sad fruit in her life. In 1462, the King, her brother, foreseeing that she would be his successor, insisted on her return to the court and his will had to be obeyed. She was only eleven years of age, but the young princess conducted herself in the licentious court with a grace and modesty which were a standing reproof to the women who flourished there, and raised the hopes of the better class of courtiers, who longed for a purer and higher condition of court life.

Her Marriage

was necessarily a court arrangement, and of course would materially affect the influence she would wield in her high station. At an early age there were many suitors for her hand, and among them Ferdinand of Aragon, who eventually became her husband. The King promised to give her to Alphonso of Portugal, but to this match the young princess was firmly opposed. A second suitor whom her brother favored was the Marquis of Villena, and to him also Isabella objected. She was, however, overruled, and the marriage would have taken place had not the bridegroom suddenly died while on his way to the solemnization of the nuptials. The subsequent candidates were a brother of Edward IV., King of England, and a brother of Louis XI., King of France, but Ferdinand of Aragon again pressed his suit, and to him she was finally united in marriage, at Valladolid, on October 16, 1469, she being at that time eighteen years of age.

She Became Queen

of Castile and Leon five years later, on the death of her brother, and from that time her life was one of ceaseless activity, of trial and struggle against domestic and foreign foes. In 1479 Ferdinand succeeded his father, and the two crowns of Castile and Aragon were united, international jealousies subsided, and Spain as one nation developed a unity of purpose and a vigor of national life never witnessed before. The two sovereigns retained their respective rights, though their names were joined in public documents, and they lived, says one historian, less like man and wife than two sovereigns in close alliance. Isabella, says Washington Irving, "is one of the purest and most beautiful characters in the pages of history. She was well formed, of the middle size, with great dignity and gracefulness of deportment, and a mingled gravity and sweetness of demeanor. Her complexion was fair, her hair auburn, inclining to red; her eyes were of a clear blue, with a benign expression, and there was a singular modesty in her countenance, gracing as it did a wonderful firmness of purpose and earnestness of spirit. Combining the active and resolute qualities of man with the softer charities of woman, she mingled in the warlike councils of her husband, engaged personally in his enterprises, and in some instances surpassed him in the firmness and intrepidity of her measures; while being inspired with a truer idea of glory, she infused a more lofty and generous temper into his subtle and calculating policy."

Her Patronage of Columbus, which has immortalized her name, was an evidence of her high qualities as a woman and a queen. Repulsed and cheated by the Court of Portugal, disappointed at Genoa, laughed at by the Court of Venice, despised as a visionary by the English king, Columbus found a friend in Isabella who listened to him attentively, and was willing to risk her name and possessions in his cause. Nearly eighteen years of disappointment, ridicule, and scorn had the brave, persistent man endured, and he was now fifty-six years old, when the sun of royal favor rose upon his project. Ferdinand and Isabella were engaged in the closing struggle with the Moors, who for seven centuries had kept a footing in Spain. As the crescent disappeared from the tower of Granada and the silver cross rose in its place Columbus claimed the fulfilment of Isabella's promise, and the noble Queen graciously responded. When her husband and his officials pleaded for delay and pointed to a treasury exhausted by war, the Queen made the project her own, declared that her own realm of Castile should bear the burden, and if no other means availed, her own jewels should be sacrificed rather than the expedition should lack funds.

Every American school-boy knows the history of the next few months. How on Friday, August 3, 1492, after surmounting difficulties innumerable, Columbus sailed, with his three poor vessels and their discontented and foreboding crews, on their voyage of discovery. How as the days passed, the discontent increased to the verge of mutiny, and Columbus, driven from one stratagem to another to prevent their compelling him to return, was at last almost in despair, when, on October 11, he took his station on the high poop of his vessel, before midnight, ranging his eye along the horizon and maintaining an intense and unrelenting watch. It was the supreme moment of his life, for in the darkness he saw a light moving that, from its motion, he knew must be on an inhabited land. (See illustration on first page.) Scarcely daring to believe his eyes, he summons others to his side, who confirm his own discovery, and the dawn reveals to all the shores of the New World.

When the news of the wonderful discovery reached Spain numbers of expeditions were fitted out, which soon carried such numbers of adventurers across the Atlantic that in some Spanish towns, notably so in Seville, few other than aged men and women were left behind. Two powerful empires in the newly discovered territories, one that of Mexico, ruled by Montezuma in North America, and the other that of Peru, ruled by the Inca, Atahualpa, on the west coast of South America, were soon conquered by the Spaniards; the first by the prowess of the Spanish warrior Cortes and his fellow-countrymen; the second by Pizarro and his Spanish companions. Colonies of Spain were soon planted throughout large portions of North and South America; and multitudes of Spain's sons and beautiful daughters left their native land, crossed the Atlantic, and made their homes among all the beauty and grandeur of Spanish America, and for about three centuries the Spanish viceroyalties governed with almost regal splendor. Nor was Isabella's desire for the extension of the Catholic Church forgotten in this absorbing struggle for wealth and power. Magnificent cathedrals were built in the chief cities of Spanish America, and Queen Isabella saw with delight the New World, outwardly, at any rate, becoming Catholic. As the years passed this religious zeal became still more completely the governing principle of her life, and the nobility and enlightenment of her younger days were clouded by subservience to papal control. Isabella died at Medina del Campo on November 24, 1504, at the age of fifty-three.

The Gospel in Spain,

from that time to the present, has been less known than in any of the great nations of Europe, and until the Spanish American colonies shook off the Spanish yoke, they, too, remained in a spiritual darkness, which is but now only slowly yielding to the dawning light. Still, the Lord had His witnesses always in the nation. In the sixteenth century an heroic struggle was made in Spain to restore the primitive faith. Philip II., the husband of Queen Mary of England, had taken to England a number of the more learned and eloquent Spanish ecclesiastics, with a view of trying by their means to extend again the usurpations of the Bishop of Rome throughout England. One of these ecclesiastics, Carranza by name, was appointed confessor to the Queen. Others were named professors at Oxford. Instead, however, of these Spanish ecclesiastics convincing the English reformers, the English reformers convinced some of them. It was found that after their return to Spain several of their number were in sympathy with the great truths revindicated during the English Reformation. Carranza was subsequently named Archbishop of Toledo, and Primate of the Spanish Church.

In the moments when the Emperor Charles V. was dying, Carranza implored the dying monarch to trust alone in the Saviour, and in His atoning sacrifice for pardon. These words, together with some that were found in the publications of Carranza, recommending the general study of the Holy Scriptures, led to the conviction that Carranza was in sympathy with the English Reformation. He was thereupon suddenly imprisoned, and kept a prisoner for eighteen years by the Inquisition.

Over three thousand persons, among whom were prominent ecclesiastics and distinguished members of the nobility, took an active part in the struggle to re-establish the faith in its purity in Spain in the sixteenth century. The Reformation movement was gaining ground rapidly in that land, when, on a given day, the officers of the Inquisition, suddenly turning on the leaders of this Reform movement, imprisoned every one more or less connected with it, of whom they had received information, as far as they were able to do so. Many of those thus imprisoned died under the tortures inflicted by the Inquisition, or were publicly burned at the stake.

A few of those who had accepted the pure Gospel in Spain escaped the persecution under which others of their number died the martyr's death, and fled to foreign lands. Three of these exiles devoted several years into Spanish. One of the number, Juan Perez, left his fortune for the publication of the Spanish edition of the Holy Scriptures. That Spanish translation of the Bible that has come down to us from those stormy days, has of late years, and under very different circumstances, been circulated both in Spain and Mexico. Liberty of worship has been proclaimed in both those lands; through the reading of the Holy Scriptures some earnest souls in our days in Spain and in Mexico have been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. Among those who have thus learned to love the Gospel in its purity in those countries, faithful preachers of the pure faith have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered. The portraits and lives of several of these brave men have appeared from time to time in this journal.

To Translating The Scriptures

The Work in Mexico.

Christian schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a secular education, and have also been carefully taught the Christian faith. Two grand stone church buildings in the city of Mexico, which had reverted to the General Government, when the orders of friars and nuns were suppressed in the Mexican Republic, have been repaired, and the pure Gospel preached within their walls for many years.

The Reformation movement, therefore, inaugurated and fearfully persecuted in Spain in the sixteenth century, has not been utterly destroyed. Over the ashes of martyrs in Spain, the Holy Scriptures, then translated, are again being studied, and among the Spanish-speaking people begins to attract attention. Among these reforming Christian congregations, both in Spain and Mexico, there are some carefully educated ecclesiastics. In both those lands a noble effort has been made to organize a native and national Church, and to revive the ancient Spanish liturgy, the Mozarabic, so far as it can be applied to modern use.

The election of Juan B. Cabrera as Bishop in Spain, whose portrait appeared in this journal on July 21, 1887, and of the Rev. H. C. Riley, as Bishop in Mexico, has given to this reforming work among the Spanish-speaking peoples on both sides the Atlantic new life and energy. The sister churches are in communion, and are working for the same end—the spread of the knowledge of Christ's gospel wherever the Spanish language is spoken. During a recent visit to Spain, Bishop Riley received a most cordial welcome, was privileged to preach in the reformed churches, and was enabled to cheer and encourage the hearts of the devoted men who are laboring in the mother country in the same cause. He was also enabled, in his journey home, to explain the movement in Spain and Mexico, and enlist the sympathy of intelligent, pious men in other lands. Among these was Lord Plunket, the Protestant Episcopal Archbishop of Dublin.

Every sincere lover of the Lord Jesus Christ must long to aid these devoted men in their struggle to preach the gospel throughout the Spanish-speaking lands. They have to do battle against prejudice, against a Church wealthy and powerful, and against insidious foes in the Protestant Episcopal Church, who, given over to ritualism, sympathize with the Roman Catholic Church and not with the reformers. It is an honor to help in such an effort as Bishop Riley is making, as it was an honor to have helped Luther and Wickliff and the reformers of by-gone times. Theirs is a kindred work. Europe is aiding Cabrera and his comrades in Spain; it is for us to see that Bishop Riley does not lack funds for the prosecution of the work on this side the Atlantic.

A Noble Effort.

We are glad to learn from the good bishop, who, by the way, has devoted the whole of his large patrimony to the work, that he has already received valuable aid from the readers of this journal. One noble lady in Philadelphia only recently sent him a contribution of two hundred dollars. Beyond this he gratefully acknowledges that the smaller gifts of one or two dollars, which have been sent, have been accompanied by words of cheer so earnest and sincere that in his hours of darkness and discouragement, inevitable in so desperate a struggle, the remembrance of those words, and the consciousness that their writers were praying for him, have given him renewed courage, and have inspired him with new hope in his toilsome struggle. He has given his fortune to the work, his life has again and again been in peril of assassination, but he is still supported by God's power, and is full of faith and confidence. He asks the prayers and gifts of our readers, and no sum, however small, but is gratefully welcomed, and does its work in the mighty struggle. Contributions should be sent to the Treasurer, J. P. Heath, Esq., 43 Bible House, New York.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Only a Year Married.—"A Few Days Ago there came before my notice a most melancholy instance of the ravages which strong drink is making in our midst. A young man, married only one year, had in that short time so far lost all sense of honor and duty as to completely neglect his wife and child, and bring them to the verge of destitution. In a fit of drunken frenzy he committed suicide, and hurled himself into the presence of his offended Creator. He had gone to a place of public amusement with a friend, and there spent most of his time in the drinking-saloon, returning home in a state of mad intoxication. He had a few angry words with his mother-in-law, who tried to remonstrate with him, then lifting a poker swung it round his head exclaiming that he was mad, and breaking what furniture he had still left. Then running to the window, he jumped clear through the glass and fell a height of twenty-four feet, fracturing his skull, and dying on the spot. You young men who say you only take a social glass, beware! See in this picture the possible end of the road which you have begun to travel. 'Turn ye, turn ye, for why will you die.'"

A Motherless Boy Provided For.—"A Gentleman hurrying home from business one day, was accosted by a bare-footed little boy, who pleadingly asked a penny. The gentleman looked at the boy searchingly, then said, somewhat sharply, 'What do you want with the penny?' 'I want it to buy bread,' was his reply. 'Now, boy, don't tell me an untruth; had you not any dinner?' 'Sir, I am telling you the truth,' he murmured, while his eyes filled with tears; 'I have not eaten anything to-day nor yesterday.' 'Where is your father?' asked the gentleman, his heart beginning to soften as he looked down on the poor, tear-stained face. 'Dead,' was the reply. 'And your mother?' again asked the gentleman. 'She died last night, sir,' the boy sobbed. Then, thinking the gentleman might not yet believe him, he said, as he took him by the hand, 'Come, and I'll let you see where she is.' The gentleman suffered himself to be led through one back street after another, until at last they reached a most miserable one, and there, in a cellar, lying on a bundle of rags, lay the dead body of the mother. 'Who was with her when she died?' asked the gentleman. 'No one but me, sir. When she was dying she looked up at me and said, 'God will take care of you when I am gone'; then, unable to say more, she sank back and died.' The gentleman took the boy home with him, and educated him, and brought him up in the fear of God."

"Sing a Hymn to Jesus."—"You seemed to enjoy the service to-night, my friend," said the preacher to a laboring man, after a special service in the village of R. 'I did, sir, and no mistake. My heart's all jumping with joy now.' 'How long have you known the Lord?' 'Well, sir, it was like this here: I was stopped by the Holy Ghost when I was coming home one Saturday night, two years ago, three parts drunk. I was singing out loud some of the songs we had in the tap-room, when the words came to me: "Sing a hymn to Jesus." A hymn to Jesus? No, I can't. I felt ashamed of myself. Now I used to go to bed every Sunday afternoon, and sleep to tea-time; but that Sunday afternoon I slipped into the little chapel like a dog with a burnt tail, and crept behind the door; and the text that day was, 'Come to Jesus.' Well, if you will believe me, I came to Jesus, and He saved me, and has kept me ever since. My old mates couldn't make it out why I didn't go any longer with them to the saloon; but, sir," said he, 'my heart isn't in the world I've given my heart to Jesus.'"

A Puzzled Scotch Clergyman.—Mr. Scroggie said: "A friend of mine met a gentleman with whom he was acquainted, and who knew that he was connected with evangelistic work. My friend was being told of a wonderful work that was being done in this minister's parish. Splendid meetings were being held. They were crowded to overflowing every night, and the clergyman thanked God for the blessings they had received. 'Have there been many brought in?' my friend asked. 'Brought in? What do you mean?' he responded, with a puzzled look on his face. 'Have you had many conversions to Christ lately?' the gentleman inquired, further. But the clergyman was shocked, and exclaimed, as the color mounted to his brow, 'You do not mean to say that in this Christian land of ours, with its churches, training academies and Sabbath-schools, that our young folks need conversion?' Oh how many are like that astonished minister. They do not think there is any necessity for conversion. Live a moral life, give every man his due, behave rightly towards your neighbors, and you are sure of heaven, they think, and sometimes say. No, that is not it. 'Ye must be born again.' 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.'"

A Conundrum at a Wedding.—Mr. McLaren says: "I have just come from the house of a friend who was at a marriage in Scotland the other day. When the ceremony was performed, and the newly made husband and wife had left the room, the minister remarked to a group of young men, who stood watching the bride's cake being cut up, 'Here is a conundrum which I have often asked, but to which I have never received a satisfactory answer. At the present moment, where is the bride's home?' All the young fellows thought for a moment of the ceremony to which they had been witnesses. The bride had left her father and his home, and she had not yet entered into the home which her husband had prepared for her. Where, then, was her home? At length one young man answered, 'I think the bride will feel at home, and be happiest where the bridegroom is.' Does not that little incident show the Christian's standing in this world? Where is the Christian's home? By giving himself over to Christ, the heavenly Bridegroom, he has severed his connection with the world, and though Christ has prepared a beautiful home for him in heaven, he has not yet entered upon it. Where, then, is the Christian's home? Is it not wherever Christ is, feeling happiest in the sunshine of His smile? Let us be ever keeping our eyes on the Bridegroom, and He will lead His bride into the eternal and glorious mansion, which He has provided for her."

DOES RELIGION PAY?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday,
January 6, 1889.

"Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." 1 Tim. 4: 8.

The Best Way of Meeting a New Year—Where Catiline's Body was Found—A Period of New Business Relations—A Partner Suggested—A Wrong View of Godliness—Not a Mere Admission Ticket to Heaven—Good for this Life—I. A HAPPY NEW YEAR to one and all!

There is a gloomy and passive way of waiting for the events of the opening year to come upon us, and there is a heroic way of going out to meet them, strong in God, and fearing nothing. When the body of Catiline was found on the battle-field it was found far in advance of all his troops, and among the enemy; and the best way is not for us to lie down and let the events of life trample over us, but to go forth in a Christian spirit determined to conquer.

The papers were made out, and some of you have just entered into business partnerships, and others of you take higher positions in the commercial establishment where you were engaged, and others have entered upon new enterprises, and there were last week in these cities ten thousand business changes. You are expecting prosperity, and I am determined, so far as I have anything to do with it, that you shall not be disappointed, and, therefore, I propose, as God may help me this morning, to project upon your attention a new element of success. You will have in the business firm, frugality, patience, industry, perseverance, economy—but there needs to be one member added, mightier than them all, and not a silent partner either—the one introduced by my text: "Godliness, which is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come."

A Very Strong Business Firm,

I suppose you are all willing to admit that Godliness is important in its eternal relations; but perhaps some of you say: "All I want is an opportunity to say a prayer before I die, and all will be well." There are a great many people who suppose that if they can finally get safely out of this world into a better world, they will have exhausted the entire advantage of our holy religion. They talk as though religion were a mere nod of recognition which we are to give to the Lord Jesus on our way up to a heavenly mansion; as though it were an admission ticket, of no use except to give in at the door of Heaven. And there are thousands of people who have great admiration for a religion of the shroud, and a religion of the coffin, and a religion of the hearse, and a religion of the cemetery, who have no appreciation of a religion for the bank, for the farm, for the factory, for the warehouse, for the jeweler's shop, for the broker's office. Now, while I would not throw any slur on a post-mortem religion, I want this morning to eulogize an Ante-Mortem Religion.

A religion that is of no use to you while you live, will be of no use to you when you die. "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come." And I have always noticed that when the grace is very low in a man's heart he talks a great deal in prayer-meetings about deaths, and about coffins, and about graves, and about churchyards. I have noticed that the healthy Christian, the man who is living near to God, and is on the straight road to Heaven, is full of jubilant satisfaction, and talks about the duties of this life, understanding well that if God helps him to live right He will help him to die right.

Now, in the first place, I remark that godliness is good for a man's physical health. I do not mean to say that it will restore a broken-down constitution, or drive rheumatism from the limbs, or neuralgia from the temples, or pleurisy from the side; but I do mean to say that it gives one such habits and puts one in such condition as is most favorable for physical health. That I believe, and that I avow. Everybody knows that buoyancy of spirit is good physical advantage. Gloom, unrest, dejection are at war with every pulsation of the heart, and with every respiration of the lungs. It lowers the vitality, it slackens the circulation, while exhilaration of spirit pours the very balm of heaven through all the currents of life. The sense of insecurity which sometimes hovers over an unregenerate man, or pounces upon him with the blast of ten thousand trumpets of terror, is most depleting and most exhausting, while the feeling that all things are working together for my good now, and for my everlasting welfare, is Conducive to Physical Health.

You will observe that godliness induces industry, which is the foundation of good health. There is no law of hygiene that will keep a lazy man well. Pleurisy will stab him, erysipelas will burn him, jaundice will discolor him, gout will cripple him, and the intelligent physician will not prescribe antiseptic, or febrifuge, or anodyne, but saws and hammers and yardsticks and crowbars and pickaxes. There is no such thing as good physical condition without positive work of some kind, although you should sleep on down of swan, or ride in carriage of softest upholstery, or have on your table all the luxuries that were poured from the wine-vats of Ispahan and Shiraz. Our religion says: "Away to the bank! away to the field! away to the shop! away to the factory! do something that will enlist all the energies of your body, mind, and soul." "Diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord"; while upon the bare back of the idler and the drone comes down the sharp lash of the apostle as he says: "If any man will not work, neither shall he eat."

Oh, how important in this day, when so much is said about anatomy and physiology and therapeutics, and some new style of medicine is ever and anon springing upon the world, that you should understand that the highest school of medicine is the school of Christ, which declares that "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come." So if you start out two men in the world with equal physical health, and then one of them shall get the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ in his heart, and the other shall not get it, the one who becomes a son of the Lord Almighty will live the longer. "With long life will I satisfy thee, and show thee my salvation."

Again I remark that godliness is Good For The Intellect.

I know some have supposed that just as soon as a man enters into the Christian life, his intellect goes into a bedwaring process. So far from that, religion will give new brilliancy to the intellect, new strength to the imagination, new force to the will, and wider swing to all the intellectual faculties. Christianity is the great central fire at which Philosophy has lighted its brightest torch. The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ is the fountain out of which learning has dipped its clearest draught. The Helicon poured forth no such inspiring waters as those which flow from under the throne of God clear as crystal. Religion has given new energy to Poesy, weeping in Dr. Young's "Night Thoughts," teaching in Cowper's "Task," flaming in Charles Wesley's hymns, and rushing with archangelic splendor through Milton's "Paradise Lost." The religion of Jesus Christ has hung in studio, and in gallery of art, and in Vatican the best pictures—Titian's "Assumption," Raphael's "Transfiguration," Rubens's "Descent from the Cross," Claude's "Burning Bush," and Angelo's "Last Judgment." Religion has made the best music of the world—Haydn's

"Creation," Handel's "Messiah," Mozart's "Requiem." Is it possible that a religion which builds such indestructible monuments and which lifts its ensign on the highest promontories of worldly power, can have any effect upon a man's intellect but elevation?

Now, I commend godliness as the best mental discipline—better than belles-lettres to purify the taste; better than mathematics to harness the mind to all intricacy and elaboration; better than logic to marshal the intellectual forces for onset and victory. It will go with Hugh Miller, and show him the footprints of the Creator in the red sandstone. It will go with the botanist, and show him celestial glories encamped under the curtain of a water-lily. It will go with the astronomer on the great heights where God shepherds the great flock of worlds that wander on the hills of heaven, answering His voice as He calls them all by their names.

Good for the Disposition.

Again I remark, that godliness is profitable for one's disposition. Lord Ashley, before he went into a great battle, was heard to offer this prayer: "O Lord, I shall be very busy to-day; if I forget Thee, forget me not." With such a Christian disposition as that, a man is independent of all circumstances. Our piety will have a tinge of our natural temperament. If a man be cross and sour and fretful naturally, after he becomes a Christian he will always have to be armed against the rebellion of those evil inclinations; but religion has tamed the wildest nature; it has turned fretfulness into gratitude, despondency into good cheer, and those who were hard and ungovernable and uncompromising have been made pliable and conciliatory. Good resolution, reformatory effort, will not effect the change. It takes a mightier arm and a mightier hand to bend evil habits than the hand that bent the bow of Ulysses, and it takes a stronger lasso than ever held the buffalo on the prairie.

A man cannot go forth with any human weapons and contend successfully against these Titans armed with upturn mountain. But you have known men into whose spirit the influence of the gospel of Christ came, until their disposition was entirely changed. So it was with

Two Merchants in New York.

They were very antagonistic. They had done all they could to injure each other. They were in the same line of business. One of the merchants was converted to God. Having been converted, he asked the Lord to teach him how to bear himself toward that business antagonist, and he was impressed with the fact that it was his duty, when a customer asked for certain kinds of goods which he had not, but which he knew his opponent had, to recommend him to go to that store. I suppose that is about the hardest thing a man could do; but being thoroughly converted to God, he resolved to do that very thing; and being asked for a certain kind of goods, which he had not, he said: "You go to such and such a store, and you will get it." After a while, merchant number two found these customers coming so sent, and he found, also, that merchant number one had been brought to God, and he sought the same religion. Now they are good friends and good neighbors—the grace of God entirely changing their dispositions.

"Oh," says some one, "I have a rough, jagged, impetuous nature, and religion can't do anything for me." Do you know that Martin Luther and Robert Newton and Richard Baxter were impetuous, all-consuming natures, yet the grace of God turned them into

The Mightiest Usefulness?

A manufacturer cares but very little for a stream that slowly runs through the meadow, but a strong torrent that leaps from rock to rock, and rushes with mad energy through the valley, and out toward the sea. Along that river you will find fluttering shuttles and grinding mill and flashing waterwheel. And a nature the swiftest, the most rugged, and the most tremendous, that is the nature God turns into greatest use-liness. Oh, how many that have been pugnacious, and hard to please, and irascible, and more bothered about the mote in their neighbor's eye than about the beam like ship-timber in their own eye, who have been entirely changed by the grace of God, and have found out that "Godliness is profitable for the life that now is as well as for the life to come."

Again I remark that religion is know the general theory is, the more business the less religion; the more religion the less business. Not so thought Dr. Hans, in his "Biography of a Christian Merchant," when he says: "He grew in grace the last six years of his life more than at any time in his life; during those six years he had more business crowding him than at any other time." In other words, the more worldly business a man has, the more opportunity to serve God. Does religion exhortate or retard worldly business? is the practical question for you to discuss. Does it hang like a mortgage over the farm? Is it a bad debt on the ledger? Is it a lien against the estate? Does it crowd the door through which customers come for broadcloths and silks?

Now, religion will hinder your business if it be a bad business, or if it be a good business wrongly conducted. If you tell lies behind the counter, if you use false weights and measures, if you put sand in sugar, and beet-juice in vinegar, and lard in butter, and sell for one thing what which is another thing, then religion will interfere with that business; but a lawful business, lawfully conducted, will find the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ

Its Mightiest Auxiliary.

Religion will give an equipoise of spirit. It will keep you from ebullitions of temper—and you know a great many fine businesses have been blown to atoms by bad temper; it will keep you from worriment about frequent loss, it will keep you industrious and prompt, it will keep you back from squandering and from dissipation, it will give you a kindness of spirit which will be easily distinguished from that mere store courtesy which shakes hands violently with you, asking about the health of your family, when there is no anxiety to know whether your child is well or sick! but the anxiety is to know how many dozen cambric pocket handkerchiefs you will take, and pay cash down. It will prepare you for the practical duties of every-day life. I do not mean to say that religion will make us financially rich, but I do say that it will give us, it will assure us of, a comfortable sustenance at the start, a comfortable subsistence all the way through, and it will help us to direct the bank, to manage the traffic, to conduct all our business matters, and to make the most insignificant affair of our life a matter of vast importance, glorified by Christian principle. In New York City there was with his fellows, who had written over his banking house, or his counting-house room, "No compromise." Then when some merchant got in a crisis and went down—no fault of his, but a conjunction of evil circumstances, and all the other merchants were willing to compromise; they would take seventy-five cents on the dollar, or fifty cents, or twenty cents—coming to this man last of all, he said: "No compromise; I'll take one hundred cents on the dollar, and I can afford to wait." Well, the wheel turned, and after a while that man was in a crisis of business, and he sent out his agent to compromise, and the agent said to the merchants: "Will you take fifty cents on the dollar?" "No." "Will you take anything?" "We'll take one hundred cents on the dollar. No compromise." And the man who wrote that inscription over his counting-house door died in destitution. Oh, we want more of the kindness of the Gospel and the spirit of love in our business enterprises! How many young men have found in the religion of Jesus Christ a practical help? How many there are in this house to-day who could testify out of their own experience, that godliness is profitable for the life that now is! There were times in their business career when they went here for help, and there for help, and yonder for help, and got no help until they knelt before the Lord crying for His deliverance, and the Lord rescued them.

In a bank not far from our great metropolis—a village bank—an officer could not balance his accounts. He had worked at them day after day, night after night, and he was sick nigh unto death as a result. He knew he had not taken one farthing from that bank, but somehow, for some reason, inscrutable then, the accounts wouldn't balance. The time rolled on, and the morning of the day when the books should pass under the inspection of the other officers arrived, and he felt himself in awful peril, conscious of his own integrity, but unable to prove that integrity. That morning he went to the bank early, and he knelt down before God and told the whole and he said: "O Lord, I have done right; I have preserved my integrity, but here I am about to be overthrown, unless Thou shouldst come to my rescue. Lord, deliver me." And for one hour he continued the prayer before God, and then he rose and went to an old blotter that he had forgotten all about. He opened it, and there lay a sheet of figures which he only needed to add to another line of figures—some line of figures he had forgotten, and knew not where he had laid them—and the accounts were balanced, and the Lord delivered him. You are an infidel if you do not believe it. The Lord delivered him. God answered his prayer as He will answer your prayer, O man of business, in every crisis, when you come to Him.

Now, if this be so, then I am persuaded, as you are, of the fact that the vast majority of Christians do not fully test the value of their religion. They are like a farmer in California, with fifteen thousand acres of good wheat land, and culturing only a quarter of an acre. Why do you not go forth and make the religion of Jesus Christ a practical affair every day of your business life, and all this year, beginning now; and to-morrow morning putting into practical effect this holy religion, and demonstrating that godliness is profitable here as well as hereafter?

How can you get along without this religion? Is your physical health so good you do not want this Divine Tonic?

Is your mind so clear, so vast, so comprehensive, that you do not want this divine inspiration? Is your worldly business so thoroughly established that you have no use for that religion which has been the help and deliverance of tens of thousands of men in crises of worldly trouble? And if what I have said this morning is true, then you see what a fatal blunder it is when a man adjourns to life's expiration the uses of religion. A man who postpones religion to sixty years of age gets religion fifty years too late. He may get into the kingdom of God by final repentance, but what can compensate him for a whole lifetime unalleviated and uncomfortable? You want religion to-day in the training of that child. You will want religion to-morrow in dealing with that Western customer. You wanted religion yesterday to curb your temper. Is your arm strong enough to beat your way through the floods? Can you, without being encased in the mail of God's eternal help, go forth amid the assault of all hell's sharpshooters?

Can You Walk Alone

across these crumbling graves and amid these gaping earthquakes? Can you, waterlogged and mast-shivered, outlive the gale? Oh, how many there have been who, postponing the religion of Jesus Christ, have plunged into mistakes they never could correct although they lived eighty years after, and like serpents crushed under cart-wheels, dragging their mangled bodies under the rocks to die; so these men have fallen under the wheel of awful calamity, crushed here, destroyed forever, while a vast multitude of others have taken the religion of Jesus Christ into every-day life, and first, in practical business affairs, and secondly, on the throne of heavenly triumph, have illustrated, while angels looked on and a universe approved, the glorious truth that "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life which now is as well as of that which is to come."

CONVERSION OF A JEWISH AGNOSTIC.

In a letter from the Rev. J. B. Ginsburg, who is laboring among the Jews of Turkey, he thus describes the conversion of a young Hebrew of Constantinople: There are some young men of the school of Agnostics, who, whatever their ostentatious language, seize now and then utterances and verses from the inspired volume, ponder over them, search further, examine and compare, and come again to ask for more.

One of these, proud of his University training, and who only the other day boasted that he would not bow before a woman-born Messiah having a "myth" for His father, lowered his flag when vanquished by the simple Word of God—by the two-edged sword of the Spirit. His philosophy, his learning, vanished like hoar frost before the warmth of the early sun. The following is a translation of a letter the would-be-enemy has addressed to me:

"Having, after continuous study and with your kind guidance, become enlightened, and through the grace of God led out of darkness to the true old paths, I now recognize the saving faith in the Messiah as the only Redeemer. Indeed, the seed you have sown brought forth glorious fruit. In the proportion as my heart became open to the influence of the Holy Ghost, His most precious fruit, faith, love, hope, forgiveness, wrought unspeakable rest and peace in my soul, hitherto unknown to me. Yes, I have arrived at the full knowledge that the hoped-for, and to this day expected, Messiah is Jesus of Nazareth. Thus convinced, I believe and confess Him to you, and come with this letter to apply for baptism, which I ask with a warm heart and sense of need. Touched by a deep feeling of gratitude, I am driven to express to you my sincere thanks. I need hardly assure you that I will endeavor to do my utmost, as far as in me lies, to become, with God's help, a worthy member of the Church of Christ."

Thus has another son of the dispersed been brought within the fold of the Great Shepherd. He acknowledged his errors to, and would not withhold the truth as it is in Christ Jesus from, his unconverted brethren at Galata, from which spontaneous confession he suffered insults, shame, and humiliation. But he was not ashamed of his Lord and Saviour. Before his conversion he tried to escape inevitable trials; he murmured and felt crushed. But feeling like a pardoned criminal, and believing in life eternal, he now took his cross willingly, and with the indwelling of the Spirit of Jesus, he bore it submissively. The last day before his baptism, when, uncalled for, and from an unexpected quarter, he was upbraided and humiliated, he shrank for a moment and wept bitterly. Indeed, it would not be a cross if he did not shrink. But he was already sufficiently warned by the love of Christ, and remembering the words, "Is there any sorrow like my sorrow?" he, in that hour of temptation, once more, and let us hope for ever, resolved manly and Christianly to bear the inevitable load of trials, and courageously and cheerfully came forward to confess the crucified Jesus as the Messiah before the little congregation at the Industrial Home at Ortakuey. Sunday, September 30, he was thus, in the usual way, during the morning service, received by the rite of baptism a member of the Church.

His history is very touching, and how the Lord led him to His knowledge and salvation. His father was murdered in his own house, the mother died soon afterwards, and brother and sister also died one after another. This young man was marvellously preserved, to be plucked as a brand out of the fiery furnace of superstition and unbelief.

A SCENE IN A DEVIL'S TEMPLE.

WHEN Mr. Thomas, the eminent missionary, who is now at Tinneveli, in the Presidency of Madras, India, reached his station there a few years ago heathenism was rampant, and devil-worship prevailed. The idolatry which prevailed was of the most repulsive kind. He thus describes one scene which he witnessed: "On one side of the road stood a devil-temple, and I saw at some distance a crowd of people assembled round it. . . . One old woman drew my attention, and I shall never forget her figure, and the fury like air and expression of her countenance. She was tall, and more than ordinarily masculine in appearance, and was smeared with ashes and saffron-water; her long black hair hung dishevelled down her cheeks, and her motions indicated a state of mind in the highest degree frantic. While she thus stood in the centre, a sheep was brought and laid at her feet. She looked wild, muttered her order, and, to my surprise, the neck of the sheep was suddenly severed by a sharp knife. Four men held the animal by its legs, and instantly, on the gash being made the sheep was lifted from the ground, and the fiendish-looking, wretched old woman pressed her mouth and face between the severed head and body and drank its blood warm as it flowed. . . . As soon as she had done so, some saffron-water was thrown upon her. Her face, to the eyes, her neck and breast, were smeared with the blood, which also clotted in her loose hair. She reeled to and fro, and seemed to have every muscle of her body in action. The accompaniment to all this was the tom-toms, and the harsh noise of a species of clarinet used by the natives, interrupted occasionally by the wild shouts of the crowd." Happily there are many hundreds of Christians now in the once dark land of Tinneveli.

A DYING CONVERT'S VISION.

AN astonishing incident is reported to the Missionary Herald by Mr. Tracy, of the American Board, who is laboring at Marsovan in Western Turkey, and who is evidently firmly convinced of its truth. He says: "A few days ago I sat by a dying woman. She was in the last stage of pulmonary consumption, and could speak only in a whisper. In a few more hours she would be beyond pain. She held my hand between both hers, and poured forth such expressions of heavenly love and joy as I never before heard from human lips. She laughed and rejoiced, striving in vain to make known the unutterable happiness that filled her soul. And why? Because she was going to be with Jesus. Who was she? A poor weaver. Where did she find this unearthly joy? In the Scriptures, which she had learned years ago, when Mrs. Tracy used to have her daily, with a dozen others, for an hour's study of the Bible.

"This girl was a pleasant and amiable person. She was married, and had children, but the burdens of life bore heavily upon her, and she was seized with pulmonary disease. She was a child of God. Her last days were remarkable. She seemed to have the visible presence of Christ with her day after day, and night after night she was filled with unearthly joy. Though in the full possession of her faculties, appreciating every little kindness—as a cup of tea—with most affecting expressions of gratitude, she was favored, in spirit, with what seemed to be the sight of the very face of Jesus. Her own words were: 'Christ came last night, and stood by the window outside, looking in upon me. His face was so full of love and grace, so benignant, so glorious, so beautiful, that it overcame me as I looked. I gazed on His countenance till I could bear the glorious beauty of it no longer; then I hid my eyes under the coverlid; but my heart smote me for refusing to look on Him who had come to manifest Himself to me: so I looked again. Thus I looked, though it filled me with a glory which I could not bear. Oh, how happy I am! I am going to the presence of Jesus! Rejoice with me! It is wedding-day to me! Away with mourning! Rejoice and be glad with me, for I am going to be with Jesus!'

"Sometimes the friends asked her to describe what she saw, to tell them more about that glory in which she was. She replied: 'It is not lawful to utter. I am not permitted to speak further about it.' In this ecstatic state of mind, with seraphic joy on her countenance, she remained for several days, and then passed away, with her last breath sending most loving salutations to us, and bidding her relatives rejoice and be glad, to make festivity as for her wedding, and have no sadness at her death.

"When a boy, I read 'Edwards on the Affections,' and have always been a little sceptical about ecstatic emotions; but as I sat by this happy, emaciated creature while she held my hand in both hers, pouring out her soul's unutterable joy, I wished that some of the wise and prudent of this world, who wander in polar seas of splendid but endless and hopeless speculation, could have taken my place and seen how the Father of our spirits reveals Himself unto babes. When the Good Shepherd, moving among his flock, takes to his bosom some maimed and helpless lamb, who can know the joy of the favored one?"

A MIDNIGHT TALK WITH A WAIF.

AMONG the recent incidents of the work Dr. T. J. Barnardo, the philanthropic physician, is doing in rescuing the waifs of the London streets, is the following, which we give in the Doctor's own words: "It was a cheerless and rainy midnight some few weeks ago when I left the train in Moorgate Street station, in London, on my return from a journey. The dismal streets seemed deserted, but at the very entrance to the ticket-office, one crouching and ragged figure caught my eye, and hardly had I observed it before a pathetic voice reached my ears: 'Box of lights, sir! Only a 'apenny a box, sir!' It was the figure of a boy, shoeless and ragged, and obviously soaked to the skin. He was slight and fragile in appearance, and with a childish face bearing the look of wretchedness and misery which went straight to my heart. Of course, I was not going to lose sight of this midnight waif; so I opened a conversation, and turned it into a personal channel at the earliest opportunity. Where did he live? Oh, he lived in the Borough. By a curious coincidence I wanted to go there myself. Would he show me the way? That he would; for though he had earned only a few pennies that day, there was no more chance for him now that the late trains were in, and so, side by side, we trudged off through the sloppy streets. By the time we reached that region of squalor, I had heard much of his history, for his tongue was speedily unlocked.

For a year, he told me, he had been lodging alone in a common lodging-house, and picking up a livelihood by selling matches on the streets. His father had been a printer's compositor, who, at his death five years before, had left a comfortable little home to his wife and his son and two little daughters. The mother had evidently been a frugal and industrious woman, who had done her best to face the world and bring up her family respectably. But the lad said she had been 'werry ill for a long while'; they had obviously fallen steadily downwards in the scale of living, and it was melancholy to reflect that the tidy wife and careful mother had to go into the poorhouse, where she died, and was buried by the parish. This crowning tragedy in Charlie's life occurred thirteen months before I met him. The two little sisters had been received into the poorhouse school, and the boy, his heart rebelling against public aid, had taken to the streets. Nearly 1 o'clock in the morning we reached the lodging-house which was favored with Charlie's patronage. It was a much more forlorn-looking building than houses of a similar class are. Poor Charlie was in a piteous plight as he stood steaming in the glare of the fire. His bare feet were red and swollen, his rags limp and dripping, and his small face was thin and careworn, despite the childishness of its features. Poor fellow! His appearance went to my heart. Charlie is now safe and happy in our Homes, and, I may add is abundantly justifying my estimate and my hopes. I trust that a very short term of further stay therein will be sufficient to open up to him the great possibilities of a Canadian farmer boy's career."

MR. C. H. SPURGEON AT MENTONE.

THE famous pastor of the Tabernacle, whose sermons appear from week to week in these pages, is now spending a few weeks at his usual place of recuperation, Mentone, in the south of France. He suffers so intensely from the damp and fogs of the English climate in November, that he hurries away, before they appear, to the genial air on the shores of the Mediterranean. This year, in his devotion to his labors, he delayed his departure, and, in consequence, was prostrated before leaving; the journey, therefore was a painful one; but we are happy to learn that he has revived, and is progressing favorably. A press correspondent says: "Mr. Spurgeon has arrived at Mentone, and has once more settled in his favorite hotel, the Beau Rivage. This is situated at the extreme end of the East Bay, which is by far the most sheltered part of the town. He goes out a great deal each day, sometimes driving on the beautiful Corniche road, or up one of the wooded lateral valleys; at other times boating on the blue, calm Mediterranean, of which exercise he is very fond. While thus enjoying daily the fresh air and sunshine, Mr. Spurgeon manages to get through a vast amount of literary work. He of course rests from preaching, although he attends regularly the Scotch Church, where the worshippers are always glad to see him. Every morning, in his own room in his hotel, he conducts 'household worship.'"

AMONG THE INDIANS.

AN unexpected offer of help has come to the Rev. W. F. ReQua in a matter which he has long had at heart and made the subject of prayer. It is that of caring for the orphan children of Indians, of whom there are many, and who are totally neglected by the tribes. Some of them are exceedingly bright children, who, being thus without home influence, present most hopeful opportunities for educational and spiritual work. Mr. ReQua has cherished the hope that he might gradually be enabled to take charge of a few of these orphans, extending the work as God provided means, and, if possible, building a home, which he proposes to call "The Christian Herald Orphanage," to identify it with the journal whose readers have so materially helped him in his work. While these hopes were in his mind he received a letter from a lady in New York City, who asked that her name might not be published, stating that a friend who is not wealthy had been forming a fund for the education of her own little son. God has lately taken the boy to Himself, and his mother now desires to consecrate her little hoard to Christ's service. She informs Mr. ReQua that if he knows of an Indian orphan boy worthy of a Christian education, she is prepared to find the money for the purpose. Thus God answers the prayers of those who trust in Him!

Mr. ReQua suggests that there may be some readers of this journal living in country districts who might be willing to aid the work in another way. If they were willing to receive an Indian orphan into their home, either a boy to help in farm work, or a girl to help in household labor, always with the hope of obtaining some education, and especially sound Gospel teaching, the arrangement might be mutually advantageous. The proposal would involve the necessity for clothing, and cost of travelling from the Indian Territory, as Mr. ReQua, like other missionaries who go out to labor trusting in God for the supply of their needs, has no surplus funds for this or any purpose outside his evangelical work.

It is gratifying to learn that some kind reader of this journal has sent the missionary and his devoted wife a sum of money which he wished expended in the purchase of a cow. This has been done, with very pleasant results. Perhaps if it is known that Mr. ReQua could use sufficient clover or timothy seed for four or five acres with advantage to himself and the cow, some friend might supply that too. Barrels of clothing, and almost any kind of provisions that would bear transit, would be very welcome, and money, of course, which in the Indian Territory as everywhere else smooths many rough places in life. His address is Rev. W. F. ReQua, McAlester, Choctaw Nation, Indian Territory.

THE CONDITION OF THE EARTH IN THE MILLENNIUM.

By the Late Dr. Albert Barnes.*

No Millennium till After the Fall of Papacy and Mohammedanism—Satan to be Bound—Righteousness to Prevail—Its Duration—What that will Imply—The Rebellion at the Close—The Consummation—Declension and Antagonism.

It may be proper, in order to a correct understanding of Revelation 20, to present a brief summary of what may be expected to be the condition of things in the time of the Millennium of 1,000 years.

1. The Millennium will be subsequent to the downfall of the Papacy and the termination of the Mohammedan power in the world. Of course, then, this lies in the future. Our interpretation of the various portions of this book and the Book of Daniel, have led to the conclusion that the termination of those powers cannot now be remote. If so, we are on the eve of important events in the world's history. The affairs of the world look as if things were tending to a fulfilment of the prophecies so understood.

2. It will be a condition of the world as if Satan were bound; that is, when his influences will be suspended, the principles of virtue and Religion Will Prevail.

According to the interpretation of the previous chapters, it will be a state in which all that has existed, and that now exists, in the Papacy, to corrupt mankind, to maintain error, and to prevent the prevalence of free and liberal principles, will cease; in which all that there now is in the Mohammedan system to fetter and enslave mankind—now controlling more than one hundred and twenty millions of the race—shall have come to an end; and in which, in a great measure, all that occurs under the direct influence of Satan in causing or perpetuating slavery, war, intemperance, lust, avarice, disorder, scepticism, atheism, will be checked and stayed. It is proper to say, however, that this passage does not require us to suppose that there will be a total cessation of Satanic influence in the earth during that period. Satan will, indeed, be bound and restrained as to his influence and power. But there will be

No Change in the Character of Man as he comes into the world. There will still be corrupt passions in the human heart, though greatly restrained; and though there will be a general prevalence of righteousness on the earth, yet we are to remember that the human race is fallen, and that even then, if restraint should be taken away, man would act out his fallen nature. This fact, if remembered, will make it appear less strange that, after this period of 1,000 years of prevalent righteousness, Satan should be represented as loosed again, and as able once more, for a time, to deceive the nations.

3. It will be a period of long duration. On the supposition that it is to be literally a period of one thousand years, this is in itself long, and will give, especially under the circumstances, opportunity for a vast progress in human affairs. To form some idea of the length of the period, we need only place ourselves in imagination back for a thousand years—say in the middle of the ninth century—and look at the condition of the world then, and think of

The Vast Changes in Human Affairs that have occurred during that period. It is to be remembered, also, that if the millennial period were soon to commence, it would find the world in a far different state in reference to future progress from what it was in the ninth century, and that it would start off, so to speak, with all the advantages in the arts and sciences which have been accumulated in all the past periods of the world. Even if there were no special Divine interposition, it might be presumed that the human race, in such circumstances, would make great and surprising advances in the long period of a thousand years.

4. What, then, will be the state of things during that long period of a thousand years?

(a) There will be a great Increase in the Population of the globe. Let wars cease, and intemperance cease, and the numberless passions that now shorten life be stayed, and it is easy to see that there must be a vast augmentation in the number of the human species.

(b) There will be a general diffusion of intelligence on the earth. Every circumstance would be favorable to it, and the world would be in a condition to make rapid advances in knowledge. (Dan 12:4.)

(c) That period will be characterized by the universal diffusion of revealed truth. (Isa. 11:9.)

(d) It will be marked by unlimited subjection to the sceptre of Christ. (Ps. 2:7-9; 22:27-29; Isa. 2:2-3; 66:23; Zech. 9:10; 14:9; Matt. 13:31, 32; Rev. 11:15.)

(e) There will be great progress in all that tends to promote the welfare of man. We are not to suppose that the resources of nature are exhausted. Nature gives no sign of exhaustion or decay. In the future there is no reason to doubt that there will yet be discoveries and inventions more surprising and wonderful than the art of printing, or the use of steam, or the magnetic telegraph. There are profounder secrets of nature that may be delivered up than any of these, and the world is tending to their development.

(f) It will be a period of the universal reign of peace. The attention of mankind will be turned to the things which tend to promote the welfare of the race, and advance the best interests of society. The single fact that will make an inconceivable difference in the aspect of the world; for if universal peace shall prevail through the long period of the millennium, and the wealth, the talent, and the science now employed in human butchery shall be devoted to the interests of agriculture, the mechanic arts, learning, and religion, it is impossible now to estimate the progress which the race will make, and the changes which will be produced. For Scripture proves that it will be a time of universal peace. (See Isa. 2:4; 11:6-9.)

(g) There will be a general prevalence of evangelical religion. This is apparent in the entire description in this passage; for the two most formidable opposing powers that religion has ever known—the beast and the false prophet—will be destroyed,

And Satan Will Be Bound.

In this long period, therefore, the Gospel will exert its fair influence on governments, on families, on individuals; in the intercourse of neighbors, and in the intercourse of nations. God will be worshipped in spirit and in truth, and not in the mere forms of devotion; and temperance, truth, liberty, social order, honesty, and love will prevail over the world.

(h) It will be a time when the Hebrew people—the Jews—will be brought to the knowledge of the truth, and will embrace the Messiah whom their fathers crucified. (Zech. 12:10; 13:1 Rom. 11:26-29.)

(i) Yet we are not necessarily to suppose that all the world will be absolutely and entirely brought under the power of the Gospel. There will be still on earth the remains of wickedness in the corrupted human heart, and there will be so much tendency to sin in the human soul, that Satan, when released for a time (vers. 7-8), will be able once more to deceive mankind, and to array a formidable force, represented by Gog and Magog, against the cause of truth and righteousness.

Religion will no longer be trampled under foot, but will triumph. In all parts of the earth it will have the ascendancy, as if the most eminent saints of past ages lived and reigned with the Son of God in His kingdom. A spiritual kingdom will be set up, with the Son of God at the head of it, which will be

A Kingdom of Eminent Holiness, as if the saints of the best days of the Church should come back to the earth and dwell upon it. The ruling influence in the world will be the religion of the Son of God, and the principles which have governed His people.

The Rebellion of Gog and Magog, mentioned in Revelation 20:7, 8, will occur at the close of the Millennial period—the period of the thousand years. It is not said, indeed, that it would be immediately after that; but the statement is explicit, that it will be after that, or “when the thousand years are expired.” There may be an interval of an indefinite time before it shall be accomplished; the alienation and corruption may be gradual; a considerable period may elapse before the apostasy shall assume an organized form; or, in the language of John, before the hosts shall “be gathered to battle”; but it is to be the next marked and prominent event in history, and is to precede

The Final Consummation.

This will be a brief period. Compared with the long period of prosperity that preceded it, and perhaps compared with the long period that shall follow it before the final judgment, it will be short. Thus, in verse 3, it is said that “Satan must be loosed a little season.” There is no way of determining the time with exactness; but we are sure it will not be long.

We may thus suppose that at that time, from causes which are unexplained, there will be (a) a revived opposition to the truths of religion; (b) the prevalence, to a greater or less extent, of infidelity; (c) a great spiritual declension; (d) a combination of interests opposed to the Gospel; (e) possibly some new form of error and delusion that shall extensively prevail. Satan may set up some new form of religion, or he may breathe into those that may already exist a spirit of worldliness and vanity—some new manifestation of the religion of forms—that shall for a limited period produce a general Decline and Apostasy.

We are to remember that human nature will then be essentially the same as now. There is no intimation that man, as born into the world, will be then different from what he is now; or that any of the natural corrupt tendencies of the human heart will be changed. Men will be liable to the same outbreaks of passion; to be influenced by the same forms of temptation; to fall into the same degeneracy and corruption; to feel the same unhappy influences of success and prosperity as now—for all this appertains to a fallen nature, except as it is checked and controlled by grace. We often mistake much, in regard to the millennial state, by supposing that all the evils of the apostasy will be arrested, and that the nature of man will be as wholly changed as it will be in the heavenly world.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, “Forty Coming Wonders,” may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

* Originally printed in 1851. Reprinted in the current number of the Prophetic News, which contains, besides, articles on The Slaying of the Witnesses, The Heavenly Jerusalem, The Wise and Foolish Virgins, The Pause of Judgment, etc. Price six cents, including postage. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

Remittances by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft, or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as, when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk. Postage stamps should never be sent if it is possible to remit in any other way.

Receipts are not sent; the receipt of the paper by a subscriber is a sufficient proof that the remittance has been received. If the paper does not arrive promptly, please advise us, that we may see if the address is correctly entered.

Notice of Expiration of subscription is always sent in addition to the date being given on the address label. When not renewed by date of expiration, the paper is stopped; no notice from the subscriber being required.

Subscribers having renewed their subscription for 1889, receiving a notice that their term will expire at the end of the year and asking for renewal, will understand that the order was written previous to their renewal order reaching us, and will treat it accordingly.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Important Constitutional Amendment was introduced in the House on January 2 on its re-assembling after the holiday recess. Mr. Springer, of Illinois, proposed a joint resolution relative to the election of President and Vice-President and Representatives in Congress. It extends the Presidential term to six years, and makes the President ineligible for re-election. It abolishes the Electoral College, and provides for a direct vote of the people. Each State shall be entitled to as many votes as there are Senators and Representatives from such State. The bill further provides for the counting of the votes by a joint assembly of the two houses of Congress, and such regulations are provided as to preclude the possibility of the result not being announced prior to March 4. The term of Representatives in Congress is extended to three years, and shall expire on December 31. Each session shall begin on the first Wednesday of January in each year. The advantages of lengthening the Presidential term are obvious. The enormous amount of money spent at the recent election—much of it in bribery and corruption—and the loss from disturbance of business, led thinking men everywhere to wish such affairs did not come so often as once in four years. The abolition of the farce of Presidential electors also is an improvement.

A Humane Proposal Came Before Congress on January 4, in the shape of a report from the Secretary of the Treasury. It dealt with the question of establishing camps of refuge in the Arctic for shipwrecked and ice-bound sailors. Mr. Fairchild recommends that Congress should reimburse the revenue marine service for all moneys expended for feeding and clothing the castaways, inasmuch as the regular appropriation for that service is too small to admit of any unnecessary expenditure. In the Secretary's opinion the better plan of rendering assistance to shipwrecked sailors would be for two vessels, one to be furnished by the navy and the other by the revenue marine, to patrol the whaling waters as long as the season will permit, although he expresses no objection to the establishment of a camp as well. The Secretary also recommends that Congress appropriate each year a sum sufficiently large to handsomely reward parties who may live in Eastern Siberia for going by land to the rescue of shipwrecked American sailors whom it would be impossible for us to succor on account of the ice. Lieutenant Emory and Engineer Melville, on the other hand, advocate the camps.

A Remarkable Report on Pauperism in New York was presented to the Secretary of State last week. It gives the nationality of persons supported or relieved in New York last year at the public expense. The total was 50,271. Of these only 15,732 were native Americans. The Irish numbered 19,618, the English 1,958, and the Germans 7,454. Of the causes of pauperism the report says that 247 cases resulted from intemperance, 163 from vagrancy, 344 from idiocy, 5,997 from lunacy or insanity, 100 from blindness, 91 from lameness, 30,526 from sickness, 248 from old age, 11 deaf and dumb, 11,459 from destitution, 555 orphans.

A Proposal to Reduce the Postage on Letters between the United States and England from five to two cents has been made. Mr. John Henniker Heaton, M. P., has accepted an invitation to visit the United States. He expects to have the honor of appearing before Congress in advocacy of ocean penny (two cent) postage. His idea is that, as letters are now carried long distances by rail at the penny rate with a profit to the Post-Office departments of England and the United States, penny postage between England and America would be perfectly feasible. Twelve millions of letters, and 2,500,000 pounds weight of newspapers, etc., were sent in 1887.

The Admission of Five New States Will probably take place this year. Mr. Springer, who is chairman of the Committee on Territories, said, last week, to a reporter: "The bill to provide enabling acts for Dakota (one State or two, as the people there may decide), Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, will be called up in the House Tuesday, January 15, and I think it will be passed on that day or on the day following. I hope the names will be changed, so that instead of North Dakota and South Dakota we may have Dakota and Winona, and instead of Washington and New Mexico we may have Takoma and Montezuma. This will depend upon the action of the House." The bill provides for elections in all of these Territories for delegates to constitutional conventions in May next, for the conventions to assemble in July, and for a vote on the constitutions in October next.

Phonographic Congratulations Were Exchanged on New Year's Day between the mayors of New York and London. The Lord Mayor of London received on that day one of Mr. Edison's phonographs, into which the Mayor of New York had spoken a congratulatory message. The reply was at once made by the same medium in the following words: "The Lord Mayor of London has received, with much pleasure, the phonograph message of good-will from the Mayor of New York, and most heartily reciprocates the friendly feelings therein expressed. He earnestly trusts that the friendship which has so long existed between the two great English-speaking communities may last for all time, and that the only rivalry between them may be in the development of education, art, science, and manufactures, with the common object of increasing the well-being and happiness of the vast populations of the United States and the British Empire."

A Uniform Divorce Law for All the States is being earnestly advocated, and is receiving strong public support. At present a man may obtain a divorce in one State for causes which would not secure it for him in another State. And—what is still more serious—a man who could not legally be married in one State, can be married in another. At a meeting of representative ministers of various Protestant denominations, held at Baltimore on December 31, to discuss the subject, the Rev. J. T. Wightman, D. D., said that the United States sanctioned polygamy by recognizing thirty different causes and twenty-seven thousand courts for divorce cases! To the honor of South Carolina, be it said, she has never granted a divorce. In New York a man may have three wives, if they have been wedded to him in separate States. In Maryland he may have as many wives as he pleases, provided the first has been absent from him seven years. In 1878 there was 1 divorce to 7,466 of the population; in 1886 1 to 3,703. Throughout the United States the average is about 1 divorce to 50 marriages. The ministers adopted a resolution recommending that Congress have power to regulate the law instead of the Legislatures of the States.

The Pope has Issued an Encyclical Letter, in which he deplores the degeneracy of the times. It opens with thanks to God for the consolations which the Jubilee rejoicings have brought to the Pope, and to the Catholic world for its tokens of affection and devotion. Turning to religious matters, the encyclical complains that the tendency of the age is toward material interests, and that this tendency is strengthened by worldly pride, an evil press and drama, demoralization of the arts, and a changed education in schools, materialistic and atheistic teaching obscuring true notions of right. Socialism, nihilism, and communism, it says, are also outcomes of this addiction to material things.

A Contradiction of Osman Digna's Assertion that Emin Pasha was captured on October 10 is given by a Greek traveller who arrived at Suakin on December 31 from Khartoum, whence he started two months ago, coming by way of Kassala. He says that nothing had been heard at Khartoum of the fall of the government of the Equatorial provinces, or of the capture of Emin Bey. On the contrary, he says that the forces of the Mahdi had been twice defeated in Bahr-el-Ghazel. The letters of Mr. Stanley have been delayed. They are not expected to reach England before March.

Gen. Boulanger Has Issued His Address to the electors of Paris. It is devoted chiefly to disproving the charge that he is plotting to become a Dictator. He says: "When a Minister, I was overthrown under the pretext that I was the personification of war. Now I am opposed as the personification of a dictatorship. If I could ever have entertained the idea of playing dictator, it would have been when, as Minister of War, I had the whole army in my own hands. There has been nothing in my conduct to justify such a suspicion. I accepted the sympathies of all without dreaming of stealing popularity from any. There is nothing dictatorial in a programme that demands constitutional revision by the most democratic system—by a constituent assembly." Paris, however, is not likely to forget that the late Emperor made even stronger protestations of fidelity to the Republic."

The Emperor of Germany is Anxious to Make his antagonism to his father's policy as conspicuous as possible. On New Year's Day he gave the order of the Black Eagle to Herr von Puttkamer, formerly Minister of the Interior. Practically the only important act of Emperor Frederick's brief and tragic reign was the dismissal of this official, who is recognized all over Germany as the type of everything hateful and oppressive in the Junker bureaucracy. His disgrace was hailed by Liberals throughout Europe as a triumph of decent politics, and his being singled out now for the highest honor conferred on New Year's Day to any German is significant. The Kreuz Zeitung says it is an act that signifies the Emperor William's satisfaction with Puttkamer's course in the "disgraceful intrigue" which led to his dismissal by the late Emperor Frederick.

The Next Few Weeks will be the best time for canvassing for new subscribers. We are happy to learn that many of our friends are already introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD among their friends and neighbors. Any one desiring sample copies for this purpose, will be supplied free of cost by writing for them, stating explicitly how many can be advantageously used. Address The Manager 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal were received last week to the amount of $136.75. They were from: New York City $100; Omaha, Neb., $2; Parsons, Kan., $2; Southport, N. Y., $1; Diamond Springs, Kan., $4.75; Bollineau, Dak., $1; Camden, N. Y., $1; E. Des Moines, Iowa, $5; Des Moines, Iowa, $5; Gambier, O., 50c.; Woodhaven, N. Y., $2.50; Sparta, Wis., $1; Plattsville, Ont., Can., $2; Philadelphia, Penn., $4.50; Long Branch, N. J., $2; Lancaster, Ont., Can., 50c.; Oostburg, Wis., $2. We heartily thank our friends who have thus liberally responded to our appeal on behalf of this fund. We can assure them that their gifts will be the means of cheering and helping many a poor preacher, who, having no library, and often not a single commentary, finds the weekly visit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a valuable aid in his work.

The Evangelical Alliance for the United States has issued a circular calling the attention of the people to insidious attempts now being made in several States to undermine the public-school system. It says: "The bulwark of the common schools is now assailed along the line of States by insidious methods and immoral political deals, in which American principles and rights are bartered for foreign votes. There is an organized and persistent attempt, under foreign leadership, and occasionally under the mask of devotion to liberty of conscience and freedom of worship, to subject the infant wards of the State to proselytizing influences and discipline; to prevent by spiritual threats and other undue influence the attendance of children at the public schools, and to pervert to sectarian purposes the School Fund." These attempts have been made in Maine, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and New York. Christian citizens in other States should be on the alert in this matter, and not leave to their assemblymen the duty of scrutinizing bills in any way affecting the public schools. If they are in any doubt about the effect of any bill, they should write for information to the Evangelical Alliance, 42 Bible House, New York.

The Tragical Death of a Bride and Bridegroom is reported from Arkansas. The young couple had been very ardently attached for some time, and their love increased as the difficulties in the way of their union developed. When those difficulties were surmounted, their delight passed all bounds and they looked forward to a life of happiness. The wedding-day was fixed for December 27. On the afternoon of that day the prospective groom started from his home for the dwelling of the bride, where the marriage ceremony was to be performed. When he reached the bayou the ferry-boat was gone, having drifted down-stream. As it would require some hours to get it in running order again, he undertook to ford the stream, which was much swollen with the rains. His horse became unmanageable when half-way across and threw him into the water. He was swept down by the current and drowned. The news was carried to the waiting wedding-party and delivered to the bride herself with shocking abruptness. She maintained her composure for the time, but she said to her mother, "It is a death-blow." She became dangerously ill, and on December 30 she died. It was a sad ending to the romance. That the death of the bridegroom should have caused the death of the bride, shows how devotedly she must have loved him. The love of the Church to the Bridegroom is tested so; His death brought life to her, but in proportion as she loves Him she dies to the world. (Rom. 6: 11.)

A Delusive Promise Tempted a Boy to Desert a happy home on Staten Island, N. Y., recently. On December 31, a detective on Broadway, New York, noticed a bright, intelligent, well-dressed lad trying to beg from the passers-by. He went to the boy and questioned him. The boy said he lived at Stapleton, Staten Island. One day, about a month ago, being in New York City, a man accosted him and spoke very kindly to him. The stranger urged him to leave home and come and live in the city with him, promising to treat him well, and make a rich man of him. The pictures he drew of the glorious life of the city, the chances there were for a bright boy with shrewd guidance, and the certainty of wealth and power, proved too strong a temptation for the ambitious lad, and he yielded. The man was kind to him, but the boy soon found what he was wanted for. His protector trained him for a sneak thief, and employed him in going into flat-houses to steal any valuables he could find, and even into back yards to steal linen from the wash-lines. The man would wait safely outside to receive the product of the boy's expeditions. The boy soon realized that he had been duped, and had sufficient sense to know that he was on his way to a prison rather than to wealth and power. Therefore, though he was kindly treated, he seized the first opportunity to run away, and was begging a few pennies to pay his fare back to his father's house. It is much to be wished that Satan's victims, lured into his service by promises of worldly success, were similarly wise in time, and would seek their Heavenly Father rather than continue living in sin. (Ezek. 18: 31, 32.)

A Remarkable Discussion Among Specialists in brain diseases took place at the Academy of Medicine in New York on Thursday last. It was at the regular meeting of the Society of Medical Jurisprudence and State Medicine, and the subject was the brutal murders recently committed in Whitechapel, London, in which the victims were horribly mutilated. Dr. Austin Abbott led the discussion. "These slaughterers," he said, "are wholly within the lines of the habitual conduct of barbarous ancestors indulged in for the pleasurable sensation of witnessing tortures. Cruel mutilations are not, therefore, inconsistent with average soundness of mind. The Whitechapel murderer is behind the times. He is an anachronism, but not necessarily to be accorded the charity of considering him insane." Dr. Spitzka and others also discussed the question, and it was the general opinion that the fiend was not insane. It is gratifying to find that the medical profession is beginning to recognize the evil of allowing criminals to escape punishment by setting up the plea of insanity. Yet in this case an able lawyer would have no better basis for such a plea than Dr. Abbott's suggestion that this criminal may be impelled to the commission of his crimes by hereditary proclivities. Even among men who are not criminals there are many who are conscious of "taints of blood." They find it impossible to reform. Happy are they who in such cases accept the deliverance which the Apostle Paul experienced and graphically described. (Rom. 7: 19-25.)

An Electrified Store in Meriden, Conn., caused some excitement in the neighborhood on January 3. A heavy rain-storm was drenching the streets, and a clothing merchant went out of his store to take in some goods exposed for sale outside. They were hanging against the front of the store, and appeared to have undergone no change. But no sooner had the man taken hold of a knitted jacket, which was the first article at hand, than he received a violent shock and was thrown to the pavement. He recovered and made another attempt, but this time his hand was scorched, his arm was paralyzed, and he felt intense pain in the back of his neck, as if some one had struck him a violent blow. The man's cries brought the neighbors to his aid, and they experimented with the electricity. Sparks could be drawn from any of the articles on the store front, and the front itself was fully electrified. An electrician, who was sent for, found that the awning in front of the store, after being saturated with rain, had overlapped an electric light wire, and had conducted the electricity to the store front, which was made of iron, and this in turn had electrified the goods suspended against it. The trouble came from the changed condition of the awning. When dry it might have touched the wire harmlessly; but when saturated, it became a conductor. It is so with some forms of spiritual and moral mischief. In his normal condition a man may be in contact with temptation without falling, but when under the influence of liquor the temptation may acquire power over him and involve injury to himself and others. (Isa. 5: 11-13.)

A Diver's Narrow Escape From Death is reported from Philadelphia. It appears that, having to repair the keel of a vessel which was sunk in the Schuylkill River, he put on his diving suit and descended, carrying a large patch with him to nail over the hole. When he had been down half an hour, the man in charge of the line by which signals are exchanged between the diver and those in charge of the air-pumps discovered that something was wrong. He could get no answer from the diver, and the line was slack. An alarm was given, and the men pulled up the diver. The rope had become entangled about the man's feet, and he came to the surface feet first. He was unconscious, and it was a long time before he could be restored. When he was able to speak, he said that while he was nailing on the patch, he suddenly became aware that his supply of air was cut off. He became alarmed, and started to walk to the place where the air-pumps were; but before he reached them he fell unconscious, and knew no more until he opened his eyes and saw his comrades working over him for his restoration. The cause of the trouble was, that the diver had carelessly adjusted the air-hose to the back of the helmet, and it became detached while he was at work, thus depriving him of air. There is always a danger of an analogous negligence affecting Christian workers. Their spiritual life depends on continual supplies of grace from on high, and if they neglect the means by which that grace is obtained, they lose power and vitality. (John 13: 5.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. William Noble is suffering from an overstrain of work, and is compelled to take a period of absolute rest.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey addressed crowded meetings at the Albert Hall, Nottingham, England, during the month of December.

The Lutherans are growing rapidly in this country. In 1870 the number of communicants was less than 400,000. Now there are over 1,000,000.

Peter Bilhorn has commenced his evangelistic tour, which this year includes North Adams, Holyoke, and Springfield, Mass., and New York.

Dr. George D. Dowkontt, the Director of the Medical Missionary Society, asks us to state that he has received a donation: "For Jesus' Sake," $10.

The queen of Madagascar has presented Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt with a gift of $100, as an expression of her interest in the total abstinence work.

The Revs. Sam Jones and Small will hold services in Los Angeles about the middle of January. It is quite probable that they will spend a week or two in Santa Rosa, while on the Coast.

Evangelists Pratt and Birdsall have commenced their year's work with churches among the Berkshire Hills in western Massachusetts. They commenced a series of meetings in Methuen, Mass., on December 30.

Major George A. Hilton is holding very successful meetings at Seattle, Wash. Ter. The Bijou Theatre, in which he speaks, is well filled with all classes of people, and some very remarkable conversions have taken place.

A series of inter-denominational services is being held in the old John Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of New York, during this month. There is preaching every week-day by eminent ministers of all denominations, and the service lasts one hour only, from 3 to 4 o'clock.

The International Committee of Y. M. C. A. has issued its annual list of Prayer-Meeting Topics for 1889. It has the new feature of a list of fifty-two topics for Boys' Meetings. It may be had, price five cents, from the International Committee, 48 East 23d Street, New York.

The Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church of Brooklyn, of which Dr. Meredith is pastor, dedicated, with appropriate religious services, on January 6, its new house of worship. The church will seat over two thousand people. Dr. George F. Pentecost was formerly pastor of the church.

The evangelical clergymen of the Ninth Ward, New York City, have, as a result of the Chickering Hall conference, decided to adopt the house-to-house visitation plan of city evangelization that has the indorsement of the Evangelical Alliance, and has been so successful in Brooklyn, Buffalo, and other large cities.

THE LORD'S OWN SALVATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen." Hos. 1:7.

A Message of Judgment and Mercy—Both to be Proclaimed—A Limit to God's Long-suffering—God's Way of Saving His People—I. Often Puts Visible Means Aside—True in Grace—In Manner of Calling—In Revivals—In the Day of Trouble—II. God's Reasons for Doing So—To Prevent Boasting—To Take Away Reliance on Second Causes—To Endear Himself to His People—To Encourage Them in Future Troubles—III. The Gospel in the Text—Salvation Possible in Every Case—To be Sought in God.

GOD is very considerate toward the messengers by whom He delivers His Word to men. They are bound to deliver His Word faithfully, whatever the tidings may be. Sometimes the burden of the Lord is very heavy. The prophets have to denounce woe upon woe, with terrible monotony of threatening; and then it is that God hastens to relieve them by giving them a gracious word, so that they may refresh their hearts, and not be altogether crushed beneath their load. We have an instance here of the Lord's care for His heralds. Hosea was bound to say, in the name of the Lord, "I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away"; but when he had said that, with heavy heart and tearful eye, he was allowed to add, "but I will have mercy upon the house of Judah." The Lord will not let our spirit fail beneath a burden which is all of grief; but He will grant us the high privilege of proclaiming grace, as well as publishing judgment. The connection of our text suggests the thought that there is of God. He bade Hosea say, "I will no more have mercy upon Israel." He had borne with that guilty people very long, and overlooked their daring crimes; but He would do so no longer: He would give them over to the enemy, who would carry them quite away, so that Israel, as a distinct monarchy, should cease to be. Oh my hearers, God is very gracious, but His Spirit shall not always strive with you. A little more sin, and you may be over the boundary, and God may give you up. Stay, I pray you! Do not further provoke. Repent, and turn unto the Lord with full purpose of heart.

But now the text brings us to consider this fact, that God will save His own people in His own way. He tells us positively how He will save the house of Judah, and negatively how He will not save them. "I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen."

I. First, then, God is pleased very often, in working salvation, to Put Means Aside.

He said of Israel, "I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel." He thus struck out of the hands of His people their only defence; they had trusted in their bow, and the Lord destroyed it.

First, the Lord does this in the work of salvation by grace. Salvation is of the Lord alone, Salvation is not of human merit, for there is no such thing. Plenty of demerit you can find anywhere and everywhere, but merit there is none. Neither are we saved by any good dispositions which lie dormant and latent within us, for there are no such things. There is none good; no, not one. The heart is, in every case, deceitful, and desperately wicked. You may, perhaps, have seen a picture drawn by a cunning artist. It represents a lady, very fair and beautiful to look upon; but the picture is so contrived that you discover underneath it the form of death. That which appeared outwardly so lovely is only a veiled skeleton. Just that kind of change the Spirit of God makes upon our moral beauty; he turns it into corruption by making us see what we really are. The bones of the skeleton of depraved nature stand out through the proud flesh of our self-righteous pride. Then we cry to God for mercy. Then we give up all idea of saving ourselves. Neither bow, nor sword, nor horse, nor horsemen, are any longer our confidence. The

are looked upon by us as weapons of rebellion—and they really are so; and we throw them away, and will have nothing further to do with them. The man upon whom there is found a bad coin is very earnest in declaring that it is none of his; somebody must have slipped it into his pocket! He will not own it. A little while ago he thought to himself, "What a splendid imitation it is! How well I have cheated the government!" Self-righteousness is nothing but a piece of counterfeit coin; and when all goes well with us, we say, "How well I have done it! How splendid is my righteousness!" But when the Spirit of God arrests us, then we are anxious to get rid of the very thing wherein we gloried.

False Expectations.

It is so in the actual salvation of men, and it is often so in their calling to this salvation. Was any man ever converted in the way in which he expected to be? I hardly think so. I know what you thought would happen; at least, I know what many expect. They look for an interesting incident. They suppose, perhaps, that they will have a very wonderful dream; or that, going to hear a minister, there will be something very striking in the sermon which will alarm or depress them, so that they will be tempted to commit suicide, or do some other outrageous thing. Possibly, on the other hand, they half expect that there will happen a sudden death in the family, or sickness upon many, and that so they will be impressed; or, possibly, like Martin Luther with his friend Alexis, they may be walking out in a thunder-storm, and Alexis will be killed, and they will be aroused in that way. I myself always looked for something very remarkable, but it did not come to me. And yet something happened which was more remarkable than the most remarkable thing would have been: I simply heard the gospel command, "Look unto me, and be ye saved." I looked, and I lived; and that is all the story I have to tell you. Dear hearer, that is all the story, very likely, you will ever have to tell. You will not be saved by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, nor by horses, nor by horsemen, but by simple trust in the Lord alone. What more do want? What more can you hope to receive?

In the next place, the same thing is true with regard to the progress of religion, and the work of revivals. Let every man work as he feels called to do, provided he follows the rules of his Lord; but we have seen revivals of which it was said at the first, "We will get up a revival." Revivals can be got up, but are they worth the trouble? What has been the end of them all? A few years after—the result, where is it? I hear an echo say, "Where is it?" I cannot tell you what has become of it; in many cases I fear that the disappointed church has become more hard to stir than it was before. Brethren, I hopefully believe that there will soon come a deep, widespread, lasting revival of religion, and it may be it will come just as it used to in apostolic times. How did they act in Jerusalem? What did they do in Asia Minor? What was

The Apostles' Plan?

I cannot find, for the life of me, that they did anything else but preach the gospel, while at the same time they went from house to house, and held meetings for prayer: and thus the kingdom of Christ came. They did not work up a revival, but they prayed it down. They simply waited upon the Lord in supplication and service. They might have tried other plans had they been so unwise as to think of them. They would never have tolerated the dodges of the present period, the adaptations of the gospel, and the degrading of it, by secular lectures, entertainments, and so forth. They never dreamed of keeping abreast of the times with liberal philosophical teaching; but I recollect that Paul was so resolutely ignorant as to say, "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified."

"But, surely," cries one, "we must have some advancement in theology. We ought to know more than our old fathers did." This is the pride of our hearts. Would you advance beyond the apostles? Into what can you advance but into the ditch of error? They did not crave for an advance in the apostolic times; but they were satisfied to speak over again "all the words of this life."

They Remained True

to the "faith once delivered to the saints," and they found salvation in this primitive revelation. Why should we go gadding elsewhere?

I believe that the same great truth will be made apparent as to the establishment of the truth of God in this land. How my soul has been burdened with the many that have turned aside, and the few that remain faithful to the covenant God of Israel! These last are not so very few as some would make them out to be, but yet they are sadly scant in number. God has reserved unto Himself seven thousand that have not bowed their knee to Baal. Oh, that there were a thousand times as many! But we have striven with all our might to bear our outspoken testimony for the old faith, and we have hopefully thought that many would rally to the cry; but it is not so, nor, perhaps, is it God's mind that it should be. Men of eminence have held their tongues, and brethren once ardent for the gospel have practically gone over to the enemy. I am sure that the Lord will confound the adversary, and bring forth His truth as the noonday; but it may not be as we would suggest. He has His own way.

Dear friends, I would make one other application of these words, and I trust it may be profitable. The text has a voice to God's people

In the Day of Trouble.

I may be addressing godly people who are in most terrible distress. You have faith in God that He will bring you out of your affliction. Maintain that faith; and if for a long time no deliverance should come, still maintain it. Perhaps you have hopes from a certain quarter. Those hopes may come to nothing; that cistern will leak. You have another friend to whom you can apply. Yes, you can apply; that is all that will happen, for that tank also holds no water. When you have tried all the cisterns, be wise enough to recollect the fountain. It may be that there will come a day when every door will be fast closed, and you will see no way of relief whatever; but bethink you that then there will remain the one way, which you should have followed at the first. In such an hour let my text speak with you: "He will save them by the Lord their God, and He will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen."

If thou must have thy bow and thy sword, or else give up hope, then the battle rests with thyself. How canst thou plead the promise of God? But when thou putteth the bow aside, and the sword is hung on the wall, then canst thou go to Him who is better to thee than bow and sword, and rest in Him, and He will work gloriously, so that His own name shall be magnified, and thou shalt be blessed. I pray the Holy Spirit to apply that truth to any heart here that is heavy by reason of sore conflict at this time. Oh, for grace to rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him, for in His own time and way He will work, and none shall hinder Him.

II. But now, secondly,

God Has Good Reasons

for this. I shall very briefly touch upon this theme. The Lord is full of wisdom, and His doings are ever prudent. He always has good reasons for everything, but one of the things we should never do is, to ask His reasons. It is an unreasonable thing to ask God to give reasons for what He does. His answer to arrogant questioners is—"May I not do as I will with my own?" Oh for grace to be silent where God is silent! Is He not God, and we worms of the dust? Who shall presume to ask Him why or what He does? Better far to say, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth Him good." If He never gave us a reason for what He did, we ought to be well content to leave all with Him, knowing that He must do that which is best and wisest.

But, so far as in humility we may dare to look, we have looked, and we believe that the Lord's ways are intended, first,

To Prevent All Boasting.

How prone we are to self-esteem! How wickedly we rob God to honor ourselves! If God uses us—if God uses any sort of means—yet there is no credit to the means which He uses, but to Himself only. Some of us might have enjoyed a much larger blessing, if we had not grown top-heavy with the blessing we already enjoyed. God saved a soul or two by you, my dear friend, and you began to rub your hands, and think that you were something better than an angel. You were running away with God's glory, and thus ending your own influence. Often this is the cause of the drying up of hopeful usefulness. The instrument began to exalt itself, and so the Lord put up the bow, the sword, the horses, and the horsemen, and then all men saw what powerless things these were. Oh, that the Lord may never feel compelled to leave you and me to ourselves!

My dear hearers, some of you are not saved yet, and I will tell you what happens with many of you. You come here on Sabbath days, and to Monday prayer-meetings, and Thursday services, and I am glad to see you. You also read your Bibles; I am glad of that. You say a thing you call a prayer: I do not know whether I am glad about that. But I will tell you what you are doing. You are making yourselves quite comfortable, as if, by some singular process, salvation would insensibly penetrate you by your being found in good company, hearing the Word, and so on. Let me remind you that as the way of salvation. I do not want you to run away from hearing the Word, or from the use of the means; but I do want to assure you that, if you trust in these means, you will be disappointed in the result. These are mere pitchers, but they will not quench your thirst if there is no water in them. Look to God, not to your minister. Get to Jesus Himself rather than to the sacred Book. Remember how the Saviour puts it—for this is not a wrested reading—"Ye search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: but ye will not come to Me that ye might have life." Pass beyond the Scriptures to the Christ whom the Scriptures reveal. "Ye must be born again!" You must distinctly go to Christ for yourselves, for the Lord saves men by the Lord Jesus Christ, and He will not save them by books, and prayer-meetings, and sermons any more than He would save Judah by the bow, the sword, the battle, the horses, and the horsemen.

Again, beloved, the Lord blesses His people Himself that He may endear Himself to them. He reveals Himself to them apart from other things, that they may see Him and know what He can do. You do not know to the full what God can do so long as He keeps within the bounds of the ordinary means, or you feel that you are well provided for by ordinary methods. You are apt to forget that because your quarterly allowance is received so regularly. Now, suppose that your business fails. Ah! then God must provide for you: then you will see what God is doing. Suppose that, instead of being in one place, you should be kicked about like a football, and still the Lord should give you rest in Himself; then you will see what He can do.

God Provides for You,

I like that bit in Abraham's life when the king of Sodom offered him the property which he had captured. Abraham had a right to it, for he had taken it in war; but he said, "I will not take from a thread to a shoe-latchet, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich." No, no; the servant of the Lord would not have a king talk as if he had been the maker of the Lord's own servant. God Himself will so help you, so bless you, so carry you through, that you shall not have to take off your hat to any king of Sodom, neither shall he be able to go up and down the city and say, "I have made Abram rich." God will put the king of Sodom away with the horses and the horsemen, and double the mercy to you by handing it out with His own hand after His own way.

I think that the Lord does this also to encourage you in all future troubles: He has rescued you in a way beyond means, without means, and even against means, and therefore you cannot be in a condition from which He will be unable to rescue you. If you should come to be more friendless and more feeble than you now are—what then? Are your or dependent upon friends? If so, you are in an evil case. But if all your supplies are in the Lord, you are no worse off than you used to be. When the Lord strips you bare of your own garments, then you can go to His wardrobe and put on the raiment which He has provided. You cannot wear God's clothes while you glory that you are wearing your own. When want has swept your table, then all the bread on it will come from your God. When the Lord has brought you down to the bare rock, then you can go no lower, and there is a chance to build a house which will stand against flood and wind. Be reliant upon Him who can work by means, but can equally well work without means whenever it seemeth good in His sight! In such confidence you will find security against all ill weathers. The Lord changes not, and therefore you shall not be consumed.

III. My time is done, or else I was going to say, thirdly, there is a gospel in this text for those here present. I can only hint at this in a few words. The first gospel is that Salvation is Possible in Every Case.

Notice, "I will save them." What can stand against a divine "I will"? With God nothing is impossible. If there be nothing to help Him, what does it matter? He does not need help. He expressly abjures the aid of a creature when He says, "I will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen." My dear hearer, whoever you may be, there is hope in your case: if God saves, then you can be saved. If you had to save yourself, you would not be saved; but as there is nothing wanted of you, but God worketh salvation with His own right hand, your case is hopeful. How clear is this! And how bright with comfort!

Next, salvation is to be sought of God alone. Do not go wandering about to the second cause. Go straight to the Lord Himself, and go at once. Straightforward is the best running in the world. Go straightforward to your God, your Saviour. Let there be no waiting for tears, feelings, repentance, sanctification, or anything else; but arise at once, and go to your God, and for Christ's sake plead with Him to have mercy upon you at this moment. As salvation does not necessarily come through the outward means, if I address any here who have neglected the outward means, let them come away to God at once, though they have neglected His courts, profaned His day, and despised His ministers.

You came in here with no idea of worshipping God, but only just to see the place, and what the preacher is like. Never mind,

Look to the Lord

Jesus Christ straight away! With these eyes that are so blinded, look! If you cannot see, it may be that in your obedient attempt to look, the Lord will give you sight. He does not command you to see, but He does command you to look to Him and be saved: so that, if you turn your eyes toward Jesus, though they be sightless eyeballs, He will make them see. If you will trust in Christ, you may cast your guilty soul on Him at this moment. Why should you not do so? Then for you the rain will be over and gone, and you will see the bright light in the clouds. Instead of the dark and dismal winter of doubt, you shall have a summer-time of hope and comfort. These dreary weeks of cold despair shall give place to a season in which heaven and earth shall blend in your experience in a joy unspeakable. The Lord grant it, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE FOREIGN INVASION.*

RECENT statistics seem to prove that our immigration is being drawn from lower and lower strata of European society. The cheapened passenger rates of the transatlantic steamboat lines have enabled people to emigrate whose poverty formerly compelled them to remain at home. The bulk of Italian immigration, which formerly came from the North, now comes from the South. It is not only in regard to Italy that this observation holds good, but also in Ireland and Prussia. In Ireland there has been a relative increase of immigration from the poorer western provinces of Connaught and Munster, while formerly it was the comparatively richer provinces of Ulster and Leinster which sent the majority of our aldermen and municipal rulers. We see in New York of what nationalities its population is made up, and we see to our cost how hopeless it is for the little American remnant to assert its right to govern the vast metropolis in accordance with American ideas and in an American spirit. But what right have we to wonder at this result, as long as we take no measures to stem the tide that is threatening to overwhelm us?

Fiery Writing On the Wall.

There is already an unnatural ferment in our society, resulting from race-antagonism, class-antagonism, and lack of organic cohesion. We have permitted our hospitality to be abused and we are now beginning to reap the consequences. What does the appearance among us of such phenomena as anarchism and socialism mean, if not this? What do the perpetual convulsions in economic centres—the strikes, boycotts, and riots—mean if not this? They are a fiery writing on the wall which he who runs may read. They mean that we have been too hospitable for our own good; they mean that we have absorbed in excessive quantities an indiscriminate diet—some of it of an extremely indigestible kind—which we are unable to assimilate, and which therefore produces disease and disorder. A nation can perish as an individual can—it can pass through crises so serious that if it survives, it is no longer the same that it was. Its health, its strength, its faith, may be broken. The new order which sooner or later follows the chaotic upheavals is sure to be a different, though not necessarily a better, social condition.

The Plan of Restriction

which I proposed some years ago is by no means an ideal measure; but it will, if properly enforced, have the effect of shutting out the very worst classes; and it has the additional advantage of being perfectly feasible. My idea would be that no immigrant should be permitted to land, unless he can exhibit a certificate signed by the American consul residing nearest his home, testifying to his good character, and showing that he complies with the conditions, whatever they may be, which Congress may see fit to impose. In all European countries such information is easily accessible; the parish, communal, and police authorities usually being able to furnish all information desired concerning the individuals within their jurisdiction. If the proper care is exercised in the selection of consular officers, and if it were clearly understood that the policy of the administration

The addresses are by Prof. Boyesen, President Gates, Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D. D., Bishop A. avored restriction rather than indiscriminate hospitality, the object of the law would, no doubt, be accomplished in lessening the total number of immigrants and excluding the most undesirable classes.

A Fatal Gift.

We cannot afford to neglect the condition of the common people, for the condition of the common people is the condition of the commonwealth. Society has a way of avenging itself for the wrongs committed on the lowest of all its members. Sir Robert Peel gave his daughter a magnificent riding-habit on her nineteenth birthday, and, attired in the embroidered gown, she rode side by side with him in the parks of London. She had scarcely returned home before she was taken ill with the most malignant form of typhus fever, and in ten days was laid to rest in the churchyard. And the secret was a very simple one. The poor seamstress, in a garret in one of the slums, while she was embroidering that garment looked upon a husband shivering in the paroxysm of chills, and she took the half-finished garment and laid it over him; and the garment took up the germs of fever, and conveyed them from the hovel of the poorest to the palace of the statesman. And so, we are bound together in one bundle of social life; and if we neglect the poorest and the lowest, society will avenge herself in the destruction of the highest and the richest and the most cultivated.

ADMIRAL LUCE.

THE expedition to Hayti for the recovery of the steamer Haytian Republic, which had been wrongfully detained by the revolutionary Government, was placed under the command of Admiral Stephen B. Luce, U. S. N., one of the best known and most popular members of the service. In addition to his naval services he has won a reputation as the originator of the naval apprentice system, the founder of the Naval War College on Coaster's Harbor Island, near Newport, R. I., and as the author of works on tactics. Admiral Luce has been in command of the naval forces on the North Atlantic Station since July, 1886 and will be retired from active service in March, 1889.

He is now more than sixty years old. Like so many old salts, he is a short, heavily bearded, sturdy sort of man. While on shore duty he is always the centre of a group of admiring friends, who like nothing better than to listen to his reminiscences. To them he is known familiarly as "Steve Luce" and he is often called so to his face, in spite of the dignity that the gentleman knows so well how to assume. He did most of his service during the war in the blockading squadron, and was made a commander shortly after the Confederacy collapsed. The Admiral is known among the old society men of New York City, with whom he was quite a favorite during the time he was in command of the training ship Minnesota, in Brooklyn, ten years or more ago.

THE YELLOWSTONE HOT SPRINGS.

(See Illustration.)

By no means the least wonderful of the many wonders of the Yellowstone region are the calcareous hot springs of Gardiner's River, at the north of the gigantic National Park. "You may imagine," says a recent visitor, "a river falling over a series of steep rapids, over terrace after terrace, only, instead of being simple terraces, they are hollowed into basins of different sizes, giving to the terraces a very irregular appearance. The water comes from an almost innumerable number of hot springs—thousands of them—which form themselves into a stream and then rush over the declivity. When the water issues from the springs, it is very hot. It fills the little reservoirs on the terraces, and in each leaves a residuum of lime or silica. As you look at this cataract from a distance, it gives you the idea of an irregular white wall. It looks, indeed, like a mass of snow and ice. Columns of steam rise from it here and there, but towards the foot of the declivity the water becomes cool enough for people to bathe in it. Into some of the basins the water no longer flows, and those are crumbling away into a calcareous powder, but those into which the water still flows have their rims constantly replenished with wavy, frill-like borders of all kinds of vivid colors. Most of the basins are about six feet in diameter, and about three feet in depth, but the upper ones are much larger—one of them being forty feet in diameter and twenty-five feet deep."

JAPANESE Y. M. C. A.'S.

IN a farewell address given in the Twenty-third Street Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York, a short time ago, by General L. D. Wishard, who is about to start on his five years' tour, to organize Young Men's Christian Associations in Asia, he said: "The Young Men's Christian Association has particularly demonstrated its adaptability to young men in foreign lands. I receive by mail every day many evidences of the success of the institution among heathen people. There are now four or five branches in Japan, four in China, two in Ceylon, and several in India, where, I am informed, the members are exerting their influence upon the Government schools. Mr. Swift, who was formerly Assistant Secretary of this institution, went to Tokio some little time ago to teach in one of the Japanese colleges. Now he has founded a Young Men's Christian Association from some students in the Imperial University, and he intends to give up his position as Professor and devote his entire work to the furtherance of the interests of the institution. This shows the possibilities of the work before the young men all over the Christian world, and it is believed that soon I will be in a position to call upon the home branches for men who are thoroughly equipped as Secretaries to go into Asia and take charge of and develop branches of the Young Men's Christian Association there."

PROGRESS IN PALESTINE.

THE remarkable growth of the City of Jerusalem is described in the Neuesten Nachrichten, a German newspaper published in Palestine. It states that new buildings are rising daily: churches, gardens, and institutes of various kinds are filling up the formerly desolate neighborhood to the distance of half an hour's walk beyond the old limits of the city. The Jews are to the front as builders. Their houses spring up out of the ground like mushrooms. The Rothschilds have completed a new hospital. Close by it there is a new Abyssinian church. The Russians are also great builders; they have erected a new church, consulate, lodging-houses for pilgrims of the orthodox national churches, and a hospital. The Russians have also built a high tower upon the Mount of Olives, from whose summit the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea can both be seen. The Greeks and Armenians are also busy builders, but they provide for the bodily rather than for the religious demands of the pilgrims.

THE ECLIPSE OF THE SUN.

THE little group of amateur astronomers depicted in the illustration on page 29 as intent on the phenomenon of an eclipse of the sun, had its counterpart in many a Western city on New Year's Day. The event, whenever it occurs, arrests the attention of all, and though the young folks may not be able to understand the problems connected with it, or even know its cause, they generally contrive to secure the necessary optical instrument of a smoked glass to watch the phenomenon. With far more intense interest, with delicately constructed instruments and with trained intelligence the same phenomenon was last week observed by parties of learned astronomers at several points on our Western coast. Large sums of money were expended in conducting the scientific observations successfully, and so important were the results expected that the New York Herald arranged with the Western Union Telegraph Company for the control of a telegraph wire three thousand miles long to be carried into the New York office direct from San Francisco, in order to obtain early and authentic accounts of the astronomers' observations.

The most important problem which astronomers hope to solve by an observation of a solar eclipse is that of the luminous envelope which surrounds the sun, and which they call the corona. When the moon comes between the sun and the earth, totally eclipsing the greater luminary, this ring surrounding the moon's edge, which was at one time thought to be upon the moon but is now found to belong to the sun, appears like a fiery crown. It consists of broad rings of light from which spring individual rays extending an enormous distance. In the eclipse of 1878 there were two of these rays which curved upward like wings, and met like the arch of a Gothic window at a distance of millions of miles. Various conjectures have been hazarded as to the materials of which the corona is composed, and what it is and does. The modern theory as stated by Prof. J. K. Rees, of Columbia College, is that the matter in the sun is in a gaseous state, although the gases are not in the form in which we know them. From the enormous pressure exerted upon them they are probably of the consistency of honey. They are intensely hot, hotter than we can form any idea of, but they are under enormous pressure, and are crushed together into a viscid liquid like honey. Of course the moment that this pressure is released a great explosion follows. Now, these gases come to the surface of the sun, radiate their heat, expand and form the atmosphere of the sun. From this point the gases which form solids by combination fall back upon the sun in the form of rain and are once more dissociated by heat. Outside of this point, however, there are glowing gases.

In 1869, during the eclipse on August 7, elaborate observations were taken of the corona with the spectroscope, and it was found that it contained iron. In 1878 Young was able to resolve the line of iron into two—one of that metal, the other of coronal gas. The substance is not known to our chemistry, but it is luminous at half a million miles above the surface of the sun, and must be considerably lighter than hydrogen. To sum up the result of the observations of the five eclipses from 1860 to 1871, it was ascertained, first, that the corona belongs to the sun; second, that the prominences are composed of hydrogen and other gases in a state of incandescence, and rise from an envelope some thousands of miles thick; third, that the corona is of a highly complex constitution, being made up in part of glowing vapors and in part of matter capable of reflecting sunlight.

In observing the eclipse last week, Professor Pickering, who was at Willow, Cal., was able to secure between fifty and sixty photographic negatives, which he will bring home to develop. He reported exceptionally fine weather, and says that he had a grand view of the two wing-like protuberances, which were fully two million miles in extent. The same phenomenon was observed at Chico, Cal., where Professors Payne, Pearson, and Wilson were engaged. It will be several weeks before the result of the observations will be available for astronomical science.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.
For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.
Parting and Poverty.

I PROMISED secrecy—what could I have refused her?—and she said: "The other day two of the sisters were at our house—I may not tell you their names, for fear of making mischief—and they were talking together between themselves, and did not notice that I was present—or else they didn't care. And I heard one of them tell the other that she had heard, secretly, that in Zion men were allowed to have many wives; and she used that word 'polygamy' very often, and said that was what the people of the world called it."

"Well, Mary dear," I replied, "that is no great secret; we have all heard that said before. Wicked people who hate the gospel say that, and a great deal more, in order to bring scandal upon the Church to which we belong; but, of course, it isn't true."

"Ah, but I haven't told you all," she said. "The sisters had a long talk about it, and they explained whom they heard it from, and it was from no one outside the Church. And then one of them said that Elder Stenhouse had heard all about it, and knew it was true, only of course he did not talk about such things yet; but that the time would come when every one would acknowledge it, and all the Saints would have many wives. I was frightened when I heard this, and very angry—for I thought of you—and I spoke to her, and said it was all untrue, and I'd ask Elder Stenhouse. And they scolded me very much for saying so, and said it was very wicked for a child like me to listen; and that was why I did not like you to call me 'a child.'"

"Well, darling," I said, "I'll not offend you any more in that way; and it was very good of you to tell me anything you thought I ought to know." Then I kissed her, and continued, "But, after all, I don't think it's of any consequence. It's the old scandal, just as in the early days they said wicked things of Christ and His apostles. Elder Stenhouse knows all that people say, but he has told me again and again that there is not a word of truth in it, and I believe him."

"You think so, Sister Stenhouse," she replied, "and I suppose I ought to think so too; but if it's all false, how did people first begin to think of it? People don't say that the Mormons are murderers and thieves, because we have given them no reason to think so. Then why should they think of such an unheard-of thing as polygamy—surely there must have been some reason. Don't you think so?"

"No, dear," I answered. "Elder Stenhouse says that sometimes very wicked men have joined the Church, and have done all manner of shocking things, so that they had to be cut off; and then they went about trying to make other people believe that the Mormons were as wicked as they were. There was John C. Bennett, who lived a frightful life at Nauvoo, and then tried to make out that Joseph Smith was as bad as he was. And Marsh, the president of the twelve apostles, and Orson Hyde, when they apostatized, not only said bad things of Joseph, but took affidavit, and swore solemnly before the magistrates, that the prophet had been guilty of the most fearful crimes." I kissed her again, and she said:

"Well, perhaps you are right"; but I could see that in her heart she was not convinced.

Then we talked of ourselves, and all that interested us; and she told me all her childish hopes and ambitions; and to me—young as I was myself—it was pleasant to listen to her innocent prattle. She promised to come and see me when Elder Stenhouse had gone, and I should be left alone; and when we got back to the rest of the party, we were as firm friends as if we had known each other a lifetime.

At midnight, Saturday, June 15, 1850, the steamer left Southampton for Havre-de-Grace, bearing on board the first two Mormon missionaries to Italy; one of them was my husband. The Saints had called in the evening to bid

Elder Stenhouse good-bye; and as he was, of course, to travel "without purse or scrip," they vied with each other in showing their appreciation of his position and his devotion to the faith. The poorest among them would not be denied the privilege of contributing their mites to aid in the conversion of the Italians; and none of the brethren felt that they could show too much kindness to the departing missionary. Just in this way have all the foreign missions of the Mormon Church been projected and sustained; the elements of success were always present—devotion and self-abnegation on the part of the missionaries, and an earnest, self-sacrificing disposition on the part of the people, commanding respect, however erroneous or foolish the foundation of their faith.

In the bustle of departure, Mr. Stenhouse seemed never to have thought about himself, and certainly he made no preparation for me. I had full confidence in him, however, and loved him devotedly, and knew that my love was returned. But men who look for miracles, and count upon special providences for daily bread, are not generally very prudent or far-seeing in their domestic arrangements. Elder Stenhouse had been told that "the Lord would provide," and it therefore seemed to him superfluous that he should interfere; it would have been a lack of faith to have shown too much interest in what might become of me. He left me with only five dollars. I now realized the loneliness of my position; there was no earthly friend to whom I could turn for sympathy at a time like this. Before my Heavenly Father alone I could pour out the bitterness of my soul and all my griefs, and in His presence weep and pray.

When the Apostle Snow called upon Mr. Stenhouse to go to Italy, the Saints willingly accepted the responsibility of providing for me during his absence. They thought it was more an honor than a burden to have this charge committed to them; but it was very humiliating to me to be placed in such a position, however anxious they might be to assist me and to serve the general cause. To face opposition, or to give my all for my religion, I was willing indeed; but to depend upon others for my daily bread was utterly repugnant to my feelings, although, of course, if the Church sent away my husband, whose proper place and duty it was to support his family, it was only right that the members of that Church should undertake the responsibility. But then, and at many other times in my life, I have learned the truth of Christ's precept: "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

The American Apostle was not without worldly wisdom when he proposed that an unmarried man should be appointed to preside over the Southampton Conference, as his wants would be few. But Mr. Stenhouse had been solicited by a friend, who had a wife and children, to secure his appointment; and with ready confidence in that friend, he overlooked his own interests and my welfare, and I was left to pass through trials and privations which I can never forget.

The Saints were very kind, and took pleasure in doing all they could for me; but the mistake which my husband committed in leaving his friend to succeed him as president of the Conference was soon apparent. The "friend" thought of his own family first, and the family required all that the Saints could be expected to contribute; and even then they had not enough. I therefore received only such little sums as could be withheld from them; and to make the matter worse, those who had any property or estate were counselled to sell all, and "gather to Zion." The more wealthy Saints were soon gone, and the current expenses of the Church fell heavily upon those who were hardly able to support their own families. They tried to send me something every week, and I have no doubt they did send me all they could. When their contributions reached four or five shillings I thought myself fortunate; more often I did not receive the value of fifty cents in the whole week, at times less, and sometimes nothing at all. That unfailing comfort to respectable poverty, a cup of tea, was my greatest luxury, but at times for weeks together I had not even that; I had nothing but bread; but I never complained.

Whenever it was possible I concealed my true situation from every one, and in my almost daily letters to my husband not a shadow of a hint was ever dropped relative to my own privations. I wanted him to be successful in his mission, and I feared that his energy would desert him if he knew of my difficulties. I was in extreme poverty, but for myself I was not in trouble. God would provide for me, I felt; and it was glorious to suffer in a sacred cause.

But darker days, days of severer trial, were creeping slowly near me. Up to this time I had worshipped God and loved my husband with a perfect heart. Now the dark shadow of an accursed thing was looming in the distance, and approaching surely, if slowly. In some way an idea had got abroad that the Mormons were somewhat unsound respecting the marriage question. Still, the elders stoutly denied the charge, and the more they were accused, the more strenuous became their denials.

At a public discussion at Boulogne-sur-Mer, in France, the Apostle John Taylor, in reply to the accusations of polygamy which were brought against him, said: "We are accused here of actions the most indelicate and disgusting, such as none but a corrupt and depraved heart could have conceived. These things are too outrageous to admit of belief. . . . I shall content myself with quoting our views of chastity and marriage from a work published by us, containing some of our articles of faith—'Doctrine and Covenants.'" He then proceeded to quote from the "Book of Doctrine and Covenants" such passages as the following: "Marriage is ordained by God unto man; wherefore it is lawful that he should have one wife, and they twain should be one flesh." (p. 218.) He quoted many other things also, among which might be enumerated the following: "Thou shalt love thy wife with all thy heart, and shalt cleave unto her, and none else." He quoted also several other passages of Scripture, which had direct reference to the subject—each powerful to put aside even the idea of polygamy, and each equally powerful as an argument against polygamy itself.

Let the reader here note the value of what Mormons say when their faith is called in question. See and judge! Brother Taylor, who spoke at that meeting, and utterly denied polygamy, had himself—at that very moment when he so atrociously perjured himself, and when he swore that no Mormon had more than one wife—five wives living in Salt Lake City. One of his friends there present had two wives; and the other was married to a mother and her own daughter! Any conclusion, any expression of disgust at these abominations and deliberate perjuries, I leave to the reader.

Among those who came to see Mr. Stenhouse before he left for Italy was Elder Margetts, an English elder of some prominence in the British mission. At the picnic, of which I have already spoken, I noticed that this elder was more than usually attentive to a pretty young sister, who was also present. There was always an affectionate familiarity among the Saints; as I previously mentioned, they were like brothers and sisters, and addressed each other as such. But the attentions of the elder I speak of pointed a little beyond all this. He could not, perhaps, be accused of any open impropriety, but he certainly looked much more like the girl's lover than an ordinary friend or her spiritual adviser. I knew this elder's family in London, and his conduct pained me a good deal. So I drew the attention of my husband to the circumstance; and he said the elder was foolish, but he would speak to them, and he did.

After the departure of the missionaries, this elder remained for several days. He then returned to London, but it was not long before he was again in Southampton, and he still paid marked attention to the same young sister. This caused unpleasant remarks among the Saints, who, at this time, certainly did not believe that polygamy was practiced in Utah.

At a later date this elder, with some others, was again in Southampton, and I was invited to take tea with them at the house of one of the Saints. In the course of the evening there was a general conversation on "the work of the Lord," in which I, of course, was greatly interested. Whenever any of the missionaries were visiting, the Saints would seek their society, just like children who were glad to meet again their parents after a long absence; and at such times they were at liberty to ask what questions they pleased. On the evening I speak of, I well remember that the general subject of conversation was the apostasy of the Christian Church, from the true order of God's salvation. Prominence was given to the history of Abraham and his descendants, and occasional allusion was made to their marital relations; but nothing directly was spoken. It was evident that these elders only wanted to drop a word or two here and there, to suit those who wanted it; but nevertheless they spoke to obscurely and mysteriously that they could easily have retracted what was said, if any one had accused them of teaching a doctrine which they were unwilling openly to avow.

When I returned home that night, I was fully satisfied that the elder I have spoken of (Margetts) had a reason for his frequent visits to Southampton, and shortly after the young sister went to London. Whether polygamy was ever to be a doctrine of the Church or not, it was very clear to me that the London elder was a polygamist at heart.

The more my mind dwelt on these things the more sick at heart did I become, and faint and weary. I had, however, personal cares enough to engage my attention. I found that I could not depend upon the Saints to provide me with even the barest necessities of life, so I looked about me and made inquiries for some light employment by which I might support myself. My health at that time would not have allowed me to do much, but for a long time I could not get anything at all to do. I had, of course, been used to teaching, but employment of that kind it was just then impossible for me to take, even if I could have got it; the only resource which seemed left to me was to find occupation for my needle, and it was a long and weary time before I could obtain even this. At length I got a little plain sewing to do, and out of the miserable pittance thus earned I contrived to pay my rent and provide a few necessities; but at times this too was beyond my power, and I have gone a fortnight at a time with nothing to eat but dry bread. Still my faith never failed, and thus the weary days passed by.

Now, however, a new interest began to gather round my life, for I expected before the end of the year the arrival of a little stranger to share my affections and my care. This certainly was a sad beginning of domestic bliss, but still the thought was pleasant to me. I had at that time no one to aid me or comfort me. The Saints were very kind, but they could not supply the place of an absent husband. My dearest friend, Mary Burton, used to come as often as she could to see me, and her presence was like a gleam of sunshine; but she was so young and innocent and happy that I had not the heart to trouble her with my sorrows. All my jewelry and trinkets, and the greater part of my wardrobe, had gone in providing for my daily wants, and in preparing those necessary trifles upon which a young mother bestows so much loving care. My health was daily failing, and sometimes I doubted if I should ever be well and strong again. But all that I suffered was for the Church, and that thought sustained me.

Often I would sit alone and think—think of the past, and all my early day-dreams of love and hope and bliss; think of my husband in a far-off land, devoting his life and all his energies to the preaching of the latter-day glory; think of those whisperings of that accursed doctrine (polygamy) which has since brought desolation and anguish to the hearts of so many weary women; think of my future life, dark as its promise even then appeared. Sometimes I heard from Italy—heard how my husband was progressing with his work, and with wifely love I sympathized with him in all his difficulties, for he told me how arduous the task was in which he was engaged.

HEALING OF THE LEPER.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for January 20, Mark 1: 35-45, Golden Text, Mark 1: 42.

Jesus Praying before Sunrise—Second-hand Communion with God—Advantages of Morning Prayer—Jesus Interrupted—Popularity Failing to Retain Him—The Leper's Doubt—Not Ability but Will—The Will of God May be Discovered—Christ Bearing Our Infirmities—Difficulties in the Way of Healing—Similar to those in the Way of Salvation—Christ's Injunction to the Healed Man—Result of his Disobedience.

AFTER Jesus had done a great work of teaching and healing, He retired to rest just as other men do. But "in the morning, rising up a great while before day, He went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed." There are some believers who seem to drag on a kind of life which subsists on prayer-meetings, open-air meetings, and evangelistic services: they take part in the prayer-meetings, and reflect the religious emotions of others who have more direct dealings with God. But their own spiritual life is almost entirely second-hand. They believe what others believe, they feel what others feel, they say what others say, they testify what others testify, they object to what others object to; but they have little or no Direct Intercourse With God.

Some of these satellites are a kind of shadow of some good minister, and all of these think little of communion with God in private. But those who have to do with God Himself, those who see His hand in all which happens, cannot live without communion with God. They can exist without meetings and services, if need be, and not suffer, but they cannot be deprived of communion with God without getting all astray. Our dear Lord did not commune with His Father as a kind of forced thing, a kind of strained example to His Disciples, although He felt no need of it Himself. Jesus was really Man, and, as such, really dependent on His Father, He "emptied Himself," and so leant on His Father as we do on Him. He could not enter on His day's work until He had settled matters with His Father. The one glimpse of his communion with God which Isaiah gives us—He wakeneth morning by morning, He wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned (Isa. 50:4)—shows us the obedient Son asking and receiving directions, while the larger glimpse we have in John 17, shows us that the great subject of His prayers was His own disciples. A heart disciplined to know its own dependence, instinctively turns to God, and arranges all things, the greatest and the smallest, in intelligent intercourse with God. Jesus' special time for prayer was the early morning. God first, man and things second. There is no time for communion with God like the morning. We then come to the world refreshed by God, instead of coming to God burdened by the world. But

Jesus Was Interrupted.

This was the beginning of His day's work, to show how the Son of God, who saw His Father in all that happened, could bear an interruption in the most important work of the day. It was from His disciples. They had wakened later, and their first morning experience was to miss Jesus, and to seek after Him. Jesus always lived in His Father's presence. He did not need to seek Him. The disciples said to Him, "All men seek for thee." What would a successful evangelist have answered? Probably he would have said, "Then I must take advantage of the disposition of the people, and strike when the iron is hot; it will never do to leave this place just now." But Jesus said unto them, "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also, for therefore came I forth." "It seems contrary to common sense to lose such an opportunity," says unbelief. But the all-seeing God, who created common sense, can see much farther than we can. When He sent Philip from his splendid work in Samaria to the desert, there to win one single soul for God, He knew what He was about. When He allowed the same Paul who turned the world upside down, and who founded churches all over Asia Minor, and some parts of Europe, to be shut up in prison for years before his death, God did not love souls the less. He was not losing His interest in His work, but He was bringing out other witnesses (Phil. 1:14), and He was providing from the epistles then written a library of doctrine for the Church, which is a precious part of His inspired Word unto this day. So Jesus took orders from His Father, and "preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and cast out devils."

It was about this time that He preached His Sermon on the Mount; and on His descent from the mountain, there came a leper to Him, beseeching Him, and saying unto Him. "If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean."

"If Thou Wilt!"

Oh, how many in the present day take up the cry of the leper, and say, "If Thou wilt, Thou canst heal me of my cancer, my consumption, my fever, my paralysis, my gout, my eczema," etc. But is there no possibility of discovering what is the will of God? Paul says, "Be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is." (Eph. 5:17.) Therefore we know it is possible that we should know the will of God. Paul prayed for the Colossians that they "might be filled with the knowledge of God's will" (Col. 1:9), and Epaphras labored fervently for them in prayer that they might "stand perfect and complete in all the will of God." (Col. 4:12.) Thus we see that God wants us to know His will. How do we discover His will about the salvation of our souls? Surely by the written Word. He willet "all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth." (1 Tim. 2:4.) "The Lord is long-suffering to us ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." (2 Pet. 3:9.) And, moreover, "He bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness." (1 Pet. 2:24.) Why should He bear our sins if He did not want to save us? But does His Word declare anything about His will to heal? "Himself took our infirmities and bear our sicknesses." (Matt. 8:17.) What for? He healed all that were sick,

That He Might Fulfil

this word. Thus He bore our sicknesses that He might heal us. Again, He came down from heaven, not to do His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him. (John 6:38.) How did He do it in relation to the sick? Was it by bringing sickness upon them? We do not read of His doing this in a single case. Was it by giving them patience to bear their sicknesses? We never read of this either. No; but He healed "all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease," and in doing so, He did always those things which pleased God. (John 8:29.) And a message is left us in James, making provision for this day, and to all time, that "the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." (James 5:14, 15.) "But how is it then," says one, "that I have prayed, again and again, that God would heal me, and I am no better? I have taken for granted that it was not God's will to heal me." Have you never known one pray, again and again, for salvation, and still have no consciousness that he was saved, because he had been praying and striving, instead of trusting himself over to Jesus, and accepting His salvation? Would you, therefore, say that it was not God's will to save him? Or would you say that He had not fulfilled the condition which God imposed upon him, and therefore was not saved.

The poor leper looked upon his case as peculiar. He was ceremonially unclean, and no one could touch him without being contaminated. He had his eye on what he was, rather than on what Jesus was. This was to healing. But Jesus did not blame him. He was "moved with compassion, and put forth His hand, and touched him, saying, I will, be thou clean." The poor suffering man felt nothing; but he trusted the word of Jesus, and immediately his leprosy was healed. It must have been a marvellous change—the loathsome sores all healed, the distorted and swollen features all natural, the skin all clear, and this the work of an instant! None but God could do this.

Jesus gave him a charge as He sent him away: "See thou tell nothing to any man: but go thy way, shew thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them." Jesus would have had the priests brought to testify of what God had done for the leper, and this would have had far more weight than his testimony of himself. If all those whom God heals without doctors or remedies in the present day, in answer to the prayer of faith, would go back and shew themselves to their former doctors, that they might have the opportunity of seeing the handiwork of God, it might be of much more service to God, and to other sufferers, than talking of it far and wide. True, many doctors might try to explain away some of the symptoms, and again some who have been healed might be proved to have been less ill than they imagined; but no true child of God wants to keep up a deception, or would object to know the truth about himself. Every one should be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh a ground of the hope or confidence which is in him. Some may object, "But unconverted people cannot understand faith in God, because He is unreal to them, and they will take for granted either that I am not cured, or that I never was really ill." This is quite true. But if they find you now perfectly healthy, and their own diagnosis in the past has proved that you were diseased, then they are in face of the working of a power which is not of man; and who knows how God may make His power known to them! Had the leper gone first to the priests—the very priests who had pronounced him unclean, and who knew that his case was incurable—what a testimony would it have been!

The leper "went out, and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more openly enter into the city, but was without, in desert places, and they came to Him from every quarter." The leper thought he knew better than Jesus, and he

in spreading abroad the matter. Many who have been healed of the Lord have done the same thing; without waiting to know what God wanted them to do, they have blazed abroad the matter, forcing it upon the notice of people who are most unprepared to believe in God's immediate working in these days. This has led to much imitation, and people who have had no direct dealing with God in the matter, have set up to teach what they call faith healing. But let us not be discouraged; God overrules. "What is the chaff to the wheat?" (Jer. 23:28) He asks. If He sees that it is needful for us to be humbled through spurious imitations of what God would teach through us, let us welcome the loving discipline, and say, "He hath done all things well."

NOTICE TO READERS OF THY HEALER.

On January 1 the size of Thy Healer was reduced to 20 pp, and the price changed from 75 cents to 50 cents. Those whose subscriptions run into 1889 will have their time extended, to credit for the difference in size and price. It is hoped that by reducing the price the circulation will be extended, otherwise it will be a considerable loss. Will not those who have found blessing through its pages recommend it to others?

"IF I COULD ONLY SURELY KNOW,"

If I could only surely know
That all these things that tire me so
Were noticed by my Lord—
The pang that cuts me like a knife,
The lesser pains of daily life,
The noise, the weariness, the strife—
What peace it would afford!

I wonder if He really shares
In all my little human cares—
This mighty King of Kings!
If He who guides through boundless space
Each blazing planet in its place
Can have the condescending grace
To mind these petty things.

It seems to me, if sure of this,
Blent with each ill would come such bliss
That I might covet pain;
And deem whatever brought to me
The loving throb of Deity
And sense of Christ's sweet sympathy,
Not loss, but richest gain.

Dear Lord! my heart shall no more doubt
That Thou dost compass me about
With sympathy divine!
The Love for me once crucified
Is not the Love to leave my side,
But waiteth ever to divide
Each smallest care of mine.

"The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular work
"Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as one specially to be recommended for young, weak, or doubting Christians.
Here is a warm hand and a loving heart tendered you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them. This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefited by it."—Preface.

"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be precisely such a one as a Christian would desire to put into the hands of any young man or woman troubled with doubts concerning the religious life. It has reference to the experience of the soul rather than the mind, and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation having its motive in love to cultivate faith in God."—Boston

MR. CHAS. N. CRITTENTON—THE RESCUE WORK OF THE FLORENCE MISSION IN NEW YORK

MR. CHARLES N. CRITTENTON, Founder of the Florence Mission in New York. A Memorial to a Dead Daughter—The Surroundings of the Mission—The Life and Death of Little Florence—The Germ of the Mission—The Sphere of the Baxter Street Work—Success of First Efforts—The Method Adopted—Another Bereavement—Extension of the Work.

DISTINGUISHED visitors to an American city, say European critics of our manners and customs, are sure to be taken to see the cemetery. The reflection on our taste in entertaining visitors is not wholly to our discredit. In rearing enduring memorials to our beloved dead, and in making beautiful by arborial and horticultural skill the places in which we have laid the dear dead bodies, we manifest a fidelity of affection of which human nature has no cause to be ashamed. It is, however, with another kind of memorial that we are now concerned—one that also speaks of intense and passionate love—the memorial of a dead child.

A Costly Memorial, too, but one that the Christian—who sometimes, as he looks at the expensive piles of granite or marble in our cemeteries, thinks that the money which they cost might have been used to better purpose—may look upon with approving thankfulness. It stands in a position where one would not look for a monument to the dead. In Bleeker Street, New York—the notorious Bleeker, not now quite so villainous a neighborhood as it was twenty years ago, but still so reeking with vice and crime as to render its name offensive to lovers of order and morality—stands this monument, within sight of the Bowery, with its teeming thousands of busy pedestrians, conspicuous night and day like a lighthouse on the shoals of the storm-tossed sea of human sin and misery. It is like a lighthouse, too, in its purpose; for it tells the weary, shipwrecked voyager of a haven of peace and rest and safety. It seems out of place there, yet it is precisely in its proper place. The illuminated sign, which it swings out over the pavement, with its conspicuous legend, looks out of character with its neighbors, which invite the passer-by to billiards, or the dance, or the intoxicating cup; but many of the former denizens of the neighborhood bless God that it was placed there, where, right in the midst of their sin and sorrow and shame, they saw its beckoning light and accepted its invitation. Nearly seven years is it since little Florence Crittenton (whose portrait appears in the medalion on the first page), the little four-year-old darling of the prosperous New York merchant, passed away, leaving behind her a home so blank and vacant by her removal that neither wealth nor amusement nor the pleasures of the world could restore its brightness. About a year later—in April 1883, her name shone out in letters of light in the moral darkness of Bleeker Street, and the Florence Mission became to women long spiritually dead the door to a new life. There is no soil so fruitful as that in which the dead are laid; none has borne so many blessed growths for the healing of the world's maladies as that which has been watered by the tears of sorrow; this child, living, the joy of a small circle, becomes, when taken out of it, a centre of wide-reaching influences, the spring of efforts which have restored to far distant homes the daughters that sin and Satan snatched out of them. Sorrowing fathers and mothers, grieving that a fate worse than death had befallen their loved ones, expecting that their gray hairs would go down in sorrow to the grave, have received their lost ones, repentant, alive from the dead, united to them by a closer bond than the broken one—the bond of union with them in Christ, and they know that they owe their unexpected, unspeakable joy to the fact that God put it into the heart of a bereaved father to rear to his little daughter's memory such a monument as the Florence mission.

"Florence Mission,"

Mr. Charles N. Crittenton (whose portrait appears on the first page), the founder of the Florence Mission, is fifty-five years of age, having been born in Jefferson County, N. Y., in 1833. Of an imposing presence, gentlemanly and courteous of bearing, his hair but slightly tinged by the frosts of the past years, and eyes singularly alert and yet gentle, he makes a favorable impression on first acquaintance, which increases with more intimate knowledge. In March, 1882, his home in New York was a very happy one. His business as a wholesale chemist was a prosperous one, and he was in possession of a considerable fortune, which every year increased. Three dear children had been given to him and his beloved partner in life, but the second one God had taken to Himself. Little Florence, the youngest of the three, was the light of the home, her intelligence, winsome ways, and bright, joyous spirit rendering her very presence a delight. "Papa's Baby," the name she clung to when she was a baby no longer, indicated the affection subsisting between the two. She was but a little over four years old when death silenced her sweet voice, and stilled the tiny, pattering feet forever. Mr. Crittenton felt when he laid her in the grave that life had lost its joy.

At that time Mr. Crittenton was unprepared to meet so terrible a sorrow in faith, or to believe that God was dealing lovingly with him. The cares of business, the occupations of city life, the joys of domestic happiness, had filled his mind to a degree unfavorable to spiritual growth. A member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, he had been satisfied with a perfunctory attention to religious observances, and liberal contributions to the needs of the Church. But now, under a great sorrow, he yearned for a higher life, a closer knowledge of God's ways, and a clearer, firmer faith in His love. It came, and in a chastened spirit he tasted the peace and happiness of the Divine life. He was thinking of some suitable memorial for Florence, when one day early in 1883,

The Germ of the Mission was received into his mind. He was at a Daily Prayer-Meeting in New York, and spoke casually to a stranger there. The two men walked away together, and the stranger, Mr. Smith N. Allen, described a mission work which he and Mr. Henry B. Gibbud had commenced in an upper room in Baxter Street, and of the need there was for more of such work in the city. Mr. Crittenton was interested, visited the Baxter Street work subsequently, and was impressed by the degradation surrounding it. His new friend offered to be his guide in an afternoon tour among the slums and dives of that section of the city. The offer was accepted, and the sights which met his eyes during that afternoon were a startling and appalling revelation to him. No greater depth of human depravity seemed possible than that into which the hundreds of lewd and utterly shameless men and women whom he met had fallen. Satan had done his very worst and most awful work upon them.

Almost Like An Inspiration

the idea of a memorial mission came to Mr. Crittenton—a mission to reach these lost creatures and tell them of a God who delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he would turn from his evil way and live. Under these circumstances the house in Bleeker Street was acquired, the two rooms on the ground floor were thrown into one for a meeting room, the upper part was fitted up with beds for the homeless, and the basement as a kitchen and dining-room. A matron was secured, Mr. Allen was engaged as an all-night missionary, and the Rev. John Dooley as superintendent of the home work. Mr. Crittenton undertook the entire cost of the institution, and has borne it, with occasional voluntary help, to the present time. The Mission was opened April 19, 1883. Its value was soon proved. In a short time, not only was every bed occupied each night, but poor miserable outcasts begged to sleep on the floors; and at the night meetings, in the room below, the number of unhappy creatures who came seeking spiritual help and guidance was surprising. The results were most blessed.

Many fallen girls were helped to lead virtuous lives. During the first year one hundred and seventy-six were received into the home. When it was possible, a reconciliation with their parents was effected, and they were sent home. In other cases they were put in the way of earning a livelihood. Some became skillful milliners or dressmakers, others became clerks, and others domestic servants. Considerably more than half of those who came to the mission were rescued from vice, and are still living virtuous lives. Some of them have been married and have made exemplary wives.

The Method Adopted

is to receive all comers, and the all-night missionary who patrols the haunts the lost creatures frequent at a distance from the mission, gives cards of invitation to those who might not know of the place. The utmost liberty is given to them. They are entertained, fed, medical attention is provided when it is needed; they may stay as long as they wish, and leave when they desire to do so. No rule that might be irksome, or suggestive of penal confinement, exists—no rule at all but the rule of love and of Christian sympathy. Some who come are so destitute of clothing, even in the winter, that garments have to be supplied; and it is in this department that Mr. Crittenton welcomes and solicits help. Any Christian lady sympathizing with the work, who has cast-off wraps, shoes, or clothing of any kind by her, would render welcome help by sending them to the Florence Mission.

The meetings are held every night, commencing at half-past 8. Three classes may be found before the platform from which volunteer Christian workers make their appeals. On one side are the girls then staying in the home; on the other are the girls who have strayed into the meeting from the street, attracted by the music and singing, and in the winter by the warmth and comfort; thirdly, in the rear are men who have been similarly drawn, and who want to be helped to give up their intemperate and vicious lives. Outside, the missionary goes from place to place, speaking kindly to the class of women whom the mission was established to help, directing them to the place (See illustration No. 1 on first page), and putting into their hands a card on which is written: "Any mother's girl wishing to leave a 'crooked' life, may find friends, food, shelter, and to a better life, by coming just as she is, at any time, to the Florence Night Mission." Some come the next day; others respond immediately, and the meeting receives reinforcement by their entrance, while the superintendent passes through the room, speaking to one and another, giving welcome and kindly words. (See Illustration No. 2.) Later on, the hymns, the addresses, and the short, earnest prayers have had their effect on some, at least, of those present; the Holy Spirit is touching their hearts, and, melted to tears, they accept an invitation to the inquiry-room, where good, Christian ladies talk with them, hear their story, pray with them, and point them to the Saviour. (See Illustration No. 3.) Many sad stories have been told there, of a long and bitter struggle to earn a living in the hard, pitiless city; of loss of work, destitution, debt, expulsion from the boarding-house, temptation and fall. In other cases the story is of a giddy, heedless girl, enticed away from a comfortable home, lured by visions of a life of pleasure, only to be speedily disenchanted. Whatever the contributing circumstances may have been, the end is the same, and to all the mission offers help in the effort to return to the path of virtue.

Extension of the Work

soon became a necessity. Mr. Crittenton, seeing how manifestly God was blessing his efforts, realizing, from the accounts given by the rescued women, as well as by personal observation of his own and his helpers, how wide was the field on which they were laboring, took measures to increase and extend the facilities at first provided. He bought the house next to the mission and threw both into one, building also in the rear, until he had an establishment with the sleeping accommodation of an average hotel and with separate rooms for the various departments of the work. (See Illustration No. 4.) About two years ago—just before these improvements were undertaken, Mr. Crittenton was called again to pass through the ordeal of domestic affliction. His beloved wife was prostrated by sickness, and in a short time she died. The effect of her loss on her bereaved husband was, as at the death of little Florence, to withdraw him still more from secular occupations and draw him nearer to God. He made arrangements for almost complete retirement from business, and consecrated his time and money unreservedly to his great work. Latterly he has been earnestly endeavoring to promote similar efforts in other cities, and has visited several in the hope that by telling Christian people how God has blessed the work in New York, they might be stirred up to undertake a like enterprise. It is his earnest hope that ere long he may see a chain of these rescue-stations stretching across the entire continent, and in every great city where Satan's victims are stranded, an organization established from which kindly men and women will go forth to lead the prodigals to the Father's house.

THE JUDGMENT TO COME.

BY REV. F. B. MEYER, B. A.

WE believe that Jesus Christ will come again personally. A proof text for this is Acts 1:9-11. Some around us would spiritualize it, but we affirm that the coming of Christ again is to be as literal as His going away from men into heaven. We also believe that Christ's advent will not be at the end of the Millennium, but at its beginning. I could deduce a wealth of proofs from this Book to show that, but I will only give three texts: (1) In Daniel 2, the stone which demolishes the image seen by Nebuchadnezzar does not come out of the image, but from above. That last king shall not come from earth, but from heaven. (2) In Luke 21:24-27, no millennial golden age is spoken of, but while men's hearts are failing them for fear, then the Son of man comes. (3) Nor does II Thess. 2:8 look like a golden state of things before the Second Advent. I think these three texts show that Scripture teaches that the Coming of Jesus Christ is not prepared for by the golden age, but introduces it to the world.

Another point is, that the coming of the Lord will have, in the first place, immediate bearing on the resurrection of His saints. Turn to I Thess. 4:14. I always feel that to be a proof that our beloved who have left us are with Christ. How could Christ bring them unless they were with Him? Moreover, Paul says, "To depart and be with Christ." They must be where Christ is; they must be in heaven. The disembodied spirits are certainly with Christ, blessed for ever. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth."

The Dead In Christ Shall Rise First.

Those who are not Christ's will not have anything to do with it. They will be left to sleep on. They may have been buried in the same tomb with some beloved Christian, but the Christian will go and they will stay. The dead in Christ shall rise first. I do not expect that the world will know much about this; the ungodly may not hear the angel's trump, nor see the rush of the glorified bodies back to meet the Lord; all this may not be discerned by the eye of flesh. Those who are not Christ's may as well shut their ears, for they will have no share in this. We believe Christ will halt, hidden by a veil of cloud, in the regions of the air; then the dead in Christ shall rise first, and then we Christians who are alive at the coming of the Lord

Shall Be Caught Up Together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and to be ever with Him. Those who are waiting and ready will go; and the world will, I think, simply miss us, as they missed Enoch. Some think that then there will be the marriage supper spoken of in the parable. Revelation 20 throws great light upon this. Look also at Luke 14:14, Luke 15:34-36, Philippians 3:10, 11, I Corinthians 15:20-23. These four passages seem to corroborate what I am saying.

When Jesus Christ Comes

there in the clouds to receive His church, He will in all probability call His saints to receive their rewards. Turn, to prove that, to Luke 19:12-27. Notice here also that it was after He had rewarded His servants that He turned round to deal with His enemies. This seems to me the precise order in which it will be. We shall stand before the judgment-seat of Christ for the rewards to be adjusted, but that is a very different thing to the great white throne. Observe I Corinthians 12:15. I wonder whether our building will be found to be hay and stubble, or gold and precious stones? That fire shall reveal everything. Christ will reward us according to our work. That is what the chapter says. It is not a question of being saved or damned; that is settled by the blood of Jesus. It is about the reward. You say I am a mean-spirited fellow to think of a reward; but, suppose the reward is being near Christ, and being trusted by Him, and made His companion. You may call me what you like, but I shall strive for it. It seems to me worth a little care in our work down here. Are there in heaven? I believe that some will have ten talents, and some five, and some hardly any at all. Some will get in by the back door, some by the front gate. Let us strive after whatever there is to be got. Let us stand as near Christ as we may in the glory. Just two passages to show you about this judgment-seat of Christ—Romans 14:11; II Corinthians 5:10. When the rewards have been given, we have the millennial reign. I cannot go into that now. There is certainly the conversion of the Jews—I have not the least doubt about that. No one can who reads his Bible. I will give you one text that proves it—Romans 11:25. Revelation 20 tells you about the millennial age. Keep your eye on the chapter as I draw to a close. Observe the twelfth verse. What books are to be opened? The book of conscience, the book of history, the book of memory, the records of our lives. Every man shall see the record of his life. You and I will have to look down it some day.

Degrees of Glory

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Christ Better than Empty Husks.—"When I was once preaching in Dundee, a man came to me at the close of one of the meetings, and said: 'Mr. Thomson, will you tell me, must I give up—naming a certain thing—if I become a Christian?' 'Brother,' I replied, 'God does not empower me to ask you to give up anything, but to entreat of you to come to Him and accept something, even Himself.' We seated ourselves, and had a little talk, the result being that when the man left he was trusting Christ. Next night he again came to the meeting, and having shaken hands with me, I said to him as I looked into his face, now beaming with joy, 'Well, what about giving up what you wanted to keep, now?' 'Oh!' was the reply, 'I cannot be troubled with it.' The joy of Christ has quite swallowed up all minor joys.' Yes; Christ filled his mind, and did what nothing else could do—satisfied him. No one should hunger after the swines' husks, when they may eat of the dainties from the King's table. Who would long after the world when they have Christ as their All-in-all?"

A Match-boy Becomes a Missionary.—Mr. J. Murray remarked: "A poor little boy stood, some time ago, at the corner of one of the busy streets in Glasgow selling matches. As he stood there a gentleman approached him, and asked him the way to a certain street. The way to that particular street was very tortuous, but the little fellow directed him very minutely. When he had finished his directions the gentleman said, 'Now, if you tell me the way to heaven as correctly, I'll give you a sixpence.' The boy considered for a moment, then suddenly remembering a text he had learned at the Sunday-school he replied 'Christ is the Way, the Truth, and the Life, sir.' The gentleman at once handed him the promised sixpence, and left him visibly affected. The child thought this an easy way to make money, and going along the street he met an old companion of his father, whom he stopped, and to whom he said, 'If you give me sixpence I'll tell you the way to heaven.' The man was surprised, but from curiosity he handed the boy sixpence, and was told, 'Christ is the Way, the Truth, and the Life.' 'Ah,' said the man, 'I have been looking for the way in the saloon these many years, but I believe you are right. It was my mother's way.' Going on his way, the boy told the same message to others. In after years it was his privilege to tell it to the heathen, for the little fellow saved a child from being run over one day, and from gratitude he was educated by the child's father, and to-day he is a foreign missionary showing to others the way to heaven."

A Desperate Struggle Ended.—The Rev. Mr. Muir observed: "One Sunday evening recently a man attended a meeting I was conducting, and was greatly impressed by the preaching of the Gospel, and when that hymn, 'I am coming, Lord, coming now to thee,' was read out, he felt that things had come to a climax. He could not sing the hymn, he felt, unless he were indeed in the very singing of it to come to Christ. But he knew what he had to give up, and even though he were to receive in its stead Jesus, his Saviour, he could not get himself to part with his idol. He went home without, unpledged. During the next four days he was miserable. Dull and spiritless throughout the day, with a fearful gnawing at his heart; and every night, impelled by some overpowering force, he came back to the meeting. Yet still he did not surrender. On the Thursday evening he was again at the meeting, and during the service I gave out the same hymn which had so roused him on the Sunday. The decisive moment had come. With a desperate effort, and a quick cry to God, he tore the idol from his heart, and accepted Christ. He came to me later in the evening, not to ask the way of salvation, but that I might rejoice with him that he had found it. He had found, like many others, that there is nothing to be compared with Christ, and yet He is often refused admission into the heart, that men may entertain degrading guests instead of the King of Glory."

Crying Over the Wash-Tub.—Mr. Murray observed: "A poor, aged woman, who was obliged to hire herself out as laundress, in order to gain even an existence, was one day, when engaged at her usual work, observed by the little daughter of the lady by whom she was engaged, to be weeping as she bent over the tub. The child watched the tears running down the old woman's cheeks for some time with deep emotion. Then going to her mother, she asked what made the poor laundress cry. 'Ah!' said the mother, 'it is because she has at home a big, wicked, lazy son, who drinks all the money she makes, and thrashes her because she does not bring more, keeping his old mother and younger sister in a constant state of misery.' The girl made up her mind to go and see that young man; and, taking a temperance card along with her, she set out with her doll in her arms. When she arrived at the woman's house, only her son and daughter were in. Approaching the girl, she put the doll in her arms; then walking up to the young man, she said, as she handed him the card, 'Jesus loves you! Jesus loves you!' That was all the child could say. She turned and left the house; but, by the power of the Holy Spirit, the young man was led to think of the love of Jesus, and to give himself into His keeping. His mother had no longer to work so hard; her son kept her at home, making her old age easy. Thus God uses the small things of this life to effect His great purposes. We may not be able to do or say much, but we all can say to a sinner, 'Jesus loves you!'"

BARN-LIKE BIRTHPLACES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday, December 30, 1888.

"Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling-clothes, lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host." Luke 2:12, 13.

A Celestial Serenade—An Apparently Inadequate Occasion—What the Birth in the Barn Meant to the World—I. Encouragement for the Poorly Started—Most of the Renowned so Started—II. Good-will to Men—The Paradise Catastrophe Reversed in the Barn—What the World Wants—III. Sympathetic Union with Other Worlds—A Star Harnessed to a Manger—IV. The Offender's Hope—What the Manger Was—Children Holding the Door of Heaven Open.

AT midnight from one of the galleries of the sky a chant broke. To an ordinary observer there was no reason for such a celestial demonstration. A poor man and wife—travellers, Joseph and Mary by name—had lodged in an outhouse of an unimportant village. The supreme hour of solemnity had passed, and upon the pallid forehead and cheek of Mary God had set the dignity, the grandeur, the tenderness, the divine significance of motherhood.

But such scenes had often occurred in Bethlehem, yet never before had a star been unfixed, or had a baton of light marshaled over the hills winged orchestra. If there had been such brilliant and mighty recognition at an advent in the House of Pharaoh, or at an advent in the House of Cæsar, or the House of Hapsburg, or the House of Stuart, we would not so much have wondered; but a barn seems too poor a centre for such delicate and archangelic circumference. The stage seems too small for so great an act, the music too grand for such unappreciative auditors, the window of the stable too rude to be serenaded by other worlds.

No, sir! No, madam! It is my joy this morning to tell you in the village barn; and as I want to make my discourse accumulative and climacteric, I begin, in the first place, by telling you that that night in the Bethlehem manger was born encouragement for all the poorly started. He had only two friends—they His parents. No satin-lined cradle, no delicate attentions, but straw, and the cattle, and the coarse joke and banter of the camel-drivers. No wonder the mediæval painters represent the oxen as kneeling before the infant Jesus, for there were no men there at that time to worship. From the depths of what poverty He rose until to-day He is honored in all Christendom, and sits on the imperial throne in heaven!

What Was Born That Night

What name is mightiest to-day in Christendom? Jesus. Who has more friends on earth than any other being? Jesus. Before whom do the most thousands kneel, in chapel and church and cathedral, this hour? Jesus! For whom could one hundred million souls be marshaled, ready to fight or die? Jesus. From what depth of poverty to what height of renown! And so let all those who are poorly started remember that they cannot be more poorly born, or more disadvantageously, than this Christ. Let them look up to His example while they have time and eternity to imitate it.

Do you know that the vast majority of

had barn-like birthplaces? Luther, the emancipator of religion, born among the mines; Shakespeare, the emancipator of literature, born in an humble home at Stratford-on-Avon; Columbus, the discoverer of a world, born in poverty in Genoa; Hogarth, the discoverer of how to make art accumulative and administrative of virtue, born in a humble home in Westmoreland; Kitto and Prideaux, whose keys unlocked new apartments in the Holy Scriptures, which had never been entered, born in want. Yea, I have to tell you that nine out of ten of the world's deliverers, nine out of ten of the world's messiahs—the messiahs of science, the messiahs of law, the messiahs of medicine, the messiahs of poverty, the messiahs of grand benevolence—were born in want. I suppose that when Herschel, the great astronomer, was born in the home of a poor musician, not only one star, but all the stars he afterward discovered, pointed down to his manger. I suppose when Haydn, the German composer, was born in the humble home of a poor wheelwright, that all the angels of music chanted over the manger. Oh what encouragement for those who are poorly started! Ye who think yourselves far down, aspire to go high up!

I stir your holy ambitions to-day, and I want to tell you, although the whole world may be opposed to you, and inside and outside of your occupations or professions there may be those who would hinder your ascent, on your side and enlisted in your behalf are the sympathetic heart and the almighty arm of One who, one Christmas night, about eighteen hundred and eighty-eight years ago, was wrapped in swaddling-clothes and laid in a manger. Oh, what magnificent encouragement for the poorly started!

Again, I have to tell you that in that village barn that night was born

Good-Will To Men,

whether you call it kindness, or forbearance, or forgiveness, or geniality, or affection, or love. It was no sport of high heaven to send its favorite to that humiliation. It was sacrifice for a rebellious world. After the calamity in Paradise, not only did the ox begin to gore, and the adder to sting, and the elephant to smite with his tusk, and the lion to put to bad use tooth and paw, but under the very tree from which the forbidden fruit was plucked were hatched out war and revenge and malice and envy and jealousy, and the whole brood of cockatrices.

But against that scene I set the Bethlehem manger, which says: "Bless rather than curse, endure rather than assault," and that Christmas night puts out vindictiveness. It says: "Sheathe your sword, dismount your guns, dismantle your batteries, turn the war-ship Constellation, that carried shot and shell, into a grain ship to take food to famishing Ireland, hook your cavalry horses to the plough, use your deadly gunpowder in blasting rocks and in patriotic celebration, stop your lawsuits, quit writing anonymous letters, extract the sting from your sarcasm, let your wit coruscate but never burn, drop all the harsh words out of your vocabulary—'Good-will to men.'"

"Oh!" you say, "I can't exercise it; I won't exercise it until they apologize; I won't forgive them until they ask me to forgive them." You are no Christian, then—I say you are no Christian, or you are a very inconsistent Christian. If you forgive not men their trespasses, how can you expect your Heavenly Father to forgive you? Forgive them if they ask your forgiveness, and forgive them anyhow. Shake hands all around. "Good-will to men."

Oh, my Lord Jesus, drop that spirit into our hearts this Christmas hour! I tell you more than anything else—more helping hands, more sympathetic hearts, more kind words that never die, more disposition to give other people a ride, and to carry the heavy end of the load and give other people the light end, and to ascribe good motives instead of bad, and to find our happiness in making others happy. Out of that Bethlehem crib let the bear and the lion eat straw like an ox. "Good-will to men." That principle will yet settle all controversies, and under it the world will keep on improving until there will be only two antagonists in all the earth, and they will, side by side, take the jubilant sleigh-ride intimated by the prophet when he said: "Holiness shall be on the bells of the horses."

What The World Wants

Again, I remark that, born that Christmas night in the village barn was sympathetic

Union With Other Worlds.

The only scepticism I have ever had about Christianity was an astronomical scepticism which said: "Why would God, out of the heavens and amid the Jupiters and Saturns of the universe, have chosen our little bit of a world for the achievements of His only begotten Son when He might have had a vaster scale and vaster worlds?" But my scepticism is all gone as I come to the manger, and watch its surroundings. Now I see all the worlds are sisters, and that when one weeps they all weep, and when one sings they all sing. From that supernatural grouping in the cloud-banks over Bethlehem, and from the especial trains that ran down to the scene, I find that our world is beautifully and gloriously surrounded.

The Meteors Are With Us,

for one of them ran to point down to the birthplace. The heavens are with us, because at the thought of our redemption they roll hosannas out of the midnight sky. Oh, yes; I do not know but our world may be better surrounded than we have sometimes imagined; and when a child is born angels fetch it, and when it dies angels take it, and when an old man bends under the weight of years angels uphold him, and when a heart breaks angels soothe it. Angels in the hospital to take care of the sick. Angels in the cemetery to watch our dead. Angels in church ready to fly heavenward with the news of repentant souls. Angels above the world! Angels under the world! Angels all around the world!

Rub the dust of human imperfection out of our eyes, and look into the heavens and see angels of pity, angels of mercy, angels of pardon, angels of help, angels crowned, angels charioted. The world defended by angels, girded by angels, cohorted by angels—clouds of angels. Hear David cry out: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand. Even thousands of angels." But the mightiest angel stood not that night in the clouds over Bethlehem; the mightiest Angel that night lay among the cattle—the Angel of the new covenant.

As the clean white linen, sent in by some motherly villager, was being wrapped around the little form of that Child Emperor, not a cherub, not a seraph, not an angel, not a world, but wept and thrilled and shouted. Oh, yes, our world has plenty of sympathizers! Our world is only a silver rung of a great ladder, at the top of which is our Father's house. No more stellar solitariness for our world, not a friendless planet spun out into space to freeze, but a world in the bosom of divine maternity. A star harnessed to a manger.

Again, I remark that that night, born in that village barn, was

The Offender's Hope.

Some sermonizers may say I ought to have projected this thought at the beginning of the sermon. Oh no! I wanted you to rise toward it. I wanted you to examine the carnelians and the jaspers and the emeralds and the chrysalis before I showed you the Kohinoor—the crown jewel of the ages. Oh! that jewel had a very poor setting. The cub of the bear is born amid the grand old pillars of the forest, the whelp of the lion takes its first step from the jungle of luxuriant leaf and wild-flower, the kid of the goat is born in cavern, chandeliered with stalactite, and pillared with stalagmite. Christ was born in a bare barn. Yet that nativity was the offender's hope. Over the door of heaven are written these words: "None but the sinless enter here"

"Oh, horror," you say, "that shuts us all out!" No. Christ came to the world in one door, and He departed through another door. He came through the door of the manger, and He departed through the door of the sepulchre.

His One Business

was so to wash away our sin that one second after we are dead there will be no more sin about us than about the eternal God. I know that is putting it strongly, but that is what I understand by full remission. All crased, all washed away, all scoured out, all gone! That undergirding and overarching and irradiating and imparadising possibility for you, and for me, and for the race was given on that Christmas night.

Do you wonder we bring flowers to-day to celebrate such an event? Do you wonder that we take organ and cornet and youthful voice and queenly soloist to celebrate it? Do you wonder that Raphael and Rubens and Titian and Giotto, and Ghirlandajo, and all the old Italian and German painters, gave the mightiest stroke of the pencil to sketch the Madonna Mary and her boy?

Oh! now I see what the manger was.* Not so high the gilded and jeweled and embroidered cradle of the Henrys of England, or the Louis of France, or the Fredericks of Prussia. Now I find, out of that Bethlehem crib fed not so much the oxen of the stall as the white horses of Apocalyptic vision. Now I find the swaddling-clothes enlarging and emblazoning into an imperial robe for a conqueror. Now I find that the star of that Christmas night was only the diamond sandal of Him who hath the moon under His feet. Now I come to understand that the music of that night was but only the stringing of the instruments for a great chorus of two worlds, the bass to be carried by earthly nations saved, and the soprano by kingdoms of glory won. Oh, heaven, heaven, heaven! I shall meet you there. After all our imperfections are gone, I shall meet you there. I look out to-day, through the mist of years, through the fog that rises from the cold Jordan, through the wide-open door of solid pearl, to that reunion. I expect to see you there as certainly as I see you here. What a time we shall have in high converse, talking over sins pardoned, and sorrows comforted, and battles triumphant!

I am going in. I am going to take all my family with me. I am going to take all my church with me. I am going to take all my friends and neighbors with me. I have so much faith in manger and cross, I feel sure of it. I am going to coax you in. I am going to push you in. By holy stratagem I am going to surprise you in. Yea, with all the concentrated energy of my nature—physical, mental, spiritual, and immortal—I am going to compel you to go in. I like you so well I want to spend eternity with you!

Some of your children have already gone. Some time ago I buried one of them, and though people passing along the street and seeing crape on the door-bell may have said, "It is Only a Child," yet when the broken-hearted father came to solicit my service he said: "Come around and comfort us, for though she was only fifteen months old we loved her so much." Ah! it does not take long for a child to get its arms around the parent's whole nature.

What a Christmas morning it will make when those with whom you used to keep the holidays are all around you in heaven! Silver-haired old father young again, and mother, who had so many aches and pains and decrepitudes, well again, and all your brothers and sisters and the little ones. How glad they will be to see you! They have been waiting. The last time they saw your face it was covered with tears and distress, and pallid from long watching, and one of them I can imagine to-day, with one hand holding fast the shining gate, and the other hand swung out toward you, saying:

"Steer this way, father, steer straight for me; Here safe in heaven I am waiting for thee."

Oh, those Bethlehem angels, when they went back after the concert that night over the hills, forgot to shut the door;

All the Secret is Out.

No more use of trying to hide from us the glories to come. It is too late to shut the gate. It is blocked wide open with hosannas marching this way, and hallelujahs marching that way. What almost unmans me is the thought that it is provided for such sinners as you and I have been. If it had been provided only for those who had always thought right, and spoken right, and acted right, you and I would have had no interest in it, had no share in it; you and I would have stuck to the raft, mid-ocean, and let the ship sail by, carrying perfect passengers from life on earth to a perfect life in heaven. Oh! I have heard the commander of that ship is the same great and glorious and sympathetic One who hushed the tempest around the boat on Galilee, and I have heard that all the passengers on the ship are sinners saved by grace. And so we hail the ship, and it bears down this way, and we come by the side of it and ask the captain two questions: "Who art Thou? and whence?" and He says: "I am Captain of Salvation, and I am from the manger." Oh! bright Christmas morning of my soul's delight. Chime all the bells. Wreath all the garlands. Rouse all the anthems. Shake hands in all the congratulations.

Merry Christmas!

Merry with the thought of sins forgiven, merry with the idea of sorrows comforted, merry with the rapture to come. Oh! lift that Christ from the manger and lay Him down in all our hearts. We may not bring to Him as costly a present as the Magi brought, but we bring to His feet and to the manger to-day the frankincense of our joy, the pearls of our tears, the kiss of our love, the prostration of our worship.

Down at His feet, all churches, all ages, all earth, all heaven. Down at His feet the four-and-twenty elders on their faces. Down the "great multitude that no man can number." Down Michael, the archangel! Down all worlds at His feet and worship! "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men!"

PROPHETIC CONFERENCE IN LONDON.

SECOND Advent addresses were given in Exeter Hall, London, on the afternoons and evenings of Monday and Tuesday, December 10 and 11, and the evening of December 12. Among the speakers were the Rev. M. Baxter, and three other Episcopal clergymen—Revs. Mr. Cooke, J. B. Kearney, and H. M. Barnett, B. A.; the Rev. T. J. Malyon, Lieut.-Colonel Alves, and Messrs. W. Greene, from Spain, W. Christmas, T. Jay, T. Parsons, J. Stewart, R. Smith, from Australia, and others.

After one or two addresses, each meeting was thrown open for brief remarks on questions from any in the audience. General agreement prevailed among the majority of speakers that of 2,345 years commenced, according to Daniel 9: 25, with Nehemiah's command to rebuild Jerusalem in Passover Week, B. C. 445, and therefore will terminate in Passover Week, A. D. 1901 as the End of this Age. This 2,345 years consists of the 2,300 years in Daniel 8: 14, and the additional forty-five years by which the 1,335 years extend beyond the conjoint end of the 1,290 and 2,300 years in Daniel 12: 11, 12. The Crimean War Treaty of Peace and accompanying Turkish Edict of Toleration in Passover Week, 1856, was explained to be the chronological conjunction and meeting-point of the end of the 2,300 years, and the beginning of the forty-five years from Passover Week, 1856, to Passover Week, 1901.

Special emphasis was laid upon the fact that Christ's Second Advent, while fulfilled in its last stage at

in Passover Week, 1901, may nevertheless be expected as early as March, 1896, in its first-fruits stage, to raise the deceased saints, and translate 144,000 watchful Christians—the wise virgins—to meet Christ in the air, because Daniel shows that first-fruits stage to take place 1,862 days before the End, i. e., sixty nine weeks of days, or 483 days after the commencement on November 8, 1894, of the final 2,345 literal days. (Daniel 9: 25; 8: 14.)

The speakers also showed, from Daniel 9: 27, that the future Antichrist-Napoleon will make a covenant with the Jews for a term of seven years, from Passover Week, 1894, to Passover Week, 1901, and that he must arise as a little Horn or King over a little state somewhere in the old Græco-Turkish territory, about 1891 or 1892, and "wax exceeding great," and become King of the North (Syria), according to Daniel

11: 21, 40 and 8: 9, by the time he makes his Jewish covenant in 1894. But that as this Little Horn does not arise at all as a king until after the Ten Horns have arisen to reign over according to Daniel 7: 24, therefore the ten-kingdomed confederacy of the existing twenty-three kingdoms inside Cæsar's original Roman Empire must be formed not later than 1891; and it can only be formed by gigantic European wars and revolutions between 1889 and 1891, in which France must regain the Rhine as its ancient boundary line, and in so doing must defeat Germany and annex to itself Belgium, Switzerland, Luxemburg, &c., and become the predominant European Power, completely changing the map of Europe and forming the twenty-three kingdoms into ten, viz., France, Britain, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and the Balkan States. Meanwhile Britain will lose Ireland and its Colonies, which are outside Cæsar's Roman Empire.

It was thus shown at this Conference that not later than the early part of 1890, and more probably even in 1889, a thunder-clap of will burst upon Europe, involving all its nations in the conflict, and removing many of their ancient landmarks and bringing astounding calamities on Britain; so that never again during this Nineteenth Century will England at Christmastide find herself in the enjoyment of so much prosperity and dominion as at this Christmas. Before the musical carols and belfry chimes of Christmas, 1890, are sounded we shall assuredly have to hear the hoarse roar of cannon and crackling explosion of bombshells on great battle-fields in Europe.

RESCUED FROM THE SLUMS.

In a report, recently issued, Dr. Barnardo tells the pathetic story of two street waifs, Rose Watson and her brother, whose early years were spent amid surroundings so vile as to shake any faith but that of a Christian in their reformation. He says: "Not unfrequently the helpless children, whom I am permitted to save from ruin, are snatched from the fires of moral perdition, as well as from the throes of physical suffering. Such was, indeed, the perilous position of little Rose Watson, nine years of age, and of James, her brother, aged twelve. The father, an utterly abandoned character of no occupation, had been convicted twenty-one times of various crimes. The mother was convicted six times of drunkenness and theft. The sister of fifteen was already living an openly abandoned life, and had been convicted five times for theft. Their brother, fourteen, had been convicted for a similar offence. Both the sister and the mother at the time of the children's admission were in gaol. James was being forced to beg and to steal by the father, and Rose was frequently beaten because she refused to become a thief. Her brother James often attended race meetings to eke out his livelihood, and was rapidly becoming a thief.

"Yet he was not altogether bad. Indeed, I not unfrequently find that, if in faith I boldly strike across the sins, the neglects, and the ignorance of years, I meet with an unexpected response. His sister Rose was, strange to say, preserved unpolluted amid such a family-life as all this implies. Both Rose and James had been half-starved, beaten, kicked, ill-used, and when they came to me they looked like what they were—poor abandoned children, waifs and strays indeed, having within them, perhaps, the possibilities of good, but with no opportunity for its development; everything fair and true crushed out of their lives by the villainess of those who had them in charge. And yet—thank God for the elastic nature of childhood and for its infinite possibilities!—hardly had these children remained in the Home for three or four months, when they began to manifest a sweetness of disposition, a docility, and a willing obedience, which won for them both the love of those who had them under their care. Their young lives, like muddied streams, soon ran clearer."

A STRANGE BURIAL SERVICE.

THE fact that even among the most reckless and profane, death brings to them the realization of the need of God and religion, is illustrated in an incident mentioned by the Rev. T. C. Armstrong in a letter to the Church. He says: I must mention an incident that occurred a few weeks ago, which is characteristic for Montana. One "Charley Brown," an old-timer, and a character in his way, rather illiterate but of strong native powers, sent to me for a prayer-book for a funeral service. A woman had died sixty miles up Tongue River, and this man, who lives in town, was to be master of ceremonies. He said if they could do so they would come to town with the body, and in that case they would want a funeral service in the church; but it might be impracticable to bring the body so far, and if they had to inter the body at the home, they desired to give the woman a Christian burial, and so he wanted a prayer-book. I said I had no prayer-book, and that he would have to solicit a prayer-book from some Episcopalian friend. I loaned him a Testament, however, which he took and used. He himself is very profane, can hardly utter a sentence without profanity, and is a man who never goes near a church, although his wife is one of our members.

Well, they found they could not bring the body to town, and so my friend Brown went through a service. He reported to us when he came home; said that he was somewhat embarrassed, but he did the best he could. He selected something appropriate from the Testament; said he made one mistake in reading. He called the word immortality "immorality," but with this slight mistake he got through pretty well.

Of course the incongruity of the whole thing seems very striking to us, yet this man and his class think it is all right. They always want to have a Christian burial. If they can get a preacher, well and good; but if not, and there is not a Christian person near, then some one must go through a service in some way. They must do something religious, like the miner who, when nobody would consent to lead in a funeral service, when all were assembled proposed that they take up a collection, for he said they ought to do something religious. This class of men are not sceptical, but seem hard to reach with gospel influences.

A SLAVE RAID IN AFRICA.

How sorely the effort now being made by England and Germany to check the slave trade is needed, may be realized from the following incident sent by a missionary at Kibanga on Lake Tanganyika to L'Afrique. He says: "Toward noon we began to see upon the hills which surround our station the negroes running toward us. The first who arrived said that a half-breed chief, east of Tanganyika, was coming to lay waste the country. In fact, at 3 o'clock we saw at a distance a troop of half-breeds and of negroes on the heights this side the river Louvou, which bounds our station. These were the soldiers of Mohammed, who came to make their raid, as they have done in all the country around us. From our hill we could see them seize the fowls, pull up the vegetables, and steal the boxes which the poor inhabitants could not carry away in their precipitate flight. A lieutenant of Mohammed brought to the missionaries the explanation that the Sultan of Zanzibar had given orders not to rob the white men, and he avowed having sacked Rouando at the north, Manyerua, Unyabemba, etc. Then at night one could see the villages everywhere in flames, the people saving themselves on the lake, and the brigands going away with the women and children in long files. A poor old woman, who was being led into captivity, caught hold of the clothing of a missionary, and entreated him to save her, but she was hauled off like a beast of burden, the rope around her neck. Another one, unwilling to go, received a blow from a pistol which mortally wounded her. These expeditions are the spectacles seen around the mission stations, and there, where yesterday the missionaries went forth to carry instruction and consolation, reigns now the silence of a desert."

A SOUTHERNER IN A MISSION.

AMONG the testimonies given recently at the Florence Mission in New York, a picture of which appears on the first page, was that of a fine looking man, who said: "I don't know just how to tell my experience, my heart is so full, but perhaps the contrast between to-night and a little over a year ago will show what God has done for me. I had left my wife and family down South. I had ruined all my prospects there, and came to New York to get away from everything, and was determined to make a man of myself before I let them know where I was. When I got here I went on a spree, and that lasted until money and everything was gone. I was so discouraged I determined to commit suicide. I started for the river one night, when I chanced to pass this door; Mrs. G. was singing a solo, it was one my wife used to sing to the little ones Sunday afternoon. I looked up and saw the sign 'Florence'; that was the name of my oldest daughter, and these two things set me to thinking, and I knew they were praying for me, and drunk as I was I came in. I felt that that was my chance, and so asked them to pray with me. I did not dare to wait till I sobered up. Well, to make a long story short, I was saved that night, even in my drunken condition, and have been kept ever since by the power of God. I got employment, and in a short time was enabled to send for my wife and family, and here we are to-night. This is my wife, and this is my Florence (turning to a lady and young girl who were with him), and I thank God for it all."

A NEW SPHERE IN AFRICA.

THE efforts which have been made by the missionaries on the East coast of the Dark Continent to penetrate to the territory of Gungunyau have, it is now reported, been successful. Mr. Bates, writing to the Missionary Herald says: "The attitude of the Portuguese, the unwillingness of the natives to act as carriers, the fear of the king to give audience to any white men, made things look very unfavorable to our mission. So many gold seekers have been looking towards this 'land of Ophir' that no whites have been admitted to an audience the last year or more, and all prophesied that we would have no better success. Those whose success was reported about a year ago were summarily driven from the country. We have now been six weeks trying to gain a hearing, and at last have been successful. The way is now open, the king has sent word that he will be glad to see us, and has sent men to guide us to his kraal. The enforced stay near the coast has enabled us to determine many things about the language, and Mr. Wilder finds that although of a different race from the Zulus, yet wherever we have been the great majority of the people speak the Zulu language.

"It seems to be the policy of the king to enforce the teaching of Zulu throughout his dominions, and thus the number of Zulu speakers is yearly increasing. There are two other great languages, the Isi Senji spoken from the Sabi to the Buzi, and the Isi Nhlwenga, from south of the Sabi. This, Mr. Wilder thinks, is probably the Sheitswa of Mr. Ousley."

PROTESTANT OFFICIALS IN BRAZIL.

A REMARKABLE fact, showing how a consistent Christian life impresses a community and inspires confidence in spite of difference in creed, is reported to the Church by the Rev. Donald C. McLaren. He says three of the leading members of the Presbyterian Church in Cabo Verde, Brazil, were till recently the most powerful town officers. The Brazilian sub-delegado is the representative of the crown in the town in which he resides. He is the magistrate before whom all criminal processes must originate, and is responsible for the general good order of his district. The Justice of the Peace is elected by the people, the suffrage, however, being very limited. The two officials, within their respective spheres, have great powers, and are, so to speak, the kings of the town.

One of the elders of our church, St. Antonio de Padua Dias, was appointed sub-delegado, and his brother, also elder, was first assistant. They had discharged their duties with marked fairness and to the general satisfaction of the community, when a politician sent a letter to one of the senators of the Province, claiming that the police authorities of Cabo Verde were Protestants, that they had built a house of worship in one of the suburbs, and that they were using their authority to compel men to become proselytes, promising liberty to prisoners, &c., on condition of their becoming Protestants! This letter was read in the Senate of the Empire, and an inquiry ordered into the facts of the case. St. Antonio, with becoming dignity, promptly resigned his position, though his brother retained his, and had not been relieved at latest accounts. It is unlikely that the result of the investigation would have led to action on the part of the Government, which is far from being priest-ridden.

The estimate of the community is shown in that, soon after this report to the Senate, in the popular election, another Protestant, a third brother of the same family, was elected Justice of the Peace, and that too though an insignificant minority of the voters are Protestants.

CLEANING HOUSE IN CHINA.

MISS GUINNESS, who is now laboring in China, reports in a recent letter the occupations of one Saturday afternoon. She says: "A good afternoon's hard work lies before us ere we can reduce to anything like respectable cleanliness the chambers we are to inhabit. There is no help to be had, so we hopefully set to work ourselves, and gathering what poor implements we can, commence a vigorous cleaning process, supplying in good-will and cheerful resolution what we lack in apparatus. China knows no such tong-si (article or thing) as either a scrubbing-brush or a broom, and the only substitute for these necessities to (English) existence is, for the former, a rag mop, and for the latter a soft kind of twig hand-brush. No mop can be had to-day. They are not to be bought in shops; each family makes its own, and our good pastor's wife has none, so we set to work with a very old, worn-down brush and a native dust-pan, made of basket-work, which being exceedingly old also, is plentifully supplied with holes of various sizes, the distressing effect of which is that the dust-pan partakes of the nature of a sieve, letting a large proportion of its contents through. We supplement our sweeping operations with pails of hot water and flannels made from some disused garment, which in skilful hands do good service. But oh, it is a funny scene! We are now installed in the native pastor's house at Tsing-kiang-pu, and no soap, no soda, but a good supply of stick-at-it and fun. Meanwhile M—, in the middle room, surrounded by various strange articles of furniture, is rubbing away at Chinese chairs and tables, and dislodging various unhappy spiders, who may no longer dwell in their peaceful recesses. Many a sweet hymn resounds in the busy rooms as we ply our various tasks, and the hours fly swiftly by: 'Am I a soldier of the Cross, a follower of the Lamb?' 'I will love Jesus and serve Him, for see, how the dear Saviour has watched over me,' 'All my heart I give thee, day by day, come what may,' 'And above the rest this note shall swell,' with many another favorite. At last in the gloaming we feel our task is finished, and lay aside our poor tools to look round on rooms that appear to us radiant with cleanliness and comfort, though to uninitiated eyes they might still leave something to be desired. San-sa comes up to tell us that tea is ready below in the 'women's room.' A happy, quiet hour at prayers follows, and then Chinese worship closes the busy day."

A SABBATH IN THE LIFE OF JESUS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for January 13, Mark 1: 21-34.
Golden Text, Luke 4: 16.

Jesus Teaching—Not a Priestly Office—The Power of His Words Felt—The Consciousness of Commission—A Strange Visitor—Unclean Spirits in Evangelistic Meetings—Uncongenial Associations Significant—The Spirit Acknowledging Subjection—The Miracle on the Fever Sufferer—No Convalescence Needed by the Divine Healer—The Crowd Around the Door—Seeking Life and Health—Jesus Still Ready to Heal.

JESUS and His disciples were sojourning in Capernaum, "and straightway on the sabbath-day He entered into the synagogue, and taught." This was His custom. (Luke 4: 16.) Jesus was not a priest after the order of Aaron; He did not come of the priestly tribe, the tribe of Levi; but He loved His Father's Word, and it was a delight to Him to read the Scriptures. In every town, village, and hamlet in Palestine, or in any of the Jewish colonies where as many as twelve could meet together, the Scriptures were read and prayer offered on the sabbath-day; this formed a synagogue. Where a large congregation gathered, buildings were built like the Jewish synagogues of the present day. The reading of the Scriptures was not confined to the priests and Levites, and thus Jesus ministered to the people in these simple services. It is probable that He had done so already in His early life at Nazareth, where He was only known as "the carpenter's son." But there was a power in His very reading. On one occasion, when He simply read the Word in the power of the Holy Ghost in the synagogue at Nazareth, so deep was the impression made that "the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on Him." (Luke 4: 20.) On the present occasion, the audience felt

The Power of His Words.

"They were astonished at His doctrine: for He taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes." What authority? Jesus did not come with kingly or with priestly authority. What, then, was the power? "I am come in My Father's name." (John 5: 43.) This was His authority. And if ever we would speak with power, it must be as commissioned by Him, just as He was commissioned by His Father. "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you." (John 20: 21.) It is a common thing to hear learned, eloquent, carefully-prepared discourses, but unless they are spoken in the consciousness of being commissioned by God, they are not spoken with authority. When a man or woman speaks out a message which God has first burned into them by the power of the Holy Ghost, it comes with authority; the instrument sinks into insignificance behind His message, and the hearers feel that God has spoken to them. All other preaching is but "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." (1 Cor. 13: 1.)

Wherever there is preaching with divine authority, there are always results, whether perceived or unperceived at the time. God's "Word shall not return unto Him void, but it shall accomplish that which He pleases, and it shall prosper in that whereunto He sent it." (Isa. 55: 11.) "The words which I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." (John 6: 63.) "There was in their synagogue

A Man With an Unclean Spirit.

Strange that such a place should have an attraction for such a man! Strange that the poor drunkard, the fallen of both sexes, the thief, and open sinners of every kind, should so often be found in evangelistic services, just where there is a work of the Spirit of God. Oh how it shows that the Spirit of God is at work in the world, convincing of sin, and that another voice than that of the master they have yielded to is at work, urging them to break their chains and fly to the great Deliverer! The poor, unhappy man could not be still. Oh, dear reader, when a poor, unhappy drunkard or scoffer interrupts a religious service don't be impatient; it is no accident that he has come there into the midst of the people of God; God has drawn him there that you may pray for him. A man with an unclean spirit could not be at ease in the presence of Jesus; can a sinner be comfortable in your presence, child of God? Are you so little unlike him that he feels quite at home with you, or does the presence of Christ in you make him want to get away from you?

An Old Christian Minister

took a young clergyman one day to call on a dear old servant of Christ. When they left the house, the young man drew two or three long breaths, and said, "Oh, I am so glad to have got away; I felt so uncomfortable while we were in that house." "Why?" said the old clergyman. "That man is so holy," he replied, "I could not bear to be there." Alas, the young clergyman had a spirit uncleaned from the world! "Let us alone," said the poor victim of Satan, "what have we to do with Thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I know thee, who Thou art, the Holy One of God." Oh how strange, how piteous, it is that the first testimony from man to God's Anointed should have come from a man who was possessed by an unclean spirit! "Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him." And the spirit showed of what kind he was—if he could no longer possess the man, he would injure him in every way he could, so he "tore him, and cried with a loud voice, and came out of him." Great as had been the power and authority of Jesus' teaching, this command over the power of the enemy was yet more striking to the people; "they were all amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, what thing is this, what new doctrine is this? for with authority commandeth He even the unclean spirits, and they do obey Him."

No wonder the fame of Jesus spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee! the merchants, the market people, and travelers of every kind would carry the news of this wondrous deliverance. But with Jesus it was not as with many a young preacher, whom God may use to do a mighty work in one place, but who, because he gets too cannot be trusted to do anything great again for his own soul's sake. Jesus went out from the synagogue where He had cast out the unclean spirit, "into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John." But "Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever; and anon they tell Him of her." Jesus proved it to be a good sabbath occupation to read the Scriptures and expound them, to cast out the unclean spirits, and to visit and heal the sick ones. There is a great clamor in these days, since all cities have become more cosmopolitan, to make Sunday more of a pleasure day, and less a day of religious observance. What did Jesus do? Just what His Father taught, for He did not do His pleasure on God's holy day, but He called the sabbath a delight and He honored God, not doing His own ways, nor finding His own pleasure, nor speaking His own words. (Isa. 58: 13.) Jesus was on duty for His Father all the day, and this is the delight of all who love Him. When Jesus heard of the poor woman's sickness, "He came and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her." And then and there, without one day to recover her strength, she arose, in the power of that creative hand which lifted her, out of the fever, out of the sickness, out of the weakness, into the life-giving power of God. In almost all, we may say all, kinds of fever, medically treated, there is the patient is never expected to recover all at once; but the hand which created the body is a Master hand, and He requires no period of time to work His wonders.

The evening came: there was no evening service in the synagogue. Probably some of the worshippers came from a long distance, and if the Bible-reading was as long as in the time of Nehemiah—from the time it was light until mid-day (Neh. 8: 3)—they would have had enough instruction for one day. Some time must have been spent in the synagogue after the service was finished, in the wondering conversation of those who had beheld the unclean spirit cast out. Then in the house time was spent, no doubt, in speaking of the power of God, while the healed woman prepared food for her welcome guests; and so the evening drew on. Meanwhile, many arrivals took place in that little home. There was no home in Capernaum so much frequented that day. Blind people were being led there; paralyzed people were carried; some who had long been sick left their beds, and, leaning on the arms of two friends, were helped along the street; sick babies were carried. Some with bandaged limbs were driven and brought up to the door in carts; it was like the entrance door of one of the modern hospitals. There were insane people there, staring out of eyes which looked as though they would start out of their sockets; dumb people were there making signs; and the anxious-looking deaf were there. "They brought unto Him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils. And all the city was gathered together at the door," the larger number from curiosity to see what would happen. And "He cast out the spirits with His word, and healed all that were sick, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses." (Matt. 8: 16, 17.) Not one of those sick ones was unwelcome—to not one of those did He say, "I cannot heal thee; it is better for thee to continue sick." They all that He both could and would heal them, and according to their faith it was unto them. Their sickness had done its work, which was to make them feel their need of Jesus; it had brought them in contact with Him; now He was touched with the feeling of their infirmity, and healed them one and all. If sickness only drives us to some remedy or some change of residence, or some celebrated doctor, it has not accomplished its purpose. All God's dealings with us are calculated to make us know Him "whom to know is life eternal." If He cannot lead us to know Him, or when we do know Him, to know Him more perfectly, without sickness, then He lets it come; but when it has done its work, He who bore it for us does not wish to keep it on us. Wherever He met with sickness when He was upon earth, He invariably took it away, and He always, in doing so, did those things which pleased God. Jesus is not changed, and His Father is not changed. He is "the Lord that healeth thee" unto this day. Thus the sabbath ended with a harvest of blessing to souls and bodies.

Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

Remittances by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft, or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as, when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk. Postage stamps should never be sent if it is possible to remit in any other way.

Receipts are not sent; the receipt of the paper by a subscriber is a sufficient proof that the remittance has been received. If the paper does not arrive promptly, please advise us, that we may see if the address is correctly entered.

Notice of Expiration of subscription is always sent in addition to the date being given on the address label. When not renewed by date of expiration, the paper is stopped; no notice from the subscriber being required.

Subscribers having renewed their subscription for 1889, receiving a notice that their term will expire at the end of the year and asking for renewal, will understand that the order was written previous to their renewal order reaching us, and will treat it accordingly.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Happy New Year, in the Best Sense of the familiar words, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wishes to all its readers in this its first visit in the year of our Lord, 1889. To many of them the greeting is that of an old and valued friend, and it is gratifying to learn, from the numerous letters received during the past few days, that the affection and respect with which they regard the paper increases as the years pass by. With deep thankfulness the letters of our friends are read in this office, for they tell of the ways in which God has used the paper during the past year in His service. Every department in its pages has, it appears, been blessed to some. The singular unanimity with which subscribers express their admiration of the paper, the total absence of criticism, and the information that prayers are continually being offered for a blessing on those who have control of it, are very encouraging. This is the eleventh time that the Editor has been privileged to tender a New Year's greeting to his readers, and on each occasion it has been to a larger circle, and with more abundant evidences of their appreciation. For all this, humble thanks are due to the Giver of all grace. Profoundly conscious that the larger opportunities of usefulness which each year places within reach of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD involve increased responsibility, we gratefully write here the word, "Ebenezer, hitherto hath the Lord helped us," and depend for the future, with humble confidence, on the same Source of help and guidance.

Both Houses of Congress Adjourned for the Holiday recess on December 21, to meet again on January 2. It is expected that in the interval the Republican Senators will decide what changes shall be made in the Tariff Bill, the discussion on the last day of sitting having shown that there was much difference of opinion on some of the details. The whole question is left with the Finance Committee, as it is evident that unless individual Senators yield to the decisions of the Committee, there is no possibility of getting the bill through the Senate at this session. An indication of the confidence with which the election has inspired the advocates of Protection was given during the discussion by Senator Blair, who advocated a policy which would prohibit all imports, and declared that that was the true Republican policy. When he was asked how the Government's expenses would be paid unless by a direct tax, Mr. Blair answered that they would be paid by the American manufacturer, who would be better able to pay than now. If Mr. Blair's opinion is correct, and that is really the true Republican policy, the probability of tariff reduction by the present or any other bill, vanishes for some time.

The Nicaragua Canal Project was not Sanctioned before Congress adjourned. The House continued its discussion of the subject up to the hour of adjournment, and advanced it to the stage of third reading, so that, on reassembling, it will come up for passage. Many amendments have been made to the bill since it left the Senate, so that, if it should pass the House in its present shape, it will have to be submitted to a conference committee. It was noticed that the opponents of the measure are fully as determined and persistent as they have been throughout, but the majority of the House were clearly in its favor. The amendments which have been made in the House, are chiefly with the object of giving to the United States increased power over the canal. The most important require that the directors shall be citizens of the United States and Nicaragua—a majority of them to be citizens of the United States; that there shall be annual reports made by the company to the Secretary of the Interior; that the United States shall have power to acquire the franchise by the payment of the cost of construction, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the amount invested.

The Surrender of the Steamer "Haytian Republic" was reported last week. A telegram from Kingston, Jamaica, to the New York Herald stated that as soon as Admiral Luce arrived at Hayti with the United States vessels Yantic and Galena he made a formal demand through Minister Thompson on the government of President Légitime for the delivery of the vessel to the United States naval commander in the outer harbor. If the steamer were not delivered before sunset the United States ships would take her by force, and if resistance were offered they would shell the city. In order that there should be no delay the Galena sent boats to the vessels in the harbor to get out of range, and the foreign Consuls were notified of the possibility of an early beginning of hostilities. The Haytian Government immediately sent a small steamer alongside the vessel which has been the subject of dispute, and which still kept the Stars and Stripes flying. Captain Compton was on board, and formally received his ship back, and at sunset she was towed to the outer harbor, and brought to anchor near the Galena. Conflicting statements are made as to whether an indemnity was paid, but Secretary Bayard has kept silence on the question. It is probable, however, that some indemnity will be demanded.

A Fatal Steamboat Disaster Occurred on the Mississippi on Christmas Eve near Plaquemine, La. The fine river steamer John H. Hanna, from Ouachita River with a cargo of cotton, caught fire, and in a few moments was a total loss. About one hundred persons were on board, and it is estimated that out of this number at least thirty perished, while those who were burned more or less severely number perhaps as many more. The passengers were enjoying themselves merrily in the cabin when the fire broke out. Their first intimation of peril came from a colored man, who rushed into the cabin crying wildly that the boat was on fire. Almost in an instant the flames shot into the cabin and over the cotton, enveloping the boat in fire. One brave man ran through the smoke and kicked at the doors of the sleeping-cabins to arouse some of the passengers who had retired. The passageways were, however, blocked with cotton bales, and some of the affrighted passengers were unable to reach the deck. The vessel was headed immediately for the bank, but when she struck she bounded off again and floated down the stream, the flames bursting out on all sides. Many of the crew and passengers jumped off and saved themselves by swimming, but at least thirty must have been burned.

A Mystery Still Surrounds the Situation of Mr. H. M. Stanley. News published last week, however, increases the doubts with which the report was received, of Osman Digna's capture of him and Emin Pacha. A despatch from Zanzibar stated that on August 17 Mr. Stanley arrived at Bonyala, on the Aruwhimi. He had come to find out why the stores left with his rear-guard, and which the late Major Barttelot was to have brought after him, had not arrived. He had left Emin Pacha thirty-two days before, in perfect health, and provided with plenty of food. He intended to return ten days later, to rejoin Emin. He reported all the whites in the expedition as healthy, and said the expedition wanted nothing. It is still possible that the capture of him and Emin, which Osman Digna said was made in October, may be true, but it is extremely improbable; and the proofs sent by that Mahdist leader, when examined, proved to be untrustworthy. It is believed that Osman sent the report in the hope that it might prevent or delay the British attack on his position before Suakin.

The Queen's Speech in Proroguing Parliament contained no reference to the unpleasant Sackville incident. She did, however, mention the Fishery Treaty. She said, "I regret that the convention concluded between myself and the President of the United States, for the adjustment of the questions which have arisen with reference to the fisheries in North American waters, has not commended itself to the judgment of the United States Senate, in whom, according to the Constitution of the United States, the power of ratification is vested. The temporary arrangements, however, which have been adopted will, I trust, prevent any immediate inconvenience arising from this decision." Referring to the joint English and German expedition for the suppression of the slave trade, she said: "The renewed vigor of the trade, of which symptoms have unhappily shown themselves in several parts of Africa, has largely contributed to the production of disturbances. I have joined the German Emperor in establishing a naval blockade of that part of the coast which is in insurrection, in order to prevent not only the exportation of slaves, but the importations of munitions of war."

General Boulanger is Again Causing Concern to the French Government. One of the members of the Legislature for Paris died recently, and General Boulanger has come forward as a candidate for the seat. The outcome of this election is awaited with all the more interest, from the fact that General Boulanger recently met with an electoral defeat in the Department of the Ardennes, where M. Auffray, who came forward under the General's and monarchical support, was beaten by the republican candidate. It is a noteworthy fact that General Boulanger's movements have excited general distrust among the friends of the Republic, of all sections. Floquet, Clémenceau, Ferry, Lacour, Reinach, and other leaders are divided on the question of the necessity of a revision of the Constitution, but are united against Boulangism. That their distrust is not without cause, is proved by the fact that General Boulanger is evidently cherishing the hope of attaining the Presidency. In a published interview on the subject of the banishment of members of the Royal Family, he said: "The first act of my Government, if the country raises me to the Presidency, will be to repeal the laws relating to banishment, readmit everybody, and open to all Frenchmen the France I love so well."

The Next Few Weeks will be the best time for canvassing for new subscribers. We are happy to learn that many of our friends are already introducing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD among their friends and neighbors. Any one desiring sample copies for this purpose, will be supplied free of cost by writing for them, stating explicitly how many can be advantageously used. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received, since our last acknowledgment, to the amount of $6.50. They are: from Youngstown, O., $1.50; Bath, Me., $1; Naperville, Ill., $3; Homer, Ill., $1. An extract from a letter received a few days ago from Kerbyville, Mo., will show the friends who have so long maintained this fund, how one of the beneficiaries appreciates their liberality; and his letter is only a specimen of many others. He says that the whole of his income is needed for rent, food, and clothing for himself and his family, and only by the most careful economy does it suffice for those necessities. He says: "I wish to offer you my heartfelt thanks for making me one of the beneficiaries of your fund during the past year, and I pray God's blessing on the unknown friend who contributed the money that paid for my paper. It has been of inexpressible benefit to myself and family, and it has furnished me with rich material for my sermons, that I should not have had if the paper had not been sent to me." He and many others are praying that God will incline the hearts of His people to give them the same source of help for another year.

The Excellent Results of the Work Now Being done by deaconesses in Chicago, is described in a letter to this office from a correspondent in that city. She states that a number of devoted women spend the whole of their time in visiting the poor, nursing the sick, and reading the Bible to the ignorant. Some very remarkable conversions have followed this labor of love. The women receive no salary, and are content with only board and clothing. The committee in charge of the work believe that the good already done will lead to the extension of the effort to other cities. They are now trying to build a new home and headquarters for the women, and are asking for help from Christian people who are willing to aid in thus obeying our Lord's explicit command. (Matt. 25:35-40.) Contributions may be sent to the Superintendent of Deaconess-Work, Chicago, Ill.

A Boy Charmed by a Snake is a Singular item of news reported by the Cincinnati Enquirer. It states that the proprietor of a store noticed a boy in the street staring intently into his window. The store-keeper paid no attention to him further until an hour afterward, when he saw that the lad was still in the same position, and that he appeared powerless to move. His face seemed to be glued to the window. He was quite a ghastly object as seen from inside the store, having a glassy stare in his eyes, which seemed bursting from the sockets. His nose was flattened and his mouth firmly set against the glass. Inside the window was a big rattlesnake on exhibition. The snake had coiled himself, raised his head, and charmed the boy through the glass. The boy was pulled away from the window and taken into a drug store. It was half an hour before he could speak. A similar strange charm is sometimes exercised by the Old Serpent, the great enemy of our race. The vicious man, the gambler and the drunkard, often seem infatuated, longing to free themselves, but powerless to do so. To all such, deliverance is offered by Him who has overcome the Evil One. (Luke 10:18, 19.)

How Typhoid Fever is Caused was Explained last week in a lecture by Dr. Cyrus Edson, of New York. "Nothing is so discreditable in civilization," said he, "as typhoid. It is found everywhere, yet it is easily preventable. After investigating many cases, I am convinced that typhoid fever is nearly always due to polluted water, milk, ice, or meat. The typhoid germ gets into the system by entering the body through the mouth. Wells are a great source of danger. There is scarcely a safe one in the country, for nearly everywhere you will find the well a close neighbor of a source of disease." Dr. Edson had just learned of a case at a popular resort in this State, where twenty-two persons had been taken sick, pretty surely because they used ice cut on a lake near by. In another instance the disease was caused by a milkman washing his cans at an infected well. "The typhoid poison," he said, "must enter the stomach." It is not so with spiritual malady. That is why the various efforts of philosophers in all ages to reform the world have failed. The source of evil being within, in the heart of man, there is no hope of extirpating it but in the promise of a new heart which God gives to those who ask Him through Christ. (Matt. 15:17-20.)

A Curious Loss of Memory Afflicts a Citizen of Jamestown, N. Y. He sustained a paralytic seizure some months ago, but has so far recovered as to be able to go anywhere about the city at his pleasure. He can converse intelligently on any subject he was familiar with before his sickness, and remembers all his old friends, but has not regained the faculty of recalling the names of his most intimate friends, although he knows, as far as circumstances with which he and his different friends were associated, perfectly well with whom he is conversing. He understands and appreciates what his friends read to him, and can converse readily, with but a slight impediment in his speech, about the subjects read. But he cannot read a word himself nor tell one letter of the alphabet from another. He remembers distinctly having been able to read before he was sick, and is troubled because he cannot do so now. He sees perfectly well, the peculiarity being with the mind and not with the sight. The curious feature of the case is, that while some mental faculties are performing their functions, others fail to do so. Christian workers often meet with analogous cases. Men who are intelligent, honorable, and scrupulous in business life, appear incapable of realizing their obligations towards God, or the necessity of seeking their eternal happiness. (1 Cor. 2:14.)

The Discovery of Three Old Deeds Among rubbish in a garret may lead to the acquisition of a large fortune. A Pittsburg, Penn., journal states that a former resident of that city, who is now a widow living in Allegheny City, was putting her house in order a few weeks ago, when she came to an old trunk in the garret which had not been opened for a long time. She turned out its contents, and found among them three deeds yellow with age. She examined them, but not clearly understanding their purport, submitted them to a lawyer. He found that they were the title to six hundred acres of land in Philadelphia, and appeared to be still valid. Investigation was at once commenced, which hitherto has developed nothing to invalidate the deeds. A reporter who has seen the documents says that they look genuine, but have evidently not seen the light for a long time, and the edges where they had been folded were ragged and torn. One of them almost fell to pieces when opened, and the parts hung together like threads. Each deed calls for 200 acres of land and a town lot "in the City of Peace." They are dated June 8, 1817, and one of them bears the endorsement of the Clerk of Records of that year. Should the claim be established, the widow will become enormously rich. The deeds have been in her possession for a long time, but she did not know of them. That is the case with many Christians, who do not realize the privileges which God is ready to give them if they will but claim them in faith. (Rom. 8:32.)

A Too Tardy Consent to a Marriage has In- volved a lawsuit in the City Court of New York. The complainant states that for some considerable time the gentleman has paid his addresses to her. She did not at first believe him to be sincere, as his manner varied at different times. At length he convinced her, and she accepted him. The wedding day was fixed at some distant day and she spent $1,700 on her wedding outfit. At the gentleman's desire the day was postponed, and again it was delayed. Finally, concluding that he had no intention of fulfilling his promise, and probably also being disgusted with him on account of his procrastination, she sued him. He then came to her house, begged to be forgiven, and offered to fix a day for the ceremony and keep it, if she would withdraw her suit. The lady was tired of the man's shifty ways, and concluding that he had only been brought to terms by fear of the law, refused to renew the engagement, and is going on with her lawsuit. To a reporter the man professed himself anxious to marry the lady now, and insisted that he is sincerely attached to her, but is fully aware that all hope of making her his wife is at an end through his own tardiness. He claims that he is suffering more from the consciousness of that fact than from fear of having to pay damages. A far more terrible calamity will fall on some to whom salvation has been offered time and again, and who have postponed acceptance of it to "a more convenient season," until they find that they have postponed it too long. (Prov. 1:14-29.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The exact number of licensed saloons in New York city to day, is 6811. Twelve years ago they were 10,000.

Mrs. S. M. I. Henry has been chosen to take the White Cross branch of the Social Purity department of the National W. C. T. U.

The Congregationalists of this country raised for missions at home and abroad, during the last year, over $2,000,000.

Twenty converts arose at one meeting of the Central Union Mission, Washington, to testify to their conversion during the recent meetings. One of them was a Jew.

Students of Princeton Theological Seminary are delivering addresses at the Young Men's Christian Association, No. 224 Bowery, New York, every Sunday night.

Rev. Mead Holmes, member of the City Council of Rockford, Ill., has been active in opposing license for the saloons, and the liquor men have threatened to attack him.

The General Assembly of 1888 changed the day of prayer for colleges from the last Thursday to the last Wednesday of January. This makes the day of prayer for 1889 fall on Wednesday, January 30.

The two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the First Congregational Church of Dover, N. H., was celebrated on the 16th of December, with appropriate services. This is the oldest parish in New Hampshire.

Princeton College catalogue, just issued, shows that there are in the undergraduate academic department 463 students, in the school of science 111, post-graduates 90. Altogether there is a total of 667 students, as against 611 last year.

Messrs. Hunter and Crossley have closed their services at Winnipeg, Manitoba. An immense crowd assembled for the last service. During the forty days they have been there, upward of one thousand persons have made a profession of faith.

The Wetmore Home for Fallen and Friendless Girls, in New York, celebrated its twenty-third anniversary on December 27. The Home has recently been enlarged by the addition of a laundry, which will give employment to forty girls, and by new dormitories.

The Rev. E. G. Thurber, D. D., of the Park Presbyterian Church of Syracuse, N. Y., has resigned to accept a call from the American Church in Paris. This is a union church, although under the general supervision of the Presbyterian and Congregational denominations.

Ben Hogan, the converted pugilist, has been holding meetings in Oil City, Pa. He has had large attendances, and his own testimony, given with straightforward earnestness in a community where his past life is well known, had a marked effect on his hearers.

A National Academy of Theology was founded in New York on December 27, at a convention of theological professors. Prof. James Strong, D. D., of Drew Theological Seminary, was elected president, and Prof. C. D. Hartman, D. D., of Hartford Seminary, secretary.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's closing service at Bloomington, Ill., is described by local journals as an extraordinary gathering. The numbers present and the enthusiasm displayed, show how profound is the impression made by the eighteen days' union meetings. Over 500 persons made a profession of faith at the meeting.

Rev. E. P. Hammond has been holding meetings at Jackson, Mich. The interest has not been confined to children, large numbers of adults having been led to Christ. The ministers of various denominations in the city report that many inquirers are coming to them for advice, having been quickened at Mr. Hammond's meetings.

The Committee of Twenty-five, appointed to organize efforts for city evangelization in New York, has elected Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst as president. The committee ask that the managers of the meetings of the week of prayer, that begins on New Year's, be requested to make the committee and its work special subject for prayer during the week.

FALSE TRUSTS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth, their idols were upon the beasts," etc. Isa. 46: 1-4

Not a Promise for Old Age Only—Goodness of God in all Tenses—I. False Confidences Passing Away—The Gods of Babylon Falling with the Empire—Their Ignominious Treatment—False Philosophies Falling Also—The Monkey-god of Modern Thought to Fall—II. God always the Same in the Past—To His Aged Children—To All Ages—In Changing Circumstances—In Impending Trial—III. God Ever Will Abide the Same—A Child Carried Up-hill—No Fresh Mercy Needed—Past Mercies Continued.

THE confidence of Babylon is buried among her heaps of rubbish, for her gods have fallen from their thrones. "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth." As for us, beloved, our trust is in the living God, who lives to bear and carry His chosen, even in Jehovah, the only true Lord. We begin our spiritual life by faith in Him, for till faith comes we have no power to become the sons of God. Our spiritual life will have to be continued, in the same way of trust in the Lord, "for the just shall live by faith." We live by faith upon the Son of God, who loved us, and gave Himself for us. We rejoice that we shall never have to change our confidence, for our God will never be carried into captivity, nor torn from His throne. Our faith is built upon a rock that can never be moved. Nothing in the past has shaken the foundation of our faith; nothing in the present can move it; nothing in the future will undermine it. Whatever may occur in the ages to come, there will always be in Jehovah and His faithful word. That part of our text which says, "Even to your old age I am He; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you," may seem to be a promise made to old age. So, indeed, it is. Many a hoary saint has made a soft pillow of this precious promise, and has rested upon it with delight in the days of his decay. But yet the text, if it be rightly read, is a promise to the people of God at any and every period between their birth and their death. The Lord is good to us in all tenses, and in all ways. Our experimental dealings with God make us know that He is our gracious Helper from the first to the last. Bel and Nebo disappoint their votaries, but Jehovah is our God for ever and ever, and He will be our guide even unto death.

I. I shall begin my sermon by calling your attention, first, to the set-off and background, which are placed behind the brilliant promise given to the Lord's people. Observe that False Confidences Pass Away.

The Lord has made a full end of false gods and their worship. "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth, their idols were upon the beasts, and upon the cattle: your carriages were heavy laden: they are a burden to the weary beast. They stoop, they bow down together; they could not deliver the burden, but themselves are gone into captivity." Bel and Nebo were two great gods of Babylon. You get the name of Bel in the name of king Belshazzar, and the name of Nebo in the name of Nebuchadnezzar. They were esteemed to be such great deities that their kings were named after them, and professed to be their servants. Bel and Nebo stood in Babylon supreme. The Babylonian empire which served these deities was so strong as to be invincible; it carried its cruel sword into all nations, and piled up the dead bodies of men in heaps; it was therefore dreaded in every part of the world; and not without cause. What kingdom or empire could stand against it? If you had gone to Babylon, and seen its mighty walls, its lofty towers, its engines of war, its wonders of art, its multitudes of heroes, you would have thought that the worship of Bel would endure for ever, and that the image of Nebo would stand there to be adored of mortals while the world existed.

But these idols—always a mere deceit—proved themselves powerless in the day of trial. Cyrus came, the Euphrates was dried up, the empire of Babylon ended, and the gods were discredited for all ages. In the ruin of Babylon the gods became a prey. The golden images themselves were too precious to be left standing in Babylon, and too little venerated to be treated with respect. They were taken off to Persia as a spoil, and became a burden to the weary beasts. Huge images of less costly material were dragged down with ropes, dashed in pieces, or buried beneath heaps of ruins. Ah me! what a melancholy fate for things which were called gods, and received the reverence of great nations! Even in these latter days, we have had an illustration of "Bel boweth down, and Nebo stoopeth," when Mr. Layard went to the ruins of Babylon and Nineveh, and dragged out those huge bulls which stand to-day in the British Museum, objects of our curiosity, but certainly not of our worship. "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth." The false gods that reigned supreme over so many myriads of men were Made Contemptible.

The like thing has happened unto false systems of teaching. They have risen, and they have dominated over the minds of men; but, like Bel and Nebo, they have tottered and fallen. They seemed to be established beyond all hope of confutation and overthrow, and yet they have passed away! If you are at all readers of the history of religious thought, you will know that systems of philosophy, and philosophical religions, have come up, and have been generally accepted as indisputable, and have done serious injury to true religion for a time; and yet they have vanished like the mirage of the desert. When at their best, they have withered; the grass has flowered, the flower has come to its full, and has fallen beneath the scythe. The gourds have come up in a night, and have perished in a night.

Even those of us who are not aged yet remember two or three different forms of philosophical divinity which preceded which is just now so loudly cried up. Many modern thoughts have come up, and have gone down again. Bel has bowed down, and Nebo has stooped. The boastful "thinkers" carried up their elaborate systems into their places with great labor, and then they carried them away again, and buried them with equal labor. What philosophers prove one year, philosophers disprove another year. We old-fashioned Christians have remained unchanged in our fidelity to revealed truth, and we have seen Bel go up and Bel go down, and Nebo go up and Nebo go down. Yes, we have seen rubbish venerated as a precious thing, and anon the precious thing carted away as so much lumber. The present idols of the mind are just as worthless as those of former times. The god of modern thought is a monkey. If those who believed in evolution said their prayers rightly, they would begin them with, "Our Father, which art up a tree." Did they not all come from a monkey, according to their own statement? They came by "development," from the basest of material, and they do not belie their original. But we shall see the monkey-god go down yet, and evolution will be ridiculed as it deserves to be.

But now, beloved, it will be just the same with us if we trust in

of any sort; such, for instance, as our experiences, or our attainments, or our services, or our orthodox belief, or aught else. If we set up any confidences apart from our God, we shall soon see the end of them. Imagine that any Christian here should be so foolish as to rely upon his own works. God forbid we should! But what an airy nothing our confidence would be! Before long that Bel would bow down, and that Nebo would stoop, for the hope would be too flimsy to bear the least weight. Or, if we should begin to rely upon our own enjoyments—if frames and feelings should become our confidence—all would come down, and our boast would become our burden, our glory our shame. If in our daily life we look to an arm of flesh, or practice self-reliance instead of God-reliance, or if we trust to friends instead of leaning upon the one great Invisible, we shall yet learn with tears the terror of that sentence, "Cursed is he that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm." "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth"; anything that you make your confidence instead of God, will fail to bear your burden, and will itself become a burden to you. Instead of its carrying you, you will have to carry it. Instead of its taking your load, it will increase your load, and become at last an intolerable curse.

"Little children, keep yourselves from idols." Beloved in the Lord, think not that this is an unnecessary warning even for you, for you may as easily set up an idol in your heart as other men may set up a false system of philosophy, or an idol god. Guard against setting up a rival trust to rob the Lord of even a small part of your confidence. Let us lean upon our God with all our weight, and lean nowhere else; for if we put our confidence elsewhere, our idolatry will come home to us, and we shall hear the voice of disappointment, wailing bitterly, "Bel boweth down, Nebo stoopeth."

II. Let that stand as the black cloud on which God will paint His bright rainbow, while I notice in the second place, that our God Abides Always the Same.

Dear friends, we rightly expect trials between here and heaven; and the ordinary wear and tear of life, even if life should not be clouded by an extreme trial, will gradually wear us out. If life should flow never so smoothly, yet there are the rapids of old age, and the broken waters of infirmity, and the cataract of disease; and these we are apt to dread; but why? Is not the Lord our trust? Is it not sure that the Lord changes not? Make this your strong confidence. As for you, ye youths, ye are strong, but boast not of your strength; the Lord Jehovah is our strength and our song. As for you in the midst of life—tremble not because of your difficulties: "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" As for you that are sinking into the decline of life, and know that very soon your tabernacle will be taken down, be not afraid, for the Lord has not altered. Hath He not said, "I am the Lord, I change not"? Let this be your delight.

In the course of years, not only do we change, but our circumstances change. Many look forward to trying circumstances in the declining days of life. "When I cannot earn my livelihood, when I cannot go out to the farm, or stand at the counter, or work at the bench, what will become of me then?" Hearken, my brother, if you are where you ought to be, your confidence is in God now, and you will have the same God then, and He will still be your guardian and provider. He will be under no decay from age, nor decline from weakness. His bank will not break, nor His treasury fail. His granary will not be exhausted, and His bounty will not be worn out. Trust in Him for that which is written between the folded leaves of destiny, as well as for the page which lies open before you. If the infirmities of the body scare you, trust Him; and if the changing circumstances of your life alarm you, trust Him, for He must be the same though heaven and earth should be dissolved. He says, "Even to old age I am He."

"Ah!" say you, "but what I most mourn is the death of friends." Yes; that calamity is to men who are getting into years. A new-made grave is with us every day. How many of those whom I dearly loved are now with God? When we near sixty, or pass onward towards seventy, we lament the multitude of dear friends that have fallen like the innumerable leaves of autumn. Some of us have now more friends in heaven than we have on earth. The best are going, still going: the messengers with heavy tidings follow close upon each other's heels. One of these days we think that some friend will cry, "I only am left." Ah, yes! But the Lord says, "I AM HE," as much as to say, "I am left to you, and will not fail you."

Some trouble themselves concerning prophetic crises which are threatened. One would think, from their perpetual alarms, that the prophets wrote to afflict us rather than to comfort us. "Oh, what shall I do," says one, "if there should be wars and rumors of wars, and earthquakes in divers places, and so forth?" What would you wish to do but trust in the Lord even as you do now? Certainly, we only see part of the Lord's way; and if we could see the whole we should most probably rejoice where now we grieve. Why, then, are we cast down? The Lord Himself says to us, "Even to your old age I am He." The Lord took care of the world before we were here to help Him, and He will do it just as well when we are gone. We can leave politics, religion, trade, morals, and everything else with Him. What we have to do is to obey Him, and trust Him, and rejoice in Him, and go on our way rejoicing.

"Still," says one, "there are such Evil Tokens in the Church itself as must cause serious apprehension to godly men." Yes, I know it. I have had to know it to my personal sorrow. The Church grows old; gray hairs are upon her here and there, and she knoweth it not. But never despair of the Church of God, for of her it is true, "Even to hoar hairs will I carry you; to your old age I am He." The Head of the Church never alters. Let us not be afraid, though clouds should come, for it is written, "Behold, He cometh with clouds," God is the same; there is the corner-stone of our comfort.

If you are depending upon anything or any person besides your God, woe unto you! "Oh," say you, "I used to hear a dear old minister in my early days; but I find none like him now. He has gone home; and I feel as if I could cry, 'My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!'" I could make some of you weep if I were to go through the list of those holy men who fed you with food convenient for you in your younger days. Where are the teachers and fathers now? But then the point is, the God of these saints is not dead. The Great Shepherd of Israel still lives, and He leads us still, and feeds us still, and guards us still; and He will guard His flock, and guide His flock, till He makes us to lie down in the green pastures on the hill-tops of glory.

III. And now, thirdly, I want to call your attention, in the words before us, to the fact that, while false confidences pass away, God will forever be the same. His former mercies Guarantee Future Mercies.

First, you see, he says, "I have made." The Lord, who is your helper, is He that created you. It is well to remember the mercy of God to us in our formation, and in the first days of our birth and infancy. We know very little indeed about those first three or four years, yet the Lord fed us, and led us, and here we are in proof of it. But think, beloved! God made us in another sense. He new-made us. Blessed is the man that has been twice born, and thus twice made! The Lord God has made us new creatures in Christ Jesus. He has made us to be His children: we have been "begotten again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." If He has done all this, He does not intend to leave us till He has finished the work of grace with power. He who hath begun a good work in us will carry it on, and perfect it unto the day of Christ. The past guarantees the future, since we have to do with a God who can never change.

But I must not linger on any point, as our time flies; I must notice next that, practically, God's mercies through life are always the same. No new form of mercy is ever wanted; all we need is the old mercy repeated, and adapted to our case. My dear friend, you will never want anything of God but what you have already had. The grace that saves the young man will save the old man. The patience that bore with your follies in youth will bear with your weakness in age. Depend upon it, you will require nothing but what you have already received the like. In this matter, the thing that has been,

is the thing that shall be, and there is nothing new under the sun.

As for this "carrying" of which the text speaks, assuredly that is no new thing. Our first spiritual blessing came of our being carried: we were sheep going astray, and the Shepherd came after us; and, when He found us, He carried us upon His shoulders rejoicing, and brought us home. Many a rough place have I encountered in my life's pilgrimage, and I have wondered how I should ever get over it; but I have been so happily that the passage has made one of the most charming memories of my heart. I begin to like rough places, even as Rutherford fell in love with the cross he had to carry. When the road is smooth, I have to walk; but when it is very rough, I am carried. Therefore, I feel somewhat like the little boy I saw the other night. His father had been carrying him up-hill; but when he reached a piece of level road, the boy was a great lump to carry, and his father set him down, and let him walk. Then the little gentleman began to pull at his father's coat, and I heard him say, "Carry me, father! Carry me, father. Carry me again!" Just so. Any sensible child of God will still say, "Carry me, Father! Carry me still, I pray thee!" The Father's answer is, "I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry you."

The promise closes with the words, "And I will deliver you." That is no new mercy. Have you not been delivered many times already? "The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine"—so David trusted, and so do we. See how Paul puts it: "Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that He will yet deliver us." See! it is a note from the same trumpet, a voice from the same mouth. Wherefore, beloved, as you will only want the same mercy repeated, be confident, be joyful. Do not dread to-morrow. Do not fear next year. Do not pine because of the coming of old age. Do not dread that painful operation which seems needful. Do not dread even death itself. He that made you will make you to endure; He that has carried you, will carry you; He that has delivered you will deliver you to the end. Blessed be God, we only want a continuance of the same mercy as we have already experienced, and that the Lord promises to us.

And now, to close, notice in the text two

the same God and the same mercy. There is nobody else here but the Lord alone with His people. Will you note that? There is nobody else here but you and your God; and you are nobody but a poor thing that has to be carried. "Even to your old age I am He. Even to hoar hairs will I carry you. I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry, and will deliver you." We have great admiration of angels, but we are very pleased to see that they are not mentioned in this promise. We have many kind-hearted friends, but we are glad to see that they are not brought in here. God's great I, and that alone, fills up the whole space. And oh, what a blessing it is when we trust in the Lord alone! You have been, perhaps, as I have often been, in a cleft stick, where nobody could tell you how to get out, but yet the Lord found a way of escape for you. You were shut up, and you could not come forth, and then God cleared the way in a moment. What a great Maker of ways is God!

You young people, oh how earnestly I wish that you would begin with my Lord Jesus Christ—begin with the great and blessed Father, and Him, for He will take care of you to hoar hairs! Oh my brothers, do trust my God! Do not let the world say, "God's own people cannot trust Him"! Surely they will think that He is not to be depended on if you begin to doubt Him. Trust Him as He deserves to be trusted, and rest in Him with all your souls. And you, my aged brethren and sisters, to whom I speak with much reverence, show to us who are younger, where your joy and your peace are, that we also may rest in God. He has brought you through seventy years of trial! Do you think that He will now forsake you? You are eighty, you say, or even getting on to ninety. Well, you have at least eighty reasons why you should not distrust your God and Saviour. If you will read your own diaries, you will see that there are eighty million reasons why you should trust Him, and yet you cannot find one solitary reason why you should not do so. Wherefore, "rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him," and may He bless you evermore, for Jesus' sake!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE CHILD IN THE MANGER.*

THIS Child was born in the fullness of time, at a particular period and in a particular place, when the world was ready for Him and the development might begin. For that day all Jewish history had been looking and waiting. The nation in its slavery in Egypt, in its wandering in the desert, in its conquest of the land promised, and in its peace and rest under Solomon, in its splendors and its decay alike, had been preparing. Moses gave the law for it, Joshua conquered the Canaanites for it, David fought, and Solomon ruled, that it might come. And over all the world the people were scattered; and their land was a Roman province, that Moses might be preached in every city, and that the synagogues might be ready for the first preaching of the faith.

At no time as at this time—before certainly not, and after certainly not—was the situation of Israel such as to make the preaching of the Gospel to all nations effectual from itself as a basis. But now, everywhere throughout the empire, in Rome as in Corinth or Alexandria, was the idea of a one unseen, eternal, and only God, to be worshipped without image, altar, or bloody sacrifice, made common among polytheists and idolaters. The synagogue worship, uncommanded in, extraneous to, the Scriptures, seems to have had its divine authority sufficiently in this—that everywhere it was holding up its testimony of the Divine oneness, and that God is a spirit, to be worshipped in spirit, and that so the synagogue stood ready for the Apostle when he came to complete the testimony by preaching that God hath revealed Himself in His Son.

Other Nations Waiting.

Not Israel only had been guided for this, and in this its story made coherent, purposeful: Babylon rose for this, and fell; and Nineveh and Tyre and Sidon, and Tadmor in the wilderness. And in the dark, unnoticed, by the Tiber, the outlaws built their first rude fortification, and founded Rome. And slowly, still unknown to the great Oriental peoples, the germ so planted grew. The whole story of the building of Rome unfolds itself in battles, intrigues, struggles of leaders, writhings and fierce pains of the people, a very wolf's litter, bloody and hungry on the prey—till out of all comes the great, strong, masterful people, who, "dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly," lorded it over a submissive world.

But is the end of all Rome's splendid story to be the later Cæsars and the overwhelming rush of the barbarians? Had Rome no purpose? Nay, we dare to say, the purpose of Rome was a divine purpose, and the great empire was built on the foundation laid in mire and darkness, and the sweat and blood of men, for the new Kingdom of God. The great roads ran from the city to the empire's bounds, that St. Paul might travel swiftly to preach the gospel. The Mediterranean was whitened with the sails of the ships, that the story might be carried by the winds and the waves. One power ruled, that under its shadow there might be protection; for even an apostle, to fulfil his purpose, might need to say, "Civis Romanus sum" and appeal to Cæsar.

LADY STANLEY.

Wife of the Governor-General of Canada.

EVERYTHING Canadian is unusually interesting just now, and a portrait and sketch of the first lady in the Dominion will be welcome.

Lady Stanley of Preston, wife of the Governor-General of Canada, possesses a fine figure, a pleasant face, and an attractive manner. Since her arrival in Canada she has won much popularity, being bright and animated in conversation, and thoroughly informed upon social, political, and literary topics. Indeed, some Canadian politicians give Lady Stanley the credit of commanding rare diplomatic resources and skill.

Lady Constance Stanley of Preston was born in 1840, being the daughter of George William Frederick Villiers, fourth Earl of Clarendon. She is the eldest of a family of ten children. Her father was born in 1800, and in 1839 married Lady Catherine, daughter of Walter James, first Earl of Verulam. Earl Clarendon, father of Lady Stanley, was a leading English statesman, at one time Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

Lady Stanley was married to Lord Stanley on the 31st of May, 1864, and has been blessed with ten children, of whom one died in 1869, aged two years. One of them, Albert George, born in 1865, is now a lieutenant in the Grenadier Guards. Queen Victoria stood sponsor for Albert Victor, who was born in 1867.

VASSAR COLLEGE.

THE famous college for women near Poughkeepsie, N. Y., a picture of which appears on this page, was instituted, built, and endowed by an Englishman, Matthew Vassar, who was born in a small picturesque cottage at Tuddenham, Yorkshire, not far from the North Sea, April 29, 1792. His father emigrated to this country in 1796, and settled on a farm three miles from the present site of Poughkeepsie, and in 1801 he and his brother established a brewery in that city, which flourished until 1812, when it was burned. Matthew Vassar, in the meantime, had been to school, and from thence he went into a country store, but he subsequently established himself in business on his own account.

Mr. Vassar had no children to whom to leave his fortune, and, being of a charitable and philanthropic disposition, he earnestly desired to become a benefactor to his race, and to spend his money in some public-spirited manner. His first idea, and one he kept steadily in mind for ten years, was that of founding a hospital; and with this purpose in view he, in 1845, visited London, and studied the methods adopted in Guy's Hospital, which was founded over a hundred years before by a kinsman of his, who had been distinguished by a like philanthropic spirit to that of Mr. Vassar. This project, however, had not acquired definite shape, and he returned to Poughkeepsie with the subject still in mind, but with no matured plans. He, however, frequently conversed with friends, and confided to them his desire to realize his hope during his lifetime, when he could exercise a personal supervision over it, and enjoy seeing his work grow, and watch and judge of its uses, as well as to employ his own energies in guiding it.

His niece, Miss Booth, the principal of Cottage Hill Seminary for Young Ladies, had planted and fostered in his mind the idea of founding a model school for young ladies, but she suddenly died, and the seminary was closed; and for some time the subject of the education of women must have been banished from Mr. Vassar's mind; and he had taken the preliminary steps towards establishing in Poughkeepsie a large hospital for the sick, when these ideas were in turn thrust aside by circumstances.

Professor M. P. Jewett, who had been the principal of a large school for young women in Alabama, re-opened in 1855 the Cottage Hill Seminary, and at the same time united with the Central Baptist Church of Poughkeepsie, of which Mr. Vassar was a member. These gentlemen established at once friendly and confidential relations, Mr. Vassar confiding to him his cherished plans as to the disposition of his fortune, which was largely increasing yearly; and Professor Jewett suggested his building and endowing a college for young women—one that should be to their sex what Harvard and Yale colleges are to young men. Thus he might become a greater benefactor than by any other act or plan of his, as the uses would be more permanent, and, with ever-spreading influence, reach more recipients than a hospital could. Mr. Vassar was greatly pleased, and the desire was awakened in him to carry it out at once on a liberal scale.

A site was selected in a beautiful natural park of 200 acres extent, with charming woodland scenery, a picturesque lake of pure spring water, and the horizon bounded by distant mountains; this within two miles of Poughkeepsie, with which it is connected by car-tracks and telegraphic communication. On June 4, 1861, Mr.

Vassar lifted the first spadeful of earth from its bed, and traced with a plough the foundations of the future college, and in the spring of 1865 the building was completed.

The main building is 500 feet in length. The centre building and wings are five stories in height, the connecting portion being four stories. In this imposing building there are accommodations for 400 students, besides six independent dwellings for resident officers, apartments for a full complement of managers and servants; suites of rooms for class recitations, lectures, and instruction in music and painting, a chapel, dining-hall, and parlors, besides the picture-gallery, library, and philosophical apparatus, cabinets of natural history, and everything, in fact, contributing to the needs of a first-class college. The art gallery, containing over 400 paintings, represents some of the best-known English and American artists.

One beautiful June day, in 1868, seven years from the laying of the foundations of the college, Mr. Vassar met his associates of the board of trustees in the building. He proceeded to read his annual address to them. He read sitting, and his voice was so feeble that the board drew nearer to catch the words that faltered from his lips. Suddenly, towards the close, his voice ceased, the paper fell from his hand, his head sank back on his chair, and without a struggle, in that peace, serenity, and quiet of a good old age, Matthew Vassar passed away. His paper concluded with an invocation to the Divine goodness to continue His smiles and favor to the institution so cherished and beloved by him, and imploring the Divine benediction.

THE CATHEDRAL OF SEVILLE.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most exquisitely beautiful piles of architecture in the world is the famous cathedral, a picture of which appears on page 13. It was completed in 1519, and has, therefore, stood nearly 370 years. Its high tower, called the Giralda, is still more ancient, having been built by the Moors in 1196, and raised from its height of 250 feet, at which the Moors left it, to its present height of 350 feet in 1568, when a rich filigree belfry was added to it. The cathedral itself is 431 feet long, 315 feet wide, has seven aisles, and a magnificent organ with over five thousand pipes. The late Dr. S. Irenæus Prime, of New York, who visited it during one of his European tours, gives, in his interesting record of travel (published by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co.,) a graphic account of his visit. He says:

"It is the noblest example of the Gothic ecclesiastical architecture in the world. St. Peter's at Rome produces no such effect on the soul when first you enter it. The Cologne cathedral is nearer it in power. I have no superstitious feeling that compels me to be awed by a place; but I cannot enter this temple without worshipping. Instantly, as you stand within its walls, its giant solemn columns rising around, scarcely visible in the twilight at the noon of a brilliant southern day, its vastness, its amazing height, the roof, like a firmament, resting on arches dividing it into sixty-eight compartments, one feels that this surely ought to be none other than the house of God. High mass was celebrated during one of my many visits to the cathedral. When the tinkling of the bell gave the signal of 'the elevation of the host,' the faithful, wherever they chanced to be in the vast area, fell on their knees and silently worshipped the water over which the officiating priest had muttered his incantations, and now held aloft for the worship of the ignorant multitude. A woman entered one of the chapels, and knelt before an image of the Virgin, and poured out her soul in prayer; as if unconscious that spectators were all around her, she wept and told her beads."

It is a depressing picture of darkness, superstition, and ignorance. Happily, since that time there has been a hopeful movement witnessed in Spain. Vila and others have taught and preached; a Church of Jesus has been formed on similar evangelical principles to those which Bishop Riley is propagating in Mexico, and that Church is in harmonious sympathy with its Mexican sister. The accounts Bishop Riley has received recently from his Spanish brethren encourage sanguine hopes of a widespread evangelical movement, and he is laboring with new heart and vigor for the spiritual welfare of the Spanish-speaking peoples of this continent.

ESCAPED FROM THE MORMONS.

A Life Story: By Mrs. Stenhouse.

For More than Twenty-five Years the Wife of a Mormon Missionary and Elder.

A Wife's Trial.

BUT there were every-day matters of much more real importance to me than those strange speculations which had recently employed so much of time and attention. It was now necessary that I should either return to France and fulfil my engagement with Monsieur D., or else resolve, once and forever, to renounce all those ties which had become so dear to me. Meanwhile, religious theories were not the only influences brought to bear upon my mind. While day by day I began to be still more doubtful whether it would not after all be sinful in God's sight for me to leave my friends in the new faith and go back to France and my betrothed, who I knew neither was nor ever could become a Saint, other thoughts began to intrude themselves upon my mind, and to shake my determination.

Elder Stenhouse's visits to my father's house began to be more frequent than ever, but as he desired to become familiar with the French language, and would bring his French grammar with him "to get a lesson," as he said, no particular notice was taken of his frequent coming. He was always welcomed with pleasure by the whole family, and, of course, by myself, who was his teacher. My pupil was studious—so much so that he told my father and mother that he could not study very well in the parlor where every one was conversing, and begged the privilege of having the folding-doors thrown partly open, that we might sit in the back parlor and be more quiet, one of my sisters being sent in with her sewing to keep us company. But my pupil by this time had made rapid progress in the French language; and, while my sister was innocently sewing, he was repeating his lesson to me; and it was not our fault if in those French phrase-books there were passages expressive of love and devotion. Unconsciously to us both, he formed the habit of repeating those phrases to me at all times, and I formed the equally bad habit of blushing whenever he made use of them. This my sister observed, and communicated the fact to my mother, who immediately said that we had better discontinue our French for awhile, as it was monopolizing too much of our time, and keeping both of us from attending to other and more important duties.

But the discontinuance of the French lessons did not put an end to the visits of Elder Stenhouse. He was a persevering young man; but the secret of the great interest taken in the French lessons was soon discovered. Then it was that arguments of all kinds, and strong reasons, were brought forward to shake my purpose of returning to France. I was "in doubt," when, one day, discussing the point, Elder Stenhouse made use of the very same expression which had fallen from the sister's lips at the testimony-meeting I have referred to—"Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." My mind unsettled, with all its strength of argument and religion on the one side, and on the other no one to plead for reason and for my return to France, who can wonder that I—at best only a weak and inexperienced girl—listened to the entreaties of my friends, and resolved to stay.

In the course of a few months I was engaged to be married to Elder Stenhouse. It may, perhaps, seem strange that I could so soon forget the past, with all its pleasant memories, and renouncing my betrothed husband, Monsieur D., accept the attentions of another; but it should be remembered that I now firmly believed it was my duty—a duty which I dared not neglect—to blot out forever all past associations, however dear to my heart they might be. Besides which, I, in common with all around me, had learned to look upon Elder Stenhouse as almost an angel, on account of what he had endured for the gospel's sake; and I thought that any girl might consider herself honored by an offer of marriage from a man in his position in the Mormon Church. My marriage in France would, I feared, have been but doubtful happiness in this world, and certain ruin in the next; but heaven itself, I thought, would bless my union with one of its own ordained and tried servants. Thus it came to pass that on the 6th of February, 1850—eight months after my arrival in Southampton—I was married to the young Mormon missionary, Elder Stenhouse.

I entered upon my new sphere as a missionary's wife, feeling that there were no obstacles so great that I could not overcome them for the gospel's sake. How little could I then imagine the life that was before me! I wrote to my friends in France. I told them frankly all. In return they wrote to me—especially Monsieur D.—entreating me to alter my determination. Kind and very gentle were those letters. Dear, very dear, has been the memory of them, and of their beloved writers, in later days. But at the time I felt that the influence which they still retained over me was in itself a sin.

About three months after our marriage it was rumored that four of the Twelve Apostles had been appointed to foreign missions, and were then on their way to England. The Saints in Britain had been for years without any missionaries direct from the body of the Church, and the announcement of this foreign mission was hailed with joy. I confess to experiencing much pleasure at the thought of becoming acquainted with a living apostle. How often in my girlhood I wished that I had lived when men inspired of God walked the earth! What a joy, I thought, it would have been to have listened to the wisdom of such teachers! Now the time was near when I should realize all the happiness of my day-dreams—when I should really have the privilege of conversing with those chosen men of God. The invitation, therefore, to meet the Conference in London on the 1st of June was very welcome intelligence. We went to the London Conference—my husband and I; and there for the first time I met with Apostles, who were also Prophets and Priests and High Priests and Teachers and Elders and Deacons—all assembled in solemn convocation.

The four Apostles whom I met at that time were John Taylor, Lorenzo Snow, Erasmus Snow, and Franklin D. Richards—pleasant and agreeable men, and withal very fair specimens of Mormon missionaries, who had found favor in the eyes of Brigham Young and of the leaders in Zion, and who had been promoted accordingly. They lived comfortably, wore the finest broadcloth, fashionably cut, and were not averse to gold chains, and charms, and signet-rings, and other personal adornments. They put on no particular airs, were as polite and attentive to ladies as gentlemen always are, and could go to a theatre or any other place of amusement without hesitation. I afterwards discovered that, in one particular at least, if not in all, they resembled the early apostles, for they too could, like St. Paul, “lead about a sister” without any compunctions of conscience.

The Southampton Saints had hitherto formed only a branch of the London Conference, but did not form a conference of their own. It was now resolved that, since so large a number had recently been baptized in Hampshire, the several branches of the church there should be organized into a special conference at Southampton, with Elder Stenhouse as its president; and the Sunday following was appointed for that purpose, when the Apostle Snow, en route to Italy—to which country he had just been appointed missionary—would honor the occasion with his presence.

As we returned, some gentlemen in the same railway carriage, to while away the time, I suppose, entered into a religious discussion. What the subject was I do not now remember; but I can recollect that a good deal was said as to which of all the numerous Christian sects really possessed Divine authority. Elder Stenhouse took an active part in the argument, and being, like all the Mormon missionaries at that time, very well posted in Scriptural discussions, he attracted considerable attention, and was much complimented by several persons present. The Apostle Lorenzo Snow was silent all the time, but he took note of all that passed. Elder Stenhouse was a man of great zeal and untiring energy—qualities in which perhaps Brother Snow felt himself a little deficient; and he was going on a mission which required unflinching devotion and perseverance. We had not been an hour at home before he told my husband that he should accompany him to Italy! How often—even while I still clung to Mormonism—did it appear strange to me that the “revelations” of distinguished Saints should so frequently coincide with their own personal wishes and inclinations, and come at such convenient times!

I had laid aside my travelling-dress, and was hastening to provide some refreshment for the Apostle, when my husband came and told me of the revelation which had been so opportunely received. I was at that time as much an enthusiast as Elder Stenhouse himself, and I felt honored that my husband should be the first English Elder appointed to a foreign mission. Here was the fulfilment of my ambition—that we should be in the forefront of the battle, and should obtain distinction as zealous servants of God. But at what a cost was this ambition purchased! My poor, weak heart sickened at the thought—I had been but four months married.

When the Apostle asked me if I were willing that Elder Stenhouse should go to Italy, I answered “Yes,” though I felt as if my heart would break. I remembered that in my first transport of joy and gratitude after being baptized, I had made a covenant with the Lord that I would do anything which He might require of me; and I dared not rebel or break that vow. Oh, the agony that fell upon my young heart! It seemed that the weight of a mountain rested upon it when I was told that my husband might be five years absent. He had already been five years a travelling elder without a home, trusting for daily bread to the voluntary kindness of the Saints. He had labored faithfully, and looked forward to the day when his “Conference” should be established, and he could count upon an improvement in his temporal position, and an early call to emigrate to Zion. In the few months that I had been his wife, it was only natural that I should share his hopes; but just at the moment when they were about to be realized, hopes and expectations were scattered to the winds. On the following day the Saints assembled, the Southampton Conference was organized, and Elder Stenhouse elected its president. Ten minutes later, he was publicly appointed by the Apostle on a mission to Italy.

During the few days which intervened between the time when Elder Stenhouse received his appointment and the hour of his departure I enjoyed but little of his society. Arranging the affairs of the Conference which he was leaving, and preparation for his mission, fully occupied his attention. I do not think we either of us uttered a word, when alone together, respecting the future that was before us. It was probably better that we did not. There are moments of our life when silence is better than speech; and it is safer to trust in the mercy of a compassionate God than to try to shape our own destiny.

The Saints are noted for the fraternal spirit which exists among them. There are, of course, exceptions; but, as a rule, every Mormon is willing to help his brother in the faith, acting upon the principle, “One is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren.” The Southampton Saints were no exception to this rule, but showed their kindness both to my husband and myself in a thousand little ways. I have spoken of my unhappiness during that week of preparation, but I must not forget that there were gleams of hope in the darkness. One occasion I shall never forget—a picnic which our friends held as a kind of valedictory feast in honor of the departing missionaries, of Elder Stenhouse in particular.

Right up the Southampton River, not far from Netley Abbey, is a pleasant and picturesque spot named Bittern, which I need not too particularly describe, although the memory of its beauty recalls recollections of mingled sadness and pleasure to my mind. There my parents now lived, and thither it was proposed our friends should go. They could obtain all they needed for the picnic at my father’s house, and we could take our good things into the woods, and enjoy ourselves as we pleased. We had a very happy time; for the moment, even I forgot the cloud that was hanging over me; and our dear friends not only enjoyed themselves to the utmost, but seemed bent upon making the time pass pleasantly to everyone else.

I had been talking to Sister White about the recent doings of the Saints, the establishment of the Conference, and the sending away of Elder Stenhouse. I wanted Sister White, as in fact I wanted every one else, to think that I was perfectly happy in the separation, and that I counted my feelings as a wife as nothing when placed in the balance against my duty as a missionary; and I tried to impress upon her how proud I was that my husband should be the first English Elder entrusted with a foreign mission. We talked together a great deal in this way. She was still quite a young woman, though married and the mother of four darling children; but probably she had a better experience than I had, and could see through my attempts to stifle my natural feelings, while, at the same time, she sympathized with me. She spoke very kindly to me; and as we talked, we wandered inadvertently away from the rest of the party. Suddenly she thought of her little boy, and, mother-like, thinking he might be in danger, ran off in search of him, promising to come back immediately.

I sat down upon the grass to await her return. I was somewhat excited by the conversation which had passed between us; but as I sat musing, my agitation began to cool down, and I was soon lost in thought, and did not notice that I was not alone. I did not hear the light footsteps near me, and did not see a little fairy friend, as I called her, pass between me and the sun. But a tiny hand was laid gently on my shoulder, and looking up I saw the loving eyes of Mary Burton looking straight down into mine.

“Where have you been, dear?” I asked. “Why, I have hardly seen you all the day.” “But I knew you were here,” she said, “and I thought you were alone; and I wanted to see you, and talk with you.” “Come and sit down beside me, Mary,” I said, “and let us have a little chat together.” Then I drew her gently towards me, and she sat down by my side. For a few moments we said nothing, but I was watching her, and waiting to hear what she would say. She seemed such a sweet and gentle girl—more like one of those little birds of glorious plumage and thrilling song that we see glittering among the dew-drops and the dancing leaves, than a child of earth. And I pitied her for her beauty, for such beauty is often a snare; and I wondered whether her innocent soul was as fair and glorious before God as her face was sweet to me; and I asked whether in years to come, when the glory of her childish radiance had passed away, the brightness of a soul pure and serene would lend a new beauty to her features—the beauty, of a noble womanhood.

I took her hand in mine, and asked her some trifling question; but she did not answer. Suddenly she looked up full into my face, and said, “Sister Stenhouse; I’m very sorry for you.”

“Sorry for me, dear?” I said. “Why should you be sorry? I am not sad.”

“You shouldn’t say so,” she replied; “you know in your heart you are sad, although you don’t say so. It’s a fine thing, no doubt, for Elder Stenhouse to go away, though for my part I’d rather stop at home if I loved any one there; and at any rate, you must feel sorry that he is going away so far, if you love him.”

“But, Mary,” I said, “you know it is his duty to go; and he has been called to it by the Apostle, and it is a great honor.”

“Oh yes, I know that,” she replied, “I know that.” Then we relapsed into silence for some few moments. Drawing nearer to me, she said again, quite suddenly.

“Sister Stenhouse, do you know the meaning of the word ‘polygamy’?”

“Why, what a singular question to ask me, child!” I exclaimed.

“Child, you call me, Sister Stenhouse; but I’m not a child—at least not quite a child; I shall be fifteen next birthday.”

“Well, dear,” I said, “I did not mean to offend you; and I call you ‘child’ because I love you; but you asked me such a strange question, and used such a strange word.” This was quite true, for at that time the word “polygamy” was as seldom used as the word “polyandry,” or any other word signifying a state of things with which we have nothing to do.

“I’m not offended,” she said, “only people have a way of treating me as if I were only such a very little girl; I suppose I look so.”

She certainly did look so, and I suppose she read my thoughts. Womanhood, by and by, brought to her more of reality, both in face and figure, as well as in the terrible facts of life; but at that time the term “Little Fairy,” which I have so often used respecting her, seemed the most appropriate. The meaning of that terrible word “polygamy” she understood in later years fully as well as I did. “Well, dear,” I said, “why did you ask that strange question?” “You must promise not to be angry with me if I tell you,” she answered; “and yet I think you ought to know.”

MY PLEA.

Dear Lord it seems from day to day,
I nothing do, I nothing say,
But hide within my heart of hearts,
The joy Thy love to me imparts.

When answers to my prayers are given,
I trembling send my thanks to heaven.
Teach me, my Lord, to meekly tell
To others that I know so well.

Use all my powers to work for Thee.
Give of Thy spirit large and free,
That rising with each new-born day,
Fit Thou my armor for the way.

O when there comes a needy cry,
Send, Lord, through me, a full supply;
The teeming earth is wholly Thine,
Give me to raise some drooping vine.

Do freed men cry for gospel food?
Give me to send the needed good.
Do heathen live in dusk of sin?
O give me grace a soul to win.

Whether by mine or other hands,
O send Dear Lord to distant lands
The means to speed the joyful day
Of Jesus' coming, Jesus' sway.

O Father hear this prayer of mine
Make me a dresser of some drooping vine
And let my joy abound in Thee
Thou King of Kings Thou Triune Three.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressing needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

"The Gladstone" LAMP

is the finest lamp in the world. It gives a pure, soft, brilliant white light of 85 candle power, — a marvelous light from ordinary kerosene oil!

Seeing is Believing

A "wonderful lamp" it is indeed. Never needs trimming, never smokes nor breaks chimneys, never "smells of the oil," no gumming up, no leaks, no sputtering, no climbing of the flame, no annoyance of any kind, and cannot explode. And besides all these advantages it gives a clear, white light, 10 to 20 times the size and brilliancy of any ordinary house lamp! Finished in either Brass, Nickel, Gold or Antique Bronze.

Send postal card for illustrated price list. Single lamps at wholesale price, carefully boxed and sent by express. Get our prices! "Seeing is believing." Address GLADSTONE LAMP CO., 10 East 14th St., New York.
